BODLEIAN LIBRARY

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological, and other TABLES.

VOL. X.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G. and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLEY, T. MOOER, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookfellers.

M DCC XLV.

1937

VI I

CONTENTS

OF

VOLUME X.

THE History of the Jews from their Return from the Babyloniſh Captivity, to the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by Titus Veſpaſian, Page 3

SECT. I.

From their Return from Babylon, to their coming under the Government of their High-Prieſts, &c. ibid.

SECT. II.

Their Government under their Pontiffs and Maccabees. 61

SECT. III.

Their Hiſtory from Judas Maccabeus, to their being ſubdued by the Romans, 125

SECT. IV.

From their Subjection to the Romans, to the Reign of Herod the Great; and the taking of Jeruſalem by him, 232

SECT.

CONTENTS.

SECT. V.

From Herod the Great's Reign to the Birth of Chriſt, with an Account of the principal Sects that then reigned in Judæa, 28●

SECT VI.

From the Birth to the Death of Chriſt, 38●

SECT. VII.

From Chriſt's Reſurrection to the total Deſtruction of the City and Temple; and Diſperſion of the Jewiſh Nation, 519.

'AN

TO THE

RIGHT HONOURABLE

WILLIAM

LORD TALBOT,

BARON of HENSOL.

My LORD,

WE presume to lay before Your Lordship this Part of the UNIVERSAL HISTORY; a Work which has hitherto received a favourable Applause, and is at present read by most Nations of Europe in their several Dialects, and by the Learned of all Nations in that Language which is peculiar to Men of Letters. The Names of the Noble Personages who have given Countenance and Protection to the foregoing Volumes, have, no doubt, greatly contributed to the uncommon Approbation they have met with, and heightened their Reputation among our own Countrymen, as well as Foreigners. That this Volume might, at its first Appearance in the World, be attended with the same Advantages as the former, is the Motive that has induced us to take the Liberty of inscribing it to Your Lordship: For who can be so little conversant in the Histories of the present and past Ages, as not to be greatly influenced in favour of a Performance, which displays the Illustrious Name of TALBOT? The Name of a Family from which your Lordship is lineally derived, near as antient as our Monarchy, and ever revered by this Nation, as it has eminently adorned the highest Offices both in Church and State: For whoever turns over the English Annals, must find the TALBOTS exerting erting their great Talents for the Service of their Country, commanding Armies in the Field, preſiding in the Senate, or at the Head of a glorious Adminiſtration. And here, my Lord, we muſt ask Pardon for reviving Your's and the Kingdom's deplorable Loſs, when we reflect upon that Great and Good Man Your Father, who, to his immortal Honour, was the Darling of the preſent, as he will be the Admiration of all future, Times. My Lord, a Subject ſo copious as the CHARACTER of the laſt Lord Chancellor, we are ſenſible, cannot be confined to the narrow Limits of a Dedication; and we ſhall the rather decline it, becauſe we hope to ſee THAT become one of the moſt amiable Parts of ſome future Volume: Beſides, my Lord, as You are univerſally allowed to inherit his extraordinary Virtues, we will not dare to offend that remarkable Modeſty, which, with his other valuable Qualities, hath deſcended to Your Lordſhip. Therefore we ſhall not preſume further, but only with Your Lordſhip's Permiſſion, to acquaint the World, that the ſole Aim of this Addreſs is to pay a Reverence to ſuch exalted Merit, and to have the Honour of declaring ourſelves to be, with the utmoſt Duty and Reſpect,

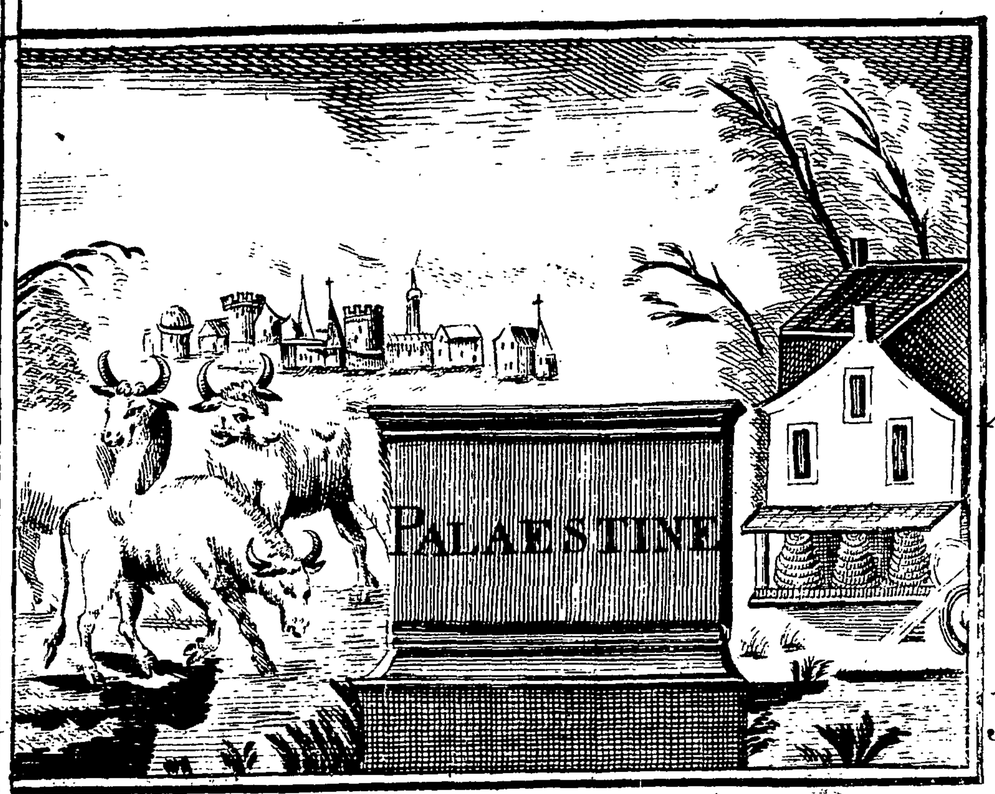
MY LORD,

Your Lordſhip's



Moſt Obedient,

And Devoted,

Humble Servants,

The Authors.

North

THE GREAT

OR

MEDITERRANEAN

SEA

PART OF EGYPT

The Desert of Sur

Desert of Etham

ARABIA PETRÆA.

The Desert of Sinai

Achzib Ecdippa

Sidon

Antilibanus

Hermon

Trachonitis

Sarepta

Phialæ Lac.

Eleutherus Flu.

Emath

Paneas Cæsarea Philippi

Auranitis

Dan

Gabala

Tyre

Auran

Jarra

Cedes-sa

Palætyrus

Argob

Geshuri

TRAEA

Seleucia

Chabul

ASHER

UPPER

Hazor

Samachonitis Lacus

Aforus

Batanæ

Livias

Ace Aco Ptolemais

Abdon

Cana

Bethsaramphtha

Basan

Canatha

Chorazin

Edrai

Togane

ZEBULON

GALILEE

Zippor

Nazareth

Bethlehem

Gamala

Gaulonitis

Gaulon

Carmel

Naim

Iturea M.

Bethsaida Julias

Pella

Endor

Capernaum

Tarichæa

Tiberias

Gerasha

Jabes

Magdala

ISACHAR

Dora

Gadara

Gilead

Jesreel

Half of MANASSE

Nophet

Ramath

Abela

Straton's Tower

Cæsarea Palæstinæ

Geboe M.

Bethsan

Rabba Philadelphia

Mahanaim

Jaramoth

Galgal

Scythopolis

Mizpa

Thirza

Succot

Ephron

Jaser

SAMARIA

Jamaria al. Sebaste

Jalim

Aenon

Apollonia

Garizim M.

Sichem

Antipatris

Neapolis

GAD

Saron

Darcas

Bethabara

Mennith

EPHRAIM

Joppa

Acrabata

Gibeon

Ai

Sichon

Gazara

Silo

Acrabatene

Bethel, Luz

Heshbon

Ramata

Phaselis

Thimna

Bethoron

Gilgal

Emmaus

Jericho

Jerusalem

Tecoa

Iabne

Iamnia

Mizpa

BENJAMIN

Accaron or Ekron

Bethsemes

Asecq

Roma

Bethlehem

Azotus

Gallim

Ephrata

Herodium

Matherus

Herodium

Dibon

Aroer

Asdod

Gath

Adullam

Bozra

Areopolis

Libna

Eleuthera

Arnon

Gabathon

Hebron

Mamre

Iuith

Madian

Ascalon

DAN

Machpelah

Ziph

Lachis

Enaim

Carioth

Gaza

Jalim

Zicklag

Ather

The Desert of Ziph

Etam

Gesuri

Engaddi

Carmel

Sodom

Besor Flu.

Maon

Statue of Salt

Zoar

Anthedon

Arad

Rhinocolura or Rhinocorura

Raphea

Gerara

Cades

Masada

Wilds of Berseba

barnea

Sichor Flu.

Ostracine

Pompey's Tomb

Mount Casius

Jupiter's Temple

Sirbon Lake

Casiotes

Rimon Perez

Libna

Hazeroth

Kibroth Hataavah

Elusa

Tabeera

Eboda

Harada

Makhelata

Tahath

Mirka

Sinai M.

Horeb

Hasmona

Maserot

Mara

Elim

Raphidim

Massa

Bne Jaakan

Hor M.

Iie Abarim

Theman

Dedan

Phunon

Zalmona

Petra Arce

Oboth

Zared Flu.

Aarim M.

Nebo M.

Aroer

Ar or Areopolis

Dibon

RUBEN

MOABITIS

JUDAH

ASPHALTITES OR DEAD SEA

Jordan Flu.

Lake of Tiberias

Lake of Genesaret

R. Kison Flu.

Megiddo

Ipsaminium

Apollonia

Joppa

Iabne

Iamnia

Accaron or Ekron

Azotus

Asdod

Ascalon

Gaza

Straton's Tower

Cæsarea Palæstinæ

Jaramoth

Dora

Nophet

Jesreel

Half of MANASSE

Gilead

Gadara

Gerasha

Jabes

Magdala

Abela

Rabba Philadelphia

Mizpa

Succot

Ephron

Jaser

Aenon

Jalim

Jamaria al. Sebaste

Garizim M.

Sichem

Neapolis

Antipatris

Darcas

Gibeon

Bethabara

Mennith

Sichon

Heshbon

Aroer

Dibon

Arnon

Areopolis

Madian

Aarim M.

Zared Flu.

Iie Abarim

Nebo M.

Oboth

Phunon

Zalmona

Petra Arce

Hor M.

Mara

Elim

Raphidim

Massa

Horeb

Sinai M.

Bne Jaakan

Mirka

Hasmona

Maserot

Tahath

Makhelata

Harada

Kehelatha

Tabeera

Eboda

Elusa

Hazeroth

Kibroth Hataavah

Rimon Perez

Libna

Theman

Dedan

Bozra

Sea of Salt

Pompey's Tomb

Mount Casius

Jupiter's Temple

Sirbon Lake

Casiotes

Ostracine

Sichor Flu.

Rhinocolura or Rhinocorura

Raphea

Gerara

Anthedon

Besor Flu.

Wilds of Berseba

Arad

Cades barnea

Statue of Salt

Zoar

Masada

Bozra

Matherus

Herodium

Bethsemes

Asecq

Roma

Bethlehem

Gallim

Gath

Libna

Eleuthera

Adullam

Ephrata

Hebron

Mamre

Machpelah

Ziph

Lachis

Enaim

Carioth

Jalim

Zicklag

Ather

The Desert of Ziph

Etam

Gesuri

Engaddi

Carmel

Sodom

Maon

Bethhirei

Besor Flu.

Statue of Salt

Zoar

Masada

Arad

Cades barnea

Wilds of Berseba

Sichor Flu.

Ostracine

Pompey's Tomb

Mount Casius

Jupiter's Temple

Sirbon Lake

Casiotes

Rimon Perez

Libna

Theman

Dedan

Bozra

Hazeroth

Kibroth Hataavah

Elusa

Tabeera

Eboda

Harada

Makhelata

Tahath

Mirka

Sinai M.

Horeb

Hasmona

Maserot

Mara

Elim

Raphidim

Massa

Bne Jaakan

Hor M.

Iie Abarim

Nebo M.

Oboth

Phunon

Zalmona

Petra Arce

Aarim M.

Zared Flu.

Aroer

Ar or Areopolis

Dibon

Arnon

Madian

Carioth

Iuith

Jordan Flu.

Lake of Tiberias

Lake of Genesaret

R. Kison Flu.

Megiddo

Ipsaminium

Carmel

Naim

Iturea M.

Endor

Capernaum

Tarichæa

Tiberias

Bethsaida Julias

Gamala

Gaulonitis

Gaulon

Pella

Gerasha

Jabes

Magdala

Gadara

Gilead

Ramath

Abela

Rabba Philadelphia

Mahanaim

Mizpa

Succot

Ephron

Jaser

Aenon

Jalim

Jamaria al. Sebaste

Garizim M.

Sichem

Neapolis

Antipatris

Darcas

Gibeon

Bethabara

Mennith

Sichon

Heshbon

Aroer

Dibon

Arnon

Areopolis

Madian

Aarim M.

Zared Flu.

Iie Abarim

Nebo M.

Oboth

Phunon

Zalmona

Petra Arce

Hor M.

Mara

Elim

Raphidim

Massa

Horeb

Sinai M.

Bne Jaakan

Mirka

Hasmona

Maserot

Tahath

Makhelata

Harada

Kehelatha

Tabeera

Eboda

Elusa

Hazeroth

Kibroth Hataavah

Rimon Perez

Libna

Theman

Dedan

Bozra

Sea of Salt

Pompey's Tomb

Mount Casius

Jupiter's Temple

Sirbon Lake

Casiotes

Ostracine

Sichor Flu.

Rhinocolura or Rhinocorura

Raphea

Gerara

Anthedon

Besor Flu.

Wilds of Berseba

Arad

Cades barnea

Statue of Salt

Zoar

Masada

Bozra

Matherus

Herodium

Bethsemes

Asecq

Roma

Bethlehem

Gallim

Gath

Libna

Eleuthera

Adullam

Ephrata

Hebron

Mamre

Machpelah

Ziph

Lachis

Enaim

Carioth

Jalim

Zicklag

Ather

The Desert of Ziph

Etam

Gesuri

Engaddi

Carmel

Sodom

Maon

Bethhirei

Besor Flu.

Statue of Salt

Zoar

Masada

Arad

Cades barnea

Wilds of Berseba

Sichor Flu.

Ostracine

Pompey's Tomb

Mount Casius

Jupiter's Temple

Sirbon Lake

Casiotes

Rimon Perez

Libna

Theman

Dedan

Bozra

Hazeroth

Kibroth Hataavah

Elusa

Tabeera

Eboda

Harada

Makhelata

Tahath

Mirka

Sinai M.

Horeb

Hasmona

Maserot

Mara

Elim

Raphidim

Massa

Bne Jaakan

Hor M.

Iie Abarim

Nebo M.

Oboth

Phunon

Zalmona

Petra Arce

Aarim M.

Zared Flu.

Aroer

Ar or Areopolis

Dibon

Arnon

Madian

Carioth

Iuith

34

33

32

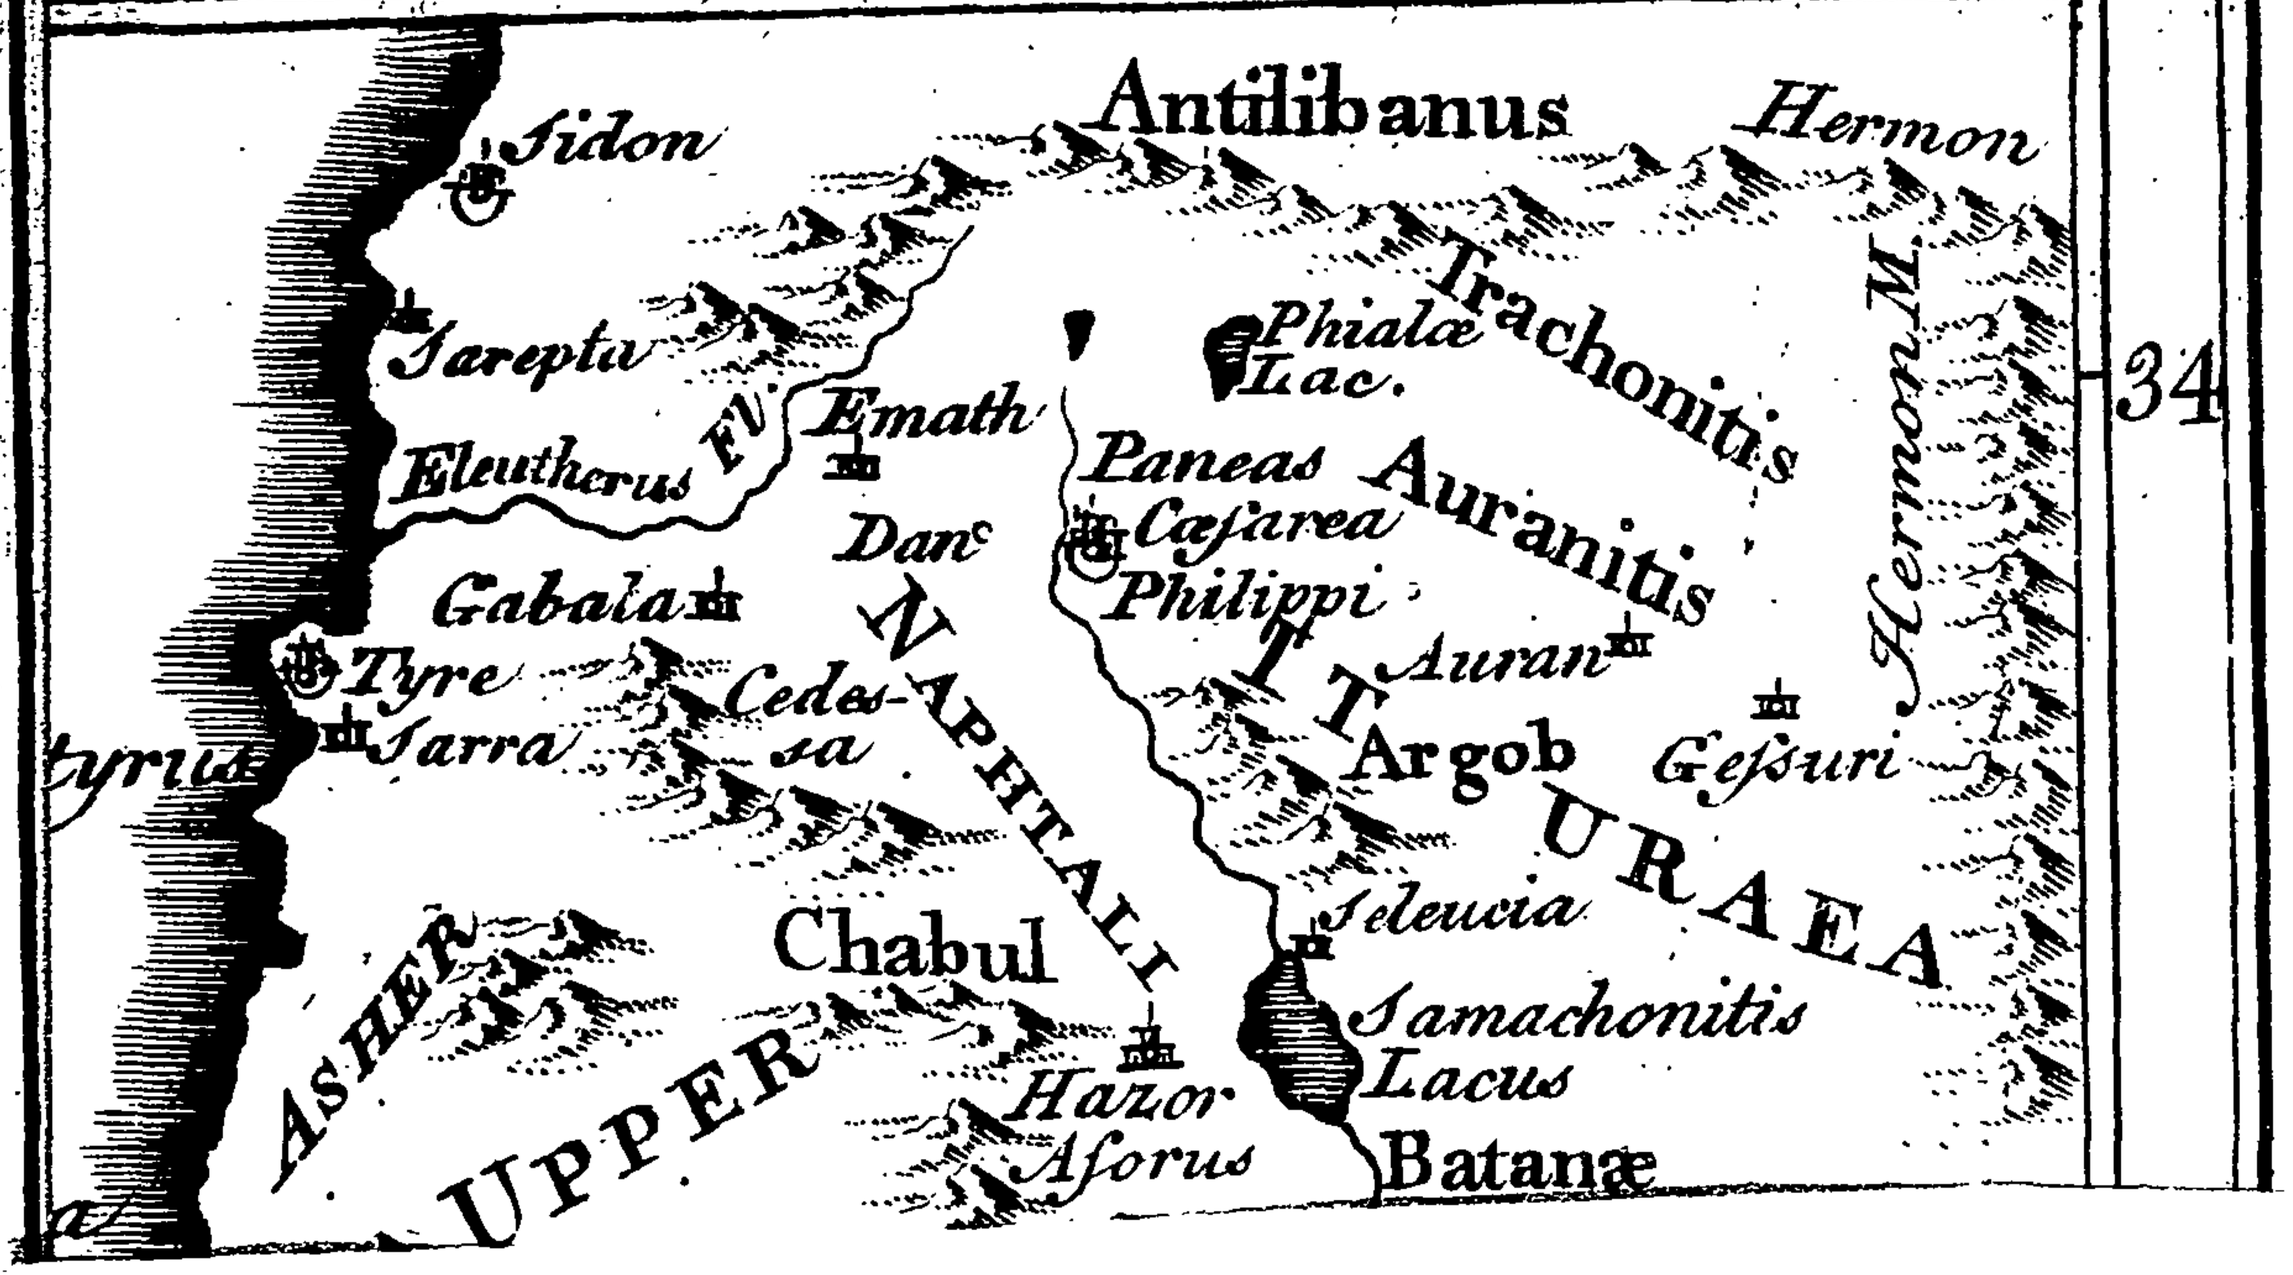
31

West

East

Part of Egypt

The Desert of Sur



Desert of Etham

ARABIA PETRÆA.

The Desert of Sinai

South

J. Wheatley Sculpt.

Antilibanus
Hermon
Sidon
Trachonitis
Phialæ Lac.
Sareptu
Emath
Eleutherus Fl.
Paneas
Auranitis
Cæsarea Philippi
Dan
Gabala
Auran
Tyre
Cedes-sa
Jarra
Tyrus
Argob
Gessuri
Hermon Mt.
NAPHTALI
ITURAEA
Seleucia
Chabul
ASHER
Samachonitis Lacus
UPPER Hazor
Batanæ
Aforus
34

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XI.

The Hiſtory of the Jews, from their return from the Babyloniſh captivity to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus Veſpaſian, with an account of their diſperſion and condition to this preſent time.

THIS chapter, long and extenſive as it is, it containing an epocha of five hundred and thirty-ſix years from their return into Judæa to the birth of Chriſt, and ſeventy-three more from that time to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem and total diſperſion of the Jewiſh nation, may be conveniently enough divided into ſeven ſections or æras, according to the following chronological order: The diviſion and chronology of this chapter.

	Years of the flood.	Total of years.
Sect. I. From their return to Jeruſalem, to their being governed by their high-prieſts, where the canonical books end	2463 to 2590	127
II. From thence to the death of Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, and his being ſucceeded by his valiant ſon Judas	2833	43
III. The reigns of the Maccabees, from Judas to their being ſubdued by Pompey	2934	101
IV. To the reign of Herod and his taking of Jeruſalem, a ſhort but copious epoch	2962	28

	Years of the flood	Total of years. Years after Christ.
V. To the birth of Christ, concluding with an account of the principal Jewish sects at that time: And	33	70
VI. To the death of Christ in the thirty-third year of his age
VII. To the total destruction of Jerusalem and dispersion of the Jewish nation	73	40
		609

A summary of the state of the Jews during this epocha.

THE account of their dispersion and condition to this present time we shall give in an appendix.

BUT, before we pass to the first section, it will be convenient to premise some few things concerning the state of the Jews during this new epoch; for from this time they are no more to be looked upon as that free, rich, and glorious people, which they had been, either under their former theocracy, as Josephus rightly terms it [a], or under their opulent and warlike monarchs, and the direction of their prophets. Their condition, government, manners, their very name, and every thing but their religion, is now intirely changed! And indeed, it could hardly be expected otherwise, when we consider, that those that had been carried away into Babylon were sold for slaves, and dispersed far and wide through that vast empire, according to the custom of those conquerors; and though some of them we find to have attained to very considerable posts [b], or grown exceeding rich in the land of their captivity, yet these were but few, in comparison of those who groaned under the heavy hand of their oppressors [c]. Neither was it the former, but the latter, that is, the poorer sort, that came back into Judæa; and even of these, the whole amount of all that came, either with Zerubbabel, Ezra, or Nehemiah, did scarcely come up to seventy thousand; among whom a multitude of strangers was likewise intermixed, either by marriages, or otherwise, most of them so indigent, that they were forced to be supported in their journey by the charitable contributions of those that stayed behind.

THEY were indeed to be governed by their own laws; but as they still continued in subjection to other nations, to the

[a] Cont. Apion. l. ii. c. 6. [b] Vid. Nehem. i. Esth. i. Tobit. pass. [c] Vid. int. al. Psalm cxxxvii.

the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans, that privilege, as well as the exercise of their religion, did very much depend on the arbitrary will of their conquerors, and was often curtailed, and sometimes wholly taken away. Even whilst they were under the Persians, the lives and estates of the whole nation were on the brink of being sacrificed to the ambition of a favourite Haman, had not Esther's interest miraculously prevented the execution of that bloody edict[d]; and so weak did they continue under them, that they were a long time exposed to the injuries of even the neighbouring Samaritans. They seem, however, to have recovered themselves by degrees, and to have lived in more peace and plenty during the two following centuries; and that is perhaps the reason of that vast chasm of near two hundred and fifty years in their history, between the death of Nehemiah and the times of the Maccabees, when those glorious heroes not only shook off the foreign yoke, but raised the glory of their nation by their victories and conquests, and by obliging other nations to embrace the Jewish religion. But this epocha was but short-lived, and eighty years were hardly expired, before the ungovernable ambition of some of their unworthy successors introduced a general apostacy, and brought them under such subjection to the Romans, as they could never more shake off. Herod indeed, whom these raised to the royal dignity, did greatly increase the glory and opulence of the Jewish nation; but as he was an Idumean, who had gained the crown by the destruction of the Asmonean race, as he was a vassal to the Romans, and a tyrant of the Jews, they could neither be said to be free or happy during his hateful reign, much less under those of his successors, when the government of Judæa was split into so many toparchies; so that the nation went from thenceforward from bad to worse, till their total destruction. We observed that they were changed in their very name; that of Israelites was quite lost, as well as those of all the other tribes, which were absorbed into that of Judah. So that from their return they were chiefly known by the name of Jews, in opposition to the Samaritans, who were a mongrel mixture, partly of the ten tribes, partly of revolted Jews, and of other nations, as the sequel will soon shew. Religion was the only thing that received the least change since their re-establishment, and if we except some apostacies, occasioned by persecutions, or the ambition of some of their high-priests, we shall find them in the sequel more averse to idolatry and all heathenish superstitions, ons, than ever their fore-fathers had been prone to them before the captivity; ſuch ſtrict obſervers of the ſabbath, as to ſuffer themſelves to be murdered by whole armies, rather than violate it by ſtanding on their defence; in a word, ſo zealous for their religion, and ſuch ſtrict obſervers of their oaths, whether of allegiance or confederacy, as to ſuffer the moſt bloody perſecutions and horrid butcheries, with the utmoſt courage and conſtancy, rather than to violate their laws or fidelity. This is indeed a virtue, which, as Joſephus rightly obſerves, was peculiar to the Jews [c], and which no other nation or religion could ever lay any claim to, till the ſufferings, number, and conſtancy of the chriſtian martyrs, did in a great meaſure eclipſe the glory of the Jewiſh ones. We have already ſeen ſeveral inſtances of theſe laſt in a former volume, but ſhall find them ſtill more frequent in this ſequel of their hiſtory.

[d] Esther iii. & seq.

[c] Cont. Apion. ubi ſupra.

SECT. I.

The Hiſtory of the Jews, from their return out of Babylon to their being governed by their high-prieſts, where the canonical books end.

AS ſoon as the ſeventy years captivity pronounced by Jeremiah againſt this rebellious people [a], were fully accompliſhed (A), God was pleaſed to raiſe up the great Cyrus to

[a] Jerem. xxv. 11. xxix. 10. See before, Vol. IV. p. 173.

(A) Theſe ſeventy years are differently computed; ſome begin them from the fourth of Jehoiakim, when the firſt Jewiſh captives were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (1), and end them at the firſt iſſuing of Cyrus's decree. Others from the words of Zechariah (2) place the beginning of it at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and its concluſion at the publication of Darius's decree for the building of the temple, and reſtoring of liberty to the Jews.

Both computations may be juſtly maintained, and may have even been deſigned by Jeremiah, ſince between either of the two epochas there are juſt ſeventy years, and the latter begins and ends juſt eighteen years after the former.

(1) 2 Kings xxiv. 10, & ſeq. (2) Ch. vii. 1, & ſeq.

For

to the throne; who, in the very first year of his reign, issued out that decree in favour of them, of which an account has been given in a former volume *. By this edict they were not only permitted to return to their own land, which that prince had doubtless beheld, in some late expedition, lying desolate and barren, though naturally fertile (B); but also to rebuild Cyrus's decree. Year of the flood 2463. Year before Christ 536.

* Vol. V. p. 81. & not.

For as the captivity which began in the fourth of Jehoïakim, could not be said to be completed till the total destruction of the city and Jewish monarchy; so neither could their deliverance, begun at the first decree of Cyrus, be said to be completed till the fourth year of Darius, which confirmed and put it in full vigor and execution.

We may still reckon a third method or stage of computing these seventy years, which answers in the same exactness with the two former; namely, from the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, when Nebuzaradan carried off all the remainder of the conquered Jews; at which time the captivity was completed to all intents; and the full restoration of their temple worship, at the solemn dedication of the new temple, and their celebrating the first passover immediately after it in the seventh year of Darius's reign; when, and not till then, was fully completed the end of their thraldom, and the Jewish religion restored to its antient splendor and regularity. All these the reader may see fully demonstrated by the learned Prideaux (3) in the place last quoted.

However, the words of the prophecy before us, we own, seem to fix the epocha according to the first of these stages; though those of Zechariah do more plainly belong to the last, as will be shewn in its due time.

(B) We have shewn in a former volume †, that the Jews were obliged by the Mosaic law to let their lands lie fallow every seventh year (4); but this had been neglected for a considerable time; for which God caused it to lie desolate and uncultivated, till it had recovered that full respite, of which that rebellious nation had deprived it (5).

If therefore we reckon the whole seventy sabbatic years to be here implied, it will follow, that the omission of this law began even before the time of David, or even of Samuel; but it is scarce credible, that it should have been suffered under the government of two such pious persons; whereas, if we date the desolation of the land from the murder of Gedaliah, at which time those few Jews that were left there fled into Egypt; to this rebuild their temple at Jerusalem, renew the divine worship and transport thither all the sacred utensils which Nebuchadnezzar had brought away from thence. These last he ordered to be delivered by Mithridath, his high treasurer, to Sheshbazzar, whom we take to be the same with Zerubbabel (C), who being the grandson of Jehoiakim, or Jeconiah, king of Judah, was then the first prince of the royal blood, and was therefore appointed head governor of Judæa, under the title of Tirshatha [b]. He likewise gave directions concerning the dimensions of the temple, which was to be sixty cubits in height and breadth, built upon a strong foundation, with three rows of great stones, and a row of timber; the expence of the whole to be furnished out of the king's house [c]; to all these the king added a full permission to all the Jews that were so disposed to return into Judæa, and to those who preferred staying behind, free liberty to contribute, as liberally as first year of Cyrus, the number of sabbatic years will be just fifty-two, and will carry us back three hundred and sixty-four years, that is, to about the beginning of Asa's reign, from which time the people began to be very remiss in this and many other particulars of the Mosaic law (6).

(3) Vid. Prideaux. Connect. vol. i. part 3. † See before, vol. iii. p. 207. (4) Levit. xxv. 1, & seq. (5) Conf. Levit. xxvi. 34, & seq. 2 Chron. cap. ult. vers. 21.

[b] Conf. Ezra i. 8, 11. ii. 2. iii. 8, 10. v. 16. [c] See Ezra vi. 3, 4.

(C) It is likely, that the first was his Babylonish name (7), it being customary for those conquerors to change the names of their captives, as we find they did those of some of the later kings of Judah (8), as well as those of Daniel and his three companions (9). As to the title of Tirshatha, or Hatirshatha, though some derive it from the Chaldee, התירשתא dispensator potûs, or a cup-bearer, such as Nehemiah seems to have been to Artaxerxes; yet it is most likely, that the word implied some high dignity, such as a governor, lord lieutenant, a deputy, and the like; for such was here our Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel.

The vessels that were delivered to him by the king's order, were, according to Ezra (10), thirty charges of gold, a thousand charges of silver, thirty basons of gold, four hundred and ten of silver, twenty-nine knives, besides many others, amounting in all to five hundred and forty; but these were not all that had been carried out of Jerusalem; the rest were afterwards brought thither by Nehemiah.

they

(6) Vid. Prid. ubi supra. Tremell. Munst. & al. in loc. sup. citat. (7) Conf. Ezra iii. 8, 10. & v. 16. (8) Vid 2 King. xxiv. 17. & alib. pass. (9) Dan. i. 7. & alib. (10) Ezra i. 9, & seq.

they pleased, gold, silver, or any other precious stuffs, towards the building and adorning of that sacred edifice, and the renewing and carrying on of the worship of God there [d].

IMMEDIATELY upon the publishing of this edict, the chiefs of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, together with the priests and Levites, assembled themselves; and as many as retained still a love for their country and a zeal for the God of Israel, disposed themselves to return to that once happy land. As for the rest, which were the far greater number, who preferred the land of Babylon to it, they contented themselves with furnishing their returning brethren with gold, silver, cattle, and other conveniencies, either for their journey, or for the building of the temple and city. At the head of these were Zerubbabel mentioned above, and Jesua the high-priest (D). The next in rank were Nehemia and Mordecai (E), Serajah, Reelajah, Bilsham, Mispar, Bigvai, Rehum, and Baanah, who were all heads of families, and assistants to Zerubbabel in the re-establishment of the Jewish affairs both in church and state [e]. The rest amounted to about forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, including those that came afterwards with Nehemiah, besides their servants and slaves of both sexes, which were in all seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven [f]. Neither were they all of the

The heads of those that returned.

The total of them.

[d] Ibid. i. 3. 4. [e] Ezra ii. 2. Nehem. vii. 7. [f] Idem. ibid.

(D) This office belonged to him by a lineal descent, he being the son of Jozadack (11), whose father Seraiah, high-priest at the taking of Jerusalem, had been put to death at Riblah (12). As for Jozadack, he was carried captive into Babylon, and had been dead some time before the publishing of this decree, so that Jesua was then the head of the pontifical family.

(E) Some think these two to be the same with those so often mentioned in the books of Esther and Nehemiah, and that finding the work of the temple obstructed by their enemies, they returned again to Shushan (13); but it is generally believed, that they were quite different persons of the same name (14).

As for the other seven, the Jewish writers affirm them to have been the chiefs of the Jewish synagogue, or grand council of the Jews, which they say did sit at Jerusalem after their return from Babylon. We shall have occasion to speak more largely of this synagogue in the sequel of this chapter.

(11) Conf. Ezra iii. 1. & 1 Chron. vi. 14, 15. (12) 1 Kings xxv. 18 ad 21. (13) Abenezr. Corn. à Lap. & al. in Ezra ii 2. (14) Vide Prid. conn. & al. supra. citat. (15) Vide Abenezr. in loc. Kimch. in rad. & al. Munst. & Jun. in loc.

the tribes of Levi, Judah, and Benjamin, though from that time they were all blended together under the name of Jehudim, or Jews; for many of thoſe of the other ten tribes, which had been formerly carried away by Tiglath-pilezer, Shalmanezer, and Ezarhaddon, and had ſtill preſerved the true worſhip of God, took the advantage of the king's edict to return into the land of their forefathers. To theſe we may add a great number, who had formerly gone from the idolatrous ten tribes to put themſelves under the protection of the kings of Judah [g]; and this may be the reaſon why the whole number of thoſe mentioned in Ezra's liſt, amounts but to twenty-nine thouſand eight hundred and eighteen, and to thirty-one thouſand and thirty-one in that of Nehemiah; whereas both theſe hiſtorians make the ſum total to be forty-two thouſand three hundred and ſixty; ſo that the overplus ſeems to be added from thoſe of the other ten tribes, which returned with thoſe of Judah and Benjamin (F). We find likewiſe mention made of two hundred men and women ſingers, whom they brought with them, four hundred and thirty-five camels, ſeven hundred and thirty-ſix horſes, two hundred and forty-five mules, and ſix thouſand ſeven hundred aſſes [h].

One may ſee by this liſt, how ſmall the number was of thoſe who returned, in compariſon of thoſe who ſtayed behind; neither muſt we be much ſurprized at it; for if even their forefathers, who were brought with ſo many wonders out of the furnace of Egypt, were almoſt continually plotting to return thither, what could be expected from their ſordid offſpring, but that the far greater part of them would prefer the [g] Vide 2 Chron. xi. 16. xv. 9, & alib. [h] Ezra ii. 65, & ſeq.

(F) Accordingly we find the decree of Cyrus, and afterwards that of Artaxerxes, extended not to thoſe two tribes only, but to all thoſe that worſhipped God at Jeruſalem, which could not but include all the other ten (16).

In conſequence of which Ezra concludes the chapter in which the above-mentioned liſt is, with theſe remarkable words; So the prieſts, levites, people, ſingers, porters, and nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Iſrael in their cities. And when he ſpeaks of the expiatory ſacrifices which were offered at Jeruſalem, he mentions expreſſly twelve he-goats according to the twelve tribes of Iſrael (17).

(16) Ezra i, 3. vii. 13. (17) Ibid. vi. 16, 17.

the place of their captivity, where they were poſſeſſed of lands, houſes, and money, to that of Paleſtine, which had lain ſo long deſolate? And accordingly the Jews themſelves tell us [i], that only the bran came out of Babylon, but that the flour ſtaid behind; even of the prieſts, who, as we ob- Prieſts that ſerved in the former part of their hiſtory *, were divided into returned. twenty-four claſſes, only four of theſe returned, namely thoſe of Jedajah, Immer, Paſhur, and Harim. Theſe, however, ſoon after their arrival, ſubdivided themſelves each into ſix, that they might again make up the old number, and called themſelves by their names accordingly (G) [k]. Some of theſe there were, who, not being able to make out their lineal deſcent from the prieſthood, were deprived of the office and privileges of it until ſome high-prieſt ſhould ariſe who could decide their title by the urim and thummim [l]. The ſame diſpute happened alſo concerning ſome others, who being come from Telmela, Telharſa (H), and other places, could not prove themſelves to belong to any tribe [m]. Theſe were about ſix hundred and fifty in number, beſides upwards of three hundred and ninety nethinims, the poſterity of thoſe Gibeonites whom Solomon did afterwards dedicate to the ſervice of the temple †; ſo ſmall was the number of thoſe of unqueſtionable deſcent, who returned either with Zerubbabel or Nehemiah. And hence it is, that ever ſince this time the number of Jews that dwelt in Paleſtine was always vaſtly inferior to thoſe that were diſperſed in Chaldea, Perſia, &c. The prieſts, levites, ſingers, nethinims, and other officers of the temple ſettled themſelves as well as they could in or near Jeruſalem, that they might more readily vacate on the ſervice

[i] Talmud. Babyl. in Keduſhim. * See before, vol. i. p. 273. a. b. [k] Sedar. Holam. Rabb. c. 29. Talmud. Hieroſ. in Taanith. Vid. Prid. ubi ſupra. [l] Ezra. ii. 62, 63. [m] Ibid. 58. & ſeq. † See before, vol. i. p. 288.

(G) Hence it is that Zechariah the father of John the Baptiſt is ſaid (18) to have been of the courſe of Abiah, and Matthias the Maccabee to have been of that of Joarib (19), though 'tis plain neither of them, nor any other but the four above-mentioned, returned into Judæa.

(H) Perhaps the ſame with Telaſſur, a province of Aſſyria; if not, we own we are in the dark about the ſituation of thoſe places.

(18) Conf. Luke i. 5. 1 Maccab. ii. 1. (19) Vid. Prid. ubi ſupra.

vice of God, by rearing up his altar, and preparing all other things against the next grand solemnity; as for the rest, the greater part of them dispersed themselves in the neighbouring cities and country, where some of them had formerly dwelt, and where they probably found also some of their brethren whom Nebuchadnezzar had left there.

The feast.

By this time the month Tishri, which, as we have elsewhere shewn ††, was the first of the civil, and seventh of the ecclesiastical year, was at hand. The first day of it was the feast of the trumpets, because the new year was to be proclaimed by the sound of that instrument [n]. It ushered in moreover two other great solemnities, namely the expiation day, or grand fast, which was to be kept on the tenth [o], and the feast of tabernacles, which begun on the fifteenth, and ended on the twenty-second of the month [p] inclusive. The greatest part of that of expiation, such as the high-priest entering on that day into the most holy place, &c. they were forced to set aside for want of a temple; however, they failed not to come from all parts to the solemnity, and to fast, pray, &c. and to offer the proper sacrifices on the altar, which they had by this time repaired, so that from this day they ceased not to offer the morning and evening, and all other sacrifices prescribed by the law of Moses.

Expiation fast.

Feast of tabernacles celebrated.

The feast of tabernacles coming five days after that of expiation, they erected them booths at Jerusalem, and celebrated that festival with the usual solemnities, and so set about in good earnest to restore the worship of God in that metropolis.

In this solemn assembly, it was resolved to set about the rebuilding of the temple, towards which every one chearfully contributed according to their power; the whole amounted to sixty-one thousand drachms of gold, and five thousand minas of silver (I), besides an hundred vestments for the priests to officiate in. This was indeed a small sum toward such a vast and expensive undertaking; and therefore we do suppose it to have been a free will addition of their own, to a much greater one which had been contributed by their brethren, who chose to stay in the places of their dispersion. This money was put into the hands of proper officers, who were to oversee the work, who immediately hired workmen, sent to Tyre and Sidon for cedars from Libanus, pursuant to Cyrus's decree, and employed the first year in preparing the materials for the building [q].

In

†† Ibid, 194, 199. [n] Ibid. [o] Ibid. 218. [p] Ibid. 193.
[q] Ezra iii. 5. & seq.

In the ſecond month of the following year, which was the third of Cyrus's reign, and the ſecond from their return, they began to lay the foundation of the temple with great ſolemnity, in the preſence of Zerubbabel their governor, of Jeſua the high-prieſt, and of the whole congregation. It was accompanied with the ſound of their trumpets, and other muſical inſtruments, the prieſts and muſicians ſinging ſome pſalms proper to the occaſion, and all the people ſhouting for joy at the laying of the firſt ſtones. But whilſt the younger ſort were thus expreſſing their joyful zeal upon this occaſion, many of the prieſts, levites, and heads of families, who had ſeen that famous building in its ſplendor fifty-three years before, could not forbear ſending the loudeſt cries of grief at the ſight of that which they were now going to build; inſomuch that the acclamations of the one, and the ſighs and groans of the other, were ſo intermixed, that it was not eaſy to diſtinguiſh them from each other (K) [r].

Year of the flood 2465. Before Chriſt 534.

The foundation of the temple laid.

[r] Ezra iii. 12.

(I) Every drachm of gold being computed to be worth about ten ſhillings of our money, and every mina of ſilver, about nine pounds ſterling, the whole amounted to ſeventy-five thouſand five hundred pounds. This was indeed a great ſum, if we ſuppoſe it to have been all contributed by that ſmall number of poor people juſt returned from a long captivity; and therefore it is generally thought, that it included likewiſe the offerings of thoſe who ſtaid behind, and who, as we have ſeen above, did all contribute largely towards it; but then this ſum will appear vaſtly too ſhort, conſidering the vaſt number, richneſs, and uſual munificence of thoſe that ſtayed; beſides, it is ſcarcely to be ſuppoſed, that had this been the whole that had been collected both in and out of Paleſtine, they would have ſo readily ſet about ſo magnificent a building; for which ſeveral millions would ſcarcely have ſufficed.

It ſeems therefore more probable to us, that this collection was raiſed among them who returned, and were then at Jeruſalem; and conſequently, that though the bulk of them might be as poor as the Jewiſh writers make them, yet there were ſome conſiderable ones, who were both opulent and liberal enough, to add this offering of ſeventy-five thouſand five hundred pounds to that which had been contributed by their brethren abroad, and which was thought ſufficient to ſet about that noble edifice.

(K) That there was a real and even conſiderable diſparity between the old and new temple, is very certain, ſince God is pleaſed to comfort them for it, and to promiſe to raiſe the glory of

WHILST the work was carrying on, the Samaritans (L) came to Zerubbabel and the Jewiſh congregation, and expreſſed

of the latter above that of the former by the preſence of the Meſſiah (20).

This difference, however, cannot be underſtood of its largeneſs, ſince the new was built upon the foundation of the old. Of the two the decree of Cyrus ſeems to allow this new one three times the breadth of that of Solomon; this being but twenty, and that ſixty, cubits broad (21); but our learned Prideaux has ſufficiently proved that the dimenſions were the ſame, only differently taken viz. the one from in to in, and the other from out to out.

The Jews indeed tell us, that the ſecond temple wanted five conſiderable things, which were the chief glory of the firſt (22); and theſe were, 1ſt, the ark or mercy-ſeat: 2. the divine preſence, called by them the Shekinah: 3. the holy fire upon the altar: 4. the urim and thummim: and laſtly, the ſpirit of prophecy. And they are certainly in the right; but then it doth not appear from the ſacred hiſtorian, that theſe were the things which the Jewiſh elders bewailed, at the foundation of this ſecond temple (23).

It ſeems therefore probable, that their grief did ariſe from the unlikelihood that it would ever be raiſed to the grandeur and magnificence of the old one, ſeeing the one had been built by the wiſeſt and richeſt king, and conſtantly adorned by ſome one or other of his poſterity; the other was now begun by ſome few exiles juſt returned from their captivity: the one in the time of profound peace and greateſt opulence; the other in time of adverſity and oppreſſion from their enemies round about: the former was built of the moſt curious and coſtly ſtones, and timber, and other materials wrought with the moſt exquiſite art, and overlaid with a prodigious quantity of gold; inſomuch, that the overlayings of the moſt holy place, which was but thirty foot ſquare every way, is ſaid to have amounted to ſix hundred talents of gold (24), that is, to four millions three hundred and twenty thouſand pounds ſterling. What likelihood therefore was there, that this, which was moſtly built of the materials that were dug up out of the ruins of the former, would ever come up to it? Laſtly, there were in the old one many ſumptuous galleries, buildings, gates and other ornaments, which were not in this, nor were added to it till Herod's time, that is, about five hundred years after, as ſhall be ſeen in its proper place.

(L) Theſe were not of the ſeed of Iſrael, but the poſterity of that mixed multitude, whom Shalmanezer, king of Aſſyria, ſent from (20) Haggai ii 3. & ſeq. (21) Conf. 1 Kings vi. & Appen. to vol. iv. cum Ezra vi. 3. (22) Talm. Jeroſol. in Taanith, c. 2. & Babyl. in Joma. c. 1. Vid. Prid. Part I. lib. iii. (23) Ezra iii. 12. (24) 2 Chron. iii. 8.

preſſed an earneſt deſire to join their aſſiſtance in it, ſeeing they had worſhipped the ſame God ever ſince the time of Eſarhaddon king of Aſſyria, who had ſettled them there. But whether the Jews ſuſpected the ſincerity of their offer, or out of contempt to a people who were not of the ſeed of Iſrael, but only imperfect worſhippers of God; Jeſhua, Zerubbabel, and the whole congregation, refuſed to let them bear any part in the undertaking, alledging, that the decree of Cyrus being only directed to thoſe who were of Iſraelitiſh deſcent, it would be a diſhonour to their nation to admit any ſtrangers to be partners in the work [s]. Whether this refuſal was really juſtifiable or not, we will not pretend to determine, ſince the ſcripture doth no where either praiſe or diſcommend it (M). Sure it is, that it proved the ſource of a bitter and irrecon-from Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, Sepharvaim, and other provinces, to inhabit thoſe parts, out of which he had carried the ten Iſraelitiſh tribes, as we have ſeen in a former volume †; they therefore took the name of Samaritans from Samaria the capital of that kingdom, but by the Jews they were called Cuthim from Cuthah, one of the provinces out of which they came (25).

Why obſtructed by the Samaritans.

[s] Ibid. Chap. iv. 1. & ſeq.

Theſe had, ſoon after their ſettlement in and about Samaria, been taught the worſhip of the true God, but they likewiſe retained, each of them, the worſhip of their own Gods, ſo that their religion was a mixture of judaiſm and heatheniſm. Samaria having been then totally deſtroyed by Shalmanezer according to the prophecy (26), they did not think fit to rebuild it, but went and dwelt at Shichem, near mount Gerizzim, and made it their capital (27).

However they ſeem to have rebuilt and repeopled the old city, at leaſt in ſome degree, by that time the Jews were returned from Babylon, ſince both Ezra (28) and Nehemiah (29) make mention of the inhabitants of Samaria, and in this ſituation they were when they came to offer their aſſiſtance to Zerubbabel.

(M) the Jews, out of their innate hatred to the Samaritans, do one and all commend the zeal of that aſſembly, in refuſing to admit them to the work; and they think, that the reſentment which that people ſhewed immediately after, is a ſufficient token of the inſincerity of their offer, eſpecially ſeeing they are ſaid no-where to have forſaken the old worſhip of their country gods. We do not irreconcileable hatred between these two nations, the sad effects of which the Jews soon felt in the immediate obstruction of not know of one christian commentator that hath not given into this Jewish notion, or has been at the pains to examine this refusal in a different light, notwithstanding its having proved so fatal to them, and so detrimental to their religion.

† vol iv. p. 147. & not. (25) 2 Kings xvii. 23. & ſeq. (26) Mic. i. 6. (27) Joſeph. antiq. lib. xi. c. 8. (28) Chap. iv. 17. iv. 2. & al.

We shall therefore for once take the liberty to inquire how far they may be justly blamed for this refusal, and so be answerable for all that long train of mischiefs it brought after it.

First, then, the sacred historian doth no-where intimate, that they came to offer their assistance out of any hostile design, which he would scarcely have omitted, had that been the case; but plainly tells us, that they came and offered their assistance to the Jews. It is true, he calls them the adversaries of the Jews, for such they became when rejected by them; but it proves not that they were so before; besides, we have shewn heretofore, that the word צַר Tzar, here used, doth often signify a rival or competitor *, and may be as capable of a good sense as of a bad one, and why not in this case?

For the Samaritans had been long since instructed and initiated in the law of Moses, and been worshippers of the God of Israel; and as for the idolatries which their forefathers had intermixed with it, we think it more than probable, that they had long since forsaken them, upon reading the severe prohibitions that are interspersed in the pentateuch, which they had in their hands. This seems beyond dispute, not only from the confession they made before the Jewish congregation (30), but also from the constant behaviour, even after their rupture with the Jews, since we do not find them any-where taxed with idolatry, nor find the least monument or relic of it, though in every thing else diametrically opposite to the Jewish nation; though, if this had been the case, the admitting of them into their commonwealth, and partnership in the work, might probably have proved an effectual means of curing them of it; and it was indeed their duty to endeavour it; because.

2dly, The law of Moses obliged them to incorporate into their church and state all, except two or three nations therein excepted, that would become circumcised, and observers of the law (31). And might it not be in right of this law, that the converted Samaritans claimed their admittance into the work? especially since,

3dly, As servants of the God of Israel, they knew, that after the temple was once rebuilt, they would be equally obliged with the Jews to come and worship there, and there only; and if they were thus equally intitled to and desirous of enjoying the benefit of the temple, why might they not be equally zealous to contribute towards of their undertaking, and by numberleſs ill offices, which the incenſed Samaritans did to them, and of which we ſhall give a further account in the ſequel of this chapter.

* See Vol. iii. 255. sub fin. not. & conf. 1 Sam. i. 6. & ii. 32. (30) Ezra iv. 2. (31) Exod. xii. 48, & alib. pass.

THE

towards the rebuilding of it? There could be then no juſt pretence for excluding them, ſince even heathens were allowed to ſend their offerings both to the temple, and for maintaining the divine worſhip there. Now, is it not more than probable, that if the ſtiff Jews had admitted them to any ſhare in the undertaking, though it had been only to contribute towards the charges of rebuilding, they might have found them as hearty friends to them, as their haughty refuſal made them enemies?

We have ſeen in a former volume how Joſiah, one of the beſt kings that ever reigned in Judah, thought theſe nations worthy to be invited to the ſolemnities which were celebrated at Jeruſalem, and with what zeal he deſtroyed all the idolatrous monuments that were in that kingdom (32); and was not his example very well worth imitating, eſpecially at this juncture?

If it be aſked how this zeal of the Samaritans, if it had been ſincere, came to be ſo ſoon turned into the bittereſt rancour, we need not now go far to ſeek for an anſwer. It is plain, firſt, they thought themſelves unjuſtly uſed by their refuſal, ſince even the law of Moſes condemned it; and in the next place, the Jews anſwer was couched in ſuch haughty and contemptuous terms, as plainly gave them to underſtand, that if ever they came to be again maſters of themſelves, inſtead of being looked upon as brethren, and ſervants of the ſame God, they muſt expect to be uſed with the ſame heavy hand as the Canaanites and other conquered nations had been by the former kings of Judah and Iſrael. It was natural therefore for them to uſe all proper endeavours to prevent it, which they did, by oppoſing all their meaſures to the utmoſt of their power; and their firſt ſtep was to obſtruct the rebuilding of the temple, which the Jews reſenting and retaliating, the enmity improved to ſuch a degree, that no two nations ever hated or were more cruel to each other upon all occaſions, than the Jews and the Samaritans. All which might in all probability have been prevented, had the former complied at leaſt in ſome meaſure with the requeſt of the latter.

Upon the whole then we think, that, inſtead of commending them for their zeal, we may much more reaſonably look upon all the misfortunes which the Samaritans made them ſuffer, to have been ſent them as a puniſhment for their uncharitableneſs.

The only thing we can ſee may be objected againſt what has been ſaid is, that the Jewiſh congregation had ſome inſpired perſons among them, ſuch as the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (33), whom they probably conſulted before they gave a definitive (32) Vid. 2 Kings xxiii. paſſ. 2 Chron. xxxiv. ult. xxxv. paſſ. Vid. & ſup. vol. iv. p 163. & ſeq. (33) Ezra v. i.

THE first step the repulsed Samaritans took to obstruct the work, since they knew they could not procure a reversion of the king's decree, was to bribe underhand some of his head ministers and officers, to represent the Jews as a rebellious nation, and their rebuilding the temple as dangerous, and tending to shake off their obedience to him. They failed not to carry their point, and the work was accordingly stopped, in a great measure, not only during the remaining five years of Cyrus's life, but also during the reign of his successor (N); however, answer to the Samaritans; and if so, their refusal must have been conformable to the will of God. But the text doth no-where say they did consult them; and they might indeed do as Joshua had formerly done with respect to the Gibeonites (34), think the case too plain to require it; and so forgetting that charity which the Mosaic law commands towards its proselytes * *, they might only listen to their natural contempt for all that were not of the seed of Israel; however that be, the event shews this their refusal to have been the unhappy source of endless evils, in which the Jews did almost constantly bear the bigger share, as the sequel will soon shew.

(N) This suppression of the work is supposed to have given occasion to Daniel's three weeks fasting and praying, which we read of (35), in the third year of Cyrus's reign, and which began on the third day of the first month (36), and at the end of which he saw the famous vision of the Persian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, contained in the three last chapters of that prophet, and which seems to have been the last he ever had.

And indeed, if we compare what he says in the close of them, with his great age, it is reasonable to believe he did not outlive it long, since he was then in the seventy-third year of his captivity, to which, if we add but fifteen, the age he was of when carried into Babylon, and less than that he cannot be supposed to have been, he must then have been near ninety years old; however, whether he died when we suppose him, or lived any time longer, we hear no more of him, except in the talmudic writings.

What the Jews opinion is, concerning him and his writings, has been seen in a former volume †. But Ezekiel, and even Josephus, give him much the preference to the other prophets (37); and what is of more weight than all, our saviour himself (38) acknowledges him to have been a prophet; and if the Jews

since

(34) Josh ix. 14.  See before, vol. iii p. 326. (35) Dan. x 1 & seq. (36) Vid int. al. Usher, sub A. M. 3470. † Sup. vol. iii. p. 475 note O. (37) Ezek. xiv. pass. Joseph lib. x. c 12. (38) Matth. xxiv. 15.

however, while Cyrus lived, the Jews did still keep on gathering materials for the work, in hopes of better times; they were still assisted in it by the Tyrians and Sidonians, who furnished them with cedars from Libanus, with masons, carpenters, and other workmen; and these being as it were pent up in their maritime cities, received in return a proportionable quantity of corn, wine, and oil from the Jews, as their ancestors had formerly done from king Solomon [t]. But Cyrus was no sooner dead, than the Samaritans, encouraged by the ill disposition of his successor Cambyses, called in scripture Ahashuerus [u], instead of their former sobdolous practices, declared themselves openly against the Jews, and against their undertaking; and writ in the most pressing terms to that monarch to put an immediate stop to it. Cambyses, however, probably out of respect to his father's decree, would not seem to revoke it, but privately gave them leave to obstruct the execution of it, so that the work, though it was not wholly suppressed, went at least very heavily on during his whole reign, which lasted but seven years and five months.

[t] Conf. 1 Kings v. 8. & seq. & Ezra iii. 7. [u] Ezra iv. 6. See also vol. v. p. 79.

since then had not been fatally blinded, they must have been forced to own that they had found him a very true one to their cost. But this will best be seen in the sequel of their history.

In the mean time, we cannot forbear observing, concerning his prophecies, whether those that relate to the Messiah or to those foreign empires above-mentioned, that they are the cleareſt and most circumstantiate of any; insomuch, that Josephus, in the place above quoted, rightly observes, that he did not only foretel future events, as the rest of the prophets did, but did also determine the time in which they should come to pass.

And this wonderful agreement between the facts when accomplished, and the prophecies that foretold them, appeared so exact and irrefragable, that Porphyry could no other way elude the force of it, than by supposing the latter to have been written after the former (39).

Besides those prophecies of his, which were originally written, partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee, the Latin version has some other pretended pieces of his, which were, however, never admitted by the Jews into their canon, and are therefore thrown out by the protestants among the apocrypha; of this kind are the history of Susanna, of Bel and the dragon, &c concerning which the reader may see all that is worth knowing in the authors quoted in the margin (40).

(39) Vid. Hieron præfat. in Daniel. (40) Id. ibid. & in Dan. xiii. Calmet præfat. in eund. Prid. Connect. part i. lib. iii.

Year of the flood. 2477. Before Christ 522.

Cambyſes being dead, and one of the magi having mounted the throne (O), as has been elſewhere related *, the Samaritans failed not to renew their accuſation againſt the Jews to that uſurper; they repreſented to him, that that nation had been always famed for rebellion, for the truth of which they appealed to ancient records; and added, that if they were ſuffered to go on in the rebuilding of their city and temple, which they were then about, they would not be long ere they ſhook off the yoke, and refuſed to pay him either tribute or obedience, and that their example might ſoon be followed by other provinces on that ſide of the Euphrates, and occaſion a general revolt. The uſurper, who had been one of the chiefs of the ſect of the magi, againſt whom the Jews were known to be diametrically oppoſite in point of religion, did not want any great arguments to induce him to ſuppreſs them, but ſent an immediate decree to them to deſiſt from their enterprize, and charged the Samaritans to ſee it executed. Theſe therefore, having received the order, went ſtraightway with it to Jeruſalem, and by virtue of it cauſed a total ſtop to be put to it, till the Jews obtained a freſh decree in the ſecond year of Darius his ſucceſſor's reign, that is, about two years after.

The building obſtructed by the Samarians.

The Jews puniſhed with dearth.

THE Jews by that time had been ſo diſheartened, partly by the conſtant oppoſition of the Samaritans, and partly by this laſt decree, that though this laſt ceaſed with the diſcovery and death of the uſurper, yet did they not ſhew the leaſt readineſs to reſume their enterprize, till God had puniſhed their indolence with a great dearth, and let them know by his prophet Haggai, that it was upon that account that both their harveſt and vintage had failed them [w]. This was indeed an effectual argument to awake the zeal of that ſelfiſh people, who had by this time taken care to ſeat themſelves in commodious and ſumptuous houſes, without giving themſelves any further thought about the houſe of God. The prophet was therefore ſent to the governor, to the high-prieſt, and to the reſt of the heads of Judah, to upbraid them with their ingratitude [x], and at the ſame time to aſſure them, that if they would now ſet

* vol. v. p. 95. [w] Haggai. i. 6. & ſeq. [x] Ibid. verſ. 4.

(O) This is he whom Ezra calls Artaxerxes or rather Artaſhſhaſhta (41); he is differently named by profane hiſtorians, as Smerdis by Herodotus; Mardys by Æſchylus; Spendadates by Cteſias; and Oropaſtes by Juſtin †.

(41) Ezra iv. 7. † See before, vol. v. p. 95, set about the work in good earnest, God would not only make it prosper in their hands, but that he would make the glory of this second temple to exceed by far that of the first [y]. This reproof had at length the desired effect, and the people, roused up by these promises and threats, resumed and pursued the work under the eye and guidance of Haggai and Zechariah [z]. The work resumed.

In the mean time, the Samaritans, who kept a watchful eye over them, being surprized that they should dare to go to work again, in spite of the decree they had obtained against them, went and applied themselves to Tatnai, whom Darius had made governor of Syria and Palestine, and acquainted him, that this enterprise was resumed, not only against the king's order, but to the manifest detriment of his realm; they expected, probably, that this new governor would have immediately suppressed that work; but he, being a man of more temper and moderation, came directly to Jerusalem, accompanied with some of his counsellors, and with one Shetharboznai, who is supposed to have been governor of Samaria, and inquired of the Jews by what authority they ventured upon that work. Zerubbabel and Jeshua undertook to answer for the rest, and acquainted him with the decree they had formerly obtained from Cyrus, and at the same time produced the sacred vessels which that monarch had ordered to be restored to them in order to renew the worship of God in Jerusalem. Tatnai, having received this answer, thought the matter of too great consequence to interfere with, till he had sent a full account of it to Darius, and desired that search might be made concerning that decree. It was accordingly found among the records that were kept in the palace of Ecbatan †, where Cyrus was at the time of his granting it, and Darius, out of respect to that great monarch, two of whose daughters he had then married, readily confirmed it by a new one, in which all the grants of the old were repeated and ratified, with this severe penalty annexed, that whosoever should presume to contravene or obstruct it, his house should be pulled down, and a gallows made of the timber of it, and the offender hanged upon it. The execution of the decree was committed to Tatnai and Shetharboznai, and was brought to them accordingly much about the beginning of the fourth year of Darius's reign (P), and Tatnai comes to Jerusalem. Darius's decree. Year of the flood 2481. Year before Christ 518.

[y] Ibid. ch. ii. 4. & seq. [z] Ezra v. 1. & seq. Zachar. i. 1. & seq. † De hac vid. vol iv. 446. vol. v. p. 81. & 102. Vid. & Ezra v. 3. & seq. [a] Ezra vi. 6, & seq. Vide & Joseph. antiq. l. xi. c. 4.

(P) The learned Usher seems to place this decree one year sooner; but if we consider that it was about the beginning of the third and by them communicated to the Jews [a].

The temple finished.

It was then that the building began to rise apace, since they were now not only free from any obstructions from their enemies, but were supplied by the king's order, with all necessaries towards the expence of it, out of the treasury of that province; and this addition of the king's bounty, joined to the offerings which both they of Palestine and their brethren abroad paid towards it, caused such a dispatch in the work, that it was completely finished in three years, that is, in the sixth year of Darius, and in the month Adar, which is the last of the Jewish year, answering in part to our February *. The dedication of that sacred building was celebrated with suitable solemnity and joy, and with abundance of sacrifices; after which they prepared themselves likewise for the approaching festival of the passover [b], to which many of their brethren from other provinces assisted, having heard of the success which that long-wished-for enterprize had met with; and from this time we reckon the complete restoration of the Jews mentioned in the first note of this chapter. Accordingly, when those that dwelt in Babylon sent about this time to Jerusalem to inquire of the prophets, whether they might not thenceforward desist from keeping the fasts of the fifth and seventh months (Q), Zachariah, among other things contained in the seventh and eighth chapters of his prophecies, tells them, that they had now kept those fasts seventy years [c]. In memory of this decree, which, we observed, was given from Shushan, or Susa, the Jews gave the name of Shushan to the eastern year of that monarch, that Tatnai sent to the king about it, one may reasonably allow six months for the messenger's going and coming from Jerusalem to Shushan in Persia, since, as we have seen a little higher, Ezra was four months in coming from Babylon; and less than other six months can hardly be allowed, before they could obtain, in so great a court, an order for searching the records, going from Shushan to Ecbatan, procuring an authentic copy of the decree, bringing it back to Darius, and obtaining a confirmation of it (42).

* See before, vol. iii. p. 206, & note. [b] Ibid. vers. 15. ch. vii. 6. Ezra vi. 16, ad fin.

(Q) These were fasts which the captive Jews kept in those two months in memory of, first, Jerusalem being first besieged by Nebuchadnezzar: Secondly, Of its being taken by him: Thirdly, Of its being burnt with the temple: And, Fourthly, For the murder of Gedaliah: All which fasts they still keep to this day, though they have somewhat changed their place in their calendar.

(42) Vide Prideaux, ubi supra.

eaſtern gate of the outward temple wall, and cauſed a baſs-relief of that metropolis to be ſet up over it, which continued there till its total deſtruction by the Romans [d].

In the mean time, the mortification which the envious Samaritans received from the king's decree in favour of the Jews, and the wonderful diſpatch with which they had finiſhed their temple, did but ſerve to augment their rancour againſt them; their being obliged to pay, not only towards the rebuilding of that edifice, but towards the ſacrifices and oblations that were daily to be offered up there, for the proſperity of the king and the whole realm, and towards the maintenance of the prieſts who officiated there [e], was what they ſeemed to reſent above all the reſt; and therefore, as ſoon as the temple was finiſhed, though the outbuildings were ſtill unrepaired, and continued ſo for many years, they made it a pretence for with-holding the uſual tribute, pretending, that it was to ceaſe as ſoon as the building was finiſhed. This obliged the Jews to ſend a deputation to Darius, at the head of whom were Zerubbabel, Mordecai, and Ananias, to complain to the king of it. Darius received them with his uſual benevolence, and after a full hearing iſſued out a freſh decree, commanding his officers at Samaria to cauſe the uſual tribute to be paid to the temple, and for the future on no pretence whatever to give the Jews any cauſe of complaint upon that article [f]. After this they met with no further obſtacle during the reſt of that monarch's reign, which laſted twenty-eight years longer, nor during the twelve years of his ſucceſſor; but enjoyed a perfect peace, being governed by their high-prieſts in matters of religion, and in thoſe of ſtate by the heads of the tribe of Judah, though ſtill in ſubjection to the kings of Perſia, and ſubordinate to his governors on this ſide of the Euphrates (R). Xerxes had no ſooner ſucceeded his father, than he confirmed all the privileges formerly granted to the Jews. This was not without a ſingular mark of the divine providence, ſince the temple of Jeruſalem was the only one that obtained this particular Samaritans refuſe to pay to it.

Xerxes. Year of the flood 2541. Year before Chriſt 458.

[d] See Lightfoot's proſpect of the temple, ch. 3. [e] Ezra vi. 8. & ſeq. [f] Vide Joſeph. antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 4.

(R) Theſe particulars we have from Joſephus, who adds, that Zerubbabel was the perſon who anſwered the wiſe queſtion propoſed by the king, which we have in the apocryphal book of Baruc. But we ſcarce think it worth inſerting here, though the ſame author tells us, the rebuilding of the temple and the reſtoration of the Jews were granted him as a reward for his merit and judgment. The canonical books are ſilent as to all thoſe particulars, and we ſhall ſtick cloſe to them as far as they go.

lar regard for that prince, whilst he was plundering and destroying all the rest that came in his way. But he was in both cases fulfilling the prophecies of Isaiah [g] and Jeremiah [h], which had long since foretold both the downfall of the heathen idols and temples, and the restoration of the Jewish one, under the protection and favour of Cyrus and his successors. Josephus adds from a passage out of an ancient poet (S), that the Jews assisted Xerxes in his wars, and that he had a band of them in his army [i]. It is true, the meaning of the poet has been much canvassed by very great critics; but whether or no he intended the Jews by it, it is hardly to be supposed, that they, who were so well known for their valour, fidelity, and attachment to that prince, should be the only people excused from the war, when his army was composed of all the other nations of the Persian empire. In the third year of his reign, according to the Alexandrian chronicle, died the Jewish high-priest Jeshua in the fifty-third year of his high-priesthood, and was succeeded by his son Joiakim [k]; and Xerxes, being murdered in the twenty-first year of his reign, was succeeded by his third son Artaxerxes, whom we have elsewhere shewn to have been the Ahashuerus of scripture, the husband of Esther [†], and consequently the greatest friend the Jews ever had, either before or since their restoration.

Artaxerxes or Ahashuerus favours the Jews.

How he came to be so above all his predecessors, we chiefly learn from the book of Esther, whose history there related is so well known, that we shall content ourselves with giving our readers as short a summary of it as is necessary for the [g] Ch. xxi. 9. [h] Ch. x. 11. li. 44, 47. & alib. pass. [i] Cont. Apion. l i. [k] Nehem. xii. 10. Joseph. ubi supra. c. 5. [†] Vol. v. p. 154. & seq. & note.

(S) The passage is out of Chærilus, and is to this purpose, That a strange people, who used the Phœnician dialect, and dwelt in the high and hilly grounds of Solyma, near to a great lake, marched under his (Xerxes) standards. The Jews speaking then the Syriac language, Solyma being one of the names of Jerusalem, and its being situate upon hills, and near the famous lake Asphaltites, it was natural for Josephus to understand the people here mentioned to have been the Jews. Some great critics, however, (43) have pretended to apply it to the Solymi of Pisidia, against whom Salmasius has undertaken to vindicate the Jewish historian (44), who seems indeed to be most in the right, the thread of our hiſtory. Eſther or Hadaſſah was an orphan of the tribe of Benjamin, brought up and adopted by her uncle Mordecai; this laſt was a deſcendant of thoſe who had been brought captives into Babylon with Jeconiah king of Judah, and, by his conſtant attendance at the palace-gate, ſeems to have been one of the king's porters. He had had intereſt enough to introduce his niece into the palace, among other beauties who were to be candidates to ſucceed the repudiated Vaſhti; and ſhe had already ſo captivated the Perſian monarch, even before he had ſet the diadem on her head, that ſhe could obtain any thing from him, which her uncle bid her aſk of him; it being a peculiar privilege of thoſe virgins, whenever their turn came to appear before the king, to obtain whatever they aſked of him [1]. It is therefore reaſonably ſuppoſed, that it was by her intereſt that Ezra, a very learned and zealous Jew, of the houſe of Aaron (T), obtained Ezra ſent into Judæa.

(43) Scalig. not. ad fragm. Bochart. Phaleg. part. ii. l. i. c. 6. Cuneus de repub. Hebr. (44) Ossileg. Ling. Hellen. Vid. Prid. ubi supra.

[1] Eſther ii. 18. & ſeq.

(T) He calls himſelf here, according to the Hebrew idiom, the ſon of Seraiah (45), who was the high-prieſt, whom Nebuchadnezzar cauſed to be ſlain at the taking of Jeruſalem (46); but had he been his real ſon, he muſt then have been at leaſt a hundred and thirty-two years old, ſuppoſing him to have been an infant when his father died (47), and ſo wholly unfit for ſuch a journey and employ; whereas we find him capable of reading the ſcriptures to the people from morning to noon, one whole week, and of aſſiſting Nehemiah in his office thirteen years after (48), when he muſt have been at leaſt a hundred and forty-five years old.

But ſince he there alſo calls Azariah the ſon of Merajoth, though it appears from the book of the Chronicles (49), that there were ſix deſcendants between them, what ſhould hinder, but he may himſelf have been ſome deſcents off Seraiah, though it doth not appear how many?

What reputation he was in at the Perſian court, may be gathered from the commiſſion itſelf, which is ſo extenſive in favour of the Jewiſh nation, as well as of Ezra himſelf, that a leſs intereſt than that of Eſther can hardly be ſuppoſed to have procured it to him; it was to this effect (50):

"Artaxerxes, king of kings, unto Ezra, the prieſt of the "law of the God of heaven, peace, &c. It is our decree, "that whoſoever of you, whether prieſts, levites, &c. ſhall "be

(45) Ezra vii. 1. (46) 2 Kings xxv. 18, & ſeq. (47) Comp. the Marg. Chronol. in both places. (48) Nehem. viii. 2, & ſeq. (49) 1 Chron. vi. 7, & ſeq. (50) Ezra vii. 12, & ſeq.

tained an ample commiſſion from Artaxerxes to return to Jeruſalem, with as many of his nation as were willing to go with him, and there to regulate or reform all matters, whether of church or ſtate, as he ſhould ſee fit [m]. This commiſſion was granted to him in the ſeventh year of that monarch's reign, in virtue of which he began his journey from Babylon on the firſt day of the month Niſan, anſwering to the middle of March; he ſtaid ſome days near the river Ahava for the reſt of his company, and during that time, being willing to take ſome Nethinims with him to Jeruſalem, to ſerve there as formerly in the temple, he ſent ſome of his retinue to Iddo, who was chief of thoſe that dwelt near the place Caſiphia (U), from whence he gathered about two hundred

Year of the flood 2541. Before Chriſt 458.

[m] Ezra vii. 6. & ſeq.

"be deſirous to return to Jeruſalem, be permitted to go ſafely
"thither — We give you power to ſettle and reform every thing
"according to the law of your God, and to convey thither all
"the money, veſſels, &c. which we, our counſellors, as well "as the prieſts and others of your nation that ſtay in the pro"vince of Babylon, ſhall freely offer for the ſervice of the
"the temple of your God, which is at Jeruſalem, or to diſpoſe "of it in any other way you ſhall think fit — and that what"ever other charges Eſdra ſhall think neceſſary for the houſe of "God, ſhall be forthwith furniſhed to him out of our revenue
"on the other ſide of the Euphrates, as far as a hundred talents of "ſilver, a hundred meaſures of flour, wine and oyl, &c.
"And we do likewiſe forbid our governors in thoſe provinces "to levy or demand any toll or taxes on any of the prieſts, le"vites, ſingers, &c. of the temple; and we impower you,
"Eſdra, to appoint judges, magiſtrates, &c. according to the "wiſdom with which God has endowed you, to judge that peo"ple on that ſide the river, and to condemn every offender to "death, baniſhment, or any leſſer puniſhment, according to
"the nature of his crime."

(U) It is not eaſy to gueſs what place this was: the text calls it כַּסְפְיָא הַמָּקוֹם, Caſiphia hammakom, Caſiphia the place. Some have taken it for the Caſpian mountains, ſituate between Media and Hyrcania, in the mines of which theſe captive Nethinims are ſuppoſed to have been ſent to work; if ſo, it is no wonder they ſhould be ſo ready to embrace the benefit of the king's decree.

Joſephus paſſes by this whole affair, and is ſo out both in his chronology and hiſtory, that he makes this decree, as was that which Nehemiah obtained thirteen years after, to have been both granted by Xerxes, contrary to the Hebrew text, which calls him Artaxerxes; but this is not the only place where that hiſtorian is out.

hundred and twenty of them, besides some priests and levites[n]; after which having proclaimed a solemn fast, to implore the divine protection, they set forward, and arrived at Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month, or the middle of July, that is, after a journey of four months.

His commission.

At his arrival he opened his commission before the whole Jewish assembly, and there delivered to the priests the offerings which had been made by the king, nobles, and by the Babylonish Jews (W); after which, having sent to acquaint the governor of Syria and Palestine with the power he had received from the king, he set about putting it in execution; he began with appointing judges and magistrates, to reform every thing that was contrary to the law of Moses, and, pursuant to his commission, impowered them to punish offenders, not only with fines, imprisonment, and other lesser punishments, but even with banishment and death, according to the nature of the crime[o]. Ezra continued in the faithful discharge of his authority thirteen years, that is, till he was succeeded by Nehemiah, who was sent thither with a fresh commission from the same monarch. But before that, the Jews having received fresh tokens of the king's favour upon his raising Esther to the diadem, Ezra relying upon the protection of two such powerful friends as the new queen and Mordecai, who now engrossed the king's favour, gave himself up wholly to the care of the Jewish affairs, and to reform some crying abuses, which had crept in among those, who were returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel.

Reforms the church and state.

One of these was the intermarriages, which not only the common people, but even priests, levites, and heads of families

[n] Ibid. ch. viii. 15. & seq. [o] Ibid. vii. 25, 26.

(W) These offerings amounted to (1) a hundred talents of gold, besides twenty basons of gold, amounting to a thousand darkonim (or darics, which were equivalent to our jacobus); (2) six hundred and fifty talents of silver, with vessels of silver, to the weight of a hundred talents more, and two vessels of some fine copper then reckoned as valuable as gold.

From this new reformation made by Ezra in the Jewish church and commonwealth, the learned Prideaux begins the computation of Daniel's weeks; but as this is a subject quite out of our province, we refer those readers who are curious about it to consult the book itself (3).

(1) Ibid. ch. viii. 25, & seq. (2) Vid. Prid. part i. l. ii. (3) Connect. part i. l. v.

lies, had made with some of their idolatrous neighbours [p], by which they had introduced a mixed mongrel breed of Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Samaritans, and other strange nations among the true Israelites; to rectify this, Ezra issued out a proclamation, and ordered all that were returned from the captivity to appear before him at Jerusalem on a set day, under the penalty of being excommunicated and forfeiture of all they had. As soon as they were assembled, he upbraided them in the severest terms for their crimes, so strongly forbidden by the Mosaic law; after which he obliged them to take a solemn oath, that as many as had been guilty of it should put away both their strange wives and the children they had by them. But as the thorough cognizance of the matter was like to take up some considerable time, and the court of the temple was still uncovered and exposed to the rains that fell then abundantly, he appointed commissioners to make strict search into every family, and to oblige all delinquents to comply with the covenant which Ezra had exacted from them. This scrutiny was accordingly begun on the first day of the tenth month, and ended on the same day of the first month, when the number of delinquents was found to amount to a hundred and fourteen, some of whom had children by these strange wives [q].

Abolishes mixt marriages.

His next great work in pursuance to his commission was, to reform the whole state of the Jewish church, by restoring its discipline and rites, according to its ancient pattern under the former prophets. In order to which, his first care was to collect and set forth a correct edition of the sacred books, and then to reduce the observance of the Mosaic law to that standard. This circumstance we find neither expressly mentioned in the sacred historians, nor in Josephus; but we have it from the Talmudists and other ancient Jews, who add a great many others, which, not carrying the same probability with this, we shall for that reason give an epitome of in the margin (X). But as for this of his collecting and reviving the Collects the sacred books.

[p] Ezra ix. 1, & seq. [q] Ibid. cap. ult. vers. 17. & seq.

(X) They tell us, 1st, that he was assisted in it by the grand synagogue or sanhedri, which they pretend to have been originally instituted by Moses in the seventy elders, and to have been since increased to a hundred and twenty; we have already confuted the greatest part of this assertion in a former volume, to which we refer the reader [†]. 2dly,

[†] vol. iii. p. 6. not.

the ſacred books, making ſome ſmall additions to them, and fixing the canon of the Old Teſtament to twenty-two books, as they are now received by the Jews and proteſtant chriſtians; we have many reaſons to confirm it. He was excellently well verſed in them; his extenſive authority enabled him to gather up all the beſt copies that could be met with, either at Jeruſalem or among the diſperſed Jews; he was himſelf inſpired, and had the aſſiſtance of two or three prophets (Y) in the work. The then confuſed ſtate of the Jews 2dly, In this ſynagogue they place among the principals of them the prophet Daniel and his three friends, Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, whom they pretend to have been ſtill alive, and to have returned from the captivity, though neither he, Ezra, or Nehemiah, mention any thing about any of them.

Laſtly, and to mention no more, they place at the tail of this ſynagogue Simon the juſt, between whom and the time in which we ſuppoſed Daniel to have died there elapſed near two hundred and fifty years. The method they take to skip over this difficulty is equally abſurd, and only expoſes their ignorance of chronology; and this makes the judicious dean above quoted rightly ſuppoſe, that this pretended aſſembly of a hundred and twenty was only a ſucceſſion of men, who put every one a helping hand to complete what Ezra had ſet on foot; and that Simon the juſt, who is the laſt there named, and was really ſo in point of time, was the perſon who gave the finiſhing ſtroke to that great work (4); for that it was ſo far completed in Ezra's time, as to have had no addition or amendment made to it afterwards, is ſcarce credible.

1ſt, Becauſe we find in Nehemiah * the genealogy of Jeſhua the high-prieſt is carried down to Iadua, and mention made of Darius the Perſian, or Codomanus, who were recenter by at leaſt a hundred years; and in the third chapter of the firſt book of the Chronicles, Zerubbabel's genealogy is carried down ſo far as muſt neceſſarily reach to the time of Alexander the Great.

2dly, Among the various readings noted in the margin of the ſacred books which are attributed to Ezra, and are known by the name of Keri and Ketib, we find ſome in thoſe of Ezra and Nehemiah, which cannot be ſuppoſed to have been put in by them, but by ſome of their ſucceſſors in the work

3dly, We may add, that Nehemiah and the Chronicles fall very ſhort of that correctneſs of ſtyle and method that we find in the other books of the Old Teſtament, and, for the reaſons above alledged, were hardly admitted into the canon, till about the time of Simon the juſt above-mentioned.

(Y) Theſe were Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, to which the Jews add, as we hinted in the laſt note, Daniel and his three companions.

(4) Connect. ubi ſupra. * Ch. xii. 10, 22.

Jews required such a collection and revisal of the sacred writeings, and some such thing we find done soon after Nehemiah's arrival in Judæa, when Ezra brought forth the sacred volume, and read and expounded it to all the people from morning till noon, during the whole seven days of the feast of tabernacles [r]. Lastly, the whole current of Talmudist writers, and all the ancient and modern Jews [s], (except the Samaritans, who reject all but the pentateuch, as shall be seen in due time; and Josephus, who perhaps did not think proper to tell the world that the sacred writings stood in need of such a revisal and amendment) ascribe this work to Ezra, as president of the sanhedrin, and chief director and overseer of the whole, in which they have been followed by no small number of ancient fathers [t], and by far the greatest part of modern writers. We may further add, that there is no other way of justifying that great and zealous man, for leaving the city and outworks of the temple in that defolate state in which Nehemiah found them at his coming [u], considering that he met with companions. As for Malachi, they pretend, that he was the same with Ezra; that this last was his proper name, and מלאכי Malachi, which signifies my angel or messenger, to have been that of his office, as being the person or prophet sent by God to restore the Jewish church to its pristine splendor and standard.

St. Jerom and some other antient writers have maintained the same notion (5): sure it is, that Malachi is rather a common than a proper name, and that in Ezra's time, prophets were called by that name (6); and accordingly, several antient fathers quoted Malachi under the title of the angel or messenger of God (7).

What seems to confirm that he was an assistant to, if not the same with, Ezra, is his reproving the people for marrying strange wives (8), of their oppression for their poor brethren (9), and several other abuses which were then rectified by Ezra and Nehemiah.

[r] Nehem viii. 2. & seq. ad fin. [s] Vid. Seld. de synder. Buxtorf. Tiberiad & Auct. ab eis citat. [t] Clem. Alexandr. Storm. l. i. Iren. l. iii. Basil. epist. ad Chilon. Isidor. Orig. l. vi. & al. mult. [u] Nehem. i. 2. ii. 14. & seq.

(5) Comment. in Malach. & alib. plur. (6) Haggai. i. 13. Malach. iii. 1. & alib. (7) Clem. Alexand. Strom. l. i. Tertul. cont. Judæos, c. 5. Orig. in Joan. & al. (8) Ch. ii. 11. (9) Ibid. v. 10. & alib. pass.

with no other obſtacles, that we read of, from the Samaritans, but all poſſible encouragement from the Perſian court; but the ſuppoſition, that he thought it of greater moment to beſtow his time and care in this new and correct edition of the ſacred code, than to buſy himſelf in repairing the outworks of the city and temple. It is in the time of this reviſal that he is ſuppoſed to have exchanged the old Hebrew character, for the more beautiful and commodious Chaldee now in uſe, and to have invented the Maſſorah (Z), vowel, and

(Z) By the term Maſſorah or Maſſoreth, which ſignifies tradition, is meant the unwritten rule or canon by which the reading and writing of the ſacred books was fixed. We have already ſeen elſewhere, that the Jews affirm it to have been given by God himſelf to Moſes, who delivered it to Joſhua, Aaron, &c. by whom it was tranſmitted by oral tradition, through a long ſucceſſion of holy and inſpired men, down quite to Rabbi Judah, ſurnamed Hakkadoſh, or the holy, who wrote it in the book which they call the Miſhna; all which we have formerly confuted †, as a ſeries of Rabbinic fictions.

Others, with more probability, attribute it to this Ezra, who, in the comparing of the ſeveral copies, out of which he was to compile his new authentic one, found himſelf under a neceſſity of correcting ſeveral errors which had crept in, through the ignorance and careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers, and obſerving likewiſe here and there a different reading, which might be well enough preſerved, he put the one, perhaps that which he thought the beſt, in the text; and this the Jews call Keri; the other he put in the margin, to intimate, that it was otherwiſe written in ſome copies; and thoſe marginals were called Cetib. It were, however, abſurd to ſuppoſe, that they were all inſerted by him, ſince, as we hinted in a former note, we find ſome of them, not only in the book that goes by his name, and is juſtly attributed to him, but in ſome of a later date; beſides, many of thoſe marginals are really trifling, and ſome of them far beneath the dignity of ſuch an author. Thoſe who underſtand the Hebrew tongue may ſee an inſtance of this in the places quoted in the margin (11)

As for the vowel points, which are ſaid to have been invented by him, in order to fix the true ſenſe of words, we have heretofore ſhewn them to be of much more modern date ‡. But as to the gramatical ones, eſpecially the athnach and ſilluc, or ſophpaſuk, ſo called, becauſe this laſt concluded every period, called by the Jews paſſuk, it is moſt likely, they were deviſed either by, or

(10) Prid. ubi ſupra. † vol iii. p. 165, note B. & alib.
(11) 2 Kings xviii. 27. Iſaiah xxxvi. 12. ‡ vol. iii. p. 456. & note.

and other points, concerning which we have given a full account in a former volume †.

ANOTHER

† vol. iii. p. 447. & note 456. & seq.

or very soon after, him; for, the Hebrew being almost forgotten during their captivity, and the Chaldee being become the current tongue, there was a necessity that those parashas or portions of scripture that were read in the temple and other synagogues, should be expounded to them by proper interpreters; and this the Talmudists (12) tell us was done verse by verse in the law, which gave occasion to the invention of those points, in order to direct the readers when to stop; but when they were afterwards forbid by Antiochus Epiphanes to read the law (13), and had substituted the lecture of the prophets instead of it; the sense in these generally running a greater length, they were obliged to read and expound three whole verses at a time.

However, when the Maccabees had by recovering their liberty restored the ancient reading of the law, they continued still reading also the prophets, and expounded the former verse by verse, and the latter every third verse; in process of time they added likewise the other books called by them כתובים Cetubim, or hagiographa; and this probably gave rise to the distinction of legal, prophetical, and hagiographical books, often mentioned in the gospel (14), and by Josephus (15).

How these periods of verses were marked in their books, is not easy to guess. If the Jews were then as superstitious as they have proved since, it is certain they could never suffer them to be inserted in any shape into the text, which they look upon as polluted by every adventitious point or dot, though ever so accidental. It is indeed a question whether they were so scrupulous in ancient times; but then, if Ezra, or any of his successors, ever admitted those stops, lines, points, or in any other form, it will be a wonder how they came afterwards to be expunged; for it is plain there are none such admitted into their synagogues.

But the difficulty may be easily removed, by supposing, that they only left a blank space between period and period; or, as Maimon imagines (16), that they finished every verse or period with a break, and began the next line with a new verse. But as they found these breaks to run to too great a length in many places, and caused their books, those we mean which they had for their private use, to swell to too great a bulk, they invented the (12) Misham tract. Megill, c. 4. Vide & Valton. prolegom. c. 3. & auct. ab eo citat. (13) El. Levit. Tishbit. (14) Luke c. ult. v. 44. Acts xiii. 15. & alib. (15) Cont. Apion. l. 1. (16) Ex Talmude in Bava Batra, cap 7, & 9.

ANOTHER, and very useful, improvement which he and his inspired associates are generally, and with great probability, believed to have made to this new edition of the sacred books, is the interspersing here and there an explanatory clause by way of parenthesis, and making such other additions to the text, as were necessary to explain, illustrate, or confirm it. Of this nature some suppose the account of Moses's death, and the excellent character given to that great lawgiver in the last chapter of Deuteronomy, to have been; but it seems to us more probable, that this was inserted much earlier, namely by Joshua, or some of his cotemporary writers, in order to inspire the people with a singular respect and credit both to him and his writings. However that be, we meet with a great number, that, being manifestly inserted long after the facts, cannot well be ascribed to any but Ezra, or some of those prophets that assisted him in the work; thus we find in several of the historical books concerning some antient monuments, such-like words as these added by way of testimony, which remain unto this day [w]; nay, many others of the like nature the reader may see in the margin (A). To Corrects them.

[w] Deut. iii. 14. Joshua x. 27. & alib.

the two grammatical points, which are now in use, and which the reader may find in all their pointed books.

But this was not the sole use of these grammatical points. Those who are acquainted with that tongue need not be told how necessary they are in fixing the sense in many places, nor how it may be, and is often rendered obscure, unintelligible, or even contrary by the misplacing of them. We have formerly given a notable instance of it , from which the reader may guess of the rest; and shall dwell no longer upon it.

(A) Thus it is said in Genesis (17), that the Canaanites did then dwell in the land; which words could not be inserted till they had actually been extirpated out of it; and in another place of the same book (18), it is said, these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king in Israel, which last words must of necessity have been inserted long after Moses's time. The large iron bed of Og king of Basan, said in Deuteronomy to have been still to be seen in the metropolis of the Ammonites (19), plainly intimates, that that prince had been killed long before this last clause was added. Lastly, and to mention no more, the twenty-fifth chapter of the Proverbs, which begins with these words, The proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah

 vol. iii. p. 458, note D. (17) xii. 6. (18) Ch. xxxvi. 3. (19) Deut. iii. 11.

To the same end he is supposed likewise to have added some new names of places to the old ones, which were become obsolete. Thus Abraham is said to have pursued the confederate kings as far as Dan, the name which the Danites gave long afterwards to Laish [x]. The same was done to Bethel, antiently called Luz, to Hebron, whose original name was Kiriath-Arba, and to many more, by the help of whose new names we come to the knowledge of the places there mentioned, which we could never have known by their old ones.

Restores the divine worship.

THE last work of this great man was the restoring of the worship of the temple, according to its antient form before the captivity; to revise and amend the Jewish liturgy, and to add particular prayers and thanksgivings, proper for the festivals that were super-added after their return from their captivity; such as the dedication of the new temple [y], of Purim [z], and the like; and as the psalms entered into almost every part of their worship, and were to be sung alternately (B), as we have seen in a former volume, it is not to be doubted, but he took the same pains in collecting the whole book, and giving it the same revisal which he had to the rest. Whether he digested them in the same order we have them now in, as is generally believed by Jews and Christians, and whether he was king of Judah copied out, plainly shews, the words were added some considerable time after the last named king, who was twelve generations off Solomon.

[x] Conf. Gen. xiv. 14. & Jos. xix. 47. Judg. xviii. 29. [y] Ezra vi. 16. [z] Esther ix. 29. ad fin. vol iii. p. 435. & seq.

(B) That is, not by hemistics, as Meibonius and some others seem to have imagined, but by whole verses, as they are now sung in our cathedrals; for, first, some of those verses there are, which, as a learned prelate has lately observed against him (20), manifestly consist of three members, and so are incompatible with the method of singing by hemistic.

But what seems to us more decisive is, that in some other acrostics (21), whose verses are consequently determined, the letter ו vau not being admitted to begin the sixth verse, but being thrust in the middle of the fifth, just after the athnach, they substituted a verse after the last alphabetical one, which begins in them with the letter פ, which can hardly be supposed to have been done, but to make the number of verses even, that the same side of the choir might not begin and end the same psalm, which addition would have been needless, had they been sung by hemistics.

(20) Hare prolegom. page 4 and 5. (21) Psalm xxv. & xxxiv.

was the author of thoſe which were manifeſtly compoſed during the captivity [a] and after their return from it [b], ſuch as we take thoſe which are ſtyled gradual to have been (C); and laſtly, whether he lived to finiſh all theſe things, or left them to be completed by his ſucceſſors, we will not pretend to determine. One thing the ſecond book of Maccabees informs us, that Nehemiah founded a library at Jeruſalem, in which he depoſited the acts of the kings, of the prophets, and of David [c], which ſeems to intimate, as if the reviſion of them had been completed before that time.

It is no leſs uncertain, whether this reviſion of the ſacred books reached ſo far as the reſtoring of the poetical parts to their antient metre, or whether they contented themſelves

[a] Pſalm cxxxvii. [b] cxxvi. [c] Chap. ii. 13.

(C) Concerning the title of theſe, which are fifteen in number, beginning at the hundred and twentieth, various have been the conjectures of the learned; its original import is a ſong of degrees or ſteps, which ſome interpreters miſtaking, have rendered a ſong of excellencies, or a moſt excellent ſong (22). The Chaldee paraphraſt turns it, a ſong of the ſteps of the abyſs, alluding to an old Jewiſh tradition; that when they came to lay the foundations of the ſecond temple, ſuch a ſtream of water guſhed out, as roſe fifteen cubits, and would in all probability have overflowed the country, had it not been quaſhed by virtue of the ineffable name of God, written upon the fifteen ſteps of the temple.

Hence interpreters have imagined, that theſe pſalms had their names from the fifteen ſteps on which they were ſung; but in what part of the temple, whether within or without, they can by no means agree. Others took the hint from thence, that they were ſung on ſome high deſk, or raiſed place, to which the ſingers went by ſteps; but where is there any foundation for this?

But if we conſider, that the whole tenor of thoſe pſalms conſiſts chiefly either in fervent prayers for their return from their captivity, or thankſgiving for having obtained it; and that the terms, aſcent, and to aſcend, are frequently uſed to expreſs their return into their own land (23); as it was indeed a high hilly ground, is it not more natural to ſuppoſe thoſe pſalms to have been compoſed ſome a little before, and ſome preſently after, and all upon the ſubject of this happy מעלות, aſcent or return from Babylon to Jeruſalem (24)? So Shir Hammealoth will properly ſignify the ſong of the return, or of thoſe that returned.

(22) Jun. Tremel. Muiſ. & al. (23) Vid. int. al. Ezra i. 3, 5, & ſeq. ii. 2. vii. 9 Nehem. vii. 5, 6. Pſalm. cxxii. Jerem. xxvii. 22. & alib. Ezek. xxxix. 2. & alib. (24) Vid. Calmet. præfat. in Pſ. Grad.

with such a punctuation and division of verses as would best fit them for the service of the temple. The generality of writers is for the latter; but there is one reason which seems to us very strong for the former, namely, that those psalms, which were composed after the captivity, appear to us to run much in the same cadence with those which had been written before it, and many of them, whatever some difficult critics may fancy to the contrary, seem to be in no case inferior to them; which seems a plain intimation, either that the rules of Hebrew poetry were not lost at Babylon, or that they were recovered after their return, though they have been in vain sought for ever since the total dispersion of that nation, as we have fully shewn in the place last quoted out of the first volume of this history. However, since that time the reverend prelate above quoted has favoured the learned world with his metrical edition of the psalms, by which he has at least convinced us that the Hebrew metre is not so irrecoverably lost as we then imagined. It is true, we are far from thinking that he has actually discovered it; we shall hereafter give our reasons for it in the margin; but this we are bound to say in justice to his extensive learning, the indefatigable pains he has taken in that work, and the irrefragable arguments with which he has exploded the greatest part of the Massoretic trash, which has been hitherto an insurmountable impediment to such a discovery, to say nothing of the many sagacious rules and judicious criticisms, which the reader will find in that edition; that if his lordship has not quite paved the way to it, he has at least blown up those discouraging obstacles that obstructed it; so that we may now hope, that, by the help of this elaborate piece, those who have both time and genius for such an enterprise, will be now encouraged to follow so noble an example, from the present prospect of success, which they must have despaired of without it. Having said thus much in justice to that excellent piece and its learned author, we shall now, with his lordship's good leave, and with that honest freedom which the dignity of the subject demands of us, offer our reasons, why we think that his new-found metre comes infinitely short of what it appears to us to have originally been, and consequently that the greatest part of the alterations and corrections made for the sake of it, and which are to be found in every page, are so many deviations from the original. And since we find that many of our readers expect we should give our opinion of this learned performance, we doubt not, but if we clear the sacred text from the corruptions which our learned prelate thinks thinks he had corrected in it; and the Hebrew poetry from being such a low, crawling, and imperfect thing as this edition makes it, not only they, but much more his good lordship, will be pleased with it; and that merit of the cause will plead for the length of the following note, into which we shall for order and brevity's sake insert all that we have to say upon that subject (D).

An account of bishop Hare's edition of the psalms.

(D) In speaking of the sacred Hebrew poetry in a former volume *, we ventured to affirm, that it was unreasonable to suppose, that an art, which, with respect to its noblest part, the strength of expression, loftiness of thought, beauty of metaphors, and imagery, was almost at its height in Moses's time; and had been so excellently well cultivated during so many centuries after, should yet be so uncouth and imperfect with respect to the metre, as Le Clerc and some other critics have made it; the latter being but a mere jingle, and within the compass of a much more ordinary genius. And this argument we think will hold much stronger against that even heavy and inelegant bitony, which our learned prelate has given us for it; and especially,

2dly, If we take in another part of his lordship's affirmation, namely, that it admitted of no distinction of long and short syllables, but used them all indifferently, as the nature of the verse, which is there affirmed to consist of no other variety than trochaic and iambic, required. For this once allowed, we may safely say with the poet, that Nil non erit versus, and that there is no period in the Old Testament from Genesis to Malachi, that may not be thus versified, not to say, any other book in any other language; for proof of which, if the reader will but be at the small pains we have been induced to take, he may with ease reduce the whole common prayer book, either English, Latin, or Greek, into the same kind of verse, and without those frequent alterations, which his lordship is forced to make in the Hebrew text.

We may add, that quantity is in many cases so necessary and obvious to fix the sense of what is said or sung, that it is absolutely impossible the sacred poets should have been thus totally negligent of it.

But, thirdly, That neither poets nor musicians, from Moses to David, should have stumbled upon a variety of metres, answerable to the variety of subjects treated of in the psalms; but that the penitential ones, than which nothing can be more grave or solemn, as to the expression, should run on in the same merry pace with the eucharistical, encœnical, epithalamical, and others of a more chearful nature; or that David, bewailing and begging pardon for his secret sins, should express himself in the same

* vol. iii. p. 421, & seq.

We return to Ezra, who, having been ſucceeded by Nehemiah, after he had governed the Jewiſh church and nation thirteen ſame leaping anacreontic ſtrain, as when he ſpeaks of the mountains ſkipping like rams, and the little hills like young ſheep (25), credat quicunque vult.

Laſtly, If the book of pſalms, a book ſo highly eſteemed, and in ſuch conſtant uſe among all the Jews, can be once ſuppoſed to have been ſo mutilated, as to ſtand in need, not only of all that vaſt quantity of corrections which are here introduced for the ſake of that metre, but of a great many more, which that learned prelate owns he could not reſtore; it is to be feared, whatever his lordſhip may think to the contrary, its authority will ſoon dwindle into nothing, eſpecially, if that be admitted, which his lordſhip affirms in ſeveral places of that work, that a great number of thoſe corruptions have been introduced into the text, not by the inadvertency and ignorance of tranſcribers, but by the ſuperſtition, or even malicious intent, of the Jews themſelves. But ſuch a ſevere charge againſt a people, who, for ought appears to the contrary, have rather ran into the other extreme, ought to have been backed by ſome ſtronger proofs, than the bare ſtructure of this new-found metre, which is at beſt built upon a tottering foundation, and in many caſes upon a wrong one, as will, we hope, appear, by what follows.

Theſe were ſome of the main reaſons that induced us to inquire further into the grounds of this new metre; and here we own, that his lordſhip could not have fallen upon a better way to come at his intended diſcovery, than that of framing his rules from the acroſtic pſalms, whoſe verſes, being confined within their alphabetical limits, take away at once all occaſion of expatiating. But the misfortune was, that he made choice of ſo ſhort a one for his ground and pattern, which conſiſting but of ten verſes, and by its ſtructure appearing to have been deſigned, like ſome others of the like nature, to be committed to memory for frequent uſe, could not afford that variety of meaſure, &c. which is to be found in acroſtics of a greater length, ſuch as the 25th, 34th, 37th, and eſpecially the 119th.

This laſt, his lordſhip juſtly obſerves, comes indeed vaſtly ſhort of the poetic elegancy of the reſt, with reſpect to the diction; but as to the metre, it affords ſuch a beautiful variety of it, that it ſeems to contain an epitome of the whole Hebrew metre; and we doubt not, but if his lordſhip had beſtowed the ſame pains in framing his rules from it, he might not only have given us a more noble idea of the ſacred poetry, but likewiſe ſaved himſelf the endleſs trouble of diſtorting the text, to make it ſquare with his thirteen years, aſſiſted him in ſome parts of his office ſome few years, after which we hear no more of him. Joſephus tells us [d], that his own. All which put together gave us juſt cauſe to think, that his fondneſs for this new diſcovery had made him overlook ſeveral great beauties and excellencies in the Hebrew metre, which a cloſer and leſs partial examination might eaſily bring to light.

(25) Compare in this new edition, Pſalm xix. 14, with cxiv. 3, & ſeq.

D 4

[d] Antiq. l. xi.

We had not gone far in this inquiry, before ſome of his metrical emendations gave us a manifeſt proof of it, and ſet us upon a much better ſcent. We obſerved, that his lordſhip was often forced, for the ſake of the verſe, to curtail a triſyllable into a biſyllable, or to ſtretch the latter into the former; but more particularly the names of God, Jah, Jahvoh, and Elohim, by exchanging them ad libitum, and contrary to the text, according as the verſe required one, two, or three ſyllables, even as far as eighteen times in one pſalm (26).

This, we obſerved, was conſtantly done in verſes whoſe hemiſtics ran either in the ſame number of ſyllables, except only in theſe names of God, as in the following; or in parallel verſes of different pſalms; in the one of which the word Javoh, and the other Elohim, and ſometimes Adonai, did occur (28), cæteris paribus. This made us apprehend at firſt, that if there was really any ſuch metre in the pſalms, his lordſhip was miſtaken in reading the word יְהוָה Jahvoh, which ought to have been a triſyllable, in order to anſwer to Elohim and Adonai.

(27) בֵּאלוֹהִים אֲהַלֵּל דָּבָר בֵּיהוֹה אֲהַלֵּל דָּבָר

But finding upon further examination, that Elohim was in ſeveral places ſet to anſwer to other words, which were certainly biſyllable, as in the following (29),

Joduca	hammim	Elohim
Joduca	hammim	Cullam

What could be a ſtronger proof than this, that Elohim, conſiſting of two ſhorts and a long, was equivalent to the two long ones in Cullam, and conſequently that the Hebrew metre admitted not only of long and ſhort ſyllables, two of the laſt of which were (26) In Pſalm lxviii. (27) Pſalm lvi. 11. (38) Conf. Pſalm, xiv, 3, & liii. 3. lvii. 10, & cviii. 3, & alib. pluries. (29) Pſ. lxviii. 3.

Ezra's death and character.

that he died and was buried at Jerusalem; but the rest of of the Jews affirm, that he returned into Persia, and died there were equal to one of the former; but also, that it consisted of trisyllables, bisyllables, and monosyllables, or what the prosodiasts call cesures? Such as are in the Latin pentameters, and in the Hebrew iambics. We have not room in a note to multiply examples; the reader may, by comparing the following ones, which are exactly according to the text, with those of our learned author, as he has been forced to distort them from it to reduce them to his metre, easily gues, to what a vast number of needless emendations this one single error of the Hebrew poetry consisting only of bisyllables, without distinction of quantity (30), has given birth, which might otherwise have been happily avoided.

Ezkòr Màhlè-lè iàh
Ezkeràh mikedem philekà
raukà Màjìm Elohìm
raukà Màjìm jakilù (31)
Hùshàh lèhèz-ratì
Adonài tèshù-hati (32)
B'elohìm ahàl-lèl dà-bar
B'jahvoh ahal-lel da-bar (33).

Nòdàh Bìhudàh Elohim
Bishraèl gadòl Shemò ashiràh lihvòh bekhajài azamràh lelohàh behodi Elohim berób Khasdecà
honneni beemeth jishecà

Those that are conversant with the Hebrew tongue and sacred poets, will easily feel the advantage of admitting this variety of feet, not only with regard to its superior elegance to a dull constant bitony, but also towards the further discovery of the Hebrew metre in verses of unequal hemistics; some of which run to such lengths above others, even in those acrostics abovementioned, that they contain often double, and sometimes treble, the number of syllables.

This indeed our author looks upon as such a disgrace to the Hebrew poetry, that, right or wrong, he endeavours to avoid it every-where, as much as possible; sometimes by the addition of one or more words, at other times by striking them out (34), by elisions, paragogics, and sometimes by splitting a long word between two hemistics, or sometimes by splitting an hemistic into two, contrary to the constant structure of the psalm (35); and yet if we were to frame a judgment from the three last quoted psalms, xxxvii. cxix. and cxxxvi, one would be apt to think, that the sacred poets thought these transitions, from a long to a very short hemistic, an ornament; and such it is thought by all, in (30) Vid. Prolegom. p. 4. & 27. (31) Psalm. lxxvii. 12, & 17. (32) xxxviii. ult. (33) lvi. 11. (34) Psalm xxxvii. 20, 25, & seq. cxix. pass. (35) Psalm. cxxxvi 9.

there in the hundred and twentieth year of his age. They bear ſo great a veneration for him, that they look upon him as in odes, epitaphs, and ſuch-like, which ſeem therefore to us to come neareſt to the Hebrew genius and metre, not only of the pſalms, but of the other poetic pieces of the Old Teſtament *.

Now this kind being ſo oppoſite to the trochaic and iambic, which his lordſhip had pitched upon for his ſtandard, we need not wonder, that he has ſucceeded no better in his endeavours to bring it to it, ſince that could not be done but by conſtant ſtretching, diſlocating, amputation, and other ſuch-like violent methods, which his lordſhip, among many other learned men, hath juſtly objected againſt Le Clerc and others, who have attempted this diſcovery.

It is not the deſign of this note to recover the ancient Hebrew poetry, a taſk for which we have neither time nor abilities; but to reſcue it from that contempt into which both it and the Hebrew text muſt unavoidably fall, if it ſhould once be ſuppoſed, that the former conſiſted only in a dull, ſleepy, and uncertain bipedality, and that the latter has been ſo corrupted and mutilated, partly by Jewiſh ſuperſtition and malice, and partly by the ignorance and inadvertency of tranſcribers. And therefore, though what has been ſaid ſeem to us ſufficient to vindicate it in both caſes, yet, as the laſt is a matter of ſuch great moment, we ſhall take the liberty to animadvert upon ſome few more of his lordſhip's metrical emendations, that the reader may ſee how little reaſon he had to ſay, Ex metro liquidò apparet; fruſtra ergo ſunt omnes hic interpretes (36). We ſhall begin with the fiftieth pſalm, out of the firſt verſe of which he has ſtruck the two names of God, El and Elohim, into the title, upon no other authority than the laſt mentioned. Could his lordſhip indeed have backed it with one ſingle inſtance of a pſalm, intitled, Mizmor El Elohim, or ſhewn that there was any abſurdity or inelegancy in the expreſſion, El, Elohim, Jahvoh, or Jehovah, the God of gods, or the Mighty God; ſuch a change might have paſt for an amendment; but to reject ſo noble an expreſſion for the ſake of a metre, which is at beſt as yet but in embryo, is a criticiſm which few of his readers will digeſt.

But were it really for the ſake of the metre, that his lordſhip rejects this triplicate name of God, how eaſily might it have been remedied by lengthening the verſe without any violence to the text! As,

El Elohim Jahvoh dibber, vajicra, Erets mimiſrah ſhemeſh had meboo or by any other way, rather than ſtripping the original of ſo lofty an expreſſion. But if his lordſhip, or the reader, is by this time

* Vid. int. al Exod. 15, & Lament. c. 3. (36) Note in v. 1. Pſalm. 1.

as a second Moses, a restorer of the sacred books and Massarah, and, in a word, one every way worthy to have been their time reconciled to that variety of metre we have endeavoured to establish above, the whole verse may be still made to run more elegantly, and conformably to the rest of the psalms, thus;

El elo-hìm Jàh-vòh dìb ber
Vàjicra èretz mìmmìz rah
Shèmèsh vè hàd meboo

But his lordship seems to be fond of spying out difficulties in the original, that he may have an opportunity of exercising his critical talent. We shall give three pregnant instances of it; the first is in the eigth and ninth verses of the fortieth psalm; this place, obscure and intricate as his lordship calls it, after some additional words and a new disposition of the original ones, he leaves much more dark and unintelligible, and less elegant and grammatical than he found it, as the reader may see by comparing it with the text.

Now all this trouble might have been saved, and the text not only cleared, but exactly adjusted, to the place, where the epistle to the Hebrews quotes it (37), by the single addition of the letter כ caph before the word בְּמִגְלַּת bimgillath, and which may easily be supposed to have been omitted by reason of its similitude to the ב beth, or even by the bare changing the one for the other, and reducing cemgillath instead of bemgillath; and then the verses will run thus, and in the bishop's own metre,

As a-marti hinneh bati
then said I lo I come (kebim-gillath Sepher Catub (as in the volume of the book it is written halai) lahsoth rezo-neka of me) to do thy will
Elo haikha-phasti
O my God, I am well pleased with it
Vetho-rathca betoc Mehai
And thy law is within my heart.

The altering the points in the verb khaphazti, and making it the substantive khephzati, will render it still more elegant; and the sense will be, O my God, and my delight; or, O God, thou art my delight, and thy law is within my heart.

The next is in the sixty-eighth psalm, verse 14; where the author not being able to light upon a better sense than that whic th

(37) Heb. 10. 7.

their law-giver, had not that honour been bestowed on Moses. They join the books of Ezra and Nehemiah into one, and make the vulgate and our version gives it, Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove, &c. has been forced to insert the words tehiu and ce, and to double that of Jonah with the addition of the כ in the first. Now all this might have been saved, and the sense made not only much plainer, but more elegant, by reading יגפה instead of כגפי, which is but a small alteration in comparison of his; and then the sense will be plainly this; Though ye have lain among the pots or rather, according to the parallel in Genesis xlix 15. Though ye sink between two burthens, yet shall the dove (emblem of innocence) escape with her wings covered with silver, and her feathers with the purest gold.

• Vid. Sed. Hol. Cabbal. R. Abr. Levit. Seph. Juchas. Shalsheleth. & al plur.

The last is in psalm cxxxviii. v. 2. the latter part of which running thus in the text, which not being altogether so intelligible, his lordship rectifies by adding the word Shem before Shemka, and casting out the last word, as absurdly added and without sense, and for a proof of it sends us to the parallel of St. Paul (37).

Ki higdalta hal col Shemca imratheca ;

I hope his lordship will not think imratheca, thy word, to have been here maliciously added by the Jews, since, if we understand the apostle right, he speaks there of Christ the word, the logos made flesh, and crucified, and for which God has given him a name above every name. If, therefore, instead of striking it out, his lordship had only expunged the pronoun ך after Shem, without any farther alteration, the sense would have much better tallied with St. Paul's quotation thus: For thou hast magnified thy word above every name. His lordship could not be ignorant, what is universally understood by the Hebrew Imrah, the Chaldee Mamre, the Greek Logos, and the Latin Verbum, when applied to that divine Person.

It is true, if we admit the original word imratheca, the verse will be one syllable too long for the foregoing; a misfortune which often happens in the text, but which his lordship is never at a loss to obviate, either by an elision or a paragogic, though, for our part, we should rather chuse to remedy it by the rule heretofore given of making two short syllables equal to a long one.

Much

(37) Philip. ii. 6.

make him the author of it: and he was certainly so of the first, since he speaks of nothing in it, but what was done in his

Much of the same nature is the correction of Psalm lxxiv. v. 3. where his lordship strikes out of the verse the words lemasshuoth netzakh, perpetual desolations, as absurd and contrary to the context, (in which the psalmist begs of God to put an end to them) and fills up the chasm with the word Calleh, which he fetches out of the eleventh verse, where he pretends it to be redundant.

His lordship, we believe, is the first that thinks it nonsense for a man to pray to God to put an end to his perpetual, that is, constant, and hitherto uninterupted, misfortunes; besides, the word נצח netzach, it is well known, doth not always imply the duration, but often strength, greatness, violence, and insurmountableness of a thing; and therefore not only very applicable to the then dreadful desolations of the sanctuary, but also very fit to be humbly represented to that God whose hand alone could remedy them.

But there is still another and much more natural way of clearing the original, than that of his lordship's, by supposing the verb to have been originally נצה netzah, fly, which the transcribers, not understanding, changed it for the other, which was more known to them. The expression of lift up thy feet, which alludes to a bird just going to take flight, confirms this sense, which will run thus, lift up thy feet, and fly to those dreadful devastations, which thy enemies perpetually commit in thy holy place.

But this not being perceived by the transcribers, in order to make their netzakh run smooth with the rest, they changed the order of the words, which probably ran thus:

Harimah pahameka
Netzah lecol Malshuoth
Herah ojeb bakkodesh.

A for the word כלה, which his lordship fetches from the eleventh verse, we think it fully as well where it is, and where it is properly the participle pahul of the verb כלא to shut, or inclose, the א elided by reason of the feminine, the hand, there said to be shut up in the bosom. See a parallel in Psalm lxxxvii. v. 9.

From these few examples the reader may see the ill consequence of too great an attachment to a favourite system: but the mischief has not stopt here; and the notion, that the text was so corrupt, that nothing but these violent means could possibly recover it, has spread itself to other places, where the metre did not want those emendations. Thus his lordship tells us, in his notes on Psalm cvii. v. 25 and 29, that the words jahmed and jaken his time and under his eye, and almoft every-where ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt perſon; but if he wrote the ſecond, ſome additions

jakem had manifeſtly changed places. We had indeed long before ſuſpected ſome error in the laſt verb, but never dreamt of this way of rectifying it. However, it appeared ſo plauſible to us at the firſt reading, that we readily jumped over the difficulty of accounting how two ſuch words, that ſtood at the diſtance of four verſes, or eight hemiſtics, aſunder, ſhould, contrary to the plain ſenſe of the text, be jumbled into each other's place; and we tranſpoſed them according to his correction in our manuſcript pſalter.

But we had not often read over the expreſſion jahmed ruakh ſeharah lidmamah, before we obſerved a manifeſt abſurdity in it, ſince that verb in this conjugation doth not ſignify to make to ſtand ſtill, but to cauſe to ſtand, to act; and could not conſequently belong to the latter, but to the former of the verſes, where it was raiſed to cauſed the ſtorm there ſpoken of; and we accordingly replaced it where it ought to be.

The difficulty then was how to rectify the word jakem, which, as it is there written, muſt be owned to be nonſenſe, unleſs we we take it in the ſame figurative meaning, which it is known to have in 1 Sam. iv. 15. and 1 Kings xiv. 4. and elſewhere But here the thirty-third and thirty-fifth verſes of the ſame pſalm furniſhed us with a much more plauſible ſalvo than his lordſhip's improbable tranſpoſition, it being much more likely that a tranſcriber ſhould miſtake or overlook one letter for another, than that he ſhould thus tranſpoſe two diſtant words againſt all ſenſe; and thus we writ יָשֵׂם jaſham, to turn, inſtead of יָקֵם jakem, to raiſe, Jaſhem Seharah Lidmamah turneth the tempeſt into a calm, will then anſwer to Jaſhem Neharoth l'Midbar. verſe 33. he turneth the rivers into a dry wilderneſs, and Jaſhem Midbar l' agam Majim, verſe 33, a dry wilderneſs into a ſtanding water.

If our reader, however, ſhould miſlike this verb, either on account of its occurring three times within ſo ſmall a diſtance from each other, or becauſe it is not elegant enough to anſwer the context, he may find ſome more noble ones in the verbs יָקֵם, to break, יָקַהּ, to blunt יָקֵהּ, to tire, whoſe laſt letters being ſo near like the ם, might eaſily be miſtaken for it, the verb קוּם being more familiar to them, than the others, which occur but ſeldom.

But after all, we very much queſtion, whether any other change need to be made than the bare tranſpoſition of the particle ל from demamah to ſeharah, and ſo יָקֵם לְמַעֲדֶהּדְּמָמָה will properly ſignify, He makes the calm to ſucceed the ſtorm, an expreſſion no ways irregular or inelegant. The reader, however, may ſee by this one inſtance, how many eaſier ways that text might additions muſt have been made to it ſince his death; but the difference of ſtyle ſeems to prove it of another hand, as well as might be rectified, than that which the learned author has pitched upon.

We ſhall end this note with one animadverſion more on that learned prelate's edition, by which the reader will plainly ſee, that his lordſhip is not always ſo happy as to take the beſt ſenſe of the pſalmiſt. We obſerved in a former volume *, that ſome of the figures in that ſacred book are ſo high and compound, that they were not eaſily perceived by every reader.

Our learned biſhop's ſingular opinion of the rudeneſs of the Hebrew poetry, hath made him not only overlook many of them, but even quarrel with ſome, which, had he been otherwiſe prejudiced, might have challenged his admiration. One of them, for inſtance, is in Pſalm lxxii v. 16. This noble pſalm is intitled to Solomon; but what is contained in it is generally underſtood to regard the reign of the Meſſiah: but be that reign whoſe it will, here is foretold, among other great bleſſings, ſuch an uncommon plenty, that Piſſath bar, a little handful of corn, ſown on the tops of the mountains, naturally the moſt barren, ſhould outvie the fertile Libanus for increaſe. One would wonder how a perſon of his profound judgment could be diſſatisfied with ſo elegant a phraſe; and yet he tells us in his note, that unleſs the word piſſath be allowed here to have a contrary ſenſe, that is, to ſignify a great abundance, he ſhall ſuſpect it to have crept in inſtead of ſome word of the like import; which would be in fact loſing all the beauty of the expreſſion, as much as if his lordſhip had ſaid, that the fertile vallies ought to be inſerted inſtead of the barren mountain tops; for where would be the wonder, that a great heap of corn, or a fertile ground, ſhould bring forth a plentiful crop?

Of the ſame nature is that noble expreſſion of the pſalmiſt †, where he compares himſelf to bammetim khopſhi, to a corpſe ſecluded even from among the dead, alluding to the Jewiſh way of burying; for as the graves of the dead polluting the living, who came near them, ſo thoſe who died a violent death, or under the anathema, were to have a grave ſeparate from the reſt, leſt they ſhould pollute even their fellow dead; and that this is the alluſion here intended, is plain by the verſes immediately following, and implied in the word khalalim, which ſhould properly be rendered, not wounded, but profane, abominable, and which, mijadeca nigzaru, are cut off from thy hand, plainly ſhews, ‡; but his lordſhip, having overlooked this beautiful figure, has ſtruck out the word bammetim, as ſpoiling the ſenſe as well as the verſe how rightly, let the reader judge.

Thus

* vol. iii. p. 422, ſub fin. note L. † Pſalm lxxxvii. 6 ‡ Concerning thoſe burials, ſee before, vol. iii. p. 341, & ſeq.

as that of the two books of Chronicles, which it is not, however, improbable, he might have had the reviſal of; as for the other two books falſely attributed to him, and known by by the names of the firſt and ſecond books of Eſdras, they are juſtly rejected; however, we ſhall ſubjoin a ſhort account of each in the margin. (E).

Nehemiah,

Thus much we thought incumbent upon us to ſay of that learned and elaborate work, which, if it has not anſwered the end which its noble author propoſed, may yet be read, as it was by us, with great pleaſure and profit, not only on account of numberleſs judicious criticiſms and obſervations which the reader will find in it, but as it will adminiſter the greateſt helps that ever were, as yet, thought on, by any of the learned, towards the recovering of the ancient Hebrew poetry. As to the reſt, we dare believe, it will be no ſmall pleaſure to that learned and pious prelate, to find the diſcovery of his miſtakes turn ſo much to the credit and vindication of the ſacred text and of its inſpired penmen.

(E) The firſt book of Eſdras is no other than the firſt book of Ezra, with a variety of fabulous circumſtances, particularly that of the three young men of Darius's guard, who, for their exquiſite wiſdom in anſwering his queſtions, are there pretended to have obtained, among other marks of his favour, the liberty of returning to Jeruſalem and of rebuilding the temple (29). The Greek church is the only one that holds it among the canonical books.

The ſecond book is acknowledged by neither Jews nor Chriſtians, being a work which carries the manifeſt marks of impoſture. It is falſely pretended to have been written by Ezra himſelf, though filled partly with rabbinic fables, ſuch as the account of the ſix days creation, particularly of Behemoth and Leviathan, two monſtrous creatures, deſigned for a feaſt to the elect after the reſurrection (30), and partly with ſome goſpel notions, corrupted and fitted to the author's taſte. Of this nature are the nearneſs of the day of judgment, the appearance of the Son of God to him, and many more not worth repeating.

Mohammed has alſo ſtuffed his Koran with ſome monſtrous fables; he not only owns him to have recovered the ſacred books, which had been in a great meaſure loſt, but affirms that he wrote them with five pens at once. He adds, that this miracle not convincing the incredulous Jews that he had rightly performed the taſk, one of the company told the reſt, that one of his anceſtors had formerly hid a fair copy of them in the cleft of a rock; which being fetched and compared with this new one of Ezra, they found ſuch an exact agreement between them, as convinced them that he

(29) Ch. iii. & ſeq. (30) Ch. vi. 40, & ſeq.

Nehemiah sent into Judæa. Year of the flood 2554. Before Christ 445.

Nehemiah, cup-bearer to the king of Persia, a Jew (F) of great learning and piety, had heard, by some of his nation lately come from Jerusalem, of the ruinous condition which that city still stood in, notwithstanding the favours which that monarch had heaped on the returned Jews; being therefore backed by the queen, who is expressly said to have been at the table, when he made his petition to him [f], he obtained a commission from him to succeed Ezra in the government of Judæa, with full power to rebuild and adorn both city and temple, and with fresh orders to Sanballat and others of his officers on this side of Euphrates, to furnish him with all necessary materials out of the king's treasury. Nehemiah, having gathered a fresh supply of men and women to return with him into Judæa, departed under an escorte which the king had granted, and arrived he had been supernaturally assisted in it; some other fables he adds, which the reader may find in D'Herbelot (31).

[f] Nehem. ii. 6.

The eastern christians believe, that Ezra, having swallowed down some of the mud of the well, wherein the sacred fire had been hid before the captivity, was immediately inspired, and enabled to write all the sacred books afresh (32). This seems to be partly taken out of the second book of Esdras, where that fabulous author tells us, that having begged of God to direct him how to recover those lost volumes, God gave him to drink of a liquor of a fiery colour; by the help of which he was enabled to dictate them to five scribes at the same time, who were forty days in writing two hundred and four volumes (33).

(F) The text calls him barely the son of Hachaliah (34), without informing us of what tribe he was. Some therefore from a passage in the Maccabees (35), where he is said to have offered sacrifices, and from his being reckoned at the head of the priests that signed the new covenant with God (36), have affirmed him to have been of the family of Aaron.

But as there is nothing conclusive in all this, and seems expressly contradicted by his saying in another place, that he was not a fit person to shelter himself in the temple (37); the far greater part suppose him to have been of the royal family of Judah (38); and this is so much the more probable, because we find none but such promoted to those high stations about the king's person; but never read of a priest that was so, till a long time after, and upon a quite different account, as the sequel will shew.

(31) Biblioth. orient. sub voce Ozair. Ben. Seraiah. Vid. & Koran. cap. Bacra. (32) D'Herbel. ubi supra. (33) Ch. xiv. 22, & seq. (34) Nehem. i. 1. (35) Lib. ii. c. i. 18. 21. (36) Nehem. x. 1. (37) Ibid. c. vi. 11. (38) R. Abrab. in Cabbal. Euseb. Isid. & Genebr. & al.

rived at Jerusalem, where he kept himself in private three days, at the end of which he went in the night, accompanied with a few of his men, to take a full view of the city and walls, which he found to answer exactly the report that had been made to him of it at Shushan. On the morrow he sent for the heads of the people, and in the great assembly opened his commission, which he told them he would immediately put in force, and set about the finishing of the wall; he divided the work between a number of great families, each of which undertook a part of a stated extent, and was to build it at their own charges; and the new governor plied them so close, that in fifty-two days they had all completed their task, notwithstanding the many discouragements which he met with, both from within and from without [g].

The wall finished.

For while the work was going on, they were forced to bear with many a bitter sarcasm from Sanballat, a Horonite (G), governor of Samaria, and some others of his officers; but this was nothing to some of their underhand plots to obstruct it; for they went so far as to hire some treacherous Jews to dishearten both the governor and people, with the specious pretence that they were sent from God to put a stop to the enterprize. Nehemiah soon found out the cheat, but foreseeing that his enemies would not fail to use force, if their subdolous practices failed, ordered the people to arm themselves even while they were at work, placed strong guards to defend them, and trumpeters at convenient distances from each other, that at what quarter soever they should chance to be attacked, the rest, upon hearing the alarm, might come immediately to their assistance. But the greatest obstacle of all was, that the poorer sort, who were to bear the greater share of the labour, had been so impoverished by continual extortions from the rich, even long before his arrival, that they had already been forced to mortgage their lands, sell their sons and daughters, and submit to so many other hardships, that they were quite disabled from pursuing it. Nehemiah, who expected nothing less than to hear of such horrid cruelties being committed by the Jewish rulers, upbraided them in the severest

[g] Ibid. iii. & seq.

(G) Probably so called, because he was a native of Horonaim, a city of Moab; their other two principal enemies were Tobias the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian; all consequently ill-affected to the Jews, but now doubly so, since they were likely to be dispossest by them of many a good estate, which they had seized on during their captivity.

vereſt terms; and partly by perſuaſions, and partly by his own authority, obliged them to reſtore all their ill-gotten wealth to the poor owners, and at the ſame time took care, that they ſhould be ſupplied with all neceſſary ſuſtenance while they continued in the work [h]; by theſe means he defeated the meaſures of the Samaritans. As ſoon as the wall was finiſhed, he cauſed the dedication of it to be celebrated with the uſual ſolemnities by the prieſts and levites (H) [i], and left the government of the city to his two brothers, Hanani and Hananiah [k], whilſt himſelf returned, as is reaſonably ſuppoſed, into Perſia (I), to obtain a new commiſſion, the old one extending no farther than the rebuilding of the city wall, which was now actually done.

Is conſecrated.

HITHERTO Jeruſalem, large and ſpacious as it was, remained ſtill but thinly peopled, the far greater part having ſettled themſelves in the country round about; and whenever any buſineſs called them into the city, they ſeldom failed

[h] Ch. v. paſſ. [i] Ch. xii. [k] Ch. vii.

(H) This noble ceremony, which is deſcribed in the chapter above quoted, conſiſted in the purification of the prieſts and people, that they might partake of the ſacrifices that were to be offered on that ſolemnity. After this they aſſembled themſelves at one of the gates, whence dividing themſelves into two bands, the one of them took to the right, and the other to the left, and marched in a ſolemn proceſſion round the wall, till they met each other at the temple; they were followed by the prieſts blowing their trumpets, and with other ſingers and muſicians.

As ſoon as they were come to the temple, the two choirs placed themſelves oppoſite to each other; and while they were ſinging ſome pſalms proper to the occaſion, the prieſts offered a great number of ſacrifices, eſpecially of oxen, after which they ſpent the remainder of the day in feaſting and mirth.

(I) This is indeed the moſt probable of the two, as the learned Prideaux obſerves (39); for as his commiſſion was only to repair the wall of the city, the only thing he had begged of the king, it is likely he went to have it inlarged, before he undertook any thing new; beſides, it is not very likely, that he would have it committed the government of the city to any one whilſt himſelf was there preſent.

His great intereſt at the Perſian court might then give ſuch diſpatch to his buſineſs, and his return to Jeruſalem might be ſo ſudden, that he did not think it material to mention it in hiſtory.

(39) Connect. lib. vi. ſub. an. A. Chr. 445.

ed returning at night to their habitations. This Nehemiah had indeed forbidden while the wall was building; but after it was finiſhed, they returned to their uſual courſe. This therefore obliged him to provide for its ſafety, by cauſing a greater number of people to come and ſettle in it. He perſuaded at firſt the nobler and richer to build them houſes there, which they the more gladly complied with, becauſe their country ſeats were very much infeſted with thieves and banditti, who made frequent excurſions againſt them. After this they took in all that willingly offered themſelves to come and ſettle there; but theſe not proving ſufficient, he was obliged to take every tenth family by lot; ſo that by this time the city being well built, peopled, guarded, and fortified, it began to reſume ſomething of its former luſtre [l]; and Herodotus, who ſaw it ſoon after this time, compares it to Sardis, the metropolis of Aſia Minor [m] (K). The city peopled.

WHILST Nehemiah was thus employed in peopling and fortifying the city, adorning the temple, and rectifying the genealogies both of prieſts and people (L), Ezra, who had by that time finiſhed his collection of the ſacred books, was preparing himſelf, and ſome other learned prieſts, to make a ſolemn lecture of them to the whole nation, on the next approaching feſtival, which was that of the trumpets, uſhering in the new year. To this end a capacious ſcaffold or desk was raiſed in one of the largeſt ſtreets of the city, that the people, who came from all parts of the land to the feaſt, might conveniently hear it. Ezra was ſeated in the midſt with the ſacred volume before him, and on each ſide ſtood The law publicly read and expounded.

[l] Nehem. xi. [m] l. iii.

(K) Herodotus calls it Cadytis; but whoever reads what the learned Prideaux has ſaid on that ſubject (40), will eaſily think with him, that it could be no other than Jeruſalem.

(L) This had been done once before ſoon after the return, as we have heretofore hinted; but not ſo clearly, but that there were ſtill many families of prieſts, levites, and of the people, who could not make out their claim to their tribes, and were then ſuſpended. It is therefore likely, that ſome of them were ſince enabled to make out their title, and were then inſerted in this new regiſter, together with thoſe who came up with Nehemiah. Several of the old families, that came up upon the firſt edict, might be by this time extinct; all which is probably the cauſe of the difference we find in the genealogies of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

(40) Sub an. 610. & 445.

six priests well versed in the Hebrew and Chaldee, who did interpret in the latter what he read in the former; and this was done, as we observed before, verse by verse, and was continued from morning till mid-day. Nehemiah then, reminding them of the joyful festival they were then celebrating, dismissed them for that day, charging them to spend the remainder of it in feasting and mirth, and to make their poor brethren partake of their joy. This caution was so much the more necessary, because he observed, that the people shed abundance of tears at the hearing of the law, which he interpreted to proceed from such a remorse of their past deviations from it, as was likely to damp the mirth of that solemnity [n]. As the people shewed a more than common desire to have this lecture and exposition continued to them, Ezra complied with their request, until he and his assistants had gone through the whole pentateuch. The grand festival of tabernacles being likewise near at hand, it opportunely happened, that that part of Leviticus, in which it is injoined, was read some days before; by which they were make sensible, how short they had been till then of its due observation, so that the next they kept was observed with greater strictness and solemnity, that it had been since the time of Joshua (M) [o].

Feast of tabernacles.

But

[n] Nehem. viii. pass. [o] Ibid. vers. 12, & seq.

(M) It is supposed to have been at this solemnity, that the notable discovery happened of the sacred fire related in the book of Maccabees (41), and which we have hinted in a former volume. The Jews affirm, that Jeremiah, or some other prophet, had caused it to be hid in a dry well a little before the taking of Jerusalem (42); the memory of it having been still preserved to that time, Nehemiah caused it to be fetched out for the divine service.

But when they came to uncover the well, they found no fire there, but only a thick mud, which being brought, however, and poured upon the wood of the altar, and victims that were laid on it, all on the sudden the sun, which had hitherto been overcast, began to shine upon it, set the wood on fire, and consumed the burnt-offerings. Nehemiah caused the rest of the mud to be fetched, and poured upon some large stones, which were immediately covered with flames, but these were presented absorbed by those that flew from the altar thither. This (41) 2 Macc. i. 18, & seq. (42) Ibid. vers. 19, & cap. ii. 1, & seq.

But this was not all the advantage which Nehemiah reaped from this lecture of the law to ſuch a great concourſe of people; there appeared ſuch a lively concern in them whenever any point of the law was read, of which they knew themſelves tranſgreſſors, that he made uſe of that happy diſpoſition to extort from them a general confeſſion of all their ſins, and a ſolemn promiſe and vow to rectify all that was amiſs for the future; and this was accordingly complied with by all the people, eſpecially with reſpect to the four following heads; namely, 1. Not to make any intermarriages with the Gentiles, and to diſannul the old ones (N): 2. The obſervation of ſabbaths, ſabbatic years, and thoſe divine commands which related to them, ſuch as letting their land reſt, releaſe of ſervants, and the like: 3. The punctual payment of their yearly tribute to the temple, both for the repairs and the maintenance of the divine ſervices in it; and 4. The exact payment of their tithes, firſt-fruits, vows, &c. to the prieſts and levites [p]. The ſolemnity concluded with a generous collection, which he cauſed to be made among them for the ſervice of the temple; in which, to ſhew a noble example to the reſt, he gave himſelf a thouſand drachms of gold, fifty diſhes, and five hundred and thirty-two prieſtly veſtments. Joſephus adds, that he built ſeveral houſes for the prieſts, in order to oblige them to reſide at Jeruſalem [q]. Sure it is, that, whether his place of cupbearer had raiſed his fortune to ſuch a height, which is not improbable, or whether he had a conſiderable patrimony, to enable him, he did many generous and public-ſpirited things in Judæa; Year of the flood 2557. Before Chriſt 442.

[p] Ibid. c. ix. & x. [q] Antiq. l. xi. c 5.

This wonderful accident being afterwards related to the king of Perſia, he ordered the place where the fire had been kept to be ſurrounded, and to be looked upon as ſacred and inviolable. It raiſed ſtill more his eſteem of the Jewiſh nation and religion, and his reſpect ſhewed itſelf in the conſiderable preſents which he made to the prieſts and temple. In memory of this wonderful diſcovery, the Jews inſtituted a feaſt, which they called the feaſt of the new fire.

(N) Either thoſe which they had contracted ſince the general repudiation, which had been made under Ezra, or perhaps had been contracted before it, but the offenders had refuſed or neglected to perform that covenant; for ſure it is, that, as ſoon as this feaſt was over, they ſet about this work afreſh, and obliged as many of thoſe offenders, as were found to have ſtrange wives (43), to repudiate them.

(43) Nehem. x. paſſ.

dæa; among which that of maintaining a noble table and ſplendid equipage, at his own coſt, without exacting the tribute aſſigned for the maintenance of a governor, was none of the leaſt. Having thus with great credit and honour completed the tenor of his commiſſion, he returned into Perſia, according to his promiſe to the king [r], after having enjoyed the government of Judæa twelve years.

DURING his abſence, which laſted but five years, it is almoſt incredible, what abuſes were crept into the Jewiſh church and commonwealth; ſo ſoon were that perverſe nation liable to forget their moſt ſolemn vows, and the miſeries which their breach of them conſtantly brought upon them. Eliaſhib, whether the then high-prieſt, or ſome other of the ſame name, who was overſeer of the temple chambers [s], had married his grandſon to the daughter of Sanballat the profeſſed enemy of the Jews (O), and had had ſo much baſe complaiſance for him, as to allow his friend Tobias the Ammonite, another ſworn enemy, a large apartment in that ſacred place, from which even the Iſraelites, who were not of the tribe of Levi, were excluded. To this end, he cauſed thoſe chambers, wherein the tithes of corn, wine, and oyl, meat-offerings, &c. uſed to be repoſited, to be emptied for his accommodation. This miſchief was followed by another: The prieſts, ſeeing the temple profaned by that ſtranger, their apartments given to his retinue, and gutted of that which was laid up for their maintenance, forſook the place, and went to live elſewhere,

The temple profaned.

[r] Nehem. ii. 6. [s] De hoc vid. Commentat. & Prid. ubi ſupra, ſub. an 428.

(O) The text ſeems to intimate at leaſt a double alliance between the Jews and this Ammonite, beſides that mentioned above; for Tobias had married the daughter of Shecaniah the ſon of Arach, one of the chiefs of the Jews, and his ſon had married the daughter of Meſhullam the ſon of Berachiah (44), one of the chief overſeers in the rebuilding of the temple (45). All which, being expreſsly forbid by the Moſaic law, and contrary to the ſolemn covenant they had ſo lately taken againſt ſuch unlawful marriages, plainly ſhews their inſincerity, and that it was not the fear of God, but of their governors, whether judges, kings, or deputies, that kept them within bounds; no wonder then, if God did ſo often ſuffer them to fall under the heavy hand of thoſe very enemies, and to be ſo ſeverely puniſhed by means of thoſe very alliances which they contracted, contrary to his expreſs commands as the ſequel will ſhortly ſhew.

(44) Ibid. vi. 18. (45) Ibid. iii. 4.

where, where they could; and this cauſed an intermiſſion of the divine worſhip. It is not improbable, that Nehemiah, who even at that diſtance he was then from Jeruſalem, kept ſtill a watchful eye over it, was ſoon informed of theſe abuſes; ſo that having procured a freſh commiſſion from Artaxerxes, he returned to Jeruſalem at the end of five years from his departure. A leſs authority than his, or a man of leſs zeal, could hardly have ventured to reform an abuſe, in which ſome of the greateſt perſons were concerned; but the baſe cowardice of the prieſt and the impudence of the Ammonite were too flagrant and impious to be ſuffered by a man of his character. As ſoon therefore as he was come to Jeruſalem, and had been a witneſs of the fact, he expelled the gentile ſtranger out of his apartment, cauſed all his furniture to be thrown out, the place to be purified, and the prieſts and holy things to be reimplaced as formerly.

The ſabbath profaned.

ANOTHER ſhameful abuſe, which had crept in during his abſence, was an almoſt total diſregard of the ſabbath; they threſhed their corn, preſſed their wine and oyl, bought and ſold from the Tyrians and other ſtrangers, who affected to bring their mercantile wares into that city on that day, rather than on any other of the week; and were baſely ſuffered to do ſo by thoſe magiſtrates, whoſe buſineſs it was to have hindered it. To prevent this practice for the future, Nehemiah, having reproved thoſe magiſtrates in the ſevereſt terms, ordered the gates of the city to be ſhut every friday night about ſun-ſet, and not to be opened again till the ſabbath was quite over; by which means thoſe ſtrangers, having been diſappointed twice or thrice, and been threatened from the walls with ſome further puniſhment, deſiſted from coming any more on that day. What aggravated the folly and baſeneſs of the Jews is, that they had among them three conſiderable prophets, who rebuked them ſeverely for their crimes, and warned them of the dreadful puniſhments which their ſhameful neglect of God's laws would bring upon them.

The worſhip reſtored.

THESE were Zechariah, Haggai, and Malachi, of whoſe remarkable prophecies the reader will find a ſhort ſummary in the margin (P); but what the authority of the prophet could not do, that of the governor's preſence ſoon brought about; ſo that beſides thoſe abuſes we have already obſerved, he rectified a number of others, which were no leſs enormous; one of which was the ceaſing of the divine worſhip through the avarice of the people, who refuſing to pay the prieſts and levites their tithes and other dues, had forced them to ſeek their living out of the temple and city. All theſe Nehemiah reſtored to their former regularity, and reformed every thing that was amiſs, not probably all at once, as one might be apt to think from their being mentioned together in one chapter [t], but at ſeveral times, and as opportunity ſerved.

(P) Zechariah, for the number, excellency, and preciſeneſs of his prophecies, is emphatically termed Sol inter prophetas minores; he was cotemporary with Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai, and Malachi, if this laſt be not the ſame with Ezra He began to propheſy about two months after Haggai, and with him to encourage the rebuilding of the temple, by aſſuring them of the divine protection and bleſſing on the work.

ALL theſe enormities, introduced within the ſhort interval of his abſence, being manifeſtly owing to their ignorance or forgetfulneſs of the Moſaic law, did ſoon point out to him, that the only way to remedy them, was to inforce the frequent lecture and expoſition of it, not only in Jeruſalem, but alſo in all other cities and places of Judæa, as it had been formerly done with good ſucceſs by ſome of the pious kings of [t] Nehem. c. ult.

But theſe prophecies are inconſiderable, in compariſon of thoſe which foretel the coming of the Meſſiah in the plaineſt terms; the cruel war which Antiochus Epiphanes waged againſt the Jews, and God's ſevere judgments againſt that tyrant; the Jewiſh war with the Romans, and the death of the Meſſiah; the annulling of the old Moſaic covenant, and the new one ſubſtituted by and under Chriſt; the thirty pieces of ſilver; the ſiege of Babylon by Darius, as Jeremy and Iſaiah had done long before him; from which it is ſuppoſed the Jews took timely warning, and retired out of it. Laſtly, he ſpeaks glorioufly of the ſtate of the chriſtian church; of the converſion of the gentiles to it; of the perſecutions which the chriſtians ſhould endure; and the ſevere puniſhment of their perſecutors, and other ſuch-like events contained in the ninth and following chapters of his prophecies.

Some learned critics of our church (46) have indeed ſuſpected the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters, which are a continued diſcourſe or prophecy of the ſame events, to have been of Jeremiah, becauſe a formal paſſage out of it is quoted by St. Matthew under his name (47). Some other reaſons they give for this their conjecture, which the curious may read in thoſe authors.

But the general opinion is, that the name of Jeremy has crept into that place of the evangeliſt, inſtead of that of Zechariah. How long he propheſied, and what death he died, is no-where ſaid, the Mohammedans confound him with Zecharias the father of John the Baptiſt.

(46) Hammond. in Matth. xxvii. Mede, l. iv. epiſt. 31.
(47) Matth. xxvii. 9, 10.

of Judah. Theſe lectures were probably read at firſt in ſome great ſtreet or market-place, ſince we read of no buildings erected for that purpoſe before this time (Q); but as they quickly

As for Malachi, of whom we have had occaſion to ſpeak before, the current of his prophecies runs intirely againſt the vile abuſes that were crept into the Jewiſh church and ſtate, ſuch as mixed marriages, breach of the ſabbaths and ſabbatic years, oppreſſing the poor, defrauding the prieſts and levites of their tithes, and ſuch other enormities, which were afterwards reformed by Nehemiah.

(Q) We have formerly ſhewn †, that before the captivity, they uſed to aſſemble themſelves at the ſchools of the prophets on the ſabbaths, new moons, and other feſtivals, to have the ſcriptures explained to them; but as to ſynagogues, we read nothing preciſe concerning them.

Thoſe that think they had them before the captivity, do indeed object a paſſage out of the pſalms (48), in which it is ſaid, that the heathen had deſtroyed col mohadde el, or, as our verſion renders it, all the ſynagogues of God; but the word mohed ſignifies properly a congregation, ſo that the place here mentioned, might ſignify no more than oratories, or what the Greeks called proſeuchia (49), or any of thoſe places where the prophets read or made lectures to them. However that be, it doth not appear, that if they had any ſuch places for the reading and expounding of the ſcriptures, they were under ſuch ſtrict regulations, and in ſuch numbers, as we find them after Nehemiah's time.

As to the regulations of theſe new ſynagogues, they may be reduced to the three following heads; 1. They were to be under the inſpection of certain rulers, called from thence rulers of the ſynagogue, and by the Greek Jews archiſynagogoi. 2. They had their ſtated times for coming to them, viz. on the ſabbaths, and other feaſt and faſt-days, and on mondays and thurſdays; they had alſo their ſtated hours for each day. 3. They had proper miniſters appointed, ſome to read and expound the current ſection out of the ſacred books, others to read the liturgy, others to ſing, &c. and theſe provided they were in every reſpect elſe qualified for thoſe offices, might be choſen out of any tribe; only they took care, to have always one or more of the prieſtly order to preſide and take care that the ſervice was performed with due order and decency.

The perſon who was appointed to read the liturgy, was called ſheliach zibbor, that is, the angel or meſſenger of the congregation, becauſe he offered up the prayers of the people to God, or was the mouth or repreſentative of the congregation to Godward; and as a meſſenger from God to men was called an angel of God, ſo quickly found the inconvenience of it in cold and rainy weather, it is not without good reaſon ſuppoſed, that this obliged ſo one from men to God was ſtyled an angel of the people; in this ſenſe the chriſtian biſhops were called the angels of the churches; this perſon was always one of the rulers of the ſynagogue; he was alſo called khakam, or wiſe, learned, as were alſo the other rulers, and preſided in their aſſemblies, and ſome in their courts of Judicature.

† vol. iii. p. 471. d. (48) Pſalm lxxiv. 8. (49) De his vid. int. al Selden. de Synedr. Sigon. Rep. Hebr. l. ii. c. 8. Cunæ. Baſnag repub. Prid. Connect. an. 444, & auct. ab eo citat.

Next to him was the khazan, who either read or looked over thoſe who offered themſelves to read the ſections of the day, and corrected them when they read wrong; this officer had the ſacred books, and other utenſils, under his care, and had a ſciamas or ſervant under him, who had the keys and overſeeing of the ſynagogue, but the khazan's chief buſineſs was to expound the portions of ſcripture that were read on that day, or to appoint or permit any other to do it for him, or to preach a ſermon on ſome proper ſubject.

Thus, when Chriſt was entered into the ſynagogue, we read that the book of Iſaiah was preſented to him, which he read, and expounded to the congregation (50); the like was alſo done by the apoſtles (1). This khazan was likewiſe the perſon who gave out and began thoſe pſalms and hymns that uſed to be ſung by the whole congregation.

2. As to the number of theſe ſynagogues, they muſt have far exceeded thoſe before the captivity, if any ſuch then were; ſince Maimon tells us, the rule was, that where-ever there were ten Batelnim, or Iſraelites of full age, there was to be a ſynagogue (2); and theſe were ſo multiplied in our Saviour's time, that the city of Tiberias had no leſs than twelve, and in Jeruſalem the Jews affirm them to have amounted to four hundred and eighty (3); if theſe laſt are not ſomewhat inlarged, as Lightfoot ſuſpects, who thinks that theſe ten Batelnim were the elders and miniſters of that ſynagogue (4). 'Tis plain, however, that they were in great number, not only in Jeruſalem and Paleſtine, but alſo in all other places of their diſperſion. And even in that metropolis, we find the Alexandrians, Cilicians, Cyrenæans, Aſiatics, Libertines, who had their own ſeparate ſynagogues (5); from which we may infer, that there were many others which belonged to Jews of other nations; and the Jews tell us, that every handicraft had alſo their ſeparate ones (6); but this we will not vouch for.

We

(50) Mat. xiii. 54. Luke iv. 16, & ſeq. (1) Acts xiii. 15. (2) Tract. Tephil. c 2. ſect. 1. (3) Gemar. Moggill. c. 3. Ketuboth, c. 13. Beracoth, & alib. Vid. Maim, ubi ſupra. Buxtorf. Lexic. Rabb. ſub. voce בטלן. (4) Centur. Geogr. c. 36. (5) Acts vi. 9. (6) Gemar. ubi ſupra.

obliged them to build ſome convenient places to aſſemble in, which have been ſince known by the name of ſynagogues and ſchools. For the ſame purpoſe the Chaldee paraphraſes, known by the name of targums, were alſo introduced much about the ſame time, to facilitate the knowledge of the Moſaic law and of the other ſacred volumes, among thoſe who were unacquainted with the original; but as theſe were not finiſhed till a conſiderable time after Nehemiah's death, we ſhall take a more proper time to ſpeak of them. Thus far had this great man carried on the reformation of the Jewiſh church and ſtate. As for the unworthy ſon of Joiada, whom Joſephus calls Manaſſeh, inſtead of complying with the governor's orders of parting with his ſtrange wife, he retired with her to Samaria to his father-in-law, and drew a great many other rebellious Jews after him, who had been guilty either of the ſame, or any of thoſe enormous crimes which were then reforming at Jeruſalem, and went and ſettled themſelves under the protection of Sanballat the Samaritan governor (R).

How

We ſhould ſtretch this note too far, were we to give an account of the liturgy, ceremonies, and other particulars relating to thoſe ſynagogues; the reader may ſee them in the authors quoted in this note; and eſpecially in dean Prideaux, who has collected all that is worth knowing concerning them, and to whom we refer thoſe who want a fuller account of them (7);

(R) The long interval between the Sanballat, who obſtructed Ezra in the rebuilding of the temple, and this, whoſe daughter was married to Manaſſes, has made ſome writers ſplit him into two; the one called by Ezra the Horonite, and not mentioned by Joſephus; and this, whom the latter calleth a Cuthean, who went over to Alexander, eſpecially becauſe he is there affirmed to have come over to his father-in-law in the reign of Darius Codomanus †.

This is indeed too glaring an anachroniſm to be admitted; for whoever compares the time in which Nehemiah returned from Jeruſalem into Perſia, viz. in the thirty-ſecond year of Artaxerxes, or before Chriſt four hundred and forty-two, and the reign of Darius Codomanus, An. 336, muſt ſee that he could never have reached to this laſt; ſo that either we muſt admit two Sanballats, and two ſons-in-law of the prieſtly race, or ſuppoſe, that Joſephus has miſplaced him in the reign of Darius Codomanus inſtead of Darius Nothus, and in the high-prieſthood of Jaddua inſtead of that of Joiada, where the text places him (8).

This

(7) Connect l. vi. ſub. an. 444. (8) Nehem. xiii. 28.

Nehemiah's death.

How long Nehemiah lived after he had made this reformation, whether he continued in his place of governor, and whether he died in Judæa or in Persia, neither the text nor Josephus informs us; only the latter says, that he died in an advanced age [u]; and indeed even at the time where his book ends, he must have been at least seventy years of age. In his days, and about the eleventh year of Darius Nothus, died the high-priest Eliashib, after he had enjoyed the pontifical dignity forty years; he was succeeded by his son Joiada, called by Josephus Judas [w], the unworthy father of that Manasses whom Nehemiah had forced to retire into Samaria for the sake of his beloved wife (S). Whilst that governor lived [u] Antiq. l. xi. sub. fin. ult. cap. 5. [w] Id. c. 6. vid. Nehem. xii. 10.

This is what the learned Prideaux (9) has taken a great deal of pains to prove; we shall refer the reader to him, because the argument would carry us too far. We shall only observe by the by, that upon his supposition, the Manasses, whom the same Josephus makes to succeed his nephew Eleazar (10), will not be the Manasses, who married Sanballat's daughter, and was expelled by Nehemiah (11).

As for Sanballat being called Cuthean by Josephus, and Horonite by Ezra, the latter we have shewn to have been given him from Horonaim the place of his birth, and that of Cuthean was a name of reproach, by which not only that historian, but all the Jews, called the Samaritans.

(S) Josephus adds (12), that Sanballat, to compensate him for the loss of his right to the Jewish priesthood, which his birth intitled him to, promised to make him high-priest of Samaria, and to bestow on him the highest place in the whole province. In order to which, he would cause a temple to be built on mount Gerizim like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he should have the high-priesthood.

Accordingly, as our author goes on, that governor having gone over from the Persians to Alexander the Great, obtained of him, as a reward for his services, leave to build that temple, and made his son-in-law high-priest of it, so that all the apostate Jews repaired to it; which still more increased the hatred of those of Judæa, who from that time looked upon them as schismatics.

This story carries as flagrant an anachronism (unless we suppose two Sanballats) as that we spoke of in the last note; that author tells us farther, that Manasses succeeding afterwards to the high-priesthood lived, he ſupported his character by the moſt exemplary zeal for religion, juſtice, and the good of his nation; and the dignity of his office by a magnificent hoſpitality. The uſual proviſion of his table was an ox, ſix fat ſheep, with fowl, fiſh, wine, and other things in proportion; at which he entertained, beſides an hundred and fifty of the head rulers, who eat conſtantly with him, all the ſtrangers of any diſtinction, who came from other countries to Jeruſalem; all which he ſupported at his own private charge, and without receiving any of the allowance which was uſually paid to the governors of that province, which had preceded him. After his death, the face of that government was wholly changed. We hear no more of any governors of Judæa, but the country ſeems to have been joined and ſubject to the prefecture of Syria, from which the high-prieſts received their authority, as ſhall be ſeen in the next ſection. All that need be added to this is, that dean Prideaux concludes the ſeven firſt weeks of the ſeventy of Daniel's prophecy with this laſt reformation of Nehemiah abovementioned, which was finiſhed, according to him, in the fifteenth year of Darius Nothus. The reader may ſee his proofs for it in that learned author [x].

(9) Ubi supra, sub. an. 410. (10) Ant. l. xii c. 3. ad. fin. (11) Nehem. xiii. 28. (12) Ant. l. xi. c. 7. 8. &c.

Year of the flood 2590. Year before Chriſt 409.

[x] Connect. l. vi, ſub. an 409.

prieſthood of Jeruſalem, in right of his great uncle (or, as others read it, nephew) came and took poſſeſſion of it; but he doth not inform us how or whether he renounced his ſchiſm, nor how he was received by thoſe of Judæa (13). We ſhall give a further account of the building of this Samaritan temple in the next ſection.

(13) Lib. xii. c. 3.

SECT. II.

The ſtate of the Jews under the High-prieſts and Maccabees.

HITHERTO we have had Ezra and Nehemiah for our guides; after them we have no canonical books concerning the Jewiſh nation, ſo that we ſhall be forced to fetch all our intelligence from thoſe of the Maccabees, and to fill up all the chaſms out of Joſephus; for as for prophane authors, they were ſo little acquainted with the Jews, that we have little or nothing from them, but what falls in occaſionally.

ſionally with other parts of their hiſtory. Judæa being now become more ſtrictly a province of Syria, and under the prefecture of it, the governors committed the adminiſtration of the Jewiſh ſtate to their high-prieſts, ſo that from this time we may aſcribe the greateſt part of thoſe misfortunes that befel their nation, to a ſet of men, who aſpired to that high dignity more through ambition and avarice, than any real zeal for their religion, or the welfare of their country. This epocha begins with a ſignal inſtance of it, which is the more remarkable, becauſe we have it from Joſephus [a], who is not often apt to turn accuſer of his brethren.

Year of the flood 2626. Before Chriſt 378.

JOHANAN ſucceeded his father Joiada in the high-prieſthood [b], about the thirty-fourth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Bagoſes was then governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and had contracted an intimate friendſhip with Jeſhua the brother of the pontiff, and had promiſed him a grant of the high-prieſthood, ſome few years after Johanan's inveſtiture. Jeſhua, whom our hiſtorian calls Jeſus, came immediately to Jeruſalem, and acquainted his brother with it; their interview was in the inner court of the temple, where the diſpute aroſe to ſuch a height, that Johanan, in ſtriving to throw him out of that holy place, gave him a mortal wound. Bagoſes, being informed of it, repaired immediately to the place, and upbraided the Jews in the ſevereſt terms for thus making a ſhambles of the temple of their God; he next offered to enter into that holy place, but being obſtructed by the prieſts, he aſked them angrily, whether they thought his living body more impure than the dead carcaſs which did lie there; and without ſtaying for an anſwer, he forcibly entered in; and being fully informed of the fact, he impoſed a heavy mulct upon the temple (A), which was not taken off, till the death of [a] Ant. l. xi. c. 7. [b] Nehem. xii. 11, & 22.

(A) This fine, which our hiſtorian ſays, was fifty drachms, to be paid out of the ſacred treaſury for every lamb that was offered in the temple, can hardly be thought conſiderable enough to extort ſuch a complaint from him, if it was only confined to thoſe two lambs that were offered in the daily ſacrifice. For fifty drachms amounting but to a little above thirty-one ſhillings of our money, ſeven hundred and thirty lambs, the number offered every year, would amount but to eleven hundred and forty pounds twelve ſhillings.

Some therefore have thought there was an error in Joſephus, and that the fine was five hundred inſtead of fifty drachms, though all the copies have it fifty; but even this would be ſtill too inconſiderable, of Artaxerxes, which happened about ſeven years after, had changed the face of affairs. However, they were not altogether free from troubles in the reign of his ſucceſſor; for Ochus having conquered the greateſt part of Phœnicia, as we have ſeen in a former volume †, marched directly towards Judæa, beſieged and took Jericho, and carried off a great number of Jews captives, part of which he ſent into Egypt, and part into Hyrcania, along the Caſpian ſea [c]. Whether they had engaged with the Phœnicians againſt that prince, or by what other way they had diſobliged him, our authors do not tell us, nor whether his reſentment ſtopped here, or was felt in any other part of Judæa. About ten years after, that is, in the eighteenth year of that monarch's reign, died Johanan their high-prieſt in the thirty-ſecond year of his high-prieſthood, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Jaddua; and three years after Ochus was poiſoned by Bagoas, who ſet up his youngeſt ſon Arſaces on the Perſian throne, who was ſoon after ſucceeded by Darius III. *

Year of the flood 2648. Before Chriſt 351.

Johanan ſucceeded by Jaddua.

In the fourth year of this prince's reign, the Jews gave him ſuch an inſtance of their loyalty, as plainly ſhewed they had not forgot what they had ſuffered from Ochus for ſiding with his enemies. Alexander the Great having reſolved upon the ſiege of Tyre, and being informed that the Tyrians, a nation wholly given to trade, received all their proviſions from Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee, ſent to Jaddua, the then high-prieſt, to demand that ſupply of them, which they were wont to pay to the Perſians. Jaddua modeſtly excuſed himſelf from complying with his demand, alledging, that his oath of fidelity to Darius did not permit him to transfer that tribute to an enemy. Alexander, provoked at this refuſal, had † vol. v. p. 200, & ſeq.

[c] Joſeph. ex Hecat. contr. Appion. l. i. Solin. Syncel. & al.

* See before, vol. v. p. 202.

ſiderable, conſidering how he inveighs againſt it as a great oppreſſion: beſides, thoſe governors were ſeldom ſo moderate in their fines, eſpecially were the crimes was ſo enormous.

We may therefore more reaſonably ſuppoſe, that it was to be levied on all the lambs, not only of the daily ſacrifices, but on thoſe of all the other feſtivals, which amounted to a much greater number, as the reader may ſee by what has been ſaid in a former volume, and on all thoſe that were offered by private perſons, whether by way of free-will offering, or upon any other caſes, wherein the law required it †.

† See before, vol. iii. p. 183, & ſeq. 226, & ſeq.

had no sooner completed the siege of Tyre, than he marched straight to Jerusalem, resolved to punish the Jews with as great severity as he had done the Tyrians. He was advancing with full speed towards their metropolis, when the high-priest and the rest of the people, sensible of their imminent danger, had recourse to God, and by their prayers, sacrifices, and other acts of humiliation, obtained a gracious promise from him, that he would protect his temple and people from the approaching calamity. It was communicated to Jaddua in a dream, in which he was commanded to go and meet the threatening conqueror, in his pontifical robes, at the head of all his priests, in their proper habits, and attended with the rest of the people dressed in white garments. Jāddua obeyed on the next morning, and having caused the gates of the city to be opened, marched in solemn procession at the head of his attendance, to an eminence called Sapha, or rather Tzaphah, because it commanded the prospect of the whole city and temple.

As soon as the venerable prelate was got near enough for Alexander to view the magnificence of his dress, especially the sacred name of God engraven on the front of his mitre, he was seized with such an awful respect, that, to the great surprize of his retinue, who were already glutting their eyes with the prospect of a rich plunder, and a dreadful slaughter, the monarch advanced towards him, and with a religious kind of veneration bowed to him, embraced him, and paid an adoration to the sacred inscription on his forehead. Whilst the Syrians, Phœnicians, and others that were present, stood amazed at the sight, Parmenio, with his usual familiarity, ventured to ask him the reason of his unexpected behaviour, and was answered by the king, that this respect, which was not paid to the priest, but to his God, was an acknowledgment for a vision of the like nature, which he had favoured him with at Dio, in which he promised to him the conquest of Persia, and encouraged him in this expedition by a person with much the same aspect, and the same venerable dress with the pontiff now before him. He then gave orders to march on to Jerusalem, and was attended thither by the high priest and his retinue, and conducted to the temple, where he caused a great number of victims to be offered to the God of the Jews. Here the priests shewed him the book of Daniel, wherein it was foretold, that a Greek should in time conquer the Persian empire; and Alexander, understanding it of himself, went away highly satisfied with what he had seen and heard. On the next day he called the Jews together,

ther, and asked them what requeſt they had to make to him, and was anſwered by the high-prieſt, that they only begged of him, the liberty of living according to their laws, to have the free exerciſe of their religion, and to be exempt from tribute every ſabbatic or ſeventh year, ſeeing they were forbidden by their law to ſow or reap in thoſe years. The ſame favour they likewiſe begged of him in the behalf of their brethren, who dwelt in Babylon and Media; all which being readily granted by the conqueror, he offered the Jews to receive into his army all that were willing to liſt under his ſtandards, and to grant them the free exerciſe of their religion, which drew a great number of them into his ſervice [d].

Samaritans addreſs Alexander.

THE Samaritans on the other hand, leſs ſcrupulous about their oath of fidelity, had ſhewed themſelves more complying to that monarch's demands; and, beſides other ſupplies, had ſent him eight thouſand men to aſſiſt him at the ſiege of Tyre. As ſoon therefore as they were informed of the king's diſpoſition towards the Jews, they began to entertain ſome hopes, that this was a proper time to apply to him for ſome ſuch-like grants for themſelves, to which their late ſervices, they thought, did better intitle them, than the Jews diſobedience to his orders. Beſides, they were always ready to claim kindred with them, whenever matters went well on their ſide; but as ready to drop, or even renounce it, whenever they ſaw them in any danger or diſgrace. Scarce therefore was the king got out of Jeruſalem, before they came in great pomp to invite him to honour their city and temple (B). Alexander did ſeemingly give

[d] Antiq. l. xi. cap. ult. and ſee before, vol. viii. Chap. 2. Sect. 5.

(B) Joſephus expreſsly mentioning this temple, doth plainly ſhew, that it was built long before Alexander; and not, as he elſewhere tells us, by leave of that monarch obtained by Sanballat, whilſt he was with him at the ſiege of Tyre; for that ſiege laſted but ſeven months; and ſuppoſing that he had ſtopt another two months at the ſiege of Gaza, as the ſame author pretends, yet all this put together would ſcarce have ſufficed to lay the foundations of ſuch a great building, much leſs for finiſhing it.

But the learned Uſher obſerves, it is not likely, that he ſhould take Gaza in his way from Tyre to Jeruſalem, becauſe this laſt did lie at ſome days journey's diſtance on this ſide of Gaza, ſo that in that caſe he muſt be ſuppoſed to have paſt it by, and then returned to it again with his army; and who can believe, that he would penetrate ſo far into Judæa, and leave Jeruſalem untaken, give them a gracious reception, but put off the deſired viſit till his return from Egypt. They then petitioned that they might, like their brethren of Judæa, be exempted from the tribute of every ſeventh year, ſince, like them, they neither ſowed nor reaped in thoſe years. They were thereupon asked, what country they were of? and upon their anſwering that they were Hebrews, but called Sichemites by the Sidonians, the queſtion was put peremptorily to them, whether they were Jews? But they, afraid, perhaps, to anſwer in the affirmative, in a place where they could be ſo eaſily confuted, did then diſown the title; and the king, who had not leiſure then to inquire further about it, diſmiſſed them with a promiſe, that he would examine their claim after his return. He did ſo accordingly, and granted them the ſame exemption as he had the Jews; for thoſe Samaritans who had aſſiſted him eſpceially when he breathed nothing but revenge againſt that metropolis (14)?

Add to this, that all other writers of Alexander's wars tell us, that he went directly into Egypt after the taking of Gaza However, granting he ſpent thoſe two months in that ſiege, what are nine months towards rearing ſuch a building? For this and ſome other reaſons, there have not been wanting thoſe who have looked upon this conteſt between the Jews and Samaritans, as an invention of the Jewiſh hiſtorian, trumpt up to give a kind of preference to his own nation.

But this is perhaps ſaying too much; however, a temple there was built upon mount Garizzim, which, if finiſhed in Alexander's time, muſt have been began long before his coming into Judæa, let the Samaritans have their permiſſion from which ſoever of the Perſian monarchs; though, if we were to venture our conjecture, might it not have been obtained from Ochus, and about the time when the Jews had incurred his diſpleaſure, either for ſiding with the Phœnicians, or for ſome other miſdemeanor; and might not the Samaritans, who watched all opportunities to get the better of them, have ſo far ingratiated themſelves into that exaſperated prince's favour, by renouncing, as uſual, all kindred with them, as to obtain a grant to build a temple for themſelves?

This once ſuppoſed, there will be time enough for that work to be finiſhed by or even before Alexander's time, and the Sanballat of Nehemiah may have probably lived to have laid the foundation of it. This will likewiſe in ſome meaſure account for Joſephus's anachroniſm, which may be no other than a wilful overſight, it being a leſs diſgrace to his nation to repreſent this grant as obtained, not for any misbehaviour of theirs, but for the ſervices done by the Samaritans.

(14) Vid. Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3673. Prid. ſub anno 332.

him at the ſiege of Tyre, having likewiſe ſignalized themſelves in Egypt, which that prince conquered with a ſurprizing quickneſs; it is not improbable, this immunity was granted to them as a reward for their ſervices. In the mean time, the temple at mount Garizzim proved the ſource of continual evils to the Jews, and the conſtant aſylum of their apoſtate brethren, who never failed to go over to the Samaritans, as ſoon as they found themſelves in danger of puniſhment for any enormous crimes[e].

Jews ſettled at Alexandria.

ALEXANDER at the ſame time was no leſs kind to the Jews, a great number of whom, at his return into Alexandria, he ſettled there among other nations, and endowed with many privileges and immunities, allowing them the free exerciſe of their religion, and admitting them to the ſame franchiſes and liberties with his own Macedonians[f]. But what gave them the greateſt advantage over their Samaritan rivals was, an inſurrection made in their capital againſt his favourite Andromachus, whom he had made governor of Syria and Paleſtine. The Samaritans, upon ſome diſcontent againſt him, ran in a tumultuous manner to his palace, ſet it on fire, and burnt him in it; which ſo exaſperated that monarch, that he cauſed all that had a hand in that atrocious deed to be put to death, and the reſt to be driven out of the city which he repeopled with his own Macedonians, and granted the reſt of their territories to the Jews[g]. From this time, thoſe that ſurvived the ſlaughter having ſettled themſelves at Shechem, that city became the metropolis of the Samaritan ſect[h]. As for thoſe eight thouſand, who had ſerved under him, he ſent and ſettled them in Thebais, the remoteſt part of Egypt, to prevent their raiſing any freſh inſurrection among their countrymen. As for the Jews, they continued ſtill in his favour both in Paleſtine and out of it, only thoſe that were in his army were like to have forfeited it, by their ſtiff refuſal to aſſiſt at the rebuilding of the temple of Belus, which that monarch had began. They urged in vain, that their law, of which they were promiſed the free exerciſe, forbad them to have a hand in ſuch an idolatrous work; they were made to undergo ſome ſevere puniſhments, but, to his ſurprize, they bore them with ſuch invincible conſtancy, that being more overcome by it than by their other pleas, he diſcharged them from his ſervice, and ſent them into their own country [i]; and he himself dying soon after, left his empire in the confused state we have seen in a former volume *. Four years after him died also Jaddua the Jewish high-priest, in the twentieth year of his pontificate, and was succeeded by his son Onias, who enjoyed that dignity about one-and-twenty years.

Samaritans expelled. Year of the flood 2668. Before Chriſt 331.

[e] Hecatæus Abder ap. Joſeph. cont. Apion. l. ii. & bell. Jud l. ii. c. 36. Vid. & Quint. Curt. l. iv. c. 8. [f] Id. ibid. [g] Id. ibid. Euſeb. Chronic. [h] Joſeph. contr. Apion. l. ii.

Jaddua succeeded by Onias.

With Alexander died the prosperous state of the Jews, and their country, being situate between Syria and Egypt, became subject to all the revolutions and wars, which his ambitious successors waged against each other; being successively invaded and captivated by the Syrians and Egyptians, and constantly oppressed under either government. At first it was, as we have seen elsewhere, given, together with Syria and Phœnicia, to Leomedon the Mitylenian, one of Alexander's generals [k], and confirmed to him by a second partition treaty; but he being soon after stripped of the other two by Ptolemy, Judæa was the only one which stood firm to him from a sense of their oath of allegiance; so that the Egyptian king was forced to invade it with a powerful army, and accordingly did lay close siege to Jerusalem. The place, being strongly fortified by art and nature, might have found him work enough, had not a superstitious fear of breaking the sabbath prevented the besieged making any defence on that day; which being understood by the king, he caused it to be stormed on the sabbath, and took the city accordingly without any opposition [l] (C). This did not, however,

Jerusalem taken by Ptolemy.

[i] Joseph. ex Hecat lib. i, cont. Apion. * vol. viii. Chap. 2. Sect. 6. and Sect. 7.

(C) This is the account we have from the authors quoted above; and we shall meet in the sequel with some other instances of the Jews chusing to be all massacred, rather than fight or fly on the sabbath; but Josephus, loth to expose this weakness of theirs, has given this transaction another turn, and pretends, that Ptolemy, having been peaceably admitted into the city, under pretence of offering some sacrifices there, did immediately break his articles, and possess himself of it.

There is indeed nothing in that prince's character, but what shews him to have been capable enough of such perfidy; but it is not so probable, that the Jews, so strongly attached to his enemy, could be weak enough to admit him into their city, especially with an escort sufficient to subdue it; besides, it is plain, that he treated them, not like friends that had given him an amicable

however, prevent his treating them with great severity; he carried near a hundred thousand of them captives into Egypt, but reflecting soon after on their known loyalty to their former conquerors, and the sacred regard they paid to their oaths, and being by the taking of Jerusalem become master of Judæa and Samaria, he committed the keeping of several considerable garisons both here and in Egypt to them; and having made them swear allegiance to him, and to his heirs and successors, he endowed them with the same privileges they had enjoyed under the Macedonians. Of those whom he carried away into Egypt, he chose about thirty thousand of the stoutest to fill his garisons, the rest he sent, some to assist them with provisions, others into Libya and Cyrene (D), which he had lately subdued [m]. Appian adds, that he demolished the walls of Jerusalem before he returned home [n]. However, he shewed such kindness to those Jews that came to settle in Egypt, that great numbers of them, being attracted, partly by the fertility of the country, and partly by the great privileges they enjoyed, flocked thither from other parts [o].

By this time the Samaritans, who daily increased in number, strength, and wealth, by the continual concourse of apostate Jews, made Shechem their metropolis, inlarged and ble entrance, but like a victor that subdued them by force of arms.

[k] Chron. Alex. Euseb. in Chron. Joseph. Ant. l. xi. c. ult. See also vol. vii. ubi supra. [l] Agathar. ap. Joseph. cont. Apion. l. i Arist. in libel. de 70 interp. [m] Id. Ibid. [n] Appian. Syriac. p. 119, & seq. [o] Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 1.

(D) From the latter of these were descended the Cyrenean Jews, among whom was Jason, author of the history of the Maccabees in five books now lost, but of which the second book of the Maccabees is an epitome (15); of the same country were those Cyrenean Jews mentioned by St. Luke (16), and that Simon who helped to bear the cross of Christ (17).

This Jewish colony grew in time so numerous, as to have a thousand of them put to death for one mutiny in Vespasian's time; and yet in a succeeding reign, they proved strong enough to master the whole province, and, as Xiphilinus tells us in the life of Trajan, to massacre two hundred thousand inhabitants of other nations.

(15) Vid. 2 Maccab. ii. 23. (16) Acts ii. 10. vi. 9. (17) Matth. xxvii. 32, & alib.

beautified it, and, as we hinted before, made it the head of their ſchiſmatic ſect; and as they were neither ſo ſcrupulous about their oaths of allegiance, nor ſo tenacious of the precepts of the Moſaic law, as their rivals of Judæa were, they ſeldom made any ſcruple to ſide with the ſtrongeſt, and, if occaſion required, to comply with the will of their princes, even in things which were abſolutely forbidden by their law. This policy, which they never loſt ſight of, as the ſequel will ſoon ſhew, not only freed them from the many perſecutions which the Jews underwent, but made them fare much better under every government than they, ſo that from this time, not only thoſe who fled from puniſhment from Judæa, but a much greater number came over to them to avoid, either perſecution on account of their law, or the tyranny and oppreſſion of their governors. As therefore this ſect became ſo numerous and powerful, as to make a conſiderable figure in the Jewiſh hiſtory, our readers will doubtleſs expect to be informed how far their religion agreed or differed from that of the Jews; and by what ſtrange arguments they have, ever ſince their ſeparation, endeavoured to prove their claim of precedence to, and to retort the imputation of ſchiſm upon, them, ſince we have already ſeen that they were originally a mixture of Cutheans and other foreign nations, ſent thither by the Aſſyrian kings inſtead of the ten tribes carried away captive by them, and now become a more mixed and mongrel nation, by the conſtant reſort and incorporation of all the renegate Jews. This digreſſion, if it be really ſuch, is ſo much the more neceſſary here, becauſe it will be impoſſible without it to dive into thoſe perpetual jars and diſputes that have been ever ſince, and are ſtill carried on, between thoſe two nations with the utmoſt irreconcileable hatred. However, that we may contract as much as poſſible, we ſhall only give here what is moſt material concerning their tenets, and throw all their fabulous authorities and pretences, as well as thoſe of the Jews againſt them, in the margin (E). The following

An account of the Samaritans.

(E) We ſhall begin with the account which the Samaritans give of their origin, in oppoſition to that which we have from the ſacred books, concerning them: 1ſt, They boaſt themſelves deſcended from Joſeph by Ephraim; they pretend, that when Joſhua entered into the promiſed land, he cauſed a temple to be built upon mount Garizzim, and appointed Ruz of the ſeed of Aaron to officiate as high prieſt, from whom they boaſt to have an exact genealogy and uninterrupted ſucceſſion, down to this very time following articles therefore are a short summary of their faith in common with, and in opposition to, that of the Jews.

1st, They

time. They neither own Jeroboam's schism (18), nor the transmigration of the ten tribes (19), but give the following account of their going out, and returning into the land.

The kings of Jerusalem and Syria, say they, having revolted against Bachtnezzar (so they call Nebuchadnezzar), he came and took Jerusalem, and went from thence to the Shechemites, whom he ordered to leave that country in seven days under pain of being all massacred, which they did accordingly. The strangers whom he settled in Judæa and Shechem soon after could not live there, because the fairest fruits of the land were tainted with a mortal poison; the king of Babylon having thereupon consulted some of the ancient inhabitants, was answered, that the only remedy to that evil, was to send the Hebrews thither again; which that prince having agreed to, a place of rendezvous was appointed for the Jews and Shechemites, to return together, each into his own land.

Here a dispute arose between them, whether they should go and rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, or that of Garizzim. Zerubbabel was for the former, and Sanballat for the latter, and each pleaded the sanction of the pentateuch, and each pretended that the copy of his antagonist was corrupted, that of the former being expressly for Jerusalem, and the other for Garizzim.

To end the dispute, they agreed that that copy, which withstood the fiery trial, should be the authentic one; upon which Zerubbabel having flung his own into the fire; it was immediately consumed, whereas that of the Samaritan chief came three times untouched out of the flames.

This miracle, they add, having determined the controversy in their favour, the king honoured them with rich presents, and sent Sanballat at the head of his ten tribes, to take possession of mount Garizzim, where he rebuilt the temple in dispute. This account they give us out of an old Samaritan chronicle, which they pretend to be of great antiquity and authority; but those who have examined it, tell us, that it was written in the reign of some of the christian emperors, and after Constantine (20), unless we suppose it to have been continued from time to time. However, let the chronicle bear what date it will, it is plain by the Samaritan woman's question to our Saviour (21), Our fathers worshipped on this mountain, and ye say, that Jerusalem is the place, that they claimed this authority long before; and accordingly, their pentateuch, of which we shall speak by-and-by, among other

(18) 1 Kings, ch. xii. & seq. (19) 2 Kings, ch. xvii.
(20) De hac, vid. int. al. Hottinger. lib. Josue, seu chron. Samarit. in exercitat. Antimorin. (21) John iv. 20.

Their religion.

1ſt, They believe in one God, and in his ſervant Moſes, and that Garizzim is the only place of God's worſhip. The Jews, ſay they, follow other teachers, other precepts, taken from their other books, traditions, and expoſitions; we ſtick cloſe to the five books of Moſes, and reject all other writings, all other authority and interpretation, and guide our faith and practice ſolely by the precepts of our law-giver. Accordingly they never admitted any other books but the pentateuch (F).

2dly, They always circumciſe their males on the eighth day, other interpolations, has changed the word Ebal for that of Garizzim, where-ever thoſe two mountains come in competition.

The Jews, on their ſide, have not been ſparing of their fictions, as if they had choſen to confute their antagoniſts by this way, rather than by the authority of the ſacred books. Joſephus tells us of much ſuch another conteſt that happened in Egypt, between thoſe of his nation and the Samaritans about theſe two temples; and which aroſe to ſuch a height, that it was like to end in a ſedition, had not Ptolemy Philometor put an end to it in the following manner (22).

He ordered the contending parties to bring their cauſe before him, and to have it pleaded by proper perſons, with this condition, that thoſe who were caſt ſhould loſe their heads. There appeared but one advocate for the Jews, viz. Andronicus the ſon of Meſſalami; but he pleaded his cauſe ſo well againſt his two antagoniſts, whom our author names Sabbæus and Theodore, that he gained his point, and they loſt their lives (23).

Another ancient author (24), whom the Jews pretend to have lived before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, but by his mentioning of the Saracen empire, muſt have wrote at leaſt ſix hundred years after (25), tells us, that when Ezra and Nehemiah were rebuilding the temple, the Samaritans came with an army of a hundred and eighty thouſand men to beſiege Jeruſalem; but that thoſe two chiefs, having aſſembled three hundred prieſts, did pronounce the higher excommunication againſt them †. Theſe prieſts were followed by three hundred young men, who held each a copy of the Moſaic law in one hand, and a trumpet in the other, which they blew whilſt the prieſts were excommunicating them, upon which they were immediately put to flight.

(F) In conſequence of this, they reject all the prophetical and hiſtorical books, as written in favour of the Jews, and eſpecially of the houſe of David; they deſpiſe the Jewiſh pretence of oral tradition, and all their targums and talmuds.

(22) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 6. (23) Vid. Baſnage. hiſtoir. des Juifs, tom. 2 part. 1, c. 1, & ſeq. (24) Rab. Eliezer, Pirke Abboth, c. 38. (25) Vid Prid. lib vi. ſub an. 409, & auct. ab eo citat.

† De hac vid. ſup. vol iii p. 342, & ſeq. & note E.

day, never deferring it upon any account, as the Jews do, some of them till the hour of death (G).

3dly, They never allow themselves to have two wives, or to marry their nieces; but the Jews do both.

4thly, They are bound to wash themselves every morning, after either matrimonial converse, or any accidental defilement, so that they look upon every vessel and household stuff, they touch before such an ablution, to be polluted.

5thly, They observe the sabbath with the greatest strictness, never meddling with their wives on that night, lighting no fires, nor stirring from their houses, unless to go to the synagogue, where they read some portion of the pentateuch, offer up their prayers to, and sing the praises of, God.

6thly, Of all their solemn festivals, the passover is by them esteemed the chief; they likewise observe the other two, of pentecost and of tabernacles, with great exactness, and the grand fast of expiation with uncommon strictness.

7thly, They never offer any sacrifice but on mount Garizzim [p].

8thly, They boast a continued succession of priests from Ruz the son of Phineas, the catalogue of which is preserved by them with utmost strictness; and their high-priest always makes his residence at Shechem, now called Naplouse, from whence he issues out his directions to the whole sect for keeping their festivals, and whatever relates to the Mosaic observances (H). From this short scantling of their faith and practice,

[p] Vid. int. al. Basnag. ubi supra.

They value themselves for having preserved the ancient Hebrew character, and curse the new one, which was since introduced by Ezra, whom they brand with the name of impostor, and who, they pretend, substituted it to the Mosaic one, for the sake of those other books which he foisted into the Jewish canon (26).

(G) Especially in countries where they are not tolerated, such as France, Portugal, Spain, &c. and where, for fear of being discovered by the fear of circumcision, they wholly neglect it, and outwardly conform with the religion of the country for the sake of trade. Some of them, however, when they are grown either rich enough, or old and qualmish, will come over into England, Holland, &c. to be circumcised. As for those that die without circumcision, some of their friends generally come and circumcise them in their coffin, and lay the prepuce by them, after which the coffin is immediately nailed, and carried to the grave.

(H) This sect is still very numerous, not only in their metropolis, but in Damascus, Gaza, Cairo, and other parts of the Ottoman practice, one would be apt to conclude, that, except those points which related to their schism, they had been much stricter observers of the Mosaic law, than the Jews; but, whatever they may have proved in later times, we shall meet with such flagrant instances of the contrary in the sequel of this and the next section, as will easily convince how ready they were, upon the least danger of persecution or severe usage from their governors, to sacrifice their religion to their interest and safety. However, even in this one point of their schism, it is manifest, they were guilty of most flagrant forgery in corrupting their pentateuch in many places, in order to colour their setting up a new temple with some shew of divine authority. It is true, all the variations of this book are not of the same heinous nature, some of them seem even imputable to the ignorance of the transcribers from the new Chaldee of Ezra to the old Samaritan character, such as their often mistaking of letters, in the former by reason of their similitude, as the beth for the caph, the daleth for the resh, which in the Samaritan are very unlike. Others again may be looked upon as explanatory interpolations, such as we have observed, Joshua and his successors, down to Ezra and beyond, have thought necessary to add to the text. But there are certainly several notorious ones, which could not but be designedly made to support their cause against their Jewish antagonists.

(26) Vid. Basnag. ubi supra, cap. 3 & 4. l. vii. c. 25.

Corrupt their pentateuch.

Ottoman empire, besides those which are dispersed into the northern parts of Europe and Asia. But so ignorant are those of Turky, especially of cosmography, whatever they may be as to their religion, that they took the English Jews to be of their sect, and England to be only a considerable city (27), as appears by a letter they wrote to them some time since, and mentioned by the author last quoted; but if they really held those tenets which the Jews attribute to them, they must have been no less ignorant in point of their religion. Among other errors they charge them with, that of believing the godhead to be a corporeal being would be sufficient to shew their stupidity, but Credat Judæus.

Epiphanius, who ranks them in the catalogue of his heretics (28), tells us, that they worshipped the Teraphims, which Rachael had stolen from her father Laban, and which they digged up from under the oak, where Jacob had buried them; but, it is likely, he took up this calumny upon some Jewish authority. He adds, that they were, like the Jews, divided into four sects (28), and gives us there the different tenets of each, but they are not worth dwelling upon.

(27) Id loc. ult. citat. (28) Hæres 9.

tagoniſts. The reader may ſee ſome few of them in the margin (I), enough, however, to convince him that this Samaritan is not the only true authentic copy, becauſe in the old Hebrew character, and that of Ezra only a tranſcript of it, becauſe in the new introduced Chaldee, as ſome learned men have thought, and particularly a modern one [q], who has given it by far the preference above the Jewiſh; thoſe who are acquainted with his notions, need not be told what induced him to this unaccountable partiality.

How and when this manuſcript came into the hands of the Samaritans, is hard to gueſs; the general opinion is, that it was brought into Samaria by the prieſt, whom Ezarhaddon ſent to inſtruct the new inhabitants of that country. The book was not unknown to ſeveral ancient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerom, who both underſtood the Hebrew tongue; but they have given us no light about it. The opinion of ſome learned moderns [r] is, that it was brought to Samaria by Manaſſes, Sanballat's ſon-in-law lately mentioned, and that it was tranſcribed from that of Ezra,

[q] Whiſton. [r] F. Simon. hiſt. crit. V. T. l. i. c. 10. Prid. ubi ſupra.

A modern traveller informs us, that in a letter they wrote to him (29), they acknowledged the book of Joſhua; but they meant moſt probably their chronicle we have lately mentioned, and which they ſtyle the book of Joſhua. However, a more righteous judge than the Jewiſh rabbies has ſummed up their character in few words, when he told them, that they worſhipped they knew not what, and that ſalvation was of the Jews (30).

(I) We have already taken notice of their ſubſtituting the word Garizzim to that of Ebal, in that place of Deuteronomy, where God commands the Iſraelites to build an altar (31); according to which corruption, they pretend that Joſhua actually built the ſaid altar on Garizzim, and that it is the ſame they have ſacrificed upon ever ſince.

2dly, They have interpolated, between the twenty-fifth and twenty ſixth verſes of the eighteenth chapter of Exodus, all that we read in the firſt of Deuteronomy from the ninth to the fourteenth verſe incluſive; and in the tenth of Numbers are inſerted the ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth verſes of the firſt of Deuteronomy, between the tenth and eleventh verſes. All which are doubtleſs wilful corruptions to ſerve their cauſe. Theſe and all the other alterations in that pentateuch, the reader may ſee carefully collected by the learned Hottinger (32), and in the collations made in the laſt volume of Walton's polyglot.

(29) Ludolph's letter printed an. 1688. (30) John iv. 22. (31) Deut. xxvii. 4 & 5. (32) Exercit. cont. Morin.

Ezra, since we find in it all the emendations and explanations which that inspired scribe is supposed to have made to those five books; and consequently could be of no older date, much less have been brought by that Hebrew priest above-mentioned (K). However, each system has its difficulties

(K) If it be asked, how he could instruct those strangers in the worship of God, unless he had brought some such book along with him from the place of his captivity? some answer, that he taught them no more than he knew by tradition (33); others distinguish between the whole pentateuch and an epitome of the law contained in some of the chapters of Deuteronomy (34), which is that which they suppose he brought with him to Samaria, since both kings and priests were bound to keep a copy of it written with their own hand. Their reason for so thinking is, that if they had had the whole pentateuch, it is hardly to be supposed they would have continued so long in their idolatry. But here they forget that even this epitome contains as strong and severe prohibitions and threatenings against it, as can be found in any other part of the Mosaic books; so that it is more likely their attachment to their country gods, rather than the want of proper books to instruct them, was the cause of their so long dividing their worship between the God of Israel and their own.

A late critic has made a bold, but strange, push to reconcile all these difficulties, by absurdly supposing the pentateuch to have been written on the other side of Euphrates, by the priest, who was sent from thence into Samaria, for the instruction of those strangers. To this end, he, it seems, thought fit to give them a short sketch of the creation, flood, and other occurrences, that happened before the giving of the Mosaic law; and that he wrote it in the old Hebrew, because he was unacquainted with the Chaldee; and that this happening precisely at the time, when the Jewish volume of the law was found out by the high-priest and brought to Josiah, he got a copy of it, and inserted it at the end of his own work, as very proper to bring men to the knowledge of the one true God; and lastly that the Jews, finding nothing to object against the author or his work, have adopted the latter as conformable to their law and history This critic has not ventured to set his name to his book, but sent it abroad under a fictitious title (35); however, Ex ungue leonem, he was not long undiscovered or unconfuted.

Upon the whole, the general opinion is, that this pentateuch was brought by the priest sent by Ezarhaddon into Samaria, and that after the rupture of the Jews and Samaritans, the latter wilfully corupted those places of it which made against them, and consequently, that the Jewish one is by far the more authentic of the two.

(33) Vid. Prid. ubi supra. (34) Vandal. epist. ad Morin. in Tractat. de Idololat. (35) Sentimens de quelque Theolog. de Hollande.

ficulties, which are not easily solved; all that we shall add concerning this book is, that besides this copy written in their old character in the Hebrew tongue, they had another written in the vulgar language spoken among them, because, like the Jews they had forgot the old Hebrew, and were accustomed to a mongrel mixture of Assyrian, Babylonish, and Chaldee. Besides this, they had a Greek version of it for the sake of their hellenistical brethren, as the Jews had the septuagint; and it is probable, that this was the version which is mentioned by several ancient fathers [s], since they cannot be supposed to have understood either the original one, or the vulgar version of it. The old Hebrew copy did afterwards remain unknown to the christians during near ten centuries. Scaliger was the first modern who got intelligence of it; after which it was brought over into Europe, and printed in the polyglots of Paris and London, the latter of which is by far the best and most correct, as well as the Latin version of it [t]; the further particulars of it we refer to the margin (L).

Two versions of it.

How brought into Europe.

[s] African. Euseb. Diod. Tarsens. & al. ap. Prid. ubi supra.
[t] Vid. Scalig. de emend. temp. c. 7. Usser. epist. ad L. Cappel. Walton. proleg. in Polygl. Morin. Prid. & al.

(L) Scaliger, having received from the Shechemites an account of this pentateuch, by a letter which he published anno 1636, acquainting him among other things with this pentateuch, did in another work (36) complain, that none of the learned of Europe had endeavoured to procure some copies of it, seeing it might probably be of great service in adjusting the scripture chronology. This awaked the curiosity of archbishop Usher, who, as he tells us in his letter to L. Capellus, had observed, that this book had been quoted by several ancient fathers and other writers, down to Gaza and Syncellus, and particularly by the learned Origen in his book against Celsus. From that time this great prelate spared neither pains nor cost, till he had procured five or six copies of it from Syria and Palestine, and compared them with the Jewish; and here he thought he had found out the person who had corrupted them, namely, one Dositheus, mentioned by Origen against Celsus; but this discovery has not been universally received. However, it is from his copies that Walton printed that pentateuch in his polyglot, since then several other copies were procured from the same place by other learned persons in Europe (38). Those who are willing to know more of the Samaritans and their pentateuch, may consult, besides the letters

(36) De emendat. temp. l. vii. (37) Prolog. ad Polyglot.
(38) Vid. Morin. exerc. 1. in Pentat. Samar. Calmet. Prid. & al.

We return to Judæa, which we left in the poſſeſſion of the king of Egypt, but which he was, about five years after, forced to abandon to Antigonus and his ſon, who came againſt him with a ſuperior army. Ptolemy contented himſelf with demanding the cities of Ace, Samaria, Joppa, and Gaza, and to carry off an immenſe booty, as well as a great number of inhabitants, whom he ſettled in Alexandria, and endowed with conſiderable privileges and immunities, as Alexander had done before him. He was then deſigning to make that city the metropolis of Egypt, and was ſo well ſatisfied with the faithfulneſs and uſefulneſs of the Jews, that he ſpared no encouragement to allure them thither; inſomuch, that vaſt numbers flocked continually to it from Judæa and Samaria, chuſing to live under ſo generous and friendly a prince in a foreign country, rather than in their own, under the tyrannical government of Antiochus (M)[u]. Thus was Judæa become the ſub-

Year of the flood 2687. Before Chriſt 312.

Jews flock to Alexandria.

ject

[u] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. & cont. Apion. l. i. & ii.

letters of Scaliger, Ludolph, and Uſher abovementioned, the authors quoted in the margin (39).

(M) Among thoſe Jews whom Ptolemy's kindneſs drew into Egypt, Joſephus (40) mentions Hezechias, one of the chief prieſts, a man of learning and probity, and about ſixty years of age, who became acquainted with Hecatæus the Abderite, a perſon trained up under Alexander the Great, and now in great credit at the Egyptian court. Him Hezechias did ſo well inform of the religion, laws, and cuſtoms of the Jews, that he wrote a hiſtory of that nation down from Abraham to his time. The book is now loſt; but Joſephus quotes ſo many paſſages out of him in favour of the Jews, that a heathen writer, who lived in Trajan's time, did very much queſtion either the genuineneſs of the book, or the ſincerity of the author (41). Had he been better acquainted with them, he would never have called either in queſtion; and it is more than probable, that Hecatæus's great opinion of them procured the nation greater favours from Ptolemy, than they might have otherwiſe met with.

The Jewiſh hiſtorian quotes another ſtory out of the ſame author, to ſhew how far his nation was averſe to the ſuperſtitions of the heathens. It is of one Moſollam a Jew, who was ſuch an excellent markſman, that he ſhot a bird dead with his bow, whilſt a ſooth-ject of the diſputes of, and ſcene of war between Antigonus king of Upper Aſia, Seleucus king of Syria, and Ptolemy king of Egypt. The partiſans of this laſt pretended, that he had not undertaken to put Aſia under the government of Seleucus, but upon condition that Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia ſhould be relinquiſhed to him. Thoſe of Seleucus on the contrary maintained, that Ptolemy was no further concerned in the war, then to help him to conquer thoſe provinces allotted to him; in proof whereof they urged, that, after the defeat of Antigonus, Lyſimachus and Caſſander had aſſigned thoſe provinces to Seleucus [w]. Accordingly we find, that this laſt enjoyed that of Judæa ſome while, with a tax of three hundred talents of ſilver, upon condition that the Jews ſhould be governed by their own laws, and that their high-prieſts ſhould be their only governors [x].

(39) Hottinger, ubi ſupra, Cellar. Lightfoot hor. Hæbr. Prid. ubi ſupra. Baſnag, tom. 2. p. 1. c. 1. & ſeq. & al. (40) Lib. i. cont. Apion. (41) Herenn. Phil. apud. Origen. cont. Celſ. lib. 1.

This prince very much imitated the clemency and generoſity of the Egyptian king, a character which was quite oppoſite to that of Antigonus, who was of ſuch fierce nature, that he ſtuck at no cruelty, falſhood, or tyranny, that ſerved his turn. This made great numbers of the Jews to fall away likewiſe from that tyrant to Seleucus, who gave them much the ſame privileges and franchiſes that his competitor did in Egypt. He built ſixteen cities in Leſſer Aſia, which he, from his father, called Antioch, nine he called by his one name, and ſix by that of his mother Laodicea; three from his firſt wife Apamea, and one from Stratonice his laſt wife; in all theſe he ſettled ſuch conſiderable colonies of the Jew, eſpecially at Antioch in Syria, that they became almoſt as conſiderable a part of thoſe cities, as they were at Alexandria. Hence that nation came to ſpread themſelves over Syria and Leſſer Aſia, whilſt Judæa became ſtill thinner of its own inhabitants, till it was again recovered by Ptolemy; after which they came ſtill a ſoothſayer in their company was perſuading them to obſerve its motion, and ſteer their courſe by that of the bird. This action having drawn ſome bitter invectives againſt our Jew from his ſuperſtitious fellow-travellers, he only laughed at their folly, for expecting to learn their fortune from a bird, that was ſo palpably ignorant of it own. Whether Moſollam was more minded to diſplay his ſkill in ſhooting, or exploding the ſuperſtition of other nations, 'tis but too plain, thoſe of his own were generally of another mind, with reſpect to foothſaying, aſtrology, divinations, and ſuch-like ſuperſtitious traſh.

[w] Vid. Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3721.

[x] Vid. Sulpit. Sever. hiſt. ſacr. l. ii.

ſtill over to him from the provinces of Antiochus, and ſtill increaſed the number of thoſe whom he found in Babylon; from all whom he received ſuch conſiderable ſervices, that he ſpared no favours nor encouragement to faſten them to his intereſt.

Year of the flood 2707. Before Chriſt 292.

Soon after the recovery of Judæa by Ptolemy Soter, died Simon the Jewiſh high-prieſt in the ninth year of his pontificate [y]. He had ſucceeded his father Onias, and had been ſo eminent for his ſanctity and integrity, which ſhone in all his actions, that he was ſurnamed the juſt. He was the firſt pontiff of that name, and the excellent character which the author of Eccleſiaſticus gives of him [z], ſhows how highly he deſerved the ſurname which his nation had given him. But he was no leſs remarkable for his other vertues, as a Jewiſh prince and governor, witneſs his repairing and fortifying the temple and the city with high and ſtrong walls, his famous ciſtern covered with braſs, which he cauſed to be made in Jeruſalem, as a reſervoir for water, and which was of ſuch capacious circumference, that the author compares it to a ſea; but his moſt conſiderable work was the finiſhing of the canon of the Old Teſtament, of which we have already ſpoken (N). He [y] Euſeb. Chron. [z] Ch. l. 1, & ſeq.

(N) It has been already obſerved, that the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and of the chronicles, could not have been inſerted into the canon by thoſe two inſpired writers; firſt, becauſe there are in them ſome marginal corrections, which muſt have been inſerted by ſome of their ſucceſſors; and, ſecondly, becauſe ſome genealogies are carried down vaſtly beyond their time, ſome even down to that of Alexander the Great.

The book of Eſther likewiſe ſeems to have been written after their time, and, as ſome think, the prophecies of Malachy. As therefore this Simon the Juſt is by all the Jews mentioned as the laſt of the great ſynagogue we have elſewhere ſpoken of, and was a man of ſuch eminent piety and learning, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he put the finiſhing ſtroke to the ſacred code, either by inſerting the books above-mentioned, or, if they had been received before, by reviſing and giving a final ſanction to them.

As for the genealogies, whoever continued them, that work ſeems to have been done before him. Had he been the author of them, it is likely he would have brought them down nearer his time.

However, from his pontificate is dated the completing of the ſacred canon of the Old Teſtament, which was thence-forward received

He left a ſon named Onias, but he being then but an infant, Eleazar, Simon's brother was ſubſtituted high-prieſt in his ſtead. He executed this office fifteen years, but with this difference; that whereas all the high-prieſts before had ſet as preſidents of the ſynagogue, or grand council of the Jews, Simon was ſucceeded in this laſt dignity by one Antigonus of Socho, a man of great learning and piety [a]. This man, who, the Jews tell us, was the maſter of Saddoc, the chief of the Sadducean ſect, taught, that our ſerving of God ought to be free either from ſlaviſh fear of puniſhment, or from ſelfiſh hope of reward; and be wholly diſintereſted, and flow from the pure love and fear of that Supreme Being. Hence his diſciple, being unable to reliſh ſuch a ſpiritual doctrine, took it into his head, that his maſter meant no more by it, than that there received and conveyed without reviſal or correction; from this time the Jewiſh doctors applied themſelves wholly to ſtudy, explain, and comment upon them, and their expoſitions were in time received with as great ſubmiſſion as the ſacred books themſelves.

[a] De hoc vid. lib. Juchaſin, Shalſhel. el. Levita. in Cabbala, & al.

This is that Simon of whom the Talmudiſts tell us ſo many wonders, ſome of which we have formerly mentioned †, ſuch as that during his prieſt-hood the ſcape-goat was always broken in pieces down the precipice, which was an omen of God's acceptance; but after his death the Saracens uſed to catch and eat it; that the ribbon tied about the neck of it always appeared white, another good omen, but after him, it appeared oftener red, they tell us likewiſe (42), that during his time the weſtern branch of the ſacred candleſtic never went out; that the ſhew-bread, and two loaves of the firſt-fruits, uſed to be multiplied to ſuch a degree, as to ſuffice all the prieſts who were then upon duty; that two ſticks thrown on the fire of the altar kept it burning and clear all the whole day; with ſome other ſuch tokens of the divine favour, which ended with his death. All which, thoſe who are acquainted with the allegorical language of the Talmudiſts, are ſo far from underſtanding either as literal truths, or as fictions of thoſe writers, that they rightly look upon them as ſo many figurative phraſes to expreſs the flouriſhing condition of the Jewiſh religion and commonwealth, which from that time began to go from bad to worſe, till the brave Maccabees raiſed it again to its ancient luſtre.

† vol. iii. p. 221. ſub. fin. note T. (42) Miſhna in Joma. Maimon. in jom. hakephur.

Rise of the Sadducees.

were neither rewards nor punishments, nor even life after this; which notion became in time so rife among the richer sort of Jews, that they monopolised all the great places in church and state, as we shall see in due time.

Antigonus by this became the head of a new kind of synagogue, which continued from this time to that of Jehudah Hakkodesh, the compiler of the Mishna, as the old one had from Ezra to Simon the just; the difference between them was, that the old one had bestowed their time and labour in collecting, revising, and completing the canon of the Old Testament; the latter was wholly employed in expounding and commenting upon it. These, therefore, whom the authors of the New Testament call by different names, such as doctors, scribers, lawyers, rulers, and such-like, affected to call themselves Tannaim, or traditionalists[b], because they handed down their expositions and doctrines by oral tradition to their disciples; and their authority once quoted in any of their schools upon any point, either put an end to the controversy, or the recusant was looked upon as an apostate from his master; and as all other disputes in political affairs were to be decided by the law of God, of which these Tannaim were the interpreters, so they were chosen also to assist, and some of the most considerable for learning, zeal, &c. to preside in all the courts of judicature, from the sanhedrin or great council of the nation, consisting of seventy-two, down to the more inferior ones, which they had in every city; and upon this account they were also called counsellors[c].

Of the Tannaim or Mishnical doctors.

Year of the flood 2715. Year before Christ 284.

Ptolemy, surnamed Philadelphus, having suceeded his father in Egypt, the Jews found in him as great a protector, as they had in Ptolemy Soter; and with this advantage, that the son, being a great lover of learning, and upon the point of rearing his noble library at Alexandria, as we have elsewhere described *, did strive to oblige them with greater favours than any of his predecessors had done, in order to obtain from them a copy of the sacred books, to be translated into Greek, and deposited there among that immense number of volumes which he had procured from all parts of the world. This version is that which is commonly known by the name of septuagint; our great Usher places the making of it in the seventh year of that monarch's reign; we have already mentioned something of it in the place above quoted, where we promised to speak more fully of it in this chapter. And indeed, when we

[b] Vid. Buxtorf, Lexic. Rab. sub voc תנן. [c] Vide Mark xv. 43. Luke xxiii. 50. Acts v. 34. * Vol ix. p. 203.

we conſider how much this performance has been celebrated, not only by the moſt learned Jewiſh writers, but alſo by the ancient fathers as well as many celebrated moderns; how much it has been cried up, as a work manifeſtly conducted by a miraculous providence, and as ſuch referred to and quoted both by our ſaviour and his apoſtles, and by all the primitive writers of the Chriſtian church; it will perhaps be expected, that we would be ſomewhat copious upon it. But when we reflect on the other hand, that all thoſe eminent writers have not only blindly followed their romantic leader, but have in many caſes embelliſhed his ſurprizing account of this tranſaction; that Ariſteas, the firſt broacher of this hiſtory, has only covered himſelf with the perſonage, if not with the name, of a heathen writer and an officer of Ptolemy's guards, that he might be the more liberal of his incenſe to the Jewiſh nation; that he is guilty of ſeveral flagrant anachroniſms and of a manifeſt falſhood, at the very threſhold of his account, in making Demetrius Phalereus, the pretended promoter of this great work, a great favourite of the king, when the contrary plainly appears from what we have formerly ſaid on that head in our third volume †; when we conſider that Joſephus, Ariſtobulus, a Jewiſh peripatetick philoſopher, Philo, the Talmudiſts, and other rabbies, either only copied, or in ſome caſes improved upon, him; and laſtly, that thoſe ancient fathers, Juſtin Martyr, Irenæus, Cyril, Chryſoſtom, Auſtin, Epiphanius, and others, have too greedily ſwallowed up the Jewiſh account of this pretended miraculous verſion, by reaſon of the preference which Chriſt and his apoſtles ſeem to have given it either to the original, or to the other verſions then extant, not perhaps ſo much upon its being more authentic than any of them, much leſs than the original, as becauſe it was the moſt in vogue, and beſt underſtood by the generality of the Jews; we hope, upon all theſe conſiderations, our readers will eaſily excuſe our not entering into ſo ſpacious a field, and be content with the ſuccinct account we ſhall now give him of it in the margin (O).

† Ibid. vol. ix. p. 293.

(O) The account we have of this verſion, out of the book which goes under the name of Ariſteas, and out of thoſe other authors who have followed him, is in ſubſtance as follows: Ptolemy Philadelphus, a great lover of learning, was inriching the noble library which had been begun by his father, when Demetrius Phalereus, who had the inſpection of that work, acquainted him

ALL that we shall add here will be two or three remarks concerning this work; the first is, that there was near that time him, that there were certain books held sacred among the Jews, which highly deserved a place in his collection, if they could by any means be procured. He advised him at the same time of a method, in all likelihood the most effectual, to prevail upon the Jewish sanhedrin to send those volumes, together with a sufficient number of learned men to Alexandria, to translate them into Greek, namely by a general redemption of all the Jewish captives that had been taken during the late wars.

Upon inquiry, the number of them was found to amount to about a hundred thousand; at which Ptolemy was so far from being discouraged, that he caused an edict to be issued out for a total release, and the sum of twenty drachms per head to be paid for their redemption out of his own treasury; so that the whole amounted to six hundred and sixty talents. Josephus, who has only abridged that author, doth yet differ from him, in that he makes the price of every redeemed slave to have been a hundred and twenty drachms, and yet the sum total to have amounted but to four hundred and sixty talents, though there were, according to him, a hundred and twenty thousand persons released (1).

After this signal favour to the Jewish nation, the king sent a splendid embassy laden with presents to Eleazar, the then Jewish high-priest; who on his side readily complied with the king's request, and sent him, with the copy of the sacred books, written in letters of gold, seventy-two Jews, well skilled in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, and a letter of thanks for his noble presents, in which he congratulated him on his glorious undertaking, and wished him good success in it.

Ptolemy received the interpreters with uncommon respect, and paid such a regard to the sacred volume, that he bowed himself seven times down to the ground before it; after which he entertained his guests with suitable magnificence seven days successively, assuring them, that he should esteem the day of their arrival as an addition to the glory of his reign. They were conducted three days after into the island of Pharos, which stood about seven furlongs from Alexandria, where Demetrius placed them in a sumptuous edifice, conveniently situated near the shore, and where they set immediately about the work.

Their method, according to Aristeas, was to set at it from six in the morning to three in the afternoon; after which they returned into the city, where they had their victuals and other necessaries prepared for them at the king's expence. Whenever any difficulty was started, they debated it in a full assembly; and when the point was settled, a fair transcript was made, and sent to Demetrius, time a verſion made of the ſacred Hebrew books into Greek, and with which the Helleniſt Jews were ſo highly delighted, trius, till the whole verſion was finiſhed, which took up only ſeventy or ſeventy-two days.

(1) Antiq. l. xii. c. 2.

Philo, an Alexandrian Jew, who was ſent on an embaſſy to Caius Cæſar, ſoon after our Saviour's death, has greatly improved the ſtory of Ariſteas, and ſpeaks of this verſion as altogether miraculous (2); for he adds, that upon comparing the ſeveral interpretations of thoſe ſeventy men, which, according to him, had been carried on by each of them ſeparately, there was not found ſo much as the difference of a word between them all; but that they had rendered every period, not only in the ſame ſenſe, but in the ſame phraſe, word, and order, throughout the whole; from whence he infers, that they were all divinely inſpired. He mentions nothing either of Ariſteas or Demetrius Phalereus, probably, becauſe he would not be ſuſpected of having copied and inlarged the former.

Juſtin Martyr, who has adopted this extraordinary addition of Philo (3), tells us, that Ptolemy had cauſed the interpreters to be ſhut up, each in a ſeparate cell, to prevent their communicating their thoughts to one another; that by the conformity of their ſeveral tranſlations, he might the more eaſily judge of the faithfulneſs of the whole verſion. He adds, that when they came to be compared together, there was ſuch an exact conformity between them all, that the king, who looked upon it as altogether miraculous, ſent the interpreters home laden with honour and with the richeſt preſents; and received their writings with that veneration which was due to books divinely inſpired. And as a further confirmation of the whole, he tells the Greeks, to whom he writes, that he had ſeen thoſe very cells, whilſt he was at Alexandria, and that thoſe that ſhewed them to him aſſured him, that they had the whole ſtory from undoubted tradition.

His account of this verſion is ſomewhat different, in another work of his (4), where he tells us, that Ptolemy ſent to Herod king of the Jews, for thoſe ſacred books; and that upon their being ſent in their original tongue and character, which were unknown in Egypt, he had been forced to ſend to him for ſome interpreters to tranſlate them into Greek; which being likewiſe complied with, copies of that verſion were ſtill every-where to be ſeen in the hands of the Helleniſt Jews in his time.

After this ample teſtimony of the good and learned martyr, we need not wonder if ſo many ancient fathers (5) have embraced the ſtory, and looked upon that verſion as divinely inſpired; and ſome of them have given it even the preference to the original,

in

(2) In vit. Moſ. l. ii. & Legat. ad Cæſar. (3) Cohortat. ad Gentes. p. 14 & dial. con. Tryphon. (4) Apolog. 11.

that Philo tells us [a], they inſtituted an annual feaſt in memory of it, and made a yearly viſit, in ſolemn proceſſion to the iſle of

[a] In vit. Moſis.

in thoſe places were the difference between them could not be reconciled (6). Epiphanius, who lived about the middle of the third century, and pretends to have preſerved the letter which Ptolemy wrote to the Jews to obtain this verſion from them, has given us a copious account of it (7); and, to what has been ſaid by Ariſteas and the other authors above-mentioned, has added ſome other circumſtances by way of improvement; ſuch as, that there were but thirty-ſix cells, into which the interpreters were ſhut up by two in each; that they had no windows, but received their light from the top by ſky-lights; that each couple had a book given them to tranſlate, which when finiſhed, was conveyed to the next cell, and ſo on to the third, fourth, &c. and ſo on to all the reſt, by which means each book was tranſlated thirty-ſix times; that they were confined to their work from morning to evening; after which each couple was conveyed in a ſeparate boat to the royal palace, where they ſupped with the king; after which they were ſhut up, each in their ſeparate chamber, till the next day, when they were again conveyed to their reſpective cells.

When the whole book of the Old Teſtament had gone through the thirty-ſix couples, their verſions were read before the king by thirty-ſix readers, whilſt a thirty-ſeventh held the original in his hand, with which they were compared; and at the end were found to agree in every reſpect, both with the Hebrew and with each other, to ſuch a degree of exactneſs, that Ptolemy looked upon thoſe interpreters as divinely inſpired, and cauſed their ſeveral works to be depoſited in his library of Bruchium, which, as we have obſerved in the hiſtory of Egypt (8), held the firſt, as that which was called Serapium held the ſecond, rank.

The Talmuds of Jeruſalem and Babylon agree in moſt of theſe particulars above-mentioned, but pretend that Ptolemy ſent for thoſe ſeventy-two Jewiſh elders, without acquainting them what work he deſigned to ſet them upon, till they were arrived at Alexandria, when he cauſed them to be all ſhut up, each in a ſeparate cell, and gave them the ſacred books to tranſlate. Some of thoſe ancient rabbies there quoted ſay indeed, that he ſent only for ſeven of them, which was indeed more than enough for the work; they all agree with the reſt, that God did ſo direct their pens,

(5) Iren cont. Hæreſ. lib iii. Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. i. Hilar. in Pſ. ii. & cxxxi. Cyril. Hieroſol. Cathec. 4. Auguſt. civit. Dei, l. xviii. c. 35. De conſenſ. Evangeliſt. c. 66, & alib. Philaſtr. Brixienſ. Hæreſ 90. Vid. Prid. Connect. ſub ann. 277. (6) Vid. int. al. Hilar. in Pſ. cxxxi. (7) In lib. de Ponder. & Menſur. N. 9, & ſeq. (8) Vid. ſup. vol. ix. p. 185.

of Pharos, where it had been made by the seventy-two Israelitish elders: whereas the more zealous Hebraising Jews, who looked pens, that all their versions were exactly agreeable both to each other, and to the original.

Lastly, and to name no more, St. Clement of Alexandria (9) and Eusebius (10) quote some fragments out of one Aristobulus, a peripatetic Jew of Alexandria, who is said to have wrote a comment on the pentateuch, and to have dedicated it to Ptolemy Philometor, to whom he had been tutor. In which dedication he mentions this Greek version, which had been made by Ptolemy's command, and under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus.

The two fathers above-mentioned quote therefore this comment to prove the possibility of Pythagoras, Plato, and other Greek philosophers, having taken most of their philosophy out of the sacred volumes, since they had been translated so long before in that known language.

The reader may see by what has been extracted out of all those authors, both Jewish and Christian, that the story of this version has gained considerably by every hand it has gone through; and this improvement, as well as some other variations which are found among those writers, is one main argument why the far greater part of our modern critics reject it as a Jewish device, calculated to advance the glory of that nation.

But this is not the only plausible argument against it. We have observed in the text above some material objections that are justly urged against the pretended Aristeas, who is the first writer of this story, particularly, that he was a Jew in disguise, notwithstanding his pretending to be a heathen and one of Ptolemy's guards; and this appears first from his style, which is fraught both with hebraisms and with panegyrics on the Jewish nation. 2. The praises he gives to the Egyptian king and court, are not only apparently false, but seem also calculated to advance the credit of the Jews.

The vast expence which he makes Ptolemy to have been at to get this version perfected, and which, put together and computed at the most moderate rate, must have amounted to near two millions sterling; the sending for seventy-two elders, that is, six out of each of the twelve tribes, at a time when the names and tribes of Israel were absorbed into that of Jews, seems only a compliment on the sanhedrin, which consisted of that number, especially considering that a much smaller one would have sufficed for the work; the extraordinary answers which those interpreters are said to have given extempore to the king's questions; and lastly the story of Demetrius Phalereus being such a great favourite with that monarch, and the victory which the latter is there affirmed looked upon it as a vile profanation of their holy religion, conceived such horror against it, that they instituted a fast in memory of it. These even add, that the day on which it was began, proved as fatal to the Israelites, as that on which Jeroboam set up the golden calves at Dan and Bethel, and that the sky was covered with thick darkness three days successively [b]. The Samaritans have likewise laid claim to the glory of this version, and pretend that their high-priest, as well as that of the Jews, having been invited by Ptolemy to come at the head of a number of learned men to carry on the work, upon a review of both translations, that of the Samaritans had been preferred to the Jewish one, and placed in the library of the Egyptian monarch †.

(9) Stromat. lib. i. & v. (10) Canon. Chronal. & præpar. evang. l. vii. c. 13, viii. c. 9, &alib.

But whether all the books of the Old Testament were translated at once, and by the same set of men, or, as some contend for, only the five books of Moses, we have no sufficient ground to affirm; the latter doth, however, appear the more probable of the two from the difference of style and exactness, which manifestly appears in them; for that of the pentateuch is not only more faithful and agreeable to the original, but seems somewhat more ancient, and in the Alexandrian dialect; whereas that of the other books is more loose and incorrect, and sometimes renders the same Hebrew word differently from that of the Mosaic ones, which seems to intimate, that they had been done by different hands, and at some distance of time. Thus much, however, is more than probable upon the whole, that if the first version went no farther than the pentateuch, the Hellenist Jews, who found so great a benefit from it, did not go long without having all the rest of the sacred volume translated in the same tongue.

The second is, that our learned Usher has fixed the time of this version to this year, as he believed the main part of the history, which we have of it under the name of Aristeas, to affirmed to have gained at sea over Antigonus, and which is mentioned by no other writer; all these put together, render the whole account very incredible. But our design is not here to confute it, but to direct our readers to those authors who have wrote more copiously on that subject, and which he will find in the margin (11).

† Lib. Josue. sup. Citat.

(11) Dupin. Script. Ecclesiast. part. 1, c. 6, sect. iii. Simon. hist. crit. V. T. l. ii. c. 2. Usser, Hoddy, Prid Connect. sub. a. A. C. 277. Calmet sub voce Septante, & al.

to be true and genuine; for had he placed it later, it could not have coincided with the time of Eleazar, who is there mentioned as the Jewish high-priest, who sent the seventy-two translators into Egypt, and who died about the beginning of the following year; and had he placed it earlier, it would have been before Ptolemy had married his sister Arsinoe; whereas the Jewish pontiff is there introduced as complimenting that princess, in his letter to the king, as his sister and queen.

Our last and most material remark is, that whatever wonders and fables the Jews may have invented, and the Christians swallowed, concerning this version, yet it was not without the conduct of a divine providence, that these sacred books were translated into a tongue so universally known and spoken, so many centuries before the completion of those prophecies, which they contained, and which were in due time to be fulfilled by and under the promised Messiah. Had those divine oracles been kept still in the hands of the Jews, and in their original Hebrew, till the preaching of the gospel, they must have lost a very considerable part of their evidence; which by their being promulgated in so known a language, and dispersed so far and wide, is now rendered unquestionable and irrefragable. Without such a version and publication of that sacred volume, it would have been extremely difficult, notwithstanding the manifest impossibility of a combination between the Jews and the Christians, to have persuaded an unbelieving world, that those prophecies had not been stamped, after their completion, as Porphyry and other enemies of christianity absurdly affirmed: whereas this version and universal dispersion of them through so many distant parts of the known world put it beyond all question, that they were previous to their completion, at least by some centuries, and owe consequently their origin to persons divinely inspired. We have had occasion to speak of several of them in our former volume [c]; those that relate more particularly to the Messiah, will be best seen in the sequel of this chapter. We shall only observe with respect to the latter, that when the primitive fathers, who were ignorant of the Hebrew, did quote those prophecies from this septuagint version, the Hellenist Jews found themselves so straitly pinched by them, that they grew as much out of conceit with it, as they had before admired it. This dislike produced those Latin versions of it, which which were afterwards known by the names of their authors, Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, and, not unlikely alſo, that diſcordance, which is found in the various manuſcripts of the Greek one, the ancienteſt and moſt correct of all which, in the judgment of thoſe who have thoroughly examined it, is that which is known by the name of Alexandrian, and is now in the king's library at St. James's. A further diſquiſition upon this head would doubtleſs be out of our province; and it is, we hope, ſufficient to have referred our readers in the foregoing note to thoſe critics who have treated of it more at large.

[c] Vid. int. al. vol. ii. p. 484. & note. vol. iii. p. 470. & O. vol. v. p. 82. 311. note.

We return now to the reign of Ptolemy, under whoſe benign influence the Jews, enjoying all the tranquillity they could wiſh, made uſe of that interval to ſtudy and explain the ſacred books. They kept open ſchools, and Antigonus Sochæus was at the head of them; he died in great eſteem of his nation, though Sadoc and another diſciple, named Baithus, forſook him and his doctrine to ſpread their own new-fangled epicuriſm. He had two ſucceſſors, namely Joſeph the ſon of Joazer, who took the title of Naſſi or prince, and Joſeph the ſon of John, who took that of Ab-beth-din, or father or preſident of the ſanhedrin; and theſe did jointly read their public lectures at Jeruſalem [d]; the Jewiſh chronologers, laſt-quoted, place Antigonus's death about the end of the twentieth year of Ptolemy's reign.

Antigonus dies.

On the other hand, ſome other contending monarchs ſhewed no leſs a deſire to ingratiate themſelves to the Jews, particularly Antiochus, ſurnamed Theos, or the god, and grandſon of Seleucus, granted to thoſe of Ionia the ſame privileges and franchiſes with the Greeks. This prince held out a long and bloody war againſt Ptolemy Philadelphus, which was at length terminated by a treaty of marriage, wherein the former was to marry Berenice the daughter of the latter, and to repudiate his firſt wife Laodicea; but he having broken his contract by a ſeries of enormous murders, as we have elſewhere related † was became ſo odious to all his ſubjects every-where, tha Ptolemy Euergetes, who had ſucceeded his father in Egypt did eaſily diſpoſſeſs him of the provinces of Syria and Cilicia beſides ſeveral other cities of Aſia; all which did readily ope their gates to him upon his firſt appearing. Euergetes, in h return from all theſe conqueſts, paſt through Judæa in h way to Egypt; and coming to Jeruſalem, offered a gre numb number of sacrifices at the temple there, as an acknowledgment for his late successes [e]. It is thought, that this preference, which that prince shewed to the God of Israel, before the deities of Egypt, was owing to his having been shewed the prophecies of Daniel, in which those great and swift conquests had been foretold. By this time, Onias II. the unworthy son of Simon the just, was entered into the pontifical office. During his minority, his uncle Eleazar, the brother of Simon, had been invested with that dignity, and enjoyed it near thirty years; it is during his pontificate that the septuagint version above-mentioned is supposed to have been made. When Eleazar died, Onias, though above thirty years of age, was, for some reason or other, set by from the high-priesthood, to make way for his great-uncle Manasses, the son of Jaddua the uncle of Simon the just; but Manasses being then very old and dying soon after, Onias, ascended the pontifical chair in the thirty second year of his age, and in the thirty-sixth year of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but in an unlucky hour for the Jews. Onias, who was of a base sordid spirit, neglected every thing but hoarding up of treasure, and was like to have ruined the Jewish state by his avarice, had not a near relation of his found out a notable expedient to save it [f].

[d] Pirke, Abboth, Juchaſin, & al ſup. citat. † See befor vol viii. Chap 2. Sect. 9.

Onias high-priest. Year of the flood 2750. Before Christ 249.

JUDÆA had till then been taxed at the yearly tribute of twenty talents of silver, which sum his predecessors had constantly paid to the kings of Egypt; but Onias, growing more covetous as he grew older, had sunk that money into his own coffers, instead of sending it to the king's treasury. How long he had gone on in arrears, our author doth not tell us; but they were grown to such a height, that Ptolemy Euergetes thought fit to send Athenion, one of the officers of his court, to demand them of that pontiff, threatening him at the same time, that, if they were not immediately payed, he would drive all the Jews out of their country, and repeople it with new colonies of his own. This threatening and unexpected demand put the whole city into the utmost consternation, and Onias, who valued neither his dignity nor nation in comparison of his money, was the only person who remained insensible of the danger; being resolved to sacrifice both to the resentment of that prince, rather than refund any part of his stolen pelf. His sister had then a son by her husband Tobias, who, though young, was highly esteemed for his piety, justice, and prudence; he was then at his country seat, where his his mother ſent him word of the peril into which her brother's ſordidneſs was like to involve the whole nation. Joſeph, that was the noble youth's name, loſt no time to come and expoſtulate with his uncle. He upbraided him in the ſtrongeſt terms, for baſely preferring his ill-gotten riches to the ſacredneſs of his function, the ſafety of his country, and eſpecially of his friends and relations; and finding him deaf to all, he urged, he adviſed him at leaſt to take a journey into Egypt, endeavour to obtain a remiſſion, either of the whole, or part of the debt. All the anſwer he could get from the reſty old pontiff was, that he never coveted either his dignity or government, and that he was reſolved to forego them both, rather than take ſuch a long journey. There being no remedy left but to offer himſelf to go and apply to the Egyptian monarch, he eaſily obtained his uncle's conſent to it. He then convened the people into the temple, the then uſual place for holding their public aſſemblies, and there endeavoured to diſſipate their fears, by promiſing them, that he would ſhortly go down into Egypt, and find ſome effectual means if they approved of his enterpriſe, to reconcile the king to them.

[e] Joseph. cont. Apion. l. ii. [f] Id. antiq. l. xii. c. 3.

Joſephus's policy to ſave his country.

His propoſal having been received with univerſal applauſe, Joſeph went imediately to Athenion, invited him to his houſe, and entertained him in a ſumptuous, but obliging, manner, all the reſt of the time he ſtayed in Jeruſalem; and, upon his departure, made him ſeveral conſiderable preſents. This noble carriage failed not to have the deſired effect. The Egyptian deputy promiſed to ſet the whole matter in a favourable light before the king, and Joſeph, on the other hand, promiſed to follow him ſoon after, and to give that monarch full ſatisfaction for all that had paſſed during his uncle's government. Both theſe did punctually perform their promiſe; Athenion, upon his arrival at court, did loudly exclaim againſt Onias's ſordidneſs, but ſaid at the ſame time ſo many things in praiſe of his nephew, that Ptolemy had already conceived a high eſteem for him; and Joſeph, on the other hand, having borrowed twenty thouſand marks from the bankers of Samaria, ſet out for Alexandria with a handſome equipage. How he was received, and what ſucceſs he met with at the Egyptian court, we have ſeen elſewhere*. So that having by his addreſs obtained the farming of the provinces Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa, and Samaria, and borrowed a conſiderable ſum of his Egyptian friends, he returned to Jeruſalem, attended with an eſcort of two thouſand men, to aſſiſt him in collecting the royal royal tribute, and to puniſh thoſe who ſhould refuſe to pay it, The Aſcalonites were the firſt who felt the ſevere effects of his authority. They had not only diſobeyed his commands, but had even loaded him with bitter invectives, ſo that, to prevent the infection ſpreading further, he was forced to make a ſevere example of them to the reſt. He cauſed twenty of the ring-leaders to be hanged, and confiſcated their eſtates, out of which he ſent a thouſand talents to the king, with an account of what he had done. He treated the inhabitants of Scythopolis after the ſame manner; and theſe were the only ones that ventured to follow thoſe of Aſcalon; the reſt, being all over-awed, did willingly open their gates, and pay their taxes, and Joſeph at the ſame time that he remitted them into Egypt, did from time to time ſend ſome preſents to his friends there, to keep up his intereſt at court. As for the king, he was ſo pleaſed with ſuch a conſiderable augmentation of his revenue, that he continued him in his office two and twenty years, during which time he gained an immenſe treaſure, under the reigns of three Ptolemies, namely Euergetes, Philopator, and Epiphanes the ſon of Phiometor, who was diſpoſſeſt of thoſe provinces by Antiochus the Great, as we have ſhewn in a former chapter[g]. After which, Epiphanes having again recovered them by a marriage with Antiochus's daughter, he was again reſtored to his farms, and enjoyed them many years after, even, as our Jewiſh hiſtorian tells us, to the day of his death. The reader may ſee what we ſaid on this head in the place above quoted †.

* Vol. ix. p. 208. & ſeq.

Joſeph by this time had ſeven ſons by one of his wives, and an eighth named Hyrcan by his brother Selinus's daughter, whom he had made him marry, inſtead of a beautifull Egyptian dancer. Joſeph, whilſt in Egypt, had ſeen this fair woman at ſome of the public ſhows, and was fallen in love with her, he was aſhamed to diſcover his weakneſs to any but his brother, who promiſed to procure her to him; but inſtead of her he converted his own daughter into his bed; and when the cheat was diſcovered, Selinus did ſo well expoſtulate the matter with him, that he eaſily convinced him, that he had acted a friendly part in preventing his expoſing himſelf to the contempt of the Egyptians, by marrying ſuch a publick actreſs. Joſeph, ſatisfied with his reaſons, took his new wife home, and had this Hyrcan by her, who proved ſuch a promiſing youth, that he ſoon ingroſſed his affection from all his other brethren, and the ſequel will ſhow that he was really deſerving of it [h]. His progeny.

In

[g] Ibid. vol. ix. p. 211, & ſeq. † Ibid. p. 211.

[h] Joſeph. antiq. l. xii. c. 4.

Ptolemy Philopator.

In the interim, Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father Euergetes in Egypt, not without strong suspicion of his having dispatched him by poison, as he was indeed profligate enough for such a deed; and Simon II. had succeeded his father Onias soon after in the high-priesthood at Jerusalem. This pontiff was of quite different spirit from his father; he was a man of great piety and zeal, of singular conduct and courage; all which were put to a severe proof before he had passed the first year of his pontificate. He was moreover free from that sordidness and avarice which had proved so detrimental to the Jewish state during his father's office; for besides those dangers which his wise nephew had the address to avoid, they had suffered a constant series of evils from the Samaritans, ever since these last came to be aware of the baseness of the Jewish pontiff. Nothing less indeed could be expected from that exasperated nation, who watched all opportunities to vent their malice, than that they should take the advantage of their weak government to insidiate and oppress them. Accordingly, Josephus tells us, there was scarce a year in which they did not make some incursion, ravage the country and carry away captives, during the whole time of that cowardly priest [i]. But to return to Philopator, we may remember he was like to have lost Palestine by the treachery of Theodore, governor of Phœnicia, who had rebelled against him, and engaged to put that province, together with those of Judæa and Cœle-Syria, into Antiochus's hands, who had always looked upon them as dismembered from his own kingdom. The plot having been timely discovered, Antiochus openly invaded Galilee, took a great many cities on both sides of Jordan, particularly Philoteria, on the north side of the sea of Tiberias, Bethshan or Scythopolis, on the south, and Ittabyrium, strongly situated on mount Tabor. From thence he took all the land that had formerly belonged to the two tribes and half on the other side of Jordan; but winter drawing near, he left five thousand men there under the command of Hippolochus and Cheræas, two other revolters from Ptolemy to keep the country in awe till the next spring. By that time Ptolemy came with such a powerful army against him, that he defeated him in a set battle, and forced him out of those provinces; after which all the cities did readily open their gates to the conqueror, and sent their embassadors to make their submission and presents to him [k].

Simon II. high-priest. Year of the flood 2778. Before Christ 221.

THE

[i] Id. ibid. c. 3. [k] Id. ibid. c. 4. 3 Maccab. i. 1 & seq.

THE Jews, always attached to the Egyptians, were some of the forwardest to come and congratulate him upon his late success. They were kindly received by him, and, among other marks of his favour, he told them, that he designed to go to Jerusalem, and offer his sacrifices to their God. He did so accordingly, and, besides a great number of victims which he there offered, he made some considerable presents to the temple; but this munificence gave them but a short-lived joy, which was soon after turned into the deepest mourning. The beauty of the temple, and the splendid order and decency of its worship, did unhappily raise in the king a curiosity of seeing the inside; and Simon II. who then officiated as high-priest, failed not to represent to him the sacredness of the place; the entrance of which was by their law forbid not only to strangers, but even to the Jews themselves, who were not of the sacerdotal order; he even ventured to denounce some heavy punishment from God, in case he presumed to profane his temple, whilst the priests were humbly surrounding him to obstruct his passage, and the people, in the utmost consternation, sending up their cries to heaven to avert his design. All this opposition made that absolute monarch more resolute, and having forced his way through the outward courts, he was going on to enter into the holy place itself, when God smote him with such a dread and terror of mind, as put a full stop to his further progress. He was carried out half dead by his attendants, and as soon as he was come to himself, instead of adoring the powerful hand that had smitten him, he breathed out the most dreadful threats, not only against those who had dared to oppose his will, but against the whole nation. Soon after which he departed from Jerusalem, full of the deepest resentment, the sad effects of which he was not long before he made them feel, by one of the dreadfullest persecutions that that unhappy nation had ever suffered, but which was happily stopped by the singular interposition of providence. We have given an account of this wonderful change in a former volume †; and all that we shall add here is, that as their constancy to their religion had obtained this miraculous deliverance, it drew as heavy a punishment on those who through fear had apostatised from it. Ptolemy, now more than ever convinced that the Jews were protected by a divine power, and that men, who could be thus faithful to their God, could never turn rebels to their prince prince (P); among other marks of his favour and high esteem, did at their earnest request grant them full power to inflict what punishment they thought fit on those few apostates, who were soon put to death, to the number of three hundred, as a warning to future ages. The Jews thus happily delivered, erected a stately pillar, and instituted a festival in memory of it, which was observed during several centuries after. This remarkable history, however, has been omitted by Josephus; he says nothing of it in his antiquities, and as for what we find of it in his book against Apion, besides that it is only in the Latin version of Rufinus, and not in the original, it is there said to have happened under Ptolemy Physcon, so that the book, out of which this persecution and deliverance is taken, seems to have been unknown to the Jewish historian. We shall refer the reader to the margin for a further account of the book and its authority (Q).

Philopator profanes the temple.

Punished.

† vol. ix. p. 216, 217, & seq.

Ptolemy

(P) They gave that prince soon after a noble instance of this, when he was forced to make war against his rebellious Egyptians, in which the Jews proved so faithful to him, that sixty thousand of them lost their lives in one battle (44).

(Q) It is improperly called the third book of the Maccabees, for it is prior to the other two in point of time, and to the 2d book in point of authority. As for the word Maccabee, of which we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel, it was used by the Jews to signify those brave heroes, who either stood up in defence of, or suffered for, their religion; and therefore that name is given to this book, as it contains the history of that persecution which the Jews suffered at Alexandria, and were like to have suffered in all the dominions of Philopater. Who the author of it was, is not there said; but he is supposed to have been an Alexandrian Jew, who has embellished his history, after the manner of his nation, with some enlargements, and couched them in a romantic style, not very likely to raise the credit of it, though the main purport of the story be nevertheless acknowledged to be true; for the Jews have undergone many such persecutions, and have been sometimes as wonderfully delivered.

The time in which this book was written, is thought to be after the other two of the Maccabees and that of the son of Sirac, called Ecclesiasticus (45). What is related in the beginning, concerning Theodotus and Arsinoe, seems taken out of Polybius, and therefore is supposed to have been written after this last (46); and yet both authors might have it from more ancient records, so that no sure inference can be made about it.

It

(44) Ensеb. Chron, Vid. Usher. in anno 3789. (45) Crot, Colin & al. (46) Prid. connect. sub an. 216.

Ptolemy Philopator died some time after, and left the kingdom to his son, surnamed Epiphanes; who, being then but between four and five years old, gave a handle to his two competitors, Antiochus the Great and Philip of Macedon, to join their forces to divest the young monarch of his whole kingdom (R); the former was to invade the provinces of Palestine and Phœnicia, and the latter Egypt, and each was to keep all he conquered. On this occasion the Jews wonted loyalty failed them, so that they took part with Antiochus, who made a quick progress in that province, but was again as quickly deprived of it, by Scopas the Egyptian general, who reduced the Jews to their former obedience. This advantage, however, proved but short-lived, and the Syrian king soon recovered it all from him, and in this second expedition the Jews did do him such signal services, that he resolved to spare no favour Ptolemy Epiphanes. Year of the flood 2795. Before Christ 204.

It was written originally in Greek, and is quoted by some ancient fathers (47) as canonical, but disputed by others, and was once received in the same apostolic canon with the other two; but the vulgate version has never admitted it, though the greatest part of the septuagint copies now extant have it, particularly our Alexandrian one; but this last not being in use in the western church at the time of the reformation, but the Latin only, that is the reason, why our English bibles have it not, though it may much better deserve a place in it, than some other apocryphal pieces that are in it.

There is still another book of the same name, commonly known by the name of the fourth book of the Maccabees. We have often quoted it in the sequel of this chapter, though the author sometimes clashes with Josephus and other historians. Archbishop Usher quotes likewise sometimes an Arabic version of it, which has been printed in Mr. Le Jay's polyglot; the book itself is very much unknown to the Latin fathers, and the Greek ones, by whom it is mentioned, differed much about its author. The reader may see all that is worth knowing concerning it in Calmet's preface to it, and we shall here own once for all, that it is to him we owe all the following quotations out of that book.

(R) The second year of this young monarch's reign being according to the Jewish chronology the three thousand five hundred and sixtieth year of the world, those authors tell us, that Joshua the son of Berachiah was chosen Nassi or president, and Nathan the Arbelite, Ab-beth-din, or vice-president, of the sanhedrin and of the divinity School at Jerusalem. They add, that when Alexander, favour to fix them to his intereſt; for when Scopas had only the citadel of Jeruſalem left, into which he had thrown a ſtrong gariſon, they received the Syrian troops and elephants into that city, and aſſiſted them with all their power, to drive the Egyptians out of it, which was ſoon accompliſhed by their united ſtrength (S).

(47) Euseb. Chronic. Theodoret. in Dan xi. 7. Athanas, synops. Nicephor. & al.

ANTIOCHUS therefore, willing to gratify the Jewiſh nation for thei: ſo freely engaging in his intereſt againſt the Egyptians, Alexander, the Aſmonean king of Judæa, put the Jewiſh doctors to death, for having dared to rebuke him for taking upon him the high-prieſthood, as well as the regal dignity, Joſhua fled into Egypt, and that Jeſus of Nazareth followed him thither, and became his diſciple (48).

One may ſee by this what wretched chronologers the Jews are, ſince that Jewiſh year of the world was many years before that Aſmonean king, and above two hundred years before the birth Chriſt (49).

(S) Our author doth not tell us the reaſon of this defection; but it is likely, that Epiphanes's minority had encouraged his governors in thoſe provinces to load them with heavy taxes and ſuch-like oppreſſions, eſpecially Scopas, who was of ſuch a rapacious temper, that he ſtuck at no rapine or cruelty to inrich himſelf.

On the other hand, Antiochus had ſhewed himſelf a great friend to the Jews that were in the provinces of Babylon and Meſopotamia, and had granted them ſuch great privileges, as might eaſily induce thoſe of Judæa to prefer his government to that of the Egyptians, by which they were now ſo much oppreſſed. Joſephus tells us further, that the Babyloniſh Jews had ſhewed ſuch an attachment to that prince, and done him ſuch ſignal ſervices, that he confided the guard of his ſtrongeſt and moſt conſiderable gariſons to them, and ſent them into ſeveral provinces to quell his other ſeditious ſubjects. All which, being ſo many arguments of the great truſt he put in them, could not but be highly pleaſing to thoſe of Paleſtine.

But, whatever was the cauſe of this change, the ſame author tells us, that Antiochus no ſooner came with his army, than they chearfully ſurrendered themſelves to him; and that, on his appearing before Jeruſalem, the prieſts and elders went out in a ſolemn manner to meet him, and make their ſubmiſſion to him; they then received him into their city, and entertained both him and his army, his horſes and elephants, and furniſhed him with arms and other neceſſaries for the war (50).

(48) Abr. Zacut in Juchaſin, David Gann. in Memakh. Dav. Shalſhel Kabbal. (49) Vid. Prideaux, Connect. Scalig. de emend. temp. Uſſer. &c. (50) Joſeph. Ant. Jud. xii. c. 3.

jans, ſent a letter to Ptolemy, his then general, which has been preſerved at length by Joſephus [l], and in which, having related the great ſervices which that people had done him, he acquaints him, that he deſigned to reſtore their metropolis to its ancient ſplendor, liberty, and privileges, and to recall all thoſe Jews who had been driven out of it: that, out of his ſingular reſpect to the temple of their God, he granted unto them twenty thouſand pieces of ſilver, towards the charges of victims, frankincenſe, wine, and oil; one thouſand four hundred meaſures of fine wheat, and three hundred ſeventy-five meaſures of ſalt, towards their uſual oblations: that the temple ſhould be thoroughly repaired at his own coſt: that they ſhould enjoy the free exercíſe of their religion, reſtore the public ſervice of the temple, and the prieſts, levites, ſingers, &c. to their uſual functions: that no ſtranger, or Jew that was unpurified, ſhould enter within the ſept (T) of that ſacred place; and that no fleſh of unclean beaſts ſhould be brought into Jeruſalem, not even their skins; all theſe under the penalty of paying three thouſand pieces of ſilver into the treaſury of the temple. He further granted an exemption from all taxes for three years to all the diſperſed Jews that ſhould come within a limited time to repeople that metropolis: and that all that had been ſold for ſlaves, within his dominion, ſhould be immediately ſet free. By all theſe extraordinary favours, Antiochus did ſo faſten the Jews in his intereſt, that not only Judæa, but all the other neighbouring provinces, readily ſubmitted to him, and that monarch, having in the ſpace of one campaign ſubdued and quieted them, returned to his capital, and paſſed the winter there.

Onias III. Year of the flood 2804. Before Chriſt 195.

ABOUT three years after this died the high-prieſt Simon II. and was ſucceeded by his ſon Onias III. a perſon of great piety, clemency [m], and worthy to have lived in better times, than thoſe of his pontificate proved, and of a better end than he met with, as the ſequel will ſhew. This is the pontiff, to whom our learned Uſher ſuppoſes Aræus king of Lacedæmon ſent a letter, of which an account has been given in a former volume *; but we have there ſhewn the impoſſibility of his being the perſon, and that it could be no other than O-

[l] Iid. ibid. & ſeq. & Chron. Alexand.

[m] Antiq. l. xii. c. 4 & 5. Euſeb. Chron.

* vol. vi. In the hiſtory of the Lacedæmonians, note (S).

(T) This incloſure, which the Hebrews called Chel, was that which ſeparated the circumciſed from the uncircumciſed, within which therefore it was unlawful for the latter to enter (51).

(51) Vide int. al. Lightfoot's proſpect of the temple, c. 17.

nias the first of that name. In the eighth year of Onias III. the Jews lost their great friend and protector Antiochus, who was murdered by the people of Elymais, as has been related in a former volume †. They found as kind a one in his son Seleucus for some time. The Jews were then in such high esteem, that sovereign princes courted their friendship, and made magnificent presents to the temple; and Seleucus furnished out of his own treasury all the expences of it. Judæa enjoyed a profound peace, and their laws were observed with great strictness under their worthy high-priest [n], until a misunderstanding, which happened between him and Simon a Benjamite, brought a series of evils on the Jewish state.

Onias had then enjoyed the sacerdotal dignity about sixteen years; and Simon had been made governor of the temple [o]. Perhaps that place was devolved to him from Joseph, the generous son of Tobias lately mentioned, whose son he is supposed to have been; when an uproar, happening in the city, caused this fatal breach betwixt those two great persons in the eleventh year of Seleucus. The author doth not tell us upon what account this tumult was raised. We shall give the best conjecture we can about it in the margin (V), it being a sequel of the history of Joseph and his son Hyrcan, and in † vol. ix. p. 7, p. 55, d.

[n] 2 Maccab. iii. 1, & seq.
[o] Ibid. ver. 4, & seq.

(V) We have lately taken notice of Joseph's progeny, and, among others of his worthy son Hyrcan. The father being before this time, grown so old, that he could not go down to congratulate the Egyptian king in person on the birth of his son, offered that office to all his other seven sons; none of whom being willing to accept it, Hyrcan undertook the journey, having first obtained a letter of credit, from his father on his Alexandrian agent, for what sums he should want to defray the charges of his commission.

It being then the usual custom to make those monarchs some considerable presents upon such occasions, Hyrcan having drawn one thousand talents from his father's banker, bought one hundred beautiful youths for the king, and the same number of the fairest damsels for the queen, which were presented to them, with the addition of a talent which each of them brought in their hands; so that this single article amounted to four hundred talents. The rest he either bestowed in presents to the great ones of the court, or spent it in making a suitable figure during his abode there; so that the whole expence of this expedition amounted to two hundred thousand pounds sterling; whereas his father supposed that in no caſe foreign to that of the Jews we are upon. This conteſt, whatever it was, grew to ſuch a height, that Simon, finding he could not get the better of the ſtrenuous pontiff, went away to Apollonius the ſon of Thraſeas, who was then governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, the only two provinces the Romans had left untaken from Seleucus [P], and acquainted him, that there were immenſe treaſures laid up in the temple of Jeruſalem, which might, at his pleaſure, be ſeized upon for the king's uſe. The governor ſent to inform Seleucus the one hundreth part of that ſum would have defrayed the whole expence.

Simon's treachery.

[P] Liv. l. xxxv., & ſeq. Appian. in Syriac. & al. 2. Maccab. iii. per tot.

If Hyrcan therefore, by this uncommon munificence, ſecured to himſelf the favour of the Egyptian court, it did no leſs expoſe him to the anger and reſentment of his old father and brethren; inſomuch, that the latter way-laid him in his return, with a deſign to murder him; but Hyrcan, who had obtained the reverſion of his father's farms, had provided himſelf with ſuch a ſtrong eſcort, that two of his brethren were killed on the ſpot, and the reſt put to flight.

This increaſed ſtill their enmity, eſpecially when, after his father's death, he went to levy the yearly tribute in his ſtead; and this raiſed him ſo many enemies, that he was forced to retire over Jordan, where he built himſelf a ſtrong and ſtately palace, which he called Tyre, whence he continued to make inroads and depredations on the neighbouring Arabs (52)

During this time it is probable he had regained the high-prieſt's favour, by ſending into the treaſury of the temple two hundred talents of gold and four hundred talents of ſilver (53), which Simon, the ſuppoſed eldeſt ſon of Joſeph, ſeems to have challenged as his own, during Hyrcan's abode on the other ſide of Jordan; but the ſtrenuous Onias refuſing to deliver it up, becauſe conſecrated to the maintenance of widows and orphans (as he himſelf confeſſed to Apollonius) this refuſal might, in all probability, ſo exaſperate the angry Benjamite, that he choſe to have the whole treaſure of that ſacred place betrayed to that governor, rather than Hyrcan or Onias ſhould reap the benefit of what the former had intruſted with the latter.

As for Hyrcan, he found himſelf ſoon after in ſuch danger of being called to a ſevere account for his depredations, by Antiochus Epiphanes, who had ſucceeded Seleucus Philopator, that, to avoid the worſt, he ran himſelf upon his own ſword (54).

(52) Joſeph. antiq. l. iv.
(53) Vide 2 Maccab. iii. 11.
(54) Joſeph. ubi ſupra, c. 5.

Seleucus (W) of it, who diſpatched immediately Heliodorus to fetch it away to Antioch.

HELIODORUS, the better to conceal the purport of his commiſſion, pretended that he was ordered to go and view all the cities of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and only to take Jeruſalem in his way; but when he came thither, where he was received by the Jews with ſingular honours, he acquainted Onias with the orders he had received from the king, and made a more particular inquiry after thoſe treaſures. The high-prieſt told him, that there was indeed ſuch a treaſure in the temple, tho' nothing ſo large as he had been informed; that

(W) It is plain from this whole ſtory, which is taken from the ſecond book of the Maccabees (55), and confirmed by Joſephus (56), that Seleucus had enjoyed Paleſtine, Cœle-Syria, and Phœnicia, ſome time before his death; and how his father got theſe provinces from the king of Egypt, we have already ſeen; but how they reverted to that monarch, after they had been reſtored to Ptolemy upon his marriage with Cleopatra, we can no-where find.

It is true, Polybius ſeems to intimate, that this reſtitution was never made to Ptolemy (57); but that both Antiochus and his ſon ſtill kept thoſe provinces in their hands after the marriage; and elſe-where he introduces Antiochus Epiphanes denying that his grandfather had ever promiſed to ſurrender them to Ptolemy the king of Egypt (58). Hence ſome have concluded, that they had never returned to the latter, but had been conſtantly kept by the three former.

But all this ſeems clearly contradicted by what Joſephus affirms of Hyrcan's being ſent to Egypt to congratulate Ptolemy on the birth of a ſon by his queen Cleopatra. Shall we then ſay, that Joſeph ſent this compliment to him, not as to his king, but as to his quondam benefactor? But our Jewiſh hiſtorian adds, that all the nobility of Cœle-Syria flocked thither on the ſame errand; which plainly intimates, that he was in poſſeſſion of thoſe provinces.

We muſt therefore ſuppoſe, either that theſe compliments were paid to Ptolemy by the Jews and Cœle-Syrians, as to the ſon-in-law of Antiochus, to whom thoſe provinces were ſhortly to devolve in virtue of the marriage; or elſe, that if they had been really ſurrendered to him, Seleucus took afterwards the advantage of his ſon Philopator's minority to diveſt him of them; ſince it is plain by the hiſtory of Simon's applying to Apollonius, of Seleucus ſending Heliodorus, and of Onias applying himſelf, not to Ptolemy, but to Seleucus, for redreſs, that this laſt had poſſeſſed them ſome time before his death.

(55) Cap. iii. & iv. (56) Lib. de Maccab. c. iv. (57) Legat. 72. (58) Idem. 80.

that besides those things that had been consecrated to God, the rest had been deposited there by, or for, the widows and orphans for their security, whose property therefore they were; that a considerable sum had been likewise laid up there by Hyrcan the son of Joseph, a man of great dignity; and that he, being the guardian of this wealth, could never give his consent that it should be alienated from the right owners, to the disgrace of his dignity and of that sacred place, which was reverenced by all the world: but all this not being sufficient to outweigh the positive orders which Heliodorus had received from the king, he marched directly towards the temple. The high-priest and the rest of the ministers of the place did in vain endeavour to obstruct his passage. Whilst the whole city was in the utmost confusion, the gates of the place were ordered to be broken down, and the Syrians were just going to enter, when God smote them with such a panic dread, that they fell down half-dead. Heliodorus among the rest, who saw a vision of a man on horseback sumptuously dressed, who flew upon him with the utmost speed and fury, and crushed him under his horse's feet, was forthwith carried out almost dead by his men, and continued some days in that condition. At length Onias, fearing lest this wonderful accident should bring the Jews under the suspicion of having made some unlawful attempt against the Syrian minister, went to the temple, and offered some sacrifices for his recovery; which being obtained, he immediately left Jerusalem, and went to acquaint the king with what had happened to him. Seleucus, however, whether he suspected the truth of his relation, or was resolved at any price to get the Jewish treasure, asked him further, whether he knew any man that was fit to be sent upon that expedition? Heliodorus answered, that if the king had any enemy that he would be glad to get rid of, he need but send him to rifle that sacred place, and he would see him come back in such a condition, as would convince him, that it was under the protection of some divine and irresistible power [q].

Heliodorus endeavours to force the temple.

Is punished by God.

When Simon found that he had missed his aim, he endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the good high-priest, pretending that he was the person who had called Heliodorus to Jerusalem; and drew such a party against him, that several persons were killed on both sides. At length Onias, fearing the consequences of such an intestine faction, especially seeing his rival in high favour with Apollonius the then governor, went to complain to the king at Antioch. He was well received, and Simon was thereupon baniſhed[r]; but Seleucus, dying ſoon after, was ſucceeded by his ſon Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, whoſe brutiſh character we have ſeen in a former chapter*, and who ſoon made his ſubjects repent of the joy they had expreſſed at his firſt coming to the crown. The Jews, of all others, were not long before they felt the dreadful effects of his fury, more through the ambition of ſome, and the factions and feuds which reigned then in that unhappy ſtate, than the cruel temper of this new monarch.

[q] Ibid ver. 37, & seq.

Jaſon ſuppls its han brother Onias.

He was ſcarce ſettled on his throne before Jaſon (X), the brother of Onias the then high-prieſt, taking advantage of the king's penury, his treaſury having been quite exhauſted by the large tribute his predeceſſors had paid to the Romans; went to Antioch, and procured from him the high-prieſthood at the price of three hundred and fifty talents, and obtained an order that his brother ſhould be ſent to, and confined to dwell at, that metropolis. Without this laſt, there would indeed have been little likelihood of his enjoying his ill-gotten dignity with any ſatisfaction, ſince the very preſence of the depoſed pontiff, ſo highly admired for his ſingular piety, muſt of courſe have revived the reſentment and hatred of the people againſt him, and have proved a conſtant check to his authority[s]. Jaſon finding how welcome this money was to the young monarch, and being deſirous to leſſen, as much as poſſible, the antipathy which other nations had againſt that of the Jews, offered him another ſum of one hundred and fifty talents for the liberty of erecting at Jeruſalem a gymnaſium or place of public exerciſes, ſuch as were practiſed in Greece; an academy for training up the youth after the Grecian manner; and for the liberty of making ſuch Jews, as he thought fit, free of the city of Antioch; all which was readily granted to him. He then ſet our for Jeruſalem, and with theſe powers formed ſo ſtrong a party in Judæa, as he thought would eaſily overbear that of his rival Onias, which was ſtill very ſtrong, eſpecially in Jeruſalem.

Among

[r] Euſeb. in Chronic. * vol. ix. p. 64, and following. [s] 2 Macab. iv. 7, & ſeq.

(X) This wretch was called Jeſus; but as he was going to purchaſe the favour of the king and court, at the expence of every thing that ought to have been valuable to an honeſt Jew, he began with changing his name into that of Jaſon, which he thought more conformable and pleaſing to the Greeks, whoſe cuſtoms he was then going to introduce into his nation.

Among those that joined themselves to this intruder, were the malecontent sons of Joseph lately mentioned, and a number of others, who, through a wanton inconstancy, were become excessively fond of the Grecian customs, and as weary of their own[t]. The freedom of the city of Antioch, a very valuable privilege, was another bait, which drew still greater numbers over to him. From this time a general apostacy from the Jewish religion overspread the greatest part of the nation; the academies were erected by the usurping high-priest both for their youth and for men grown; and as some of these exercises were to be performed naked, these vile apostates found means to efface the scar of circumcision, to prevent their being distinguished from other nations. The priests, as well as the people, from thenceforward neglected the service of the temple, to assist at these new heathenish exercises; and the laws, which the Jewish nation had obtained for the free exercise of their religion and rights, became of none effect, through the baseness of one single renegado, who sacrificed his religion and country to his ungovernable ambition.

As he stuck at nothing that could ingratiate himself to Antiochus, he sent the next year a number of his partizans, on on whom he had bestowed the freedom of Antioch, to assist at the olympic games, with a considerable sum to (Y) be spent in sacrifices to the Tyrian Hercules, in whose honour those games were celebrated*; but these men, whether out of conscience or fear, chose rather to make a present of it to the Tyrians towards the repairing of the fleet. Antiochus, by this time understanding that the young king of Egypt, now of age, designed to attempt the recovery of Palestine, Phœnice, and Cœle-Syria, made a tour into these provinces, and took Jerusalem in his way, where Jason received him with a magnificence suitable to the value he put upon that monarch's favour and friendship. He

[t] Vide 1 Maccab. i. 12, & seq. · Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 6.
* De his vide supra, vol. v. p. 434. vol. vi. 68.

(Y) This sum, the common Greek copies say, was only three hundred drachms; but as the learned Usher observes (59), this was too inconsiderable a sum upon such an occasion, it amounting to but a little above eleven pounds sterling; and therefore prefers the Arundelian manuscript, which calls it three thousand three hundred, which was a more likely present, considering the person who sent it, who was a man wholly devoted to that monarch's pleasure.

(59) Sub. A. M. 3830.

He did not, however, enjoy his ill-gotten dignity long, before he was thrust out of it by his own brother Menelaus (Z), whom he had sent to Antiochus with the usual tribute. Menelaus, instead of consulting the king about those matters which his brother had charged him with, took that opportunity to insinuate himself to him by the most flagrant flatteries; to which having added the sum of three hundred talents more than Jason had paid for the high-priesthood, he easily obtained it, and returned with his new commission to Jerusalem in the third year of Jason's pontificate. He soon got himself a strong party, at the head of which were the sons of Tobias, who were then very powerful in Judæa; but Jason was not without his powerful friends, who, detesting Menelaus's treachery, soon forced him to retire, with the heads of his faction, into Antioch. Hither, the better to gain their point against Jason, they went, and acquainted Antiochus, that they were fully resolved to forsake their old religion, and wholly to conform to that of his country; which so pleased that proud monarch, that he sent them back with a force sufficient to drive Jason out of Judæa into the land of the Ammonites. Being thus rid of his rival and seated in his new dignity, his next care was to perform his promise to the king, and to outdo his brother in his apostacy [u].

But whilst he was endeavouring, by all wicked means, to ingratiate himself to Antiochus and to his court, he neglected

[u] Maccab. ubi supra, & Joseph. ubi supra.

(Z) This apostate right name was Onias, which he changed for that of Menelaus, in imitation of his brother, and in complaisance to the Greeks. The book of the Maccabees (60) makes him the son of Tobias, and brother of Simon abovementioned; but if he had been of that family, he could not have entered into the sacerdotal office, without such a manifest violation of the Mosaic law, as would have set the whole Jewish nation against him; for tho' they proved but too complying to the Grecian customs lately introduced, yet they seem to have had an invincible attachment to the Aaronic family.

Josephus therefore is most generally followed, who expressly tells us (61), that he was the brother of the deposed Onias and of Jason; and that he did but requite the latter for having supplanted the former, in which case the high priesthood was still retained in the right line.

(60) 2 Maccab. iv. 23. (61) Antiq. l. xii. c. 6.

neglected one main article, the paying of the money he had promised to him, tho' Softratus, then governor of the citadel of Jerusalem and receiver of the king's customs in Palestine, was continually pressing him to it. At length Antiochus, suspecting some private intelligence between them, ordered them both to come to Antioch, Menelaus leaving his brother Lysimachus his vicegerent at Jerusalem. At their arrival at Antioch, they found that the king had been forced to go and quell a sedition in Cilicia †, and had left the government of Antioch to Andronicus, one of the prime nobles of his court. Menelaus having exhausted his coffers, and finding that nothing but the payment of the king's money could recover his favour, sent private instructions to his brother at Jerusalem, to convey to him as many of the golden vessels as he could conveniently strip the temple of; which having received soon after, and caused to be sold at Tyre and in the neighbouring cities, raised him a sufficient sum, not only to satisfy the king, but also to bribe his courtiers in his favour. All this, however, could not be transacted so secretly, but his brother Onias, who had been, ever since his deposition, confined to that capital, had intelligence of his sacrilege. He made such bitter complaints against Menelaus, as were like to have raised all the Antiochian Jews against him. He was therefore obliged to have recourse to Andronicus, whom he had already bribed by his presents; and for a fresh sum of money engaged him to cut off the good old high-priest, who, being by this time apprized of his intrigues, had taken sanctuary at Daphne, an asylum near the city of Antioch. Andronicus went to him, and, under some pretence or other, accompanied with the most solemn vows and protestations for his safety, had no sooner got him out of the place, than he put him to death [w], without regard to his oaths, the sacredness of the place, or the laws of hospitality (A).

Menelaus summoned to Antioch.

Onias murdered.

THIS

† See before. vol. ix p. 69.

[w] Vide sup. ibid. Joseph. ubi supra.

(A) This worthy person, whose character is excellently well drawn by the author of the second book of Maccabees (12), is supposed to have been murdered in the twenty-fourth year of his pontificate.

There is indeed some difference between Josephus, and Eusebius, and the Alexandrian chronicle, concerning the length of time

(12) 2 Macab. iii. 1, 2, 3.

THIS treacherous murder of a person so venerable for his age and exemplary piety, and so respected in that metropolis, both by Jews and Gentiles, drew the bittereſt complaints againſt the ſacrilegious aſſaſſin, as ſoon as the king was returned to Antioch; and that prince, bad as he was, could not forbear ſhedding of tears at the news of it. As ſoon therefore as he had taken full cognizance of the fact, he cauſed the murderer to be ſtripped of his purple, and to be conducted with infamy to the place where it had been committed, and there to be put to death. As for Menelaus, though the moſt guilty of the two, he found means to avoid the preſent ſtorm, and to maintain his credit ſome time longer; but this obliged him to draw ſuch large ſums from Jeruſalem, that Lyſimachus was forced to raiſe them by the moſt unheard-of violences and ſacrileges, which ended in an univerſal mutiny, in which the Jews fell upon him and the three thouſand men he had got to defend him, with ſuch deſperate fury, that they killed a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. Lyſimachus, no longer able to reſiſt, was purſued to the treaſury of the temple, and there maſſacred by the inraged multitude. Antiochus coming ſoon after to Tyre, the Jewiſh ſanhedrin reſolved to ſend a deputation to him, both to juſtify the putting to death Lyſimachus, and to accuſe Menelaus, as the author and cauſe of all the troubles that had happened both in Judæa and Antioch. The three deputies pleaded their cauſe ſo well before the king, that Menelaus, not knowing which way to clear himſelf and avoid the impending puniſhment, had recourſe to his old ſecret of bribery. He applied himſelf to a favourite of Antiochus, named Ptolemy Macron, the ſon of Dorymenes, and promiſed him ſo large a ſum, that that courtier, who knew the inconſtancy of that monarch's temper, eaſily prevailed upon him, not only to abſolve the apoſtate high-prieſt, but alſo to condemn the three Jewiſh deputies to death. This ſentence, unjuſt as it was, was forthwith put in execution, and thoſe venerable men were hurried to death, who, as the author of the Maccabees expreſſes it, would have gained their cauſe, had they pleaded it before even the Scythians; and indeed this time between his acceſſion to that dignity and his being murdered at Antioch; but as the laſt quoted author aſſigns expreſly twenty-four years to it, he has been preferred before the other two. The reader may ſee the reaſons for it in our learned Prideaux (13).

Andronicus put to death.

Year of the flood 2829. Before Chriſt 170.

(13) Connect. ſub. an. 171.

this piece of cruelty and injuſtice was ſo ſhocking to the Tyrians, that though they dared not openly exclaim againſt it, yet they ventured to ſhew their reſpect to thoſe deputies, by beſtowing an honourable burial upon them [x].

THIS unjuſt ſentence gave the traitor Menelaus ſuch a complete victory over all his oppoſers, that from thenceforth he gave himſelf up to all manner of tyranny and wickedneſs; Jeruſalem became deſtitute of protectors; the ſanhedrin, if there were any zealous men left among them, were ſo terrified by this laſt cruelty on their deputies, that they no longer dared to oppoſe him, though they ſaw that every ſtep he took was with deſign to enſlave the nation ſtill more, and to overturn the ſmall remains of their religion and liberties. Theſe were the ſad prognoſtics of thoſe evils which ſoon after overtook that rebellious nation, and in which God choſe to puniſh them for their apoſtacy, by means of that very monarch, whoſe favour they had bought at the expence of their religion and laws; and to convince them that theſe grievous calamities were the effects of his anger, they were pre-ſignified to them by the moſt terrifying apparitions in the air for the ſpace of forty days, during which there were ſeen multitudes of armed men, both foot and horſe, magnificently armed and apparelled, charging and fighting againſt each other in battle-array, whilſt their ears were dinned with the claſhing of ſwords, lances, and ſhields; all which dreadful omens threw the whole city into the deepeſt conſternation, whilſt they all looked upon them as the ſure forerunners of ſome ſad calamity, which they in vain endeavoured, when it was too late, to avert by their prayers from that unhappy land [y].

Signs ſeen in the air.

THIS fatal change was occaſioned by an accident, which ſeemed at firſt of no great conſequence, but proved in a little time the cauſe of all their miſeries. Antiochus was then taken up with the conqueſt of Egypt, when a falſe rumour was by ſome means ſpread, that he had been killed before Alexandria. Jaſon, who had been forced to retire into the land of Ammon after his depoſition, heard of it, and thought it was a fit opportunity to attempt the recovery of his dignity, and that his nation, tired with the Syrian government, and eſpecially with the tyranny of Menelaus, would readily receive him again with open arms. To this end he got him a band of about one thouſand reſolute men, at the head of whom he quickly appeared before the walls of Jeruſalem, which, by the Jaſon forces Jeruſalem.

[x] 2 Maccab. iv. 44, & ſeq. [y] Ibid. c. v. 2, & ſeq.

the help of a party which he had within that metropolis, he easily entered, and forced his brother to retire into the citadel; after which, minding nothing but his resentment, he committed the most horrid butcheries against such of the Jews as he suspected to have been of the contrary party. He was, however, soon after forced to leave both the city and country, at the news of Antiochus coming with a powerfull army against him (B); for that prince, highly provoked at this rebellion, and especially at the news, that the Jewish nation had made some rejoicings at the report of his death, was actually coming with a great army against Jerusalem. The Jews, apprised of his will towards them, seem to have made a stout resistance, and to have given him no small trouble in forcing his way into their metropolis (C); but the gates being at length forced open to him, perhaps by some of his friends from within, he spared no cruelty against its unhappy inhabitants, insomuch, that within three days they reckoned no less than forty thousand killed, and as many taken captives, and sold for slaves to the neighbouring nations [z].

Antiochus takes it by storm.

His cruelty.

ing

[z] Ibid. ver. 11 & 14. See before, vol. ix. p. 74.

(B) Our historian says, that he retired at first to the Ammonitish king, where becoming soon after suspected by that prince, he was forced to withdraw, and to wander from city to city, being detested by all that knew him, as a betrayer of his country, and a monster of mankind (14).

He came at length into Egypt, and finding no safety there, he hoped he might at least find it among the Lacedæmonians, in virtue of the pretended kindred between their nation and his own, but here he also missed of his aim, at least it seems as if he had not met with any favourable reception, since our author adds, that, at his death, his carcass was left to rot above ground, being denied even the common sepulchre that was allowed to other strangers (15).

(C) So says the book of the Maccabees (16), with whom agrees Diodorus Siculus (17), and even Josephus, in his wars of the Jews (18), where he expressly says, that he laid siege to that city, and represents him as inraged at the trouble it gave him; but in his antiquities he tells us, that he entered it without force; and that those of his party within did open the gates to him (19). The former is indeed the most probable, and Josephus might easily forget himself through the distance of the time in which he wrote those two books; and this may in some measure atone for such-like inconsistencies which are to be met with in him.

(14) 2 Maccab. v. 5, 6, & seq. (15) Ibid. ver. 10. (16) l. 2. c. v. 11. (17) cap. xxxiv. (18) l. i. c. 1. (19) l. 12. c 7.

His fury did not ſtop here; he cauſed the traitor Menelaus, who by this time had by ſome means recovered his good graces, to lead him to the temple, which he entered, even to its moſt ſacred receſſes (D), laying his impious hands on all the veſſels that were in it, and cauſed the golden altar of incenſe, the golden table of the ſhewbread, the golden candleſtick, the cenſers, bowls, and other utenſils belonging to that holy place to be ſeized, together with the golden ſhields, crowns, and other ornaments which had been dedicated to it. He cauſed alſo the gold plating that covered the gates and other architecture of the temple, the veil that divided the holy from the moſt holy place, and, in a word, all that was valuable, either for its metal or workmanſhip, to be carried off, beſides one thouſand eight hundred talents of gold and ſilver, which he forced out of the treaſury. Having thus glutted his revenge and avarice, he returned in ſuch a kind of triumph to Antioch, as if he had had it now in his power, to uſe our author's words, to make the land navigable, and the ſea paſſable on foot [a]. As a further mark of his ſpleen againſt that unhappy nation, he put it under the government of one Philip, a moſt barbarous Phrygian, and Profanes and plunder the temple.

Samaria

[a] Maccab. ibid. ver. 21.

(D) D. Siculus, in the place laſt quoted out of him, tells, upon ſome Heatheniſh report, that Antiochus been entered into the moſt ſacred part of the temple, where the high-prieſt alone was to be admitted, he there found the ſtatue of a man carved in ſtone, with a long beard, holding a book in his hand, and mounted upon an aſs; and ſuppoſing it to have been the ſtatue of Moſes, the Jewiſh law-giver and founder of Jeruſalem, he took it into his head to deſtroy the mutual hatred between the Jews and the reſt of the world, by deſtroying of their law.

To this end he cauſed a large ſow to be ſacrificed on the altar of burnt-offerings to that law-giver, ſprinkled the porch and the ſacred books with the blood of it, and cauſed the high-prieſt and others to eat of the fleſh, and put out the lamp which burnt night and day in the temple. All which Joſephus has ſufficiently confuted (20) from Polybius, N. Damaſcen, and other authors, better acquainted with the Jewiſh religion than this Sicilian Only he adds, that Antiochus, not contented with rifling the temple of all its riches, cauſed it to be polluted, by ſacrificing ſome ſwine upon its altar, and ſprinkling the broth of them upon the Jews (21); but this circumſtance, if true, has been omitted by the authors of the two books of the Maccabees.

(20) Cont. Apion. l. ii. (21) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16.

Samaria under that of Andronicus, a person of the same brutish disposition, and left the apostate Menelaus, the most hateful of all the three, in possession of the high-priesthood [b].

WHAT the Jewish nation suffered under those governors, or rather butchers, is more easily imagined than described; but their miseries were not to end there, Some time after Antiochus having received the mortifying letter from the Roman senate we have elsewhere taken notice of †, he chose them above all other people to wreck his resentment against, and with as much cruelty as if they had been the cause of his disgrace. To this end he dispatched from his army, as he was marching through Judæa, Apollonius, at the head of twenty-two thousand men, with orders to plunder all the cities of Judæa, to murder all the men, and to save only the women and children for sale, Apollonius came accordingly with his army (E), and, to outward appearance, with a peaceable intention, which was not suspected by the Jews, because he was superintendant of the tribute in Palestine. He kept himself quiet, till the next sabbath, when they were all in a profound quiet, when on a sudden he commanded his men to arms, some of whom he sent to cut all in pieces that were gone to the temple and to the other synagogues, whilst the rest, going through the streets of the city, massacred all that came in their way, which they did without the least resistance from those unhappy wretches, who suffered themselves to be butchered in that mercileſs manner, rather than break their sabbath by standing on their defence. He next ordered the city to be plundered, and then set it on fire, pulled down all their stately fabrics, caused the walls to be demolished, and carried away captive about ten thousand of those that had been saved from the slaughter [c]. From that time the service of the temple was quite abandoned, that place having been everywhere

[b] Ibid. ver. 24. † Vol. ix. p. 62. [c] 1 Maccab. i, 30, & seq. 2 Maccab. v. 24, & seq. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7.

(E) Josephus seems to have confounded this slaughter with that which was made by Antiochus two years before, by making him present at this also (22); but it appears from the author of the Maccabees, who rightly distinguishes these two prosecutions, that the one was executed in the presence of that monarch, and the other by his vicegerent Apollonius.

(22) l. xii. c. 7.

where polluted, both with the blood of the slain, and with many other defilements. From the ruins of the city the officers of Antiochus built a large fortress on an eminence in the city of David *, fortified it with a strong wall, stately towers, and placed a garison in it to command the temple, over-against which it was built; so that the soldiers could easily see and and sally upon all those that ventured to come to that sacred place, so many of whom were continually plundered and murdered by them, that the rest, not daring to stay longer in Jerusalem, went and dwelt in the neighbouring cities of the Gentiles. In this polluted and forsaken condition did this metropolis and its temple continue three full years and a half; that is, till Judas Maccabeus, having wrested both out of their hands, did purify and restore them to their ancient splendor and use, as we shall see in due time [d] (F).

THE

* See the draught. [d] Vide 1 Maccab. iv. pass. 2 Macab. x. Joseph. ubi supra, & præfat. in bell. Judaic. & histor. de bell. l. i. c. l. vi. c 11.

(F) In the time of this prosecution under Antiochus, is generally supposed to have lived Jesus the son of Syrac, author of the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus. Some place him indeed in the time of Onias II. (23); but, by some passages scattered here and there in his work, he seems rather to have lived about the time of Onias III. and at a time when his nation suffered some grievous persecution †. He praises the high-priest Simon II. as a person long since dead (24). His grandson did afterwards translate this book into Greek, under the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes (25), about the year 132. that is, about thirty-six years after this time we suppose him to have wrote it.

Who this author was, is neither agreed nor easily guessed. Some make him of the sacerdotal line, as descended from Joshua the son of Josedech (26). Some Greek copies give him for grandfather Eleasar the father of Syrac of Jerusalem; but we find nothing like this pretended priesthood or descent in those places of the book where he speaks more particularly of himself (27). Only it appears, that his great thirst after wisdom (28) made him pray fervently, study hard, travel much, and undergo (23) Vide Prid. Connect. sub ann. 132. † Vide Ecclus xxxv. 17, & seq. & xxvi. pass. (24) Ibid. l. 1, & seq. (25) See his preface at the head of the book, which is the second in our bibles. (26) Vide Genebr. in Chronic. & al. (27) Vide int. al. Eccluf. c. i. 29. l. 27, & seq. li. pass. & alib. (28) Ibid. xxxiv. 10, & seq. li. pass.

Jews perſecuted every where.

THE Jews of Paleſtine were not the only ones who felt the fury of this perſecution. Antiochus, reſolved either totally to aboliſh their religion, or to deſtroy their whole race, as far at leaſt as he could reach them, cauſed a decree to be iſſued out the following year, that all nations within his dominions ſhould forſake their old religion and gods, and worſhip thoſe of the king, under the ſevereſt penalties. To make his orders more effectual, he ſent overſeers into every province to ſee them ſtrictly put in execution; and as the Jews were the only people who he knew would diſobey them, ſo eſpecially directions were given to have them treated with the utmoſt ſeverity. Many therefore of them, either to avoid the effects of his rage, or to ingratiate themſelves to him, did not only comply with great readineſs, but, having once apoſtatiſed, became the biterеſt enemies of thoſe who had the courage to refuſe; all which did but increaſe the already too general defection, as it did on the other hand the ſufferings of thoſe who ſtood firm to their religion [e]. As for the Samaritans many great dangers for it (29); that he had been unjuſtly traduced to the king (30); whence he is ſuppoſed to have retired into Egypt, and there compoſed his book. Laſtly he tells us, that he was the laſt writer of the Jewiſh nation who treated of moral ſubjects (31). This is all that we know of the author.

[e] Joſeph. ubi ſupra. 1 Maccab. vi. 21, & ſeq.

As to the work, which was anciently called Παναρετος, that is, according to the Greek energy, the ſtore or treaſure of all virtues, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it, when we come to the time of its being tranſlated into Greek. Some ancients, particularly St. Auſtin, (32), thought once the ſame perſon the author of the book of Wiſdom, as well as of this of Eccleſiaſticus, but he owns his miſtake in another place. And as to the latter of theſe, it is not known who wrote it, only it is generally believed, that it was never wrote originally in Hebrew, becauſe there are none of thoſe Hebraiſms in it, which are every where found in other verſions out of that language; and there are in it many Greek ones, which convince one, that it was originally written in that language This might be ſufficient to confute thoſe who pretend it to have been originally written in Hebrew, and by king Solomon (33); but, beſides this, we may urge againſt them the unlikeneſs of ſtyle with his other writings; its never being mentioned by Jewiſh authors; its being rejected out of their canon, and many more too obvious to be mentioned.

(29) xxxiv. 12. li. paſſ. (30) Ibid. & ſeq. (31) xxxiii, ib. & ſeq. (32) De doctrin. Chriſt. l. ii. (33) Sext. Sen. Bibl. l. viii. Salmer. chr. a Caſtro, & al.

ritans, a much leſs danger would have cooled all their zeal, either from the Jewiſh nation, or the Moſaic law. To convince the king therefore, that they did not deſign to die martyrs to either, they ſent a deputation to him, ſetting forth, that tho' they had hitherto conformed in many of the Jewiſh ſuperſtitions, in imitation of their fore-fathers, who had been perſuaded to it for their own ſafety, yet they were now ready to forſake them all, and to embrace the king's religion. They added, that they had a temple on mount Garizzim, which was dedicated to a God without a name (G); but begged it might thenceforth be dedicated to the Grecian Jupiter, as Joſephus has it, or rather, as the author of the Maccabees calls him [f], the hoſpitaller, or, the receiver or protector of ſtrangers, intimating thereby, that they were not originally natives of that country, but ſtrangers ſettled there in times paſt. They concluded with a petition, that as they were not of Jewiſh, but Sidonian, race, and were ready to conform in every thing to the king's will, they might not be involved in the ſame calamities with their wicked rivals. Antiochus readily granted them their requeſt, and diſpatched a letter to Nicanor his ſub-governor there, with orders, that they ſhould be diſtinguiſhed from the Jews, and that their temple ſhould be dedicated according to their petition; all which was punctually obſerved. Samaritans policy.

WHILST the Samaritans peacefully enjoyed the fruits of their treacherous complaiſance, Atheneas, an old miniſter, well verſed in all the heatheniſh rites, as well as in cruelty, made thoſe of Judæa undergo the moſt ſevere puniſhments for their ſtedfaſtneſs to their religion. He began with dedicateing the temple to Jupiter Olympius, and cauſing his ſtatute A cruel perſecution in Judæa.

[f] 2 Maccab. vi 1, 2. Vide & Joſeph. antiq. l. xii. c. 7.

(G) We have, in a former volume (†), acquainted our readers, that the Jews, after their return from the Babyloniſh captivity, had left off pronouncing the name Jehovah, and ſubſtituted that of Adonai to it, where-ever it occurred in their reading of the ſacred books. As therefore the temple was ſimply called the houſe or temple of God, and oftner emphatically the houſe or temple, without adding any proper name, the Samaritans made this a pretence for calling theirs the temple, of a nameleſs deity, as the ſuperſtitious Jews called that name of God, Ἀνεκφώνητον, unutterable or unlawfull to be uttered.

(†) vol. ii. p. 536. T.

to be erected on the altar of burnt-offerings (H), with another leſſer altar before it, whereon they ſacrificed to that falſe deity. All

(H) This idol was ſet up in the temple on the fifteenth of the month Ciſleu, which anſwers to part of our November and December; but they did not begin to offer ſacrifices to it till the twenty-fifth of that month, which was the king's birth-day; ſo that from thenceforth they continued ſacrificing to it every twenty-fifth day of the month, till the Jewiſh religion and ſtate were reſtored by Judas Maccabeus.

The profanation of the temple, and the ſetting up of this idol in it, had been long before foretold by the prophet Daniel (34), under the name of abomination of deſolation; but there are in that chapter many other ſtrokes, which do plainly delineate this perſecution, and the tyrant that cauſed it. We ſhall content ourſelves with ſubjoining ſome of the plaineſt of them.

This expedition begins at the 29th verſe of that chapter thus; He ſhall return at the time appointed, and come towards the ſouth (Egypt); but it ſhall not be as the former or as the latter, for the ſhips of Chittim (the Romans) ſhall come againſt him; therefore he ſhall be grieved, and return with indignation (or turn his indignation) againſt the holy covenant (the Jewiſh religion). Thus ſhall he do, he ſhall get intelligence of thoſe that forſake the covenant. Arms ſhall ſtand on his ſide, and he ſhall pollute the ſanctuary of ſtrength, and ſhall take away the daily ſacrifice, and they ſhall place the abomination (or abominable thing) that maketh deſolate; and ſuch as do wickedly againſt the covenant, ſhall be corrupt by flatteries. But the people that know their God ſhall behave valiantly, and ſuch as have underſtanding, and inſtruct the people, (divert them from apoſtatiſing) ſhall fall by the ſword, by flame, by captivity, by ſpoil.——And the king ſhall do acording to his will, and ſhall exalt and magnify himſelf above every god. He ſhall ſpeak wonderfull things againſt the God of gods, and ſhall proſper till the indignation be accomplished; for that which is determined ſhall be done, &c. The ſame prophet points him out there by his ſcattering the prey, ſpoil, and riches among his followers; and it is well known, that his extravagant largeſſes had not only emptied his coffers, but gained him the title of magnanimous and munificent.

The reader may remember, that whilſt Antiochus was preparing himſelf for the conqueſt of Egypt, the Romans ſent their deputies to him, who obliged him to ſet aſide that enterprize; for which he vented his reſentment on the innocent Jews in the manner we have related, and exactly as it had been foretold in the prophecy before us; ſo that it is impoſſible not to know that he was the perſon deſigned by providence to be the ſcourge of his people.

(34) cap. xi. 31.

All thoſe therefore that refuſed to come and worſhip it, were either maſſacred out of hand, or put to ſome more lingering torments. till they either complied, or died under the hand of their butchers. At the ſame time there were altars, groves, and ſtatues ſet up in every city and town of Judæa, to which the inhabitants were compelled to come and ſacrifice, under the ſame ſevere penalties; inſomuch, that the whole land was but a ſcene, either of the moſt abominable idolatries and debaucheries, or of the moſt horried butcheries; and when the feaſt of Bacchus was come, they were either forced to aſſiſt as it, and to go about the ſtreets with their heads crowned with ivy, in honour of that beaſtly deity, or expoſed themſelves to ſome cruel death. All this while it was made immediate death to be caught obſerving either the ſabbath, the rite of circumciſion, or any other branch of the Moſaic law; inſomuch, that two women having been found to have circumciſed the children of which they had been lately delivered, were both led, with the infants hung about their necks, through ſeveral ſtreets of Jeruſalem, and caſt headlong down from the higheſt walls of the city, and all that had aſſiſted at the ceremoney were put to death [g].

THESE unheard-of barbarities having obliged many of the Jews to leave their habitations, and to go and hide themſelves among the cragged rocks in holes and caverns, and live upon wild roots and herbs, to avoide either death or apoſtacy, ſome of them ventured to aſſemble themſelves in a cavern near Jeruſalem, to celebrate the ſabbath. But Philip, their barbarous Phrygian governor, having been informed of it, came againſt them with a ſufficient force; and after having, in vain, offered them a general amneſty if they would forſake their religion, and conform to that of the king, he waited, without any other hoſtilities, till the next ſabbath; on which day entering the cave without reſiſtance, he cauſed them all, men, women and children, to be maſſacred, to the number of a thouſand [h]. As to the ſacred Jewiſh books, Philip and his officers had taken care to burn and deſtroy all that they could lay hands on, whether in the temple, in their ſynagogues, or even in their private houſes; after which, if any Jew was found to conceal any of them, he was dragged to immediate death [i]. They had ſeveral other ways of trying thoſe who retained ſtill a due regard to the law of Moſes; and in order to [g] Maccab. & Joſeph. ubi ſupra. [h] 2 Maccab. vi. 10, & ſeq.

[i] 1 Maccab. i. 56, & ſeq.

to make as many as they could comply with the king's command, they ſpared neither flatteries nor careſſes to encourage, nor threats and tortures to deter, them; ſo that, though vaſt numbers were ſeduced by theſe means, yet there were ſtill a ſufficient number, eſpecially in and about Jeruſalem, who continued proof againſt them, to vex the tyrant for not being univerſally obeyed.

As ſoon, therefore, as he heard, that there were ſuch numbers who remained ſtill inflexible, he reſolved to come in perſon to Jeruſalem, and to ſee either his orders more punctually obeyed, or the recuſants puniſhed with the moſt exquiſite cruelties. One of the firſt that fell a victim to his fury was the venerable Eleazer, a man of ninety years of age, reſpected by all for his great learning, probity, and zeal for his religion, and whoſe example had preſerved a great number of Jews from falling into apoſtacy. Him they brought upon the butchering ſtage, and endeavoured to force him to eat ſwine's fleſh; and when they could not prevail upon him by any means to comply; they deſired him, that at leaſt he would, out of regard to his extreme old age, conſent to eat ſome other unforbidden fleſh, that they might make the king believe that he had obeyed. The good old man anſwered with a becoming courage, that the moſt dreadfull death was preferable to ſuch a baſe diſſimulation, ſo unworthy his old age and character, and ſo dangerous in its conſequence, ſince it might be a means of ſeducing many of his nation to follow his example. As ſoon as he had ended this ſpeech, which was interpreted as the effect of his pride rather than of his zeal, he was haled to execution; and when he was ready to expire under the ſtrokes of his butchers, he gave a great groan, and expired with theſe words in his mouth, O Lord, thou knoweſt what pains I ſuffer in my body, from which I might have freed my ſelf; but my ſoul feels a real joy, becauſe I ſuffer them for the ſake of thy law [k]. After him the ſeven brethren, whoſe martyrdom is related in the ſame book [l], ſuffered, one after another, the moſt exquiſite torments with invincible courage and conſtancy, whilſt their heroic mother, diveſted of all the weakneſs of her ſex, ſtood by encouraging and ſtrengthening them in the Hebrew tongue, with the aſſurance of a glorious recompence in the next life, for which ſhe was, laſt of all, ſacrificed to the tyrant's fury, and died with Eleazer martyred.

Seven brethren and their mother martyred.

[k] 2 Maccab. vi. 18, & ſeq. [l] cap. vii.

with the ſame chearfullneſs and intrepidity, which ſhe had inſpired into her ſeven ſons (I).

It was about this time that Mattathias, an eminent prieſt of the family of Joarib (K), began to ſignalize himſelf by

(I) Joſephus has likewiſe given us the hiſtory at large of thoſe heroic martyrs, in a book by itſelf, which was intitled, Of the empire of reaſon. It is now better known to us by that of the book of the Maccabees; but as neither he, nor the author of the ſecond book of that name, do expreſly mention the place where this dreadful ſcene was acted, Rufinus has taken it into his head, that it was done at Antioch (35), becauſe they ſhewed their tomb in that city in St. Jerom's time, and had there built and dedicated a church to them (36). But as Joſephus ſeems to believe that it was done at Jeruſalem (37), and is followed by many learned men, and Rufinus gives no better reaſon than that of his tradition, we ſee no reaſon for following him, as ſome others have done (38); it being more likely that Jeruſalem ſhould be the place, where above all others, the Jews ſhewed the greateſt firmneſs for their religion, and conſequently where ſuch ſevere examples were thought moſt neceſſary by that exaſperated prince.

Joſephus, in the book above-quoted, gives us the names of thoſe ſeven brothers, and of their mother, whom he calls Solomona; but the Jews call her Hannah.. He adds, that ſhe flung herſelf into a large fire which was there kindled to prevent the executioners laying their profane hands on her. The Latin verſion ſays, that ſhe was dragged on the ground to execution, where having cut of her breaſts, and ſcourged her naked body, they flung her into a boiling chaldron. Rufinus is of the ſame opinion (39).

The Arabic verſion and Joſephus Ben-Gorion, on the contrary, ſay, that having lived to ſee her ſeven ſons martyred, and lying dead on the ground before her, ſhe flung herſelf in the midſt of them, and prayed to God to take her out of this world; and that ſhe immediately fell upon them, and expired. An ancient poet makes her die of exceſs of joy, in theſe words: Solverunt gaudia matrem (40).

(K) We have already ſpoken of this family, which was the firſt of the twenty-four claſſes appointed by David to officiate at the temple (41), and was one of the four that returned from the captivity. Mattathias was the ſon of John, the ſon of Simon, his brave zeal for his religion. He had been some time before forced to retire to Modin his native place, to shun the sight of those scenes of cruelty and profaneness, which were acted at Jerusalem by Apollonius and the apostate Jews. During his recess there, Apelles, one of the king's officers, came to oblige the inhabitants of the place to execute his commands [m]. Having got the people together, with Mattathias and his five sons (L), he addressed himself to him on account of his dignity and the great esteem he was in, hoping, that, if he could persuade him to comply, his example would soon draw all the rest. He made him in vain the ampleſt promises, that the king's favour and protection, both of him and his sons, would be the immediate reward of his compliance. Mattathias answered him, with a voice loud enough to be heard by all the assembly, that though the whole Jewish nation, and the whole world, were to conform to the king's edict, yet both he and his sons would continue faithful to their God to the last minute of their lives, and that no consideration should prevail on them to forsake the religion of their forefathers. In the mean time, some of the king's officers had prevailed on some cowardly Jews to take another way; and one of them was just then offering himself to sacrifice to an idol, when the good old priest, calling to mind what the law of Moses ordains against such transgressors, that they should be put to immediate death [n], fell upon the man, and killed him upon the spot. His sons at the same time, being fired with the same zeal, killed the king's officer and his men, overthrew the altar and idol, and running about the city, cried out, that those who were zealous for the law of God should follow them; by which means they saw themselves at the head of a numerous troop, with whom they soon after withdrew into some of the deserts of Judæa. These were presently followed by great numbers of others, who, to avoid persecution, flocked to mon, the son of Asmoneus, from whom descended the Asmonæans (42). From this Mattathias descended the Maccabees, so famed in history for their zeal and bravery, and of whom we shall speak in the following section.

(35) Paraphr. in lib. de imper. ration. (36) Vide Hieron. loc. Hebr. ſub voce Modin, & Auguſt. ſerm. de Maccab. i. (37) Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. & lib. de imper. ration. (38) N. de Lyra, Serrar. Calmet. (32) Paraph. in lib. de imper. ration. (40) Victorin. African. poem. in Maccab. (41) 1 Chron. xxiv. 7.

[m] Joseph. Ant. l. xii. c. 8. 1 Maccab. ii. 1. & seq. [n] Deuter xiii 6, & seq.

(L) These were Johanan, surnamed Kaddis, Simon, surnamed Thassi, Judas, called Maccabeus, and the most famous of all the rest, Eleazar, surnamed Avarani, and Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (34).

(42) Joseph. antiq. l. xii. c. 8. (43) 1 Maccab. ii. 15, & 28.

to him from other parts of the country [o]; ſo that the deſarts of Judæa were filled every-where with them.

As ſoon as Mattathias and his men were come into a place of ſafety, they ſet themſeves on conſulting the beſt means for ſtanding on their defence. Here the remembrance of thoſe of their brethren, who had ſuffered themſelves to be butchered by their enemies on the ſabbath, ſoon made them ſenſible of their danger, unleſs they ſteered a different courſe; for as long as they continued in that ſcrupulous notion of nonreſiſtance for fear of breaking the ſabbath, they would be ſtill liable to the ſame ſtratagems, and by that means, in a little time, be totally extirpated. Having, therefore, maturely weighed the matter, and conſulted other learned prieſts and rulers that were come over to him, it was reſolved, that, for the future, it ſhould be lawful, nay obligatory, to take up arms in their own defence, whenever they were attacked, on the ſabbath as well as on any other day [p]. This decree, having been privately communicated to the Jews in and out of Paleſtine, together with their reaſons for paſſing it, was univerſally received by all; and from that time they made no difficulty to defend their lives and properties, at all times, and upon all occaſions. Among thoſe who reſorted to, and did not a little ſtrengthen, the little flying army of Mattathias, were the Aſſideans, or rather Haſſideans, a brave and ſtrenuous ſect, formed among the Jews ſoon after their return from the captivity. We have already given ſome account of them in a former volume †; the reſt the curious reader may find in the margin (M). Theſe being known to be

The Aſſideans join Mattathias.

[o] Joſeph. 1 Maccab. ubi ſupra. [p] Idem. ibid. † vol. iii. p. 473.

(M) We have already ſeen what their doctrine was concerning meum and tuum *. They differed likewiſe from the Zaddikim their oppoſite ſect, in that theſe contented themſelves with obſerving all that was written in the Moſaic law, without troubling themſelves with the traditions, comments, and conſtitutions of the elders; whereas the Aſſideans inſiſted upon a ſtrict obſervance of all.

Scaliger ſuppoſes them, not without ſome good reaſons (44), to have been rather a fraternity than a ſect of Jews, who had given themſelves up more ſtrictly than the reſt to the ſervice of the temple, to the keeping up the repairs of that place, and the divine worſhip in it. To this end, beſides the half ſhekel which every

* vol. iii. p. 473. (44) Elench. Trihæreſ. c. 22.

be the moſt ſtrict obſervers of the Jewiſh laws and traditions [q], their example did very much influence the reſt in the late deciſion, and encourage them to ſet aſide their ſcruples about the ſabbath, whenever the ſafety of their lives came in competition with the obſervance of it.

Mattathias reſtores the worſhip of God.

MATTATHIAS having by this time ſtrengthened his little army with theſe and other ſtout and religious men, who daily reſorted to him, began to come down with them into the plains, and to try his force not only againſt their perſecutors, but alſo againſt his apoſtate brethren. As many of theſe as he caught, he put to death; the reſt, in much greater numbers, he forced to fly into foreign countries, to ſecure themſelves from his reſentment. Having once injected an univerſal fear on all his enemies, he marched from city to city, overturned the idolatrous altars, opened the Jewiſh ſynagogues, which had, till then, been either ſhut, or appropriated to other uſes; made a diligent ſearch after all the ſacred books which had eſcaped the fury of their enemies, and ordered freſh copies to be written of them; cauſed the reading and expounding of the ſcriptures, prayers, and other parts of divine worſhip to be reſumed (N), and all the males born ſince every man was to pay towards it, they contributed other voluntary ſums. They likewiſe ſacrificed every day, except that of the grand expiation †, a lamb, beſides thoſe of the daily ſacrifice; and this was called the ſin-offering of the Aſſideans. They practiſed greater hardſhips and mortifications than the reſt, and their common oath was, by the temple. To their zeal and love for that ſacred place, now polluted and profaned, was owing their coming to Mattathias, and that courage which they ſhewed from thenceforth under him and his brave offspring; for the book of the Maccabees expreſly ſays, that they were mighty men of Iſrael, and wholly devoted to the law Whether the ſect of the Eſſenians, or any other, ſprang from the Aſſideans, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in another place.

[q] 1 Maccab. ii. 42.

(N) We have already taken notice, that the king's prohibition extended only to the five books of Moſes; which had therefore been taken away from them, and been either burnt and deſtroyed, or polluted with blood, ſwine's broth, idolatrous pictures, and other ſuch defilements, which rendered them unfit for future ſervice, and to which therefore he ſubſtituted new ones, which he cauſed to be tranſcribed from the beſt copies.

But

† De hoc, vide vol. iii. p 218, & ſeq.

ſince the perſecution to be circumciſed [r]. In all theſe God bleſſed him with ſuch ſucceſs, that he had extended this reformation through a conſiderable part of Judæa, within the ſhort ſpace of one year; and had, in all likelihood, gone through with it, even to Jeruſalem, where the ſtrongeſt Syrian gariſon was kept, had he not been prevented with death. But what he left unfiniſhed, was ſoon after perfected by his worthy ſons, eſpecially by Judas Maccabeus, of whom we ſhall ſpeak more fully in the next ſection.

His laſt ſpeech to his ſons.

In the mean time, Mattathias, finding himſelf quite worn out with age and ſickneſs, called his ſons together, and ſpoke to them to this effect, Hitherto pride and oppreſſion have been ſuffered to proſper over us, for a puniſhment of our ſins; but now be ye valiant and zealous for God's laws, and fear not to expoſe your lives in defence of God's covenant with your forefathers, if you expect the reward promiſed to it. Call to your remembrance the obedience of Abraham, the faithfulneſs of Joſeph, the zeal of Phineas, Caleb's courage, David's conſtancy, Elijah's zeal, and the intrepidity of Daniel and his faithful companions. Let their miraculous deliverances inſpire you with a ſure truſt in the Almighty's protection. Be not diſcouraged by the threats and weak efforts of the greateſt men, who, though they ſeem to triumph now, will ſhortly be cut off, and become the food of worms; but arm yourſelves with courage in defence of our laws, liberties, and religion, and you will not fail of ſucceſs. Simon, your eldeſt brother, has always ſhewed himſelf a man of conſummate wiſdom; let him ſupply the office of a father and a councellor, and do nothing may

[r] 1 Maccab. ii. 43, & ſeq.

But this had not obſtructed the lecture of other ſacred books, the prophets and Hagiographa, amongſt thoſe who had perſiſted in the exerciſe of their religion, and who then ſubſtituted theſe to the pentateuch; ſo that when the public worſhip came to be reſtored, and the law to be again read and expounded as formerly, they ſtill retained alſo the reading and explaining of the other books; and this occaſioned double leſſons, one out of the law, and the other out of the prophets, &c. which continued ever after; and for the underſtanding of which, new targums or paraphraſes in the Chaldee were compiled by proper perſons, as we have elſewhere hinted in this chapter *.

* Supra, p. 31. (Z).

without his advice. Judas is well known to you all for his valour and conduct; let him be your general, and lead you against your enemies. And may heaven crown his and your valour with glory and success. Having thus said, he expired in a good old age, and was buried at Modin with his ancestors, greatly lamented by all the faithful in Israel [s] (O). He was, according to his desire, succeeded by his brave son Judas in the command of the army; and by him the Jewish religion and state were soon after restored to their ancient splendor, as we shall see in the next section.

[s] Ibid. ver. 49. ad fin.

(O) The first book of Maccabees doth barely tell us, that he died in the one hundred and forty-sixth year, without mentioning whether of his life, or of the æra of the Seleucidæ. Some therefore have taken it in the former sense; but the far greater part in the latter; for the one hundred and forty-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks falls exactly with the Julian year 166 before Christ, which is the year in which he died (45).

His deciding the point about the necessity of taking arms on the sabbath has made several learned men, both Jews and Christians, fansy, that he had been high-priest of the Jews (46) but it is plain he did not determine the case by his own authority, but by the advice of such learned men as were with him; neither doth the book of Maccabees or Josephus say any thing of this imaginary dignity. It appears on the contrary, that Menelaus was still alive, and in credit at the court of Antiochus, and was succeeded by his brother Alcimus, of whom we shall speak in the sequel.

(45) Vide Usser. & Prid. sub ann. (46) Joseph-ben-Gorion. Aben. Ezra, & al. Serrar. Fuller. Genebr. & al.

SECT.

SECT. III.

The sequel of the Jewish history, from Judas Maccabeus, to the conquest of Judæa by the Romans.

Judas Maccabeus succeeds his father,

JUDAS, surnaned Maccabeus, from whom the heroes of this epocha had the names of Maccabees (P), did not suffer his troops to continue longer idle, than till they had

(P) There are various conjectures concerning the etymology of this word, and not one of them to be depended upon; not only because nothing is more uncertain than etymologies, but because, the book of the Maccabees being only extant in Greek, we have no certainty which were the original letters of the word; so that some have taken the middle letter to have been a ח, others a כ, others the ק, according to which the sense of the verb will vary exceedingly.

It might indeed appear at first sight, that the Maccabees were so called from the Hebrew מחכה. Mucchabeh, or Mecchubeh, hid, as a term of contempt, because they hid themselves in holes and caverns; and that having afterwards wiped off the reproach of it by their bravery, they retained still that appellative in memory of their former absconsion, or from the word Makkabah, which signifies a cavern; and so they might be called caverners, or lurkers in caverns.

Others derive it from the verbs macab to wound, from nakab to perforate, from hakab to supplant; all which they do, by some seeming analogy, apply either to those Jewish heroes who fought, or to those who suffered martyrdom, for their religion, whether in Judæa or out of it. Rufinus above-mentioned tells us indeed, that the eldest of the seven brethren, who suffered under Antiochus, was called Maccabeus; and that all the rest, who fought or suffered for the same cause with him, were called Maccabei; but he gives us no authority for it but his own.

The most general opinion is, that it was taken from the four initial letters מ.כ.ב.י of the 11th verse of the 15th of Exodus, Mi camoca baelim Jehovah, Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the Gods? which four letters are supposed to have been embroidered upon their standards and shields, in the manner of the Romans S. P. Q. R. That the Jews were afterwards fond of these abbreviations, appears from those of the treble or quadruple names of their learned Rabbies; such is that of RAMBAM for Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon; RALBAG for Rabbi Levi Ben Gershom, had ended the days of his father's mourning. His little army amounted to no more than six thousand men [a]; but what [a] Maccab. viii. 1.

Gershom, and many more (1); but whether or no these kind of abbreviatures were so ancient as the Maccabees, it seems plain from the text, that Judas had that surname long before he displayed his standards against his enemies (2); not by anticipation, but in the same manner as his other brethren had each his different one, of which it would still be more difficult to find the cause or meaning.

However that be, Judas the Jewish chief seems to have bore it by way of eminence; and from him it passed to his brethren and successors, and thence to all who took up arms, or died, for the Jewish cause; and lastly, it was given to the books which contain the history of those wars and persecutions, and of which it will be therefore necessary to give our readers a short account, before we close this note.

The first book of the Maccabees was written originally either in Hebrew or the Chaldee, which became the current language of the Jews after the captivity. Its style and phrase come nearest that of the sacred historians of any of the Apocrypha, and its chronological computation is purely Hebrew, and begins always at the month Nisan, answering to our March and April; whereas the Syrians, &c. began their year six months later. St. Jerom tells us, that he had seen it in the former (3); and Origen tells us, that it was intitled Sharbit Sar Bene El, or, the sceptre of the prince of the sons of God (4); or, according to others (who read Sarbene in one word, and with the samech instead of the shin) the sceptre of the rebels against the Lord, intimating, that the Maccabees had maintained the divine sceptre or power, against those who had rebelled against it; but the original has been long since lost, and the Greek version is now reckoned the most authentic.

It contains a clear and succinct history of what happened to the Jews, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, to the death of the high-priest Simon (5); that is, of about forty years. It was partly compiled from the memoirs which Judas Maccabeus had caused to be collected (6), and partly from those of the high-priest Hyrcanus the son of Simon, who began his government where the book ends, and who is therefore by some supposed to be the author of it, though he be barely quoted in it as having furnished

(1) De his, vide Wolf. biblioth, Rabbin. & Buxtorf. tract. de abbreviature. (2) Vide 1. Maccab. ii. 4. (3) Prolog. galeat. (4) Apud. Eusеb. hist. eccles. l. vi. c. ult. & Comm. in Psalm. vol. i. edit. Huetian. (5) Vide 1 Maccab. cap. ult. ver. 11, & seq. (6) 2 Maccab. ii. 14.

what they wanted in number, they made up in zeal and bravery, and God gave them such success, that they quickly got into some of the strongest fortresses of Judæa, fell upon their enemies so suddenly, and with such courage, that they drove them out of their cities, villages, and advantageous posts; insomuch, that Judas's name began to become terrible to the Syrians, Samaritans, and apostate Jews, whilst those who had forsook their country to avoid persecution, were encouraged to resort daily to him from their retreats, whereby his troops increased to such a degree as to make Apollonius, the then governor of Judæa and Samaria, think it high time to suppress their growing power, before it was grown to a greater height. He hastened therefore to raise a considerable army, which chiefly consisted of Samaritans, Jewish renegadoes, and other neighbouring nations, with whom he marched against the Maccabean chief. Judas, on the other hand, in no ways terrified with the superiority of the enemy, came out against him with his handful of men, and furnished him the materials out of his chronicle (7), and seems therefore to have lived after him.

Theodotion is generally supposed to have translated this book into Greek; but it being quoted by some fathers as ancient as that writer, seems to argue this version to be of older date, It is, however, from this that our English version was made.

The second book of the Maccabees is, as we have observed in another section, an epitome of a larger history, written by one Jason, but long since lost. Both the author and the abridger seem to have been Hellenists, by their manner of computation and style; or rather it looks like a collection of some valuable pieces relating to the Jewish history, from the attempt of Heliodorus upon the treasury of the temple, to the signal victory which Judas Maccabeus gained over Nicanor, fifteen years after.

It begins with two letters from the sanhedrin at Jerusalem, one to the Jews of Alexandria, the other to those in Egypt, to notify to them the purification of the temple and dedication of a new altar, instead of that which had been polluted with the idol of Jupiter, and to exhort them to join in the celebration of the festival of it on the twenty-fifth of the month Cisleu. But both these letters are esteemed even more apocryphal than the rest of the history, and therefore neither of them need be longer dwelt upon.

We have already spoken of the third book of the Maccabees, as previous in time to these two, and in authority to the latter of them. We shall likewise refer the reader to what we subjoined in that note concerning the fourth book of that name.

(7) 2 Maccab. xvi. ver. ult.

and gave him a total defeat. Apollonius was killed on the spot, with a great number of his men. The rest were put to the rout, leaving a rich plunder behind them. Among the rest of the spoil, Judas took the slain governor's sword, and used it ever after in those wars which he waged against the enemies of the Jewish nation [b].

THIS defeat so enraged Antiochus, that, upon his hearing the first news of it, he swore again the total extirpation of the Jews; and happy was it for them that his treasury was then so exhausted, by his extravagant largesses, that he was forced to suppress his resentment, till he could raise a sufficient supply of money to renew the war against them; but before he could accomplish this, another of his generals, received likewise a signal overthrow. This was Seron, deputy-governor of Cœle-Syria [c] under Ptolemy Macron, who took it into his head to come against Judas, in hopes, that if he could defeat that little army of his before the king sent more forces thither, he should gain no small glory by it. He advanced therefore with his troops as far as Bethoron, where Judas met him with a handful of his men. These, seeing the superiority of the enemy, expressed a great reluctancy to engage, fatigued as they were with marching and fasting (Q); but Judas soon dispelled their fears, by reminding them, that they fought the cause of God, who was not wont to save by strength or number, and whose glory, now concerned in their success, would display itself the more, by the disproportion there was between their two armies. Having thus put new life into them, they fell upon (Q). It was, it seems, this Hebrew general's method to keep a fast before they engaged the enemy (9); and here, their march, fast, and onset so closely followed, that his men began to despond of the victory, when they saw the superiority of Seron's army to theirs.

Seron defeated,

[b] 1 Maccab. iii. 10, & seq. Joseph. ubi supra. [c] Maccab. iii. 13.

As for Bethoron, it was according to St. Jerome and Eusebius, about twelve thousand paces from Jerusalem (10); but, according to Josephus, one hundred stades (11). It was situated northward of Jerusalem, and between that metropolis and Shechem (12).

(R)

(9) 1 Maccab. iii. 17, & seq. (10) Loc. Hebr. 11 Conf. antiq. l. xx. c. 4. & bell. Judaic. c. 11. (12) Hieron. ubi supra.

upon the Syrians with ſuch vigor, that Seron was overthrown and killed, with eight hundred of his men, on the ſpot. Some of the reſt fled as far as Bethoron, and the greateſt part ſaved themſelves by running into the land of the Philiſtines [d]. Theſe continued ſucceſſes of the new Jewiſh general made Philip, governor of Judæa, think it high time to acquaint Antiochus with the danger that province was in of being loſt, if not ſpeedily relieved. Antiochus had then left the government to Lyſias, whilſt himſelf was gone beyond the Euphrates, as we have ſeen elſewhere *. Lyſias, who had orders to invade Judæa, and to deſtroy all the Jews, diſpatched immediately to Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and to Nicanór and Georgias, two experienced officers, forty thouſand foot, with orders to ſee the king's commands punctually obeyed againſt the Jewiſh nation. Theſe came and encamped on the plains of Emmaus, not far from Jeruſalem, about twenty miles from Lydda, where they were reinforced with ſeven thouſand horſe. Nicanor, who had reſolved to raiſe, if poſſible, the ſum of two thouſand talents, which the king his maſter did owe to the Romans, cauſed proclamation to be made in all the cities and ſea-ports round about, that he would ſell his Jewiſh captives at the rate of ninety for a talent; and this brought a great concourſe of merchants, who came with large ſums of money to purchaſe thoſe captives. Our author reckons no leſs than a thouſand of them, beſides a great number of ſervants, who brought chains and other materials to convey them away [e].

Nicanor and Georgias ſent againſt Judas,

Judas, being thoroughly appriſed of this bloody apparatus againſt his nation, gathered his little army together, conſiſting only of ſix thouſand men, and reminded them, not only of his late ſignal victories, but of thoſe which had been formerly gained in a more miraculous manner againſt Senacherib and other powerful enemies of the Jews; and particularly of a recent one, which ſix thouſand of their nation had gained over an army of one hundred and twenty thouſand Gauls and Macedonians [f]. However, concluded he, remember, that, let the ſucceſs be what it will, it is ſtill more glorious to die ſword in hand, in defence of our religion, lives, and liberties, than to fall into the hands of an enemy fully determined on our utter deſtruction. After this exhortation

Judas's ſpeech to his troops,

[d] Ibid. ver. 14, & ſeq. * See before, vol. ix. p. 83, ad 86.
[e] 1 Maccab. iii. 41. 2 Macc. viii. 34. Joſeph. l. xii. c. 11.
[f] 2 Maccab. viii. 19, & ſeq.

exhortation, he was obliged, by the Mosaic law, to make a proclamation, that all who had married wives, planted vineyards, &c. or whose hearts failed, should depart [g]; and this carried off near one half of his men, whilst the rest, who remained intrepid, were scarcely furnished with weapons fit for so bold and unequal an enterprize [h]. However, he led his three thousand men to Mizpa (R), there to implore the divine assistance, by prayer, fasting, and sacrifices, in confidence of which he marched with them against the enemy, and encamped as near them as he safely could, resolved to give them battle early on the next morning, of which he gave his troops notice that very night [i]. In the mean time, news was brought to him by some of his scouts, that Georgias was coming, at the head of five thousand of his choicest men and one thousand horse, to surprise him in his camp; which gave him such an opportunity of countermining him, as gained him a complete and easy victory; for, taking the advantage of Georgias's absence, he and his three thousand men fell on a sudden on the Syrian army, killed three thousand of their men, and put the rest to flight, and into such confusion, that they could not be rallied again by any means, but left their camp, and all their baggage and spoil behind them, and fled. Georgias, having in vain sought for his enemy, whom he supposed to have retired again into the mountains, was returning back to his army, when he perceived his camp on fire, which threw his men into such a panic, that,

Defeats the Syrians.

[g] Vide Deut xx 5. [h] 1 Maccab. iv .6. [i] Ibid. iii. 57, & seq.

(R) This place, which is famous in the Old Testament upon many accounts, and where the Jews used to assemble themselves to worship before the temple was built (13), was now made choice of upon this occasion, the temple being then polluted, and kept by a Syrian garison.

Here they fasted in sackcloth and ashes, whilst Eleazar, Judas's brother, read and expounded to them some proper portions out of the scriptures. The Nazarites likewise, who should have performed the conclusion of their vows at the temple †, assembled themselves with the priests in their robes; and, at the close of their fast and prayers, the priestly trumpets gave a signal as a sure omen of their future victory; and the Maccabean chief gave for the watch-word, the help of God (14).

(13) Vide int. al. 1 Sam. vii. 5, & seq. † De his, vide vol. iii. p. 249. (14) 1 Maccab. iii. 46, & seq. 2 Maccab. viii. 23, & seq.

that, in ſpite of all he could do to prevent it, they threw down their arms and ran after the reſt. Judas did not leave off purſuing them, till he had killed ſix thouſand more of their men, beſides a great number of maimed and wounded; after which he led his victorious troops to plunder the enemies camp, where, among other rich ſpoil, they found that money which the greedy merchants had brought to buy the Jewiſh captives with. This ſignal victory was gained on the Friday, and the next day, being their ſabbath, was celebrated with ſuitable returns to the divine providence for their miraculous deliverance [k].

THIS defeat proved doubly advantageous to the conqueror. It furniſhed him with quantities of arms and ammunition for his men, and his fame drew daily freſh reinforcements from all parts of Judæa, whom his ſucceſs encouraged to repair to him from all the places of their diſperſion: ſo that he found himſelf ſoon after in a condition to attempt another action, which proved no leſs glorious and ſucceſsful to him. Timotheus, governor of the country beyond Jordan, and Bacchides, another experienced officer of the Syrian army, had joined their forces, and were coming againſt him, with a deſign to retrieve their late defeat; but Judas was by this time ſo well reinforced, that he met and overthrew them in a ſet battle, killed twenty thouſand of their men, inriched himſelf with their ſpoil, got a new ſupply of proviſions for his men, and took preſently after ſeveral ſtrong fortreſſes from the diſheartened Syrians, which he gariſoned with ſome of his troops and depoſited in them the arms which they had taken from the enemy. In the diſtribution of all the ſpoil Judas's generoſity outwent what was even preſcribed by the Moſaic law, which intitled none to ſhare it with the combatants, but thoſe who were left to take care of the baggage †; but he cauſed a conſiderable part to be divided among his indigent brethren, ſo that the old and decrepit, the ſick and lame, the widows and the fatherleſs, were made partakers of the fruits of his victories. In this battle was killed one of Timotheus's chief officers, named Philarchus, who had been a bitter enemy to the Jews; and whilſt they were making their rejoicings for their ſucceſs, news were brought, that Caliſthenes, the man who had firſt ſet fire to the gates of the temple, had concealed himſelf in a little houſe not far from them; upon which Judas diſpatched a detachment, who went and ſet it

Divides the ſpoil,

Caliſthenes burnt,

[k] Ibid. cap. iv. paſſ. Joſeph. ubi ſupra. 2 Maccab. viii. 24, & ſeq.
† Vide Numb. xxxi. 25, & ſeq. 1 Sam. xxx 24.

on fire, and burnt him in it, as a juſt retaliation for his ſacrilege [l]. As for Nicanor, he ſaved indeed his life, but loſt his honour, being forced to retreat to Antioch in the diſguiſe of a ſervant, and there excuſe his late diſgrace, by owning, that the Jews, when under the protection of their God, were invincible [m].

Nicanor's ſhameful flight,

When Lyſias heard the news of the total defeat of the army he had ſent into Judæa, he made all the haſte he could to put himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, all of the choiceſt troops he could get; and entering Judæa with them, through the territories of Idumea, was met at Bethzura (S) by the Maccabitiſh general, at the head of only ten thouſand men. The two armies engaged, and Judas, though ſo much inferior to the Syrians, fell upon them with ſuch courage, that he immediately killed five thouſand of them on the ſpot, and routed the reſt; and Lyſias, obſerving that the Jews fought like men determined either to conquer or die, dared not venture a ſecond engagement with the remainder of his ſcared army; but returned to Antioch, with a deſign to bring a much greater force againſt them by the return of the year (T) [n].

Lyſias defeated in Judæa, Year of the flood 2834, Before Chriſt 165,

But

[l] 2 Maccab. viii. 30, & ſeq. [m] Ibid. ver. 35, & ſeq. 1 Maccab. & Joſeph. ubi ſupra. [n] 1 Maccab. iv. 30, & ſeq.

(S). This was a very important fortreſs about that time. It was in the tribe of Judah (15), and had formerly been fortified by king Rehoboam (16), it being one of the keys of Judæa on the ſouth ſide of Idumea (17). The ſecond book of the Maccabees places it at five furlongs diſtance from Jeruſalem (18); but this muſt be a miſtake either of the tranſlator or tranſcriber, it being, according to Euſebius, full twenty miles from it, on the road to Hebron (19).

It is likely, that this was one of the fortreſſes which Judas had retaken from the Syrians, and which Lyſias came now to beſiege; but was defeated in the attempt by the Jewiſh chief, who came immediately from Bethoron to its relief.

(T) This is one of the moſt ſignal victories that ever Judas yet gained againſt the Syrians, and at the ſame time the moſt difficult to be accounted for, from the imperfect relation which the Jewiſh authors give us of it. That which he gained againſt thoſe two experienced generals, Nicanor and Georgias, was owing to a ſurprize, the Syrian army being attacked in the night, and in the abſence of one of their generals, whilſt the other, depending on

(15) Vide Joſh. xv. 58. (16) 2 Chron. ii. 7. (17) 1 Maccab. iv. 61. 2 Maccab. xiii. 19. (18) Chap. xi. 5. (19) Loc Hebr.

But all theſe ſucceſſes ſeemed ſtill too ſmall to our Jewiſh general, whilſt the ſanctuary continued polluted with abominable

on his ſtratagem, did lie in profound ſecurity. In that which he gained over Timotheus and Bacchides, he killed twenty thouſand of their men, before they gave ground; neither is it ſaid of either of theſe two actions, whether Judas attacked the two commanders jointly or ſeparately; ſo that if we may gueſs, from his character, it is more likely he fell upon them both, before they had joined their forces.

But in this, Lyſias comes at the head of ſixty thouſand choice foot and ten thouſand horſe, ſets down before Bethzura, is attacked by only ten thouſand men, and has ſcarcely five thouſand of his own killed, a ſmall number out of ſeventy thouſand, before he is routed, and ſo diſheartened, as to leave the province and retire to Antioch. Our authors do not tell us in what order either ſide diſpoſed their troops; but from what we have formerly mentioned of the Jewiſh way of fighting †, and even by what we can gather from that of the Maccabees, who ſeem to have ſtill followed the old way, the method was, (whenever their army was too ſmall to make a front equal to that of the enemy) to divide their troops into four or five bodies of a conſiderable depth, and ſo fall on the enemy at proportionable diſtances.

As for the Syrians, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they did, like other nations, ſpread their phalanges according to the number of their troops, and cover at leaſt their two wings with their cavalry; and in this laſt reſpect Lyſias had vaſtly the advantage, as well as in number, ſince we find not any where that the Maccabees made uſe of any cavalry; for, if they had, it is hardly to be ſuppoſed their hiſtorians would have omitted mentioning it, as well as that of the enemy.

Let us therefore ſuppoſe ever ſo great a ſuperiority in the Jewiſh army, either in point of courage and experience, knowledge of the ground, advantage of ſituation, or the like, it will ſtill appear next to a miracle, that ſeventy thouſand choice men of horſe and foot ſhould be routed and broken, upon the death of five thouſand of their men, and by ſo ſmall a number as ten thouſand, (ſuppoſe none of theſe were either killed or wounded ſo as not to be rallied again by their old experienced officers; but that they ſhould, one and all, be flung into ſuch conſternation, as to quit both the field and the country to ſo inferior an enemy.

If therefore the Jewiſh authors have not exaggerated the number of their enemies, we may very well ſuppoſe they have their character; and by their defeat, and their general's ſo ſuddenly retiring from Judæa, it may be reaſonably concluded, that his army, inſtead of conſiſting of ſuch choice horſe and foot, was only an undiſciplined multitude, gathered up in haſte, and eaſily

† vol. iii. p. 62.

minable idols, the temple garisoned by idolaters, and the city a ruined heap. As soon therefore as their enemies were gone out of the province, Judas marched with his army to the metropolis, fully purposed to recover and purify it, and was as chearfully followed by them. Upon their coming to mount Sion, and seeing the desolation in which it did lie, the houses, palaces, and gates of the temple burnt down, the courts of the sanctuary over-run with shrubs and briars, the priestly apartments demolished, the altar and holy places profaned and stripped of all their ancient splendor, they rent their cloaths, covered their heads with dust, and filled the air with cries and other tokens of the liveliest sorrow. As soon as Judas observed these first emotions a little assuaged, he posted some of his bravest troops to guard all the avenues of the city from surprize, and then appointed such of the priestly order, as had best signalized themselves for their zeal and sanctity, to enter into the temple, and see it thoroughly rid of all its profane lumber, whilst the rest of the people were busy in clearing the streets and places of all their rubbish. Whatever old materials they found, that had undergone any defilement, they broke in pieces, and carried them out of the city, and buried them in some common place, especially the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been so notoriously profaned, that no part of it was fit for future use; and which was therefore demolished, and carried off, and another of unhewn stones [o] substituted to it (V). There were still many things wanting before scared at the sight of so brave and resolute an enemy. What confirms this conjecture is, that Lysias had much better success the next year, when he came against Bethzura with a fresh army, whilst that of Judas, as well as his fame, and consequently the courage of his troops, increased by every one of these victories.

Comes and purifies the city and temple.

[o] Ibid. ver. 43, & seq. 2 Maccab. x. 6, 7.

(V) It seems there arose no small difficulty among the Jewish doctors, about disposing of the materials of this old altar. On the one hand, it had been dedicated to, and had a long time been used in, the service of God; so that they thought it unlawful to apply them to any common uses. On the other hand, the heathens had polluted it in so many ways, by sacrificing unclean beasts upon it to their idols and false deities, that the retaining any part of it would have been deemed to defile all their future offerings. At length a middle expedient was agreed on, that they should be deposited into some convenient cavity of the mountain on which the temple stood, till some prophet arose that could direct them how to dispose better of them (20).

Among

(20). 1 Maccab. iv. 44, & seq.

before the divine ſervice could be reſumed; the altar of perfumes, the table of ſhew-bread, the ſeven-branch candleſtick, cenſers, and other ſacred utenſils, all of the pureſt gold, had been carried off, as well as the rich veil which covered the holy of holies: all theſe therefore the Jewiſh chief cauſed to be made anew out of the ſpoils of their enemies; and all being ſet up in their reſpective places, and the holy and moſt holy place repaired, they began the divine worſhip, with the dedication of the new altar, and other holy utenſils, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Ciſleu, it being the very ſame day on which it had ceaſed by the profanation of the temple three years before, and in the ſecond year of Judas's government.

THIS ceremony, which was performed with all imaginable ſolemnity, was uſhered in with the earlieſt dawn, by the ſound of the trumpets, by raiſing a freſh fire by the ſtriking of two fire ſtones; which was no ſooner kindled, than they began with offering the lamb for the daily ſacrifice, lighting the lamps, burning the uſual portion of incenſe, and all other parts of the divine ſervice, according to the Moſaic law; from which time it was never diſcontinued, till the deſtruction of the temple by the Romans. This feſtival was kept eight days with great devotion and joy, after which it was ordered to be ſolemnized every year in the ſame manner, by the whole nation, under the name of the feaſt of the dedications [P]. During this time the front of the temple was adorned with crowns, garlands, eſcutcheons, and other ornaments of the beſt gold. Every houſe was likewiſe illuminated and adorned;

[P] 1 Maccab. iv. 58, & ſeq.

Among the ſacred utenſils which Judas cauſed to be made, inſtead of thoſe which Antiochus had carried off, we do not read of any ark and mercy-ſeat to ſtand in the moſt holy place; nor is it ſaid by Ezra, Nehemiah, or even by Joſephus, that ever they made a new one.

The Talmudiſts, after the author of the ſecond book of the Maccabees, tell us indeed, that Jeremiah cauſed the old one, which Moſes had made, to be buried in ſo ſecret a place a little before the captivity, that it could never be found; and the former add, that it will never be brought forth, till God is reconciled to the people, and has gathered them all under the king Meſſiah. It is therefore reckoned one of the five things that were wanted in the ſecond temple; but whether they made any thing like it after their return, is more than we dare affirm. We ſhall ſee in the ſequel, that when the Romans plundered the ſanctuary, they found it quite empty of all thoſe utenſils.

and from thence it was also called the feast of lights [q] (W). The author of the second book of the Maccabees adds [r], that in memory of their having kept the feast of the tabernacles whilst they lurked in their dens and on the mountains, they repaired to the temple on this new festival, with palms and other curious branches in their hands, and celebrated this wonderful deliverance with psalms and hymns suitable to the occasion.

And

[q] Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c, 11. [r] 2 Maccab. x. 6, &. seq.

(W) It was accordingly continued to be celebrated by lighting many candles, some at their doors, and some in their houses. Even to this time they light a certain number of large wax-tapers in their synagogues during this festival; that is, one on the first day, two on the second, and so on to eight on the last day of the feast: the occasion of which, the Jews tell us, was, that when they came to light the lamps on the great candlestick, they could find no holy oil to feed them with, till, after much looking, they found a little vessel sealed, which contained just as much as would serve one day; but, to their surprize, burnt eight whole days. On this day they likewise celebrated the death of Holophernes by Judith, tho' they are not all agreed that it happened about this time (21).

It was lawful, however, to work during the festival, it being only observed by mirth and going to the synagogue. The Jews call it hanuca, which signifies restoration, or renewing. One of the evangelists calls it encœnia (22), which implies the same thing, and adds, that it fell in the winter, about the time of that solstice.

This circumstance is so much the more material, because Christ, vouchsafing to assist at it, tho' appointed only by human authority, sufficiently proves the lawfulness of instituting festivals in memory of public blessings (23).

The Jews did indeed celebrate two other dedications, viz. that of Solomon and that of Zerubbabel, which were properly founded on divine authority, because instituted by persons divinely inspired; but that this, which our Saviour is observed to have been present at, could be neither of these, is plain, because that of Solomon was kept in the month Tisri, which is about our autumn (24); and that of Zerubbabel in the month Adar, or the last month, which falls in the spring (25); whereas that of Judas Maccabeus was in the winter, which agrees with what the evangelist says of it in the place above-quoted, (21) Vide Leo. de Moden. cerem. Jud. par. 2. c. 9. (22) John. x. 22. (23) Vide Grot. in John. x. (24) 1 Kings viii. 2. 2 Chron. v. 3. (25) Ezra vi. 15, & seq.

AND now there remained but one obſtacle more to be removed, namely, the gariſon which Apollonius had placed in the fortreſs of Acra, on the eminence over-againſt the temple (X), to annoy thoſe that went to and from it; for whilſt that was ſtill kept by heathens and apoſtate Jews, it could not but obſtruct their concourſe to that place of worſhip. A ſiege would have taken up too much time, had Judas been furniſhed with men and warlike inſtruments for it; becauſe the place was very ſtrong both by art and nature; and to have blockaded it would have taken up a greater number of men than he could ſpare. There was therefore but one way left, namely, to fortify the mountain of the temple with a high wall and ſtrong towers round about, and to leave a ſtout gariſon to defend it, and hinder that of Acra from diſturbing thoſe who reſorted to Jeruſalem. At the ſame time Judas cauſed ſome additional fortifications to be made to Bethzura, it being, as was lately obſerved, an advantageous fortreſs, to obſtruct the entrance from Idumea (Y); for which reaſon it had been lately attempted by Lyſias [s].

By

[s] 1 Maccab. iv, 60, & ſeq.

(X) The word Ακρα, acra, properly ſignifies an eminence, or fortreſs built on ſome eminent ground, which has the command of the country round about; and as this of Acra ſtood higher than that of Sion, it gave that gariſon the advantage of annoying all that paſſed to and from the temple, as was obſerved above.

(Y) It will not be improper here to remind our readers, that this Idumea is not the Idumea anciently ſo called in the ſacred books of the Old Teſtament, otherwiſe the land of Edom, ſituate between the Dead and the Red ſea, and known ſince by the name of Arabia Petræa; concerning which the reader may ſee what has been ſaid in former volumes *.

But this we are now ſpeaking of, was a portion of the inheritance of the tribes of Simeon and Judah, taken in poſſeſſion by ſome Idumeans, during the time of the Babyloniſh captivity; who, being driven out of their land by the Nabatheans, came and ſettled here, and inlarged their territory from the ſouth part of the lot of Judah, as far as Hebron, which they made their metropolis, as it had been that of the tribe of Judah. Theſe therefore, and not the ancient Edomites, are the Idumeans we ſhall have often occaſion to mention in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Now Bethzura, lying on the road between Hebron and Jeruſalem, at about twenty miles from the latter, as we have hinted in

* See before, vol. ii. p. 169, & ſeq. & vol. iii. p. 101, & note (E).

By this time all the neighbouring nations, having heard what had been done at Jerusalem, were so exasperated against the Jews, that they resolved to join their forces to extirpate the whole nation. They began with murdering all those that chanced to live among them, and waited only the coming of Antiochus into Judæa to assist them in the utter destruction of the Jews; but, happily for these, Antiochus's death, which happened soon after, broke all their measures, and freed them from the bloody designs which that exasperated tyrant had sworn against them, when he heard of their success against his three generals [t]. We have already given an account, both of his preparations and extraordinary death in a former chapter *, and to which nothing needs to be added here.

Antiochus's death.

The minority of the young Antiochus caused some alterations in Palestine, and gave the Jews a kind of respite, which proved, however, but short-lived. Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cœle-Syria, who had been an inveterate enemy to the Jews, and had made them suffer great hardships during the last reign, was now by some means become their friend; but he was soon after accused for it to the king, and deprived of his government by Lysias, who succeeded him in it, and came presently after with a powerful army into Judæa. In the interim, Georgias, who commanded the Syrian forces there, having gathered a fresh body of strangers, was making continual incursions against the Jews, whilst the Idumeans, who had joined with him, held the most advantageous posts, and received in them all the renegado Jews, in hopes to tire the rest by prolonging the war. But Judas, having gathered his army together, went and attacked them in that part of their territories, which was called Acrabatene, and killed no less than twenty thousand of them [u]. From thence he marched against the children of Bean (Z), who had proved a great thorn in his sides, and drove them into two of their strongest Judas falls on the Idumeans.

[t] 1 Maccab. v. 1, & seq. 2 Maccab x. 1, & seq. Joseph antiq. l. xii. c. 14. Eusеb. Chron. * vol ix. p. 55, & seq. [u] Id. ibid.

in a former note, was an important barrier against the incursions of the Syrian troops that were in Idumea, and did well deserve all the care that Judas bestowed in the fortifying of it.

(Z) Whether Bean was the name of a man, city, or tribe, is not certain; but most probably they were a tribe of Idumeans, of whom the text says, that they were a snare and decoy to the Israelites ſtrongeſt towers; and when he underſtood they were furniſhed with every neceſſary thing to hold out a ſiege, he left his three brethren, Simon, Joſeph, and Zaccheus, with a ſufficient force to reduce them, whilſt he led the reſt upon a more important expedition. During the ſiege, ſome of Simon's head officers ſuffered themſelves to be bribed with a ſum of ſeventy thouſand drachms, to let ſome of the beſieged eſcape. Judas, being informed of it, ordered thoſe traitors to be tried by the heads of the army, and to be put to death; after which he took the two fortreſſes by aſſault, put both gariſons, which conſiſted of about twenty thouſand, to death, burnt the towers to the ground, and paſt over Jordan into the land of the Ammonites [w]. Theſe he found likewiſe in a good poſture of defence, having Timotheus the Syrian general at their head, who had gathered a great number of forces out of Aſia, and was coming to invade Judæa; he had ſeveral skirmiſhes with the Ammonites, before he could come at the Syrian commander, defeated and killed great numbers of them; after which he took the city of Jazar, put a gariſon in it, and marched back into Judæa [x].

In the mean time, Timotheus had not been idle, but had gathered together an army from among all the heathen nations, who were now more than ever exaſperated againſt the Jews, reſolved, if poſſible, to wipe off the diſgrace of his former defeat, with the extirpation of that people. To this end, he entered Judæa with his new forces. Judas did not let him penetrate far, before he met and totally defeated him, killed twenty thouſand five hundred of his foot and ſix hundred horſe, and forced him to retreat into the city of Gazara (A), which was commanded by his brother Chereas. Hither Judas purſued and inveſted him, and, having carried the place in five days, ſlew him with his brother and another Syrian general named Apollophanes [y]. This defeat, though very advantageous

Defeats Timotheus.

[w] 1 Maccab. v. 1, ſeq. [x] Ib. ver. 8. [y] 2 Maccab. x. 31, & ad fin.

Iſraelites, and did lie in wait againſt them on the high-ways (26), as they paſſed to and from Jeruſalem.

(A) Probably the ſame with Gadara and Gaderoth, ſituate in the neighbourhood of Dioſpolis and Nicopolis (27). Euſebius places it about five miles northward of the latter (28).

(26) 1 Maccab. v. 4, & ſeq. Conf. cum Gen. xxxvi. 27, & Numb xxxii. 3, & xxxiii. 31, & ſeq. (27) Vide Steph. Byzant. ſub Gadara, Reland. Paleſt. l. iii. (28) Loc. Hebr.

geous to the Jews, proved the cauſe of great numbers of their nation being murthered by the heathens, who could not brook the continual ſucceſs of the Maccabitiſh general. A thouſand of them were ſacrificed to their fury in the land of Tob, and their wives and children carried into captivity; the reſt of their brethren muſt have undergone the ſame fate, had they not timely prevented it, by flying into Dathema, a fortreſs in the land of Gilead, and there timely provided for their own defence [z]. From thence they ſent letters to Judas, informing him of their condition, and that Timotheus, perhaps the ſon of him that was lately killed at Gazara, at the head of the Tyrians, Sidonians, Ptolemaidans, and others, was beſieging them in it. Judas had ſcarcely done reading theſe letters, when he received others from other brethren in Galilee, who were alſo in the ſame diſtreſs. The general immediately convened a ſanhedrin, in which it was reſolved, that Judas and his brother Jonathan ſhould go to help the Gileadites, with part of his troops, making in all about eight thouſand: that Simon, another of his brothers, ſhould go with another part to ſuccour thoſe of Galilee; and that Joſeph and Azarias his other brothers, ſhould ſtay to defend Jeruſalem with the reſidue of their troops. To theſe latter Judas gave ſtrict charge in no caſe to act offenſively, but to ſtand in their own defence, till his or his brother Simon's return [a].

Gileadites and Galileans diſtreſſed.

UPON Judas's paſſing the Jordan, he was informed by the Nabatheans, with whom he was then at peace, that not only the Jews of Dathema, but likewiſe thoſe of Boſſora, Caſphon, Maked, Alema, Carnaim, and other conſiderable cities of the land of Gilead, were likewiſe cloſely ſhut up by their enemies, and, if not timely relieved, were deſigned to be all deſtroyed in one day. As there was no time then to be loſt, Judas immediately fell on Boſſora, took it, and deſtroyed all the males; and, having freed his brethren, ſet fire to the city, and marched directly to Dathema. Upon his arrival thither early on the next morning, he found Timotheus ready to ſtorm the place; and fell upon him ſo unexpectedly, and with ſuch force, that he put all to the rout; for they no ſooner heard the ſound of their trumpets, and underſtood that Judas was at the head of their enemy, than they threw down their arms in the utmoſt confuſion, and betook themſelves to flight. Judas purſued them ſome time, and killed about eight thouſand of them; but remembering the condition of his other brethren in the Gileaditiſh cities, he marched marched againſt and took them one after another, made them undergo the ſame fate as he had that of Boſſora, loaded himſelf with the richeſt plunder, and returned, with his victorious army and delivered brethren to Jeruſalem [b].

Delivered by Judas.

[z] 1 Maccab. v. 1, & ſeq. [a] Ibid. ver. 13, & ſeq.

On the other hand, Simon, his brother, though inferior in ſtrength having but three thouſand men, was no leſs ſucceſsful in Galilee; he defeated his enemies in ſeveral rencounters, killed about three thouſand of them, and purſued them as far as Ptolemais, inriched himſelf with their plunder, and delivered his brethren from their cruel thraldom; but finding it impoſſible with his handful of men to ſecure their longer abode there, by the total reduction of their oppreſſors, he choſe rather to bring them with their families and valuable things to Jeruſalem; whence Judas ſoon after ſent them to new-people the deſolate cities of Judæa, where they might dwell in more ſafety. Whilſt things went on thus ſucceſsfully in Gilead and Galilee, the two brothers, that were left at Jeruſalem, unluckily took it into their heads to ſignalize themſelves alſo by ſome brave exploit on their heathen neighbours, though contrary to Judas's expreſs commands. Jamnia appeared to them a fair ſea-port town (B) and worth their conquering, before the return of their victorious brethren. Thither therefore they led their little army, but were unhappily defeated by Georgias, who commanded the place, and who ſallied out againſt them, killed about two thouſand of their men, and forced the reſt to return with ſhame and loſs to Jeruſalem [c]. This diſgrace, however, did not hinder the fame of their worthy brother's increaſing daily, and his valour being more and more dreaded by their enemies. This gave the Jewiſh chief a freſh opportunity of falling upon the Idumeans, who, as we have ſeen, had joined with the Syrians, and had been in ſome meaſure humbled by them. But as he found them ſtill ſtirring againſt him, he led his forces into Simon's ſucceſs in Galilee.

Joſeph's unlucky attempt on Jamnia.

Judas's ſucceſs againſt the Idumeans.

[b] Ibid. ver. 22, & ſeq. [c] Ibid. v. 55, & ſeq.

(B) It was ſituate on the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Azotus, or Aſhdod, about two hundred and forty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem (29). Its name is not to be found in the Hebrew, but the ſeptuagint places it after the city of Ekron, mentioned in Joſhua (30). It is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Jabneh, which Uzziah king of Judah is ſaid (31) to have taken from the Philiſtines.

(29) 2 Maccab xii. 9. (30) cap. xv. 45. (31) 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.

into the fourth parts of Idumea, laid siege to Hebron their famous metropolis, took and demolished it, with all the neighbouring towns, and carried off a considerable plunder [d]. From thence he entered the territories of the Philistines and Samaritans, injecting terror where-ever he past, and discouraging those nations at least from acting offensively against him. In this expedition, some indiscreet priests, that were in his army, endeavouring to signalise their valour by some exploit against the enemy, fell a sacrifice to their untimely ambition, being all slain in the attempt, and by their deaths convinced both him and his army, how dangerous it was to go one step beyond the orders of such an experienced general. Judas did not return into Judæa till he had taken a tour through the land of the Philistines, and destroyed, with their fortresses, all their altars, groves, and other instruments of idolatry [e].

Lysias invades Judæa. Year of the flood 2836. Year before Christ 163.

ALL these repeated successes raised such a jealousy and shame in the lately defeated Syrian governor, that he assembled an army of eighty thousand foot, together with all the horse and elephants he could get, and marched with them into Judæa, not doubting but speedily to reduce that unhappy kingdom, into as miserable a condition as Antiochus had formerly done. After which his design was to extirpate the whole Jewish nation, and to repeople their land with heathens, and to inrich his master and himself, both with the richest plunder of the land, and with the sale of the high-priesthood and other dignities. Flushed with these great hopes, he marched through the southern territories of Judah, probably because the other was too mountainous and craggy for his elephants and cavalry, and laid siege to the fortress of Bethzura. Judas, who was then at Jerusalem, having first implored the divine blessing on his arms, set out with his little army to its relief. On the road there appeared to them a man on horseback in rich shining armour, and seemingly brandishing his spear against their enemies. This sight, whatever it was, gave his men such flush of courage, that they fell like lions on the Syrian camp, killed eleven thousand foot, and put the rest to flight.

Is defeated.

Sues for peace.

LYSIAS, now more than ever convinced how impossible it would be to carry on the war against such an enemy, with either honour or advantage, sent Judas some overtures of peace [f], with a promise that it should be ratified by the King his master, and that the young prince should make him all the concessions conceſſions he ſhould with juſtice demand, and conclude an alliance with him. Judas accepted the propoſal, and ſent ſoon after John and Abſalom, two of his captains, with the conditions upon which he would agree to a peace, to Lyſias, who cauſed them to be forthwith conveyed to Antiochus. They contained upon the whole a general amneſty for whatever had been done before; a total revocation of the late edict, which obliged the Jews to renounce their religion and to conform to that of the Greeks; a free exerciſe of their religion and cuſtoms; and ſafe paſſports for commiſſioners to paſs from Jeruſalem to Lyſias, or, if need required, to Antioch. Theſe conditions, advantageous as they were to the hated Jews, were readily granted by the king, and two letters were ſent, the one to the governor, and the other to the Jewiſh ſenate. Lyſias likewiſe wrote to them, as did alſo Q. Memmius and T. Manlius, two Roman embaſſadors to the Syrian court. All theſe four letters the reader may find in the chapter laſt quoted [g]; by which it appears, how ready both the governor and his maſter were to agree to a peace with the victorious Jews, and how friendly thoſe two Romans had interpoſed their good offices on their behalf (C). It appears alſo by the king's letter, that Menelaus;

[d] Ver 64, & seq. [e] Maccab. v. 67, 68. [f] Ibid. cap. xi. 1, ad 13.

[g] Verſ. 16, to the end.

(C) Lyſias's letter, being dated from the month Dioſcorinthius, or, as the Latin verſion abridges it, Dioſcorus, has very much puzzled the chronologiſts, becauſe there is no ſuch month to be found in the Syro-Macedonian calendar, or indeed in any other of thoſe times. Thoſe who ſuppoſe it to have been an intercalar one, placed between thoſe of Dyſtrus and Xanthicus (32), anſwering in part to our March and April, have not given us any proof, that either Syrians, Macedonians, or even Chaldeans, had any ſuch intercalary month; and the main reaſon on which they build their ſuppoſition, viz. that the ratification of the peace dated is from the month Xanthicus, immediately following, doth make rather manifeſtly againſt it.

For Antioch and Jeruſalem being at leaſt four hundred miles aſunder, it is hardly credible, that theſe articles of peace could have been ſent for, tranſmitted, and ratified in ſo ſhort a ſpace as a month. We muſt therefore either ſuppoſe ſome miſtake in the text, occaſioned by the inadvertency of the tranſcribers, or ſuppoſe, that the king was not then at Antioch, but either in Phœnicia, or ſome other place nearer Jeruſalem; and this latter ſeems indeed the moſt probable, if we conſider, that, according to laus, the apoſtate high-prieſt, who in all likelihood was then at the Syrian court, had alſo laboured to promote this peace, and was deſirous to be included in it, ſince he was ſent back to Jeruſalem by Antiochus, as his letter terms it, to comfort or confirm the Jews [h].

(32) Scalig. de emend temp. l. ii. Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3841.

THIS peace, however, which ſeems to have been obtained from the young king by the ſole intereſt of Lyſias, unleſs we join with him the high-prieſt above-mentioned, could not be brooked by the other Syrian generals; ſo that, as ſoon as Lyſias was retired to Antioch, Timotheus, Apollonius (D), Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicanor governor of Cyprus, began to renew their hoſtilities againſt the Jews. The neighbouring nations, whether out of innate hatred againſt them, or by the ſuggeſtion of the Syrian officers, were equally forward to infeſt them. Some inſtances of which the author gives us in thoſe of Joppa, who treacherouſly invited, upon ſome pretence, a number of Jews, with their wives and children, who lived in the place, on board ſome barges by the ſea ſhore,

[h] Ibid. ver. 32.

to the king's letter (33), thoſe Jews, who were to tranſact this peace and to go from Jeruſalem to Lyſias's camp, or, as was obſerved above, to the Syrian court, had but fifteen days allowed them, viz. from the fifteenth to the thirtieth day of Xanthicus, which would have been too ſhort a ſpace to have gone to and from the king, and makes it reaſonable to ſuppoſe he was nearer Judæa.

In this caſe Dioſcorinthius and Dioſcorus may be probably enough either a corruption, or more likely, other names for Dyſtrus, immediately preceding Xanthicus, or, if the former be derived from Δίος κορινθίος, as who ſhould ſay the month Dius of the Corinthians, becauſe Dius among the Bithynians anſwered the Dyſtrus of the Syro-Macedonians, which is not improbable, then the Dioſcorus of the Latin verſion will be only an abbreviation or corruption of the Dioſcorinthius (34).

Theſe letters bear moreover the date of the hundred and forty-eighth year, viz. of the Seleucidæ, which the learned author laſt-quoted has proved to anſwer to the year before Chriſt 163, and the reſt in proportion accordingly; to which we refer the reader.

(D) Not the general that has been ſpoken of in the former ſection, who was the ſon of Thyrſeus, and was killed by Judas, but another, who is here called the ſon of Genneus †.

(33) 2 Macc. xi. 30. (34) Vid. Prid ſub. an. 163. †

See vol. ix. p. 117, ad 118.

ſhore, rowed them further into the deep, and flung them over-board, to the number of about two hundred. This barbarous action was ſoon after heard of at Jeruſalem, and Judas, juſtly provoked at it, marched againſt thoſe murderers, came upon them in the dead of night, ſet fire to their boats and port, and killed all thoſe that had ſaved themſelves from the flames. He would have done the ſame to the city itſelf, but they had timely ſhut their gates upon him; and when he was reſolving its utter deſtruction, he heard that thoſe of Jamnia had hatched the ſame cruel miſchief againſt thoſe Jews that lived with them; he turned his arms thitherward, and came ſuddenly upon them, burnt their ſhips, port, and magazines, inſomuch, that the flames were ſeen from Jeruſalem, though, as we hinted before, at near two hundred and forty furlongs, or about thirty miles diſtance [i].

JUDAS ſtaid not to take a further revenge of thoſe two perfidious towns, becauſe he heard, that Timotheus, who had by this time got a freſh army, was entered the land of Gilead, but marched directly to their aſſiſtance; he had ſcarce gone nine furlongs, before he was attacked by a band of Arabian Nomades (E), in number about five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe. A fierce engagement immediately enſued, in which Judas having got the better, forced thoſe free-booters to ſue for peace, and granted it to them the more readily, that his march into Gilead might not be ſtopt [k]. However, he obliged them to furniſh him with a certain number of cattle and proviſions, and extorted a promiſe, that they ſhould aſſiſt him in any thing he ſhould require of them, after which he marched in all haſte to the other ſide of Jordan to attack the Syrian general. However, he met with ſeveral other obſta-

Judas defeats the Arabians.

[i] 2 Macc. c. xii. 1, & ſeq. ad 9. [k] Ibid. ad ver. 12.

(E) Theſe were a kind of wandering people, living in tents, and ſtaying in a place no longer than it afforded them proviſion for themſelves and cattle. They were the deſcendants of Iſhmael, and, according to the angel's prediction of them (35), their hands were againſt every man, and every man's hand againſt them; for they lived chiefly upon plunder, eſpecially of the caravans, who did therefore go well armed, and whenever they met, they ſeldom gave quarter to one another; and as thoſe plunderers were ſtout, warlike, and well acquainted with the courſe of all thoſe countries, it was no ill policy in the Jewiſh chief to ſecure their friendſhip and future ſervices.

(35) Gen. xvi. 12. See alſo, vol. ii. p. 405, note (M).

cles, and was forced to take some places in his way. The first of them was Caspis, a city well fenced with high walls, and so well provided within, that the inhabitants, trusting to their own strength, threw many scornful and blasphemous sarcasms at the Jewish army; but Judas assaulted it with such an unexpected bravery, that he made himself master of it, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, insomuch, that a neighbouring lake, about two furlongs broad, was seen running with blood [1].

From thence he marched into the land of Tob, where the Jews, called from thence Tubieni, had shut themselves up in the fortress of Characa (F); and whence Timotheus, having in vain tried to dislodge them, was gone, after having left a good garrison in a place strongly situate within its neighbourhood to keep them in awe. As soon therefore as Judas found him gone, he sent two of his generals with a detachment to take that garrison, whilst he with the rest of his army, marched in search of the Syrian chief. Dositheus and Sosipater, the two Hebrew generals, soon after forced the garrison, and put it to the sword, to the number of ten thousand. By this time Timotheus had got an army of a hundred and twenty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse; and when he heard that Judas was in full march against him, he sent all the women, children, and other luggage, into Carnion, a strong city of Gilead and very difficult of access, whilst himself incamped his army in the neighbourhood of Raphon, upon the borders of the river Jabboc. As soon as Judas was come near enough for his van-guard to

And Timotheus.

[1] Ibid. ad ver. 16.

(F) Probably the same with Charac Moab, as Carnion may be reasonably supposed the same which in the Hebrew, and the first book of the Maccabees, is called Carnaim, al. Ashtaroth Carnaim, or Ashtar with two horns (36), which city was the residence of Og king of Bashan †. We find a city mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy by the name of Carno in Arabia. Eusebius mentions one near Jerusalem (37); and there might be many more of the same name, if Astarte was either the moon, worshiped under that name, or the Egyptian Isis, represented by a bullock's head with two horns (38).

(36) De his vid. Byzant. Reland. Palest. tom. 1. p. 212, & s. & alib. Bochart. & al. † vol. ii p. 200, 227. (37) V. infra, in seq. (38) Vid. Sanchoniat. ap. Euseb. Præp. lib. ult. & sup. vol. ii. 343, (G). 344.

to be ſeen by the enemy, they ſeem to have been ſeized with a panic fear, for they made ſuch haſte to fly from him, that they wounded one another with their own weapons in the flight. In this running fight Timotheus loſt thirty thouſand of his men, and, unable to rally the reſt, betook himſelf to his heels. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſlaughter, finding themſelves cloſely purſued, fled into Carnion, and a great number of them went and took refuge in the temple of Atargatis (G). Judas, who came cloſe after them, burnt the temple and them in it; then ſetting fire to the reſt of the city, they all periſhed likewiſe, either by the flames or by his ſword, to the number of twenty-five thouſand. As for Timotheus, he fell in his flight into the hands of Doſitheus and Soſipater, who were haſting from the land of Tob to join their commander. Theſe two captains, however, were perſuaded by him to give him his liberty, upon promiſe that he would do the ſame to a great number of Jews, whom he held priſoners, many of whom were very nearly related, either to ſome of thoſe officers, or to ſome of their troops there preſent [m]. This victory quite completed the reduction of the land of Gilead, and put it out of his enemies power to undertake any thing againſt him there. However, as the cities of Judæa were ſtill in great meaſure unpeopled, he choſe rather to follow his brother Simon's example, and bring the Jewiſh Gileadites to inhabit and fortify them [n].

Takes and burns Carnion.

In his way to Judæa, he was of neceſſity to paſs through Ephron, that city being ſo advantageouſly ſituate, that he could neither turn to the right nor the left hand of it. It was moreover well fortified and peopled by ſtrangers of all nations. He therefore ſent in a peaceable manner to demand a paſſage through it; but they, inſtead of opening their gates to him, did ſhut, and even wall them up, and prepared themſelves for a ſiege. Judas therefore cauſed it to be proclaimed

And Ephron.

[m] Ibid. ad ver. 24. [n] Ibid. v. 24, 25.

(G) Suppoſed to be the ſame with the Aſtarte mentioned in the laſt note. Diodorus ſays (39), ſhe was worſhipped at Aſcalon, under the figure of a woman from the navel upward, and fiſh downward, like the Dagon of, if not the ſame with that of, the Philiſtines; for ſhe was worſhipped under ſeveral names, though under the ſame form, being called Derceto at Joppa, Aſhtaroth, Atargatis, and Atergata in the other places (40).

(39) Bibl. l. ii. (40) Vid. Strab. Geogr. l. xvi. Plin. l. v. c. 23. Selden. de. diis Syr. & ſup. vol. ii. 343, & ſeq.

claimed through his camp, that every man ſhould ſcale the walls in the place that chanced to be over-againſt him. On the other hand, the city, which had been well garriſoned by Lyſias, had placed their choiceſt men on the battlements of it. The aſſault was fierce, and laſted the whole day; at length Judas carried it and took the city, put all the males, about twenty-five thouſand, to the ſword, took their wives and daughters captives, ſeized all the richeſt plunder, and burnt and quite erazed the place. From Ephron, croſſing the Jordan, he ſpread his army along the plains of Bethſhan, then called Scythopolis, a conſiderable city, about a hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem †. Here he enquired of the Jews how they had been treated by the Scythians, and they anſwering much to the commendation of that people; Judas returned them thanks for their kindneſs to his brethren, exhorted them to live in friendſhip with them, and aſſured them of his own °, and then continued his journey towards Jeruſalem. During their march, Judas kept ſtill in the rear of his army, encouraging thoſe that lagged behind, and brought them at length to that metropolis about the time of pentecoſt. Here they went to the temple to return thanks to God for their quick and wonderful ſucceſs (H), and particularly that they were all returned ſafe and victorious without the loſs of one man P.

JUDAS had ſtill a powerful enemy left: Georgias, governor of Idumea, was at the head of that nation, and had haraſſed the Jews for ſome time. He therefore made no longer ſtay at Jeruſalem than the ending of that feſtival, immediately after which he marched at the head of only three thouſand foot and four hundred horſe. The two armies met, and † De hac. vid. ſup. vol. v. p. 472. ° 2 Macc. ubi ſupra, v. 30, & 31. P 1 Maccab. v. 46. & ſeq. 2 Maccab. xii. 30, & ſeq.

(H) Quick and wonderful indeed! if we conſider, that the peace could not be broken as ſoon as made, and that it was concluded on the fifteenth of Xanthicus, anſwering to the beginning of our April; and that the feaſt of pentecoſt fell either on the latter end of May or beginning of June; ſo that in leſs than two months time they burnt the two havens and fleets of Joppa and Jamnia, beat the Arabian Nomades, took the city of Caſpis, defeated Timotheus and his numerous army, burnt and deſtroyed Carnion and Ephron, beſides ſeveral other ſtrong fortreſſes, releaſed a vaſt number of their brethren, and were returned to Jeruſalem loaden with ſpoils and a vaſt multitude of female captives, and all this without any loſs on their ſide.

and the onſet was ſo fierce on both ſides, that Judas, till then ſo victorious, had the mortification to ſee ſome of his men killed on the ſpot. Doſitheus likewiſe a brave captain of his, whom we have lately mentioned upon another occaſion, having ſeized the Idumean general alive, had his arm cut off cloſe to the ſhoulder by a Thracian horſeman, and was forced to quit his priſoner, who took that opportunity to fly into Mareſa, a fortreſs near Eleutheropolis. Another part of his troops, commanded by Eſdrin, had ſuſtained the ſhock ſo long, that they were quite exhauſted. At length, Judas having again revived his men by freſh prayers and warlike canticles, the enemy took fright and fled, which gave him an opportunity of rallying his ſcattered forces to Odollam, a town near the field of battle, where they purified themſelves for the ſabbath then enſuing. On the day following, when he and his men came to view the ſlain, in order to bury them, they found upon every one of them ſome gold and ſilver idols, which had been conſecrated by the Jamnites, and which, though taken in plunder, were forbidden to be worn by the law of Moſes [q]. It was then eaſy for them to diſcover the true cauſe of their late defeat, and the juſt puniſhment of thoſe wretches, who had ventured to tranſgreſs in that clandeſtine manner. Judas did not loſe ſo fair an opportunity of inſpiring the ſurvivers with an abhorrence againſt all ſuch heatheniſh ſuperſtitions, and with a ſure confidence in God, as long as they kept themſelves free from them. He then ordered a voluntary collection to be made among them, which amounted to two thouſand drachms of ſilver, which he ſent to Jeruſalem, and cauſed an expiatory ſacrifice to be offered up for thoſe that had thus died in their ſin, and to avert any further puniſhment being inflicted on them for it in the other life (I) [r]. From thence Judas fell upon the ſouthern

Offers ſacrifices for the ſlain.

[q] Deut. vii. 25, & ſeq. ad fin.

[r] 2 Maccab ubi ſupra, verſ. 38.

(I) This is certainly the meaning of the hiſtorian (whatever might be that of the Jewiſh chief in cauſing this ſin-offering or reconciliatory ſacrifices and prayers to be made for thoſe dead ſinners; for he adds (41), that Judas gave thereby a ſignal proof of his belief of a reſurrection; for, ſays he, if he had not hoped that thoſe ſlain men would have riſen again from the dead, it had

(41) 2 Maccab. xii. 44.

parts of Idumea, took Hebron and other fortreſſes; after which he went and took Azotus from the Philiſtines, and pulled down all their images and altars where-ever he paſſed, and ſo returned to Jeruſalem loaden with freſh laurels and plunder.

Beſieges Acra.

All this while the fortreſs of Acra was in the hand of the enemy, and not only hindered many of the Jews from reſorting to the temple, but annoyed thoſe that did, eſpecially in Judas's abſence. Upon his coming therefore from Odollam, he reſolved to form the ſiege of it, and to that end gathered together his whole army, furniſhed himſelf with engines for throwing large ſtones, and with other inſtruments for the ſiege. The place being very ſtrong, and the garriſon numerous and well furniſhed with arms and proviſion, made it likely to hold out a conſiderable time. But the renegado Jews, a great number of whom were then in the place and knew the valour and ſtoutneſs of Judas and his troops, finding that they ſhould be forced at length to ſurrender, and knowing how little mercy they had to hope for from the conqueror, adviſed the commanders to make a vigorous ſally, in order to give an opportunity to ſome of their brethren to go to Antioch, and inform the young king of their diſtreſs. Their advice was taken, and the ſally ſo well managed, that a number of thoſe renegadoes, with ſome officers, found an opportunity to divide from the reſt, and to take the way to the court unperceived. Upon their arrival they went and informed the king of all that Judas had done. They added, that he perſecuted with the moſt mercileſs hatred all that dared had been vain and ſuperfluous to have cauſed prayers to be made for them.

Judas might, in all likelihood, have in his eye the defeat which the Iſraelites had formerly had upon ſuch another occaſion, in the caſe of Achan's ſacrilege (42); and it may as well be likewiſe, that the notion of praying and offering of ſacrifices for the dead might be then in uſe, if not of longer ſtanding. However that be, it muſt have been ſo in the time in which the hiſtorian wrote it, unleſs we will ſuppoſe with ſome interpreters, that the paſſage above-quoted was a gloſs of the tranſlator (43).

We may farther obſerve that the Arundelian copy and Syriac verſion mention three thouſand drachms, and the Latin one twelve thouſand (44).

(42) Joſh vii. 16, & ſeq. Vid. & Vol. iii. p. 77. (43) Vid. int. al. Tremel. in loc. (44) Vid. Uſſer. ann. ſub. A. M. 3841.

dared ſhew any fidelity to the Syrians, that he plundered, ſacked, and put to fire and ſword all that came in his way; and laſtly, that to ſhake wholly off the Syrian yoke, he had beſieged the garriſon of Acra, which had been placed there to keep their metropolis in awe, and that it muſt undergo the fate of Bethzura and other of his cities and fortreſſes, if not ſpeedily relieved. This news failed not to alarm the Syrian monarch, who ordered immediately all his generals to aſſemble his troops, and if they were not thought ſufficient, to hire a number of auxiliaries, and to march with utmoſt diſpatch into Judæa. His orders were punctually obeyed, and a vaſt army was drawn together, conſiſting of a hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe, thirty-two elephants, and three hundred armed chariots. Theſe, having the young king and his uncle Lyſias at their head, marched to the borders of Idumea, where they laid ſiege to the fortreſs of Bethzura [s]. We have already given an account of this war in a former volume †, and of the miraculous deliverance of the Jews, which ended in an advantageous peace to them, though diſhonourable to Antiochus, who, contrary to the articles of it, cauſed the fortifications of their metropolis to be demoliſhed.

Invaded by Antiochus.

MENELAUS, the apoſtate high-prieſt, who had accompanied the king in this expedition, in hopes of being reſtored to his ill-gotten dignity, and perhaps of obtaining the government of Judæa, left no ſtone unturned to ingratiate himſelf to the young monarch, though at the expence of his nation and religion; but his wicked policy failed him, and Lyſias, tired with ſo dear and diſhonourable a war, and fearful, leſt, if that wretch was left at Jeruſalem and inveſted with any power, he ſhould ſtir up a new revolt, either to ingratiate himſelf to the Jews, or to maintain his own authority againſt a people who he foreſaw would never brook it; thought it more adviſeable to find out ſome expedient to rid himſelf of ſo dangerous a wretch. He eaſily compaſſed his end, and his great credit with the young monarch, to whom he accuſed him as the author and cauſe of all the late miſchiefs, ſoon prevailed upon him to condemn him to ſuch a death as his treaſon, if not to Antiochus, yet to his God and nation, had deſerved. He was accordingly ſent under a ſtrong guard to Beræa, and there made to undergo the cruel puniſhment of the ashes [t], a death we have already described in a former volume *.

[s] 1 Macc. vi. 18, & ſeq. 2 Macc. xiii. 1, & ſeq. † vol. ix. p. 98, & ſeq.

Menelaus put to death.

THE Jews, though glad at the death of that monster, did not, however, gain much by the change; Lysias found means to persuade the young monarch, that there was a necessity of bestowing the high-priesthood on one that was not of the pontifical family; so that that dignity, which of right belonged to Onias, the son of that worthy high-priest who had been murdered at Antioch, was bestowed on Alcimus, or Jacimus as he is called by Josephus, who was of another family, though of the Aaronic race, and a person no less wicked than his predecessor. As for Onias, when he found his right given to one who had neither title nor merit, he resented the wrong to such a degree, that he retired into Egypt, in hopes by some other way to recompense himself for his loss. Accordingly, upon his coming to that court, he found means to ingratiate himself so well to Ptolemy Philometor and to his queen Cleopatra, that they granted him, some time after, the liberty of building a temple at Alexandria, like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he secured the priesthood to himself and descendants, as shall be seen in the sequel [u].

Onias deprived of the high-priesthood.

Demetrius recovers Syria.

WE have elsewhere seen how Demetrius, the lawful heir of the Syrian crown, had found means to escape from Rome, where he had been long kept as an hostage; and, being arrived at Antioch, had put to death both Antiochus Eupator and Lysias, and had made himself master of that capital, and soon after of the whole kingdom *. In the mean time Alcimus, whom the Jews had refused to admit to the high-priesthood, because he had obtained and sullied that dignity by open apostacy and conforming to the religion and customs of the Greeks, came to complain of it to the new monarch; he brought with him a number of other Jewish renegadoes, whom Judas had caused to be banished Judæa for the same crime. At the head of these miscreants he applied himself to the king, accused Judas and the rest of the Maccabean or Asmonean race, of having destroyed those that stood firm to their allegiance to him; of banishing others for not joining with his revolted party, and of other such crimes as they thought would render them odious to the court. They added, that their present distress was owing to their readiness in obeying the edicts of the late king, his uncle; and in the end

Judas accused by Alcimus.

[t] 2 Macc. xiii. 3, & seq. * vol. v. p. 163. & note.
[u] 2 Macc. xiv. 9, &c. Joseph. antiq. l. xii. c. 15, xx. 8. * vol. ix. p. 105.

end, Alcimus forgot not to beg to have the high-priesthood confirmed to him by Demetrius. This accusation, carried on with such seeming zeal for the king, did so exasperate him against the Jews, that he sent back the apostate, and with him Bacchides, governor of Mesopotamia, at the head of a considerable army, and with orders both to reinstate Alcimus to his dignity, and to carry on the war against the Maccabees. These two were joined in the same commission, and Alcimus, impatient to see himself restored to his dignity hastened the Syrian general, who was wholly devoted to him, to march forthwith into Judæa [w].

Upon their arrival, the two collegues, who knew what an enemy they had to deal with, endeavoured at first to decoy him by some treacherous stratagem; and to this end sent deputies to the Jewish chief to invite him to a conference, in order to end their dispute in an amicable way. They spared no promises nor vows, that he should come and go with utmost safety. Judas easily suspected their design, and rightly judged, that such a powerful army was intended rather to surprise him, than to decide the title of an intruding priest, hated and rejected by the whole nation. Instead therefore of accepting of their invitation, he set himself about preparing for a vigorous defence. His behaviour, however, was disapproved by several doctors and scribes, and particularly by some of the Assideans, whose sect we have spoken of in a former section. These, pretending to a greater degree of sanctity than the rest, insisted, that an amicable way was preferable to an hostile one, and that Alcimus, being of the race of Aaron, ought not to be lightly suspected of treachery against them. But finding Judas immoveable, they took it into their heads to try how far their mediation would work towards the desired peace; and having obtained an oath of safety from the treacherous high-priest, they came to him accompanied with some of their doctors and scribes. Alcimus gave them at first a friendly reception, but as soon as he had got them into his power, he caused sixty of them to be seized and put to death [x]. This action proved of singular service to Judas and his council, and sufficiently justified his refusal; and his whole army, being now fully convinced that nothing but the blackest perfidy was to be expected from that base pontiff and his collegue, resolved to stand up for their general, their religion, and liberty. Some few indeed, being terrified, either at the news of Alcimus's perfidy, or at the sight of of ſo great an army, left Jeruſalem and retired into the country; but there ſtayed with him a ſufficient number to ſuppreſs the power of the treacherous pontiff, in ſpite of his daily reinforcements from the renegado Jews, who reſorted to him, eſpecially after Bacchides's departure. For that general, whether ſtung with the reproaches, which his late perfidious action brought upon him, or with ſhame for not having been able to ſubdue an enemy by treachery, whom he dared not to attack openly, left Judæa and returned to Antioch, leaving Alcimus what he thought a ſufficient number of troops, to maintain himſelf in his new dignity. However, whilſt he was in his way to the Syrian court, he could not forbear committing ſome cruelties againſt thoſe Jews that came in his way. Particularly at Beſeth, or Bethſetha, he cauſed a conſiderable number of them to be ſeized and killed, and their bodies to be flung into a well [y].

[w] 1 Maccab. vii, 8, & seq. [x] Ibid. ver. 12. & seq.

Alcimus, on the other hand, ſpared neither pains nor coſt, flatteries nor cruelties, to ſtrengthen himſelf. Thoſe that were of greateſt ſervice to him were the Jewiſh renegados and malecontents, whom his careſſes and generoſity drew daily to his ſide. For with theſe, ſupported by the Syrian troops, he was making continual excurſions into ſome part or other of the country, plundering, burning, and deſtroying all that refuſed to acknowledge him. Judas, on his ſide, was no leſs watchful of all opportunities to oppoſe and ſuppreſs him; he defeated him in ſeveral rencounters, and took ſuch a ſevere vengeance on as many of the revolted Jews as fell into his hands, that the reſt dared no longer to act againſt him. Alcimus, being by this time convinced of the impoſſibility of maſtering his enemy, and of ever being admitted to approach the ſacred altars, unleſs he procured a much greater army to force the Jews into a compliance, returned to the Syrian court, renewed his former accuſations and complaints, which failed not to be backed by all the enemies of the Jews that were then at Antioch; and having preſented Demetrius with a rich crown of gold and other valuable preſents, obtained of that incenſed monarch a freſh army, the command of which was given to Nicanor, one of the bittereſt enemies the Jewiſh nation had, with expreſs orders to cut off Judas and his party, diſperſe his army, and to ſettle Alcimus in his power and dignity, beyond the poſſibility of any future oppoſition [z]. But Nicanor, who had lately lately been so feelingly convinced of the strength and bravery of the Jewish chief, and justly reckoned that one defeat more would complete his disgrace, entered Judæa with a numerous army indeed, but with a full resolution, if possible, to bring Judas to accept of a peace, rather than hazard any more battles with him.

[y] Ibid. v. 19. [z] Ibid. 21, & ſeq.

Nicanor sent against the Jews.

However, upon his first coming into that province, all the apostate Jews and the heathen, whom Judas had driven out of Judæa, came in shoals to list under him, in hopes to be soon resettled in their former habitations, so that his army was increased exceedingly, before he reached the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. On the other hand, the Jews, being informed of his approach, went to the temple to implore the divine assistance by fasting and prayers, and then prepared themselves for a vigorous defence. Nicanor advanced as far as the fortress of Dessau, where Simon, Judas's brother, having attempted to come out against him, was so terrified at the sight of his numerous army, that he was glad to retire to Jerusalem. All this, however, could not induce the Syrian general to begin any hostilities against the valiant Judas; on the contrary, he sent three of his head officers, Posidonius, Theodosius, and Matthias, to make overtures of peace to him. Judas, who had so lately observed the propensity of his men to a peace, acquainted them with the proposals made to him by Nicanor; which were so well approved by them, that a day and a place for an interview was agreed on by those two generals to give it the finishing stroke. Judas, however, justly suspecting the sincerity of the Syrians, caused a certain number of his stoutest men to be so advantageously posted, that they might come to his relief, in case any violence were offered to him. But his precaution at this time was needless, and Nicanor was so bent upon clapping up a peace with him, that their conference was carried on to the satisfaction of both parties; the articles were agreed on, after which Nicanor went and stayed some time in Jerusalem, without giving the Jews the least cause of complaint; so far from it, that, to avoid giving them any umbrage, he disbanded the greatest part of his army, and lived in perfect friendship with the Jewish nation [b] (K).

Makes peace with them.

This

[a] 2 Macc. xiv. 12, & seq. [b] Ibid. ver. 16, & seq.

(K) In this year some chronologers (45) place the introduction of the cycle, or rather period, of eighty-four years, in order to

(45) Vid. Bocher. de antiq. Pascal. Cyclo, ap. Prid. connect. sub an. 162.

Year of the flood 2838. Before Christ 161.

THIS harmony was, however, interrupted soon after by the perfidious high-priest, who, thinking the peace not sufficiently advantagious to him, went a third time to Antioch to complain against Nicanor, as a betrayer of his master's interest, and a friend to his mortal enemies; in testimony of which, he urged the peace lately concluded between them. Demetrius, though justly surprised that his general should venture to take such a step, not only without his leave, but without informing him of it, would not, however, recal him: he contented himself with refusing to ratify the articles, and sending him fresh orders to renew the war against the Jewish chief, and not to sheath his sword, till he had killed to settle the return of their new moons and festivals depending on them. We have shewn in a former volume †, what a wretched method they had used before the captivity, for discovering those new appearances without the help of astronomical tables. The inconveniency they found in it after their dispersion, obliged them to fall upon some surer method, that the whole nation might, in every place, observe them and the other festivals on the same day.

This method was the period of eighty-four years, which in all probability was only the period of Calippus, which that learned astronomer had published about a hundred and seventy years before, and consisted of seventy-six Julian years, and to which they added the Octoeteris, either thinking it answered their purpose better, or, which is more likely, as dean Prideaux conjectures (46), to make it look like a discovery of their own. For the Jews, who were always very jealous of being suspected to borrow any things of the heathen nations, may be supposed to have been more so at this time, when they had just gone through so great and general a reformation in their church.

But whether Judas and his sanhedrin, harrassed as they were on all sides by their enemies, could have leisure enough to find out and settle this new method, or whether they had not brought already something like it, either from Babylon, or from some of the Greeks; one thing is certain and worth observing, that this period of eighty four years was peculiar to the Jews, and has been used from thence downward to the time of the famous Hillel, who corrected their calendar in the year of Christ 360. It was afterwards followed by the primitive fathers in the christian church in the settling of their Easter till new disputes arose, and new corrections were introduced, which are foreign to our present subject.

† vol. iii. p. 202, (H). (46) Ubi supra.

killed him and wholly suppressed his party. Upon receiving this unexpected order, Nicanor was extremely displeased; on the one hand, he was loath to violate the peace, which had been so strictly kept by the Jews; on the other, he feared the resentment of the king, if he disobeyed such an express command. This last motive having at length determined him, his main study was now to find out some plausible pretence for laying hold on the Jewish chief. To this end he began to alter his behaviour towards him, and, instead of their former intimacy, to treat him with coldness and an air of superiority. This soon gave Judas to understand, that it was high time to look to himself, which he accordingly did, with such speed and secrecy, that he was quite disappeared before they had the least suspicion of it. Nicanor, surprised to find him gone out of his reach, endeavoured, as well as he could, to conceal his resentment: he found himself now obliged to raise a new army, and to act against him as an open enemy, and yet was both afraid and unwilling to do it. At length having gathered a sufficient number of forces and come towards Jerusalem, he resolved once more to try to surprise him by some foul stratagem, before he ventured upon an open rupture. To this end he sent some deputies to acquaint him, that he was not come to make war against him, but to treat of peace with him, and to invite him to a new interview. Judas came accordingly to the place agreed on, where their first greeting was in all appearance very friendly and peaceable; but having discovered his treacherous intent, he withdrew, and from that time refused to meet him any more. Nicanor then ordered his troops to advance towards Capharsalama, not far from Jerusalem, where, being met by the Jewish army, a battle was fought, in which he lost five thousand men. But the Jews, finding themselves unable to make head against the enemy's superior forces, retired, some to the city of David, and some into the temple [c]. Nicanor then led his army straight to Jerusalem, and getting upon the eminence of mount Sion, was addressed by some of the priests and heads of the people, who came in a submissive manner to him, and shewed him from that place the sacrifices which were then offered up in the temple for the prosperity of king Demetrius. But the exasperated general, having cast many insolent and blasphemous reflections on what he called their base superstition, swore the utter destruction of them and their temple, unless Judas was immediately Ordered to renew the war.

Attempts to surprise Judas.

Threatens Jerusalem.

[c] 1 Macc. vii. 27, & seq.

mediately delivered up to him. But Judas had happily put it out of their power, having betimes withdrawn himself into the land of Samaria with some of his faithful troops. However, it was in vain for the priests to urge this or any thing else in their own defence, to a man who was now determined to make them feel the effects of his resentment, for having missed his blow. The poor priests, seeing an exasperated enemy, at the head of a powerful army, at the very gates of the temple, and their valiant protector forced to abandon them to his mercy, had no other recourse but to their prayers and tears; whilst Nicanor, still bent rather upon stratagem than open war, bethought himself of a hellish expedient to oblige the Jews to apostatise, both from their God and their brave deliverer [d].

They had at that time an aged member of their sanhedrin, named Razis, a man highly esteemed by the nation for his strict piety and virtue, and whose inviolable fidelity to his religion and nation had gained him the title of father of the Jews. Nicanor, having heard so good a character of him, and that his example had preserved numbers of his people from apostatising, conceived a design, either to force him to it by fair or foul means, or else to do a despite to the nation, by putting him to some cruel death. To this end he dispatched five hundred of his soldiers to take and bring him to him. These, finding his castle strongly guarded, were endeavouring to break open the doors, or to force him out by setting it on fire, when the old man, after a long and stout defence, finding himself on the brink of being either taken, or burnt, rushed on the point of his sword, and pierced himself through. However, the wound not proving mortal, and he seeing the soldiers rushing into the house, he ran to the top of one of the turrets, and flung himself headlong down. This fall not having put an end to his life, he raised himself up, ran through the midst of them to a neighbouring steep rock, leaving a rivulet of blood behind, which issued out of his wounds, and having gained the top of it, he opened his wound with his hands, tore out his bowels, and flung them at his agashed enemies [e]. Thus died the brave old man, with an intrepidity rather to be admired than imitated. The Jews, however, have made no scruple to canonise him a martyr, though his death was rather that of a madman, or a desperado.

Razis Killshimself.

While

[d] Ibid. ver. 32, & seq. [e] Ibid. 37, & seq.

WHILE this was doing at Jeruſalem, Nicanor, having heard that Judas was in the land of Samaria, marched againſt him with an army of thirty-five thouſand men; and as he ſtill truſted more to his political ſtratagems, than to his ſtrength, he reſolved to attack him on the ſabbath, not doubting but they would, as they had formerly done, chuſe to be all murdered, rather than fight on that day. He was, however, aſſured of the contrary by ſome of that nation who were in his army, and who begged, that he would pay a regard to that ſacred day, which the God of heaven had conſecrated to his ſervice. Nicanor aſked them, with a ſcornful taunt, Whether there was indeed a mighty God in heaven, who had ordered the ſanctification of the ſabbath? And being anſwered in the affirmative, he replied, And I, who am powerful upon earth, do command you to fight for the king your maſter, and to obey his orders. This blaſphemous arrogance, as well as his former threatenings againſt the temple, did not go long unpuniſhed; for whilſt he was encamped in the neighbourhood of Bethoron, Judas marched immediately againſt him with his three thouſand men, and encamped near Adaſa, a place about thirty furlongs diſtant from the enemy. The firſt thing he did was to encourage his little army with proper texts out of the ſacred books, and, to aſſure them further of the divine aſſiſtance, he acquainted them with a comfortable viſion which he had lately had, in which he ſaw Onias, the late worthy high-prieſt, and after him the prophet Jeremiah, interceding for the Jewiſh people, and that the latter had preſented him with a ſplendid ſword, and given him at the ſame time an aſſurance of a complete victory. This ſpeech had the deſired effect, and his men were on a ſudden fired with ſuch courage, that they routed the enemy on the very firſt onſet; for Nicanor being killed one of the firſt, his men were ſeized with a panic, threw their arms down, and ſought in vain for a ſhelter; for Judas purſuing them, and the Jews of the neighbouring cities hearing of this victory, ſtopping their flight, killed them all to a man, inſomuch, that there was not a ſingle perſon left to carry the news to Antioch. This battle was won on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, anſwering to our February; and on the next day, the body of Nicanor being found among the ſlain, Judas ordered his head and right hand which he had ſo lately lifted up with threatening oaths againſt the temple, to be cut off and carried in triumph to Jeruſalem; where, being arrived with his army, he cauſed them to be expoſed to the view of the Jews and Gentiles, reminding them at the ſame time, that thoſe were the Nicanor attacks the Jews.

Is defeated and ſlain.

head

head and hand of the profane Nicanor, who had ſworn the total deſtruction of their ſacred temple. His tongue he likewiſe ordered to be cut out, and minced, and to be thrown to the birds, and his head and hand to be hung upon ſome of the higheſt towers of that city. After the uſual rejoicings for their late ſucceſs, a public anniverſary was inſtituted by the ſanhedrin, to be kept by future generations on the thirteenth day of Adar, by the name of the day of Nicanor [f], which has been kept ever ſince.

THIS victory gave the Jewiſh nation ſome peaceful intermiſſion, and their enemies, being juſtly terrified at the continual ſucceſſes of their leader, ſuffered him to return and take quiet poſſeſſion of the city, which his ſucceſſor was, however, forced to quit ſoon after to the then ſuperior power of the Syrian general and apoſtate Alcimus, who held it but a ſhort while, and for the laſt time, as the ſequel will preſently ſhew. During this peaceful interval, Judas, always intent on the intereſt of his religion and nation, obſerving how powerful the Romans were now grown, and how faithfully they protected and aſſiſted their friends, reſolved to procure an alliance with them, which might prove a bulwark againſt the oppreſſive power of the Syrians. Eupolemus the ſon of John and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, who had been already ſent with ſucceſs to Seleucus Philopator, were likewiſe choſen for this embaſſy. Their propoſals were readily accepted by the Roman ſenate, and a decree was accordingly made and engraven on copper, in order to be ſent to Jeruſalem; importing, that the Jews were thenceforth acknowledged as friends and allies of the Romans; that both nations ſhould be ready to ſuccour each other and the allies of either with all their power, and in no caſe ſhould aſſiſt their enemies; and for as much as Demetrius Soter had been complained againſt to the ſenate, as an oppreſſor of the Jewiſh nation, they ſent a letter to him, injoining him for the future to forbear all hoſtilities againſt them, and threatening him with an invaſion of his country by ſea and land, in caſe he did not comply with the purport of their decree [g]. This alliance was made in a lucky time; for whilſt it was tranſacting at Rome Demetrius, having received the news of Nicanor's defea and death, was ſending the right wing, that is to ſay, th flowe

The Jews make alliance with Rome.

[f] Ibid. ad ver. 50. 2 Maccab. xv. 1, & ſeq. Vid. & Joſeph antiq l. xii. c. 17.

[g] Id. ibid.

flower (L) of his army, into Judæa, with Bacchides and Alcimus at their head. It conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and

(L) It was uſual in thoſe days for the kings to command the right wing of their army, ſo that the beſt of their troops were generally placed there.

With relation to the alliance above-mentioned, Joſephus obſerves (47), that it was the very firſt that ever the Jews made with Rome, which is very probable alſo, from the manner in which the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees prefaces his account of it (48); for it appears from it, that the Jews till then knew but little of the Roman ſtate.

And here it will not be amiſs to enquire, how far the account which Joſephus gives of this alliance (49) is liable to the reproof which our learned Uſher gives it (50); that hiſtorian tells us, that the decree of the ſenate was written by Eupolemus and Jaſon, when Judas was high-prieſt, and his brother Simon general of the Jews. That Judas died before Alcimus, and ſo could not be choſen by the people to ſucceed him in that dignity, as he there affirms a little before, is plain, not only from the firſt book of the Maccabees, but even from Joſephus himſelf, who tells us in another place, that Alcimus had no ſucceſſor till ſeven years after his death (1), but that the ſuperſcription abovementioned was therefore forged by him, doth not ſo clearly follow. It is probable, on the contrary, that his finding it in thoſe very terms, in the Roman records, which he was then conſulting, might lead him for the preſent into that miſtake, that Judas had been choſen to the high-prieſthood after Alcimus's death.

If it be aſked, how it came to be ſo worded, we anſwer, that the Jewiſh nation being known to have had a high-prieſt at the head of all their affairs, both religious and civil, ſuch an alliance could not be well contracted without one. On the other hand, Alcimus having been conſtantly rejected by reaſon of his apoſtacy, it is not likely, that they would make uſe ſo much as of his name in ſo public a tranſaction. What other expedient could then be found, but that Judas, who was then at the head of all affairs, ſhould take that title upon him, at leaſt in the tranſacting of this alliance?

We might add, that it is not eaſy to gueſs, how the nation could be ſo long without a high-prieſt; for ſetting aſide thoſe religious functions which were peculiar to that dignity, and which might, for ought we know, have been ſuſpended during this interval; it is plain, the ſanhedrin, or grand Jewiſh ſenate, could neither aſſemble nor make any authentic decrees without him;

(47) Antiq l. xii c. 17. (48) Cap. viii. 1, & ſeq. (49) Antiq. l. xii. ſub fin. cap. 17. (50) Sub A. M. 3843. (1) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8.

and two thousand horse, and with these Bacchides entered Galilee, and took the city of Maseloth or Massadoth in the territories of Arbela, where he killed a great number of Jews. From thence they marched towards Jerusalem, but being told that Judas was retired into the neighbourhood of Eleasa, they went to attack him there. Judas had then but three thousand men, and when these beheld the superiority of the enemy's army, their hearts failed them so far, that only eight hundred of them stayed with him, and the rest conveyed themselves away, to the great regret of their valiant chief, who was now so sorely prest, that he had no time to get a new reinforcement, but must either fight or be cut in pieces. However, trusting in that superior assistance which had accompanied him hitherto, he encouraged his men the best he could; a dreadful fight ensued, which lasted from morning till evening; and Judas observing that the enemy's right wing, commanded by Bacchides, was the strongest, made a stout push at it, broke and pursued it as far as mount Azotus; but in the mean time, the left having quite surrounded him and his men, he was at length over-born by their numbers, and slain, after a long and vigorous defence; so that he fell down on a heap of his enemies, which he had killed round about him. As soon as the news of his death had reached Jerusalem, the whole city was filled with the most lively sorrow. An universal mourning was made for him for some time, and in imitation of that which David had made for Saul and Jonathan, they sung these lines of his, How is the mighty fallen? How is the preserver of Israel slain? However, his body did not fall into the hands of the enemy; for so, that we must suppose, either that every thing went irregular, or that they chose some person to that dignity; in which case why might not the choice of the nation, or at least of the heads of it, be deemed as valid at least, as that of a heathenish king, or rather tyrant and usurper? for such the Jews deemed even the best foreign princes that ruled over them.

Judas's death.

How the generalship came to be given in this inscription, rather to Simon the third brother, than either to Judas, or to Jonathan the next in birth, can only be guessed at. Judas treating then with the Romans as high-priest, might think the quality of general incompatible with it, and Simon might, for some signal exploit or other, have been at that time more famed than his brother.

One thing may be added, that this supposed inscription might imply no more in the Jewish historian, than that Eupolemus and Jason wrote, or sent the written decree to Judas the high-priest and to Simon the general.

whether the Syrians, after this victory, which redounded less to their honour than a defeat, left the field of battle, or whether a truce was made for the burying of the dead, the author tells us, that it was taken and carried off by his two brothers, Jonathan and Simon, and buried in the sepulchre of his father at Modin [h]. Thus died the brave Jewish general, six years after his father Matthias, and was succeeded by his brother Jonathan. The Maccabitish historian adds, that the rest of his victorious wars were omitted, because they were too numerous; and Josephus, that he never departed from the precepts of his father, who injoined him never to shun any labours or hazards for the service of his country, and that he died on the third year of his executing the office of high-priest [i], which confirms what was observed in the last note; so that, for ought appears, his only mistake was in making him die so long after Alcimus.

The news of his death was no sooner spread through Judæa, than it gave a new life to all the enemies of the Jews, so that the greatest part of these found themselves obliged, partly for want of a chief of known valour and conduct, and partly through a grievous famine, which then raged in the land, to acknowledge Bacchides their governor, and to submit themselves to him. Whilst therefore this general was taking all proper measures to secure his own government, some of the chief officers, that served under him, were ordered to make a diligent search after the principal friends and adherents of the Maccabees, and to put them to the most torturing deaths; insomuch, that this persecution did seem to exceed all that they had suffered since their return from Babylon, and caused as general defection. Under these dismal circumstances, those few who retained still a love for their religion and country had recourse to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus, and desired him to take upon him the command of the Jewish forces, and to endeavour to stop the cruel progress of the Syrian general. Jonathan was easily prevailed upon, and was gathering what forces he could get. But Bacchides, being informed of it, and coming against him with a design to surprize and put him to death, forced him and his few followers to retire into the deserts of Teckoa, where they encamped near the lake Asphar, being fenced by a large moras on the one side, by woods on the other, and the Jordan before him [k]. This situation, which he thought very advantageous to his handful of men, because there was but one narrow way to come at them, proved the very reverse, when they came to engage the enemy, as we shall soon see.

Jonathan succeeds him.

[h] 1 Maccab. ix. 1, & seq. ad 22. Joseph. antiq. l. xii. c. ult.
[i] Id. ad fin.

In the mean time, as soon as he heard that Bacchides was in full march against him, his first care was to secure their goods and equipage, which were very numerous, till better times. The Nabathæans, as we observed before, were then at peace with them. John therefore, the brother of Jonathan, was sent at the head of a convoy to go and deposit them with them. But in his way he was surprized by the Jambrians (M), who, issuing out of their city, fell upon him, slew him and his men, and carried away all their baggage. This injury did not go long unrequited. Jonathan being informed soon after that a great wedding was to be celebrated at Medaba, between one of the Jambrian chiefs and a daughter of a Canaanitish prince, or perhaps rather a prince of the Arabians now settled there, and having got notice of the day on which the bride was to be conducted to her new home, he and his men lay in ambush behind a hill; and as soon as the company, which was very numerous and of both sexes, was come nigh enough, they fell upon them, killed them to the number of four hundred, and carried away their plunder to their camp.

John killed by the Jambrians.

As soon as Bacchides heard of this retaliation upon the Jambrians, he hasted his army, with a resolution to attack the Jewish general on the sabbath, at which Jonathan found himself in no small distress. On the one hand, he was hemmed in on all sides, and on the other his men were with difficulty prevailed upon to stand in their own defence, partly at the sight of their superior enemy, and partly out of respect to the day; whether they had forgot the resolution and example of their late chiefs to the contrary, or whether they scrupled the validity of it. At length, Jonathan, finding himself prest by the enemy on the one side, and on the other by the reluctancy of his men to engage them, addressed himself to the latter Bacchides comes against the Jews.

[k] 1 Maccab. ix. 23. ad 45. Joseph. antiq. l. xiii. c. 1.

(M) These were a tribe of the plundering Arabs, who lived then at Medaba, formerly one of the cities which the Moabites took from the tribe of Reuben (z), and afterwards the Arabs from them.

(z) Conf. Josh. xiii. 16. Isaiah xv. 2. & Joseph. ant. l. xiii. 1.

latter in the following ſhort, but pathetic, ſpeech; "Come "on, and let us fight for our lives; for it is not now with "us, as it was in time paſt; for you ſee plainly that the bat- "tle is both before and behind us, and the Jordan on this, "and the moraſs and the wood on that, ſide. Neither is "there a place left for us to turn aſide to. Wherefore cry "ye now unto heaven, that ye may be delivered out of the "hand of your enemies". As ſoon as he had done ſpeaking, his men, what through his encouragement, and what through deſpair, made a bold puſh at the enemy, and killed a good number of them on the firſt onſet. Bacchides all the while ſeemed to aim ſolely at Jonathan, which being perceived by him, he attempted to make a full and effectual blow at him, but was prevented by his addreſs. The Jews, finding themſelves at laſt unable to cope with ſuch an army, caſt themſelves one and all into the river (MM), and ſwam to the other ſide, after having killed about a thouſand, or, according to Joſephus, two thouſand of the enemy [1].

Jonathan put to flight.

[1] Iid. ibid.

(MM) Whoever compares the ſituation of theſe places with the abſtruſe and imperfect account which the author of it gives of this action, muſt confeſs, with the judicious Calmet *, that Jonathan muſt have croſſed the Jordan twice, inſtead of once, elſe he could never have had that river before, and Bacchides behind. For when he retired to Teckoa, the river muſt then have parted them, and he muſt have croſſed it again to come to Medeba to puniſh the Jambrians; for Medeba was on the eaſt ſide, and Teckoa, where they had incamped at firſt, was on the weſt ſide of that river.

Had he then croſſed it again, after this bloody expedition, which would have been the third time, he could not have had it before and Bacchides behind him, unleſs we ſuppoſe that he alſo croſſed it either higher or lower, and ſo fetched a long compaſs about to incloſe him; in which caſe there would be three croſſings omitted, viz. two of Jonathan's, and this of Bacchides's. But it is more probable, conſidering what haſte the latter was in to fall upon him, that he overtook him as they returned from Medeba, and before he could croſs again to return to Teckoa; and this may be the reaſon when they found themſelves overpowered, of their flinging themſelves into that river, and ſwimming acroſs it, in order to recover their camp, which might be ſo well ſituate and fortified, that it diſcouraged the Syrians from purſuing them further.

* Sub voce Jonathan IX.

BACCHIDES, now convinced that they would fight on the sabbath, as well as on other days, did not think fit to pursue them further, but returned with his army to Jerusalem, and there gave orders for the fortifying and garisoning of such places as were most likely to keep the Jews in awe, and oblige the Maccabitish party, either to submit, or at least to forbear all future attempts against him. Among these were Bethoron, Jericho, Emmaus, Bethel, Thimnatha, Bethzura, and some others, especially the fortress of Acra, into which, besides a new supply of men, arms, and provisions, he sent the children of some of the principal Jews to be kept as hostages there, to prevent their parents and relations going over to Jonathan and his party. At the same time the apostate Alcimus, finding himself master of Jerusalem, gave orders for demolishing the wall of the temple, which inclosed the court of the priests from that of the people (N), and which had been formerly built by the direction of the prophets Haggai and Zachary. But he had scarce began the work, before he was struck with a dead palsy, which took his speech from him, so that he died without being able to speak a word, or to take any care of his house. After his death, Bacchides, having by that time brought all Judæa into subjection, thought he had no further business there, but returned to Antioch, and left the Jews and heathens to live in peace there, which they did for about two years [m] (O).

Year of the flood 2839. Before Christ 160.

JONATHAN

[m] Iid. ibid.

(N) Or more probably that which divided the court of the circumcised from that of the uncircumcised. For as his apostacy had made him incur the hatred of all the sincere Jews, it is not unlikely, that he caused this partition wall to be pulled down to mortify them, and to ingratiate himself with the heathen and the renegadoes of his nation. However, the book of the Maccabees calls it the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary (3), and Josephus (4) the wall of the old sanctuary, and adds to it the works of the prophets.

(O) It may be also likely enough, that he was privately recalled by Demetrius; for that prince at this time stood in great need of the friendship of the Romans (5), and had probably received their letter, which ordered him to cease all hostilities against the Jewish nation; so that he was forced to recall him, yet so privately, that the Jews should not be too elated by it; and this may be the reason why neither Josephus nor the book of the Maccabees mention it.

(3) 1 Maccab. ix. 54. (4) Antiq. l. xii. c. 17. (5) Vide Polyb. legat. 120.

JONATHAN and his party made the best of this short interval to secure themselves, so that they lived quietly and without any mistrust. This gave his enemies an opportunity to make a fresh attempt upon him, by inviting Bacchides to surprise and destroy the whole party, which they sent him word might be done in one night. Demetrius, who had been by this time acknowledged king of Syria by the Romans, and had made a new alliance with them, having now nothing to fear from that side, was easily persuaded to send Bacchides with a powerful army into Judæa. As soon therefore as this general was got there, he sent letters to those of his party, with orders to seize Jonathan and his men, and to bring them to him, as had been agreed before. This plot, however, had not been carried on with such secrecy, but that vigilant chief had notice of it time enough, both to disappoint it, and to punish those traitors that had hatched it; for he came suddenly upon them, took fifty of the chief conspirators and put them all to death; after which the rest were soon dispersed, and the whole design discomfited [n].

A plot against Jonathan.

Defeated.

AFTER this signal escape, Jonathan, being informed of Bacchides coming against him, and finding himself by far too weak to withstand so great a force, retired to Bethbasi, or, as Josephus calls it, Bethlagan, a place strongly situate in the desart of Jericho, which he and his brother Simon fortified, and filled with all necessary provisions for a siege. Bacchides came, according to his expectation, and laid close siege to the place with his numerous army, which he had increased with all his adherents in Judæa, whom he summoned to repair to him thither. As the siege was like to last long, Jonathan, after a vigorous defence, left the place under the care of his brother, and with a small brigade went out to reinforce his army; and crossing the country, defeated Odonarches and his brethren, and the sons of Phasiron, in their tents. These we suppose were part of the besieging host. From thence he went on, attacked, and annoyed other parts of their camp, and forced Bacchides to come to their assistance; which being perceived by Simon from within, he made a vigorous sally, burnt their engines, then falling upon his army, discomfited it on one side, whilst his brother did the same on the other. Bacchides, vexed at the heart to meet with such a defeat, where he expected an easy victory, vented his rage on those who had invited him out of Syria, and put many of them to death, resolved to raise the siege and to return to Antioch. The only difficulty was how to do it, if not with honour, at least with as little disgrace as might be; which as soon as Jonathan understood, he sent him some messengers with proposals for a peace; which were gladly accepted, and soon after ratified by both parties. By these articles all prisoners were to be released on both sides, which was accordingly done; and Bacchides, having sworn never more to act hostilely against Jonathan, departed into Syria, and punctually kept his oath to him as long as he lived [o]. It seems likewise, that by these articles Jonathan was left, if not governor, at least deputy-governor, of Judæa; for as soon as Bacchides was gone, he went and settled in Michmash (P), where he judged Israel, pretty near like the ancient Judges. He began with making a severe example of all the apostate Jews, who were the cause of all the wars and persecutions that fell upon their nation, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes downwards to that time. After this he set about reforming the Jewish church and state. So that from this time Judæa began to enjoy a perfect peace and free exercise of their religion, the happy effects of their general's valour and piety [p].

Jonathan besieged by Bacchides.

Defeats him.

[n] 1 Maccab. ubi supra. v. 57. ad 61. Joseph. ubi supra.

Makes peace with him.

Judges the Jews.

Soon after this, the troubles that happened in Syria, and of which we have already spoken in the last volume †, gave the Jews a fair opportunity of wholly recovering their liberty, and not only of raising themselves into a state of independency, either from that kingdom, or that of Egypt; but of being highly courted by both. But, above all, Demetrius, who so feelingly knew their strength and bravery, had most cause to use all possible means to prevent their declaring for his competitor Alexander Balas. To effect which, he wrote a letter to Jonathan full of expressions of the sincerest friendship and confidence, and in which he gave him full power to levy what forces he should think fit, and to cause new arms to be fabricated, and declared him his new friend and ally. In the end, he added an order for setting at liberty all the hostages which had been sent by Bacchides into the fortress

Year of the flood 2845. Before Christ 153. Demetrius's letter to Jonathan.

[o] Id. ibid. & seq. [p] Macc. ubi sup vers 62. ad fin. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 2. † vol. ix. p. 110, and following.

(P) This town was in the tribe of Benjamin east of Bethaven (6), about nine miles from Jerusalem (7), and between it and Gibeon. Eusebius tells us in the place last quoted, that it was still very considerable in his time.

(6) 1 Sam. xiii. 5, (7) Loc. Hebr. sub voce.

treſs of Acra, and had been detained there ever ſince, notwithſtanding the late peace concluded with him. As ſoon as Jonathan had received the letter, he brought it to Jeruſalem, cauſed it to be read before that gariſon, and demanded the hoſtages to be delivered unto him according to the tenor of it. The people, ſeeing how great a power he was now inveſted with, dared not heſitate about the matter, but immediately complied with his demand; after which Jonathan found his army encreaſe exceedingly, there being now no check nor danger in joyning him. On the other hand, thoſe gariſons which Bacchides had left in ſeveral ſtrong places of Judæa above-mentioned, not finding themſelves ſtrong enough to withſtand him, forſook them and fled. Thoſe only of Bethzura and Acra, which were moſtly filled with apoſtate Jews, not daring to follow their example, leſt they ſhould be purſued and meet with their juſt deſerts, reſolved to ſtand it out to the laſt, and either ſurrender upon ſafe terms, or to die ſword in hand. Jonathan, however, did not think fit to beſiege them immediately, but went to Jeruſalem, where his preſence was more required, and there cauſed the repairs both of the city and temple to be forthwith ſet about, fixing his abode in that city to ſee the work more effectually finiſhed [q].

When Alexander underſtood what a powerful friend Jonathan was like to prove to the ſide he ſhould declare himſelf for, and the favours which Demetrius had lately bribed him with, he reſolved to outbid him and to draw him to his intereſt. He ſent him a moſt obliging letter (Q), in which he beſtowed the high-prieſthood on him, and accompanied it with Alexander's letter to him.

[q] 1 Maccab. x. 10, & ſeq. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 3, & 4.

(Q) The purport of it was to this effect: "King Alexander "to his brother Jonathan, &c. Being informed of your power "and valour, and that you are worthy of our friendſhip, we "conſtitute you high-prieſt of your nation, and it is our pleaſure "that you be inrolled in the number of the king's friends. To "this end we have ſent you a purple robe and a golden crown, "not doubting a ſuitable return from you for our affection and "friendſhip (8).

We have often obſerved in the courſe of this hiſtory, that the purple was a mark of the greateſt dignity next to the royal one; it was eſteemed ſuch among the Jews, Perſians, Macedonians, &c. and thoſe that wore it were called the king's friends, and implied the ſame as the king's couſins here with us.

(8) Joſeph antiq. l. xiii. c. 5.

Jonathan made high prieſt.

with rich preſents, and among them a purple robe and a golden crown [r]. Jonathan readily accepted of them, put on the prieſtly veſtments, on the feaſts of tabernacles [s], in the ninth year of his government (R), and in the ſeventh month of that year. However, as he would not ſeem wholly to receive that dignity from a prince, whoſe right to the Syrian crown was ſo juſtly ſuſpected, he got himſelf choſen to it by the ſuffrages of the Jewiſh nation; and indeed not without a ſpecious right to it; for being, as we hinted in the laſt note, of the family of Joarib, and conſequently of the firſt claſs of the Aaronic race, that was ſufficient to intitle him to it upon the failure of that of Jozadack, which had enjoyed it ever ſince their return from Babylon; and we don't read of any ſurvivor of it except Onias, who was then in Egypt, and had there, if not apoſtatiſed, at leaſt made a conſiderable ſchiſm, by ſetting up a new temple, altar, and prieſthood there. As ſoon therefore as Jonathan was inveſted with his new dignity, his firſt care was to raiſe new forces, and to cauſe a great number of arms to be made, reſolved to ſide with Alexander. When Demetrius found that his competitor was like to deprive

[r] 1 Maccab. ibid. ver. 17, & ſeq. Ant. ubi ſupra, c. 5. [s] Iid. ibid.

(R) Joſephus (9) ſays in the fourth year after the deceaſe of his brother Judas; but we have already ſhewn in a late note his miſtake in making this laſt outlive and ſucceed Alcimus, the contrary of which appears from the book of the Maccabees (10), which expreſsly mention the inſtallation of Jonathan to have been on the hundred and ſixtieth year of the Grecian kingdom, which anſwers to the three thouſand eight hundred and fifty-ſecond year of the world, and one hundred and fifty-three before Chriſt (11).

We have likewiſe ſhewed at the cloſe of the laſt ſection †, that Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, was deſcended from the prieſtly family of Joarib, though not from that of Jaddua or Jaddus, the high-prieſt, whoſe lineal heir and ſucceſſor was the Onias whom we lately mentioned to have retired into Alexandria, and there built a temple for the uſe of the Egyptian Jews.

Jonathan if not his brother Judas, was therefore the firſt of the family, who enjoyed the pontifical dignity, which continued in it through a number of ſucceſſors till Herod's time, who, from hereditary, made it venal and arbitrary, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel.

(9) Ibid. (10) Conf. 1 Macc. x. 21. & ix. 3. 28, & 54. (11) Vid. Uſſ, ann, & the Marg. of the Macc. in loc. † vol. x. p. 119. (K) prive him of so important an ally, he spared neither favour nor promises to prevent it: he sent him a long letter, couched in the most obliging terms, and wherein he artfully disguised his resentment for his defection, under the greatest professions of confidence in his friendship and loyalty. In acknowledgement of which, and to bind him still faster to his interest, he promised him a general relaxation of all arrears, an exemption from future tribute, imposts, or taxes, a free exercise of their religion, with many other concessions and privileges, vastly exceeding those which Alexander had made to him, and too great indeed to be really designed by that monarch: at least the memory of the many mischiefs and persecutions, which they had so lately suffered under him, made them suspect the sincerity of them; and indeed such was the character of that prince, and the present situation of his affairs, that they might well extort such exorbitant promises from him, without any real intention to perform them. However, whether through resentment or diffidence, Jonathan chose rather to enter into an alliance with his competitor, and disclaimed all future friendship with a man who had given them so many feeling proofs of his hatred to their nation. So that from this time they stuck close to Alexander's interest [t], and it was lucky for them that they did so, since Demetrius was soon after defeated and killed by him, as we have seen in a former volume *.

Demetrius's second letter to him.

Suspected of insincerity.

THE new monarch, however, having by that decisive battle made himself master of the Syrian crown, forgot not to express his gratitude to the Jewish chief; he invited him soon after to his nuptials, to which Jonathan went with a numerous retinue, and was received with great marks of friendship and esteem. During his stay at Ptolemais, where they were celebrated, some disaffected Jews came to exhibit some accusations against him; but the king, resolved not to hear any thing against his friend, caused a proclamation to be made through the city, expressly forbidding any such complaint to be brought before him. To mortify his enemies the more, he caused him to sit by him cloathed in purple, confirmed all his former grants to him, and made him generalissimo of Judæa, and gave him some other titles and government in his kingdom (S); all which did cast such a damp upon his accusers,

Year of the flood 2849. Before Christ 150.

Jonathan's reception at Ptolemais.

[t] Iid ibid. * vol. ix. p. 115.

(S) The book of the Maccabees says, that he made him one of the Malabarchas, which our version after the vulgate renders a duke, some critics lord-high-steward, others lord-chief-sewer; which accuſers, that they ſneaked away for fear of further miſchief. Jonathan, on the other hand, having made ſome conſiderable preſents to the king and queen, and to their court, returned into Judæa [u], highly ſatisfied with his reception, and much more with his choice of ſuch an ally. From this time the Jewiſh nation became more and more conſiderable, not only in Judæa, where they enjoyed every branch of liberty, whether religious or civil; but in other countries alſo, and particularly in Egypt; where Ptolemy Philometor and his ſiſter and wife Cleopatra raiſed many of them to conſiderable poſts both at court and in the army, intruſted them with the keeping of their principal fortreſſes, and had given the command of their army to Onias and Doſitheus. Theſe two, if we may believe Joſephus [w], ſeem to have wholly ingroſſed the king's favour during his whole reign. But Onias could not be ſatisfied with it, whilſt he ſaw himſelf deprived of the dignity of the Jewiſh high-prieſthood, and of the pleaſure of performing the functions of that ſupreme dignity, which his birth intitled him to. Since therefore there were no hopes that Jonathan would ever yield to him that of Jeruſalem, he had no other way to make himſelf amends for it, but by ſetting up a new one in Egypt; and his great credit with the king and queen did eaſily procure him the liberty of doing it. But as this tranſaction did no further concern the Jews of Judæa, to which we confine ourſelves, than as it made a great ſchiſm with them, we ſhall relate it in the margin (T).

Jews in Egypt highly eſteemed.

A Jewiſh temple built in Egypt.

By

[u] 1 Maccab. ibid. ver. 59. ad 66. Antiq. ubi ſupra.
[w] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 6. Cont. Apion. l. ii. See alſo, vol. ix. p. 237, which offices, and ſome others of the like nature, are ſtill held by the electors of Germany. But it is more likely, as Grotius in another place ſeems to have proved it (12), that it meant ſome higher place than an office in the king's houſe, viz. the government of ſome tribe or province in the kingdom.

(T) This edifice, which was built after the model of that of Jeruſalem, but neither ſo large nor ſo ſumptuous the reader may ſee deſcribed in Joſephus (1). It was ſurrounded with a very ſtrong ſtone wall, and had the altar of incenſe and burnt offerings, &c. like that in Judæa; only, inſtead of the ſeven-branch candleſtick, Onias contented himſelf with a ſtately golden lamp, which hung from the roof by a chain of the ſame metal.

The

(12) Comment. in Matth. xix. 28. (1) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 6. l. xiv. c. 14. l. xviii. c. 20. Bell. Jud. l. vii c. 30.

By this time Alexander having, partly by his negligence and debaucheries, and partly by the tyranny and cruelties of his favourite Ammonius, as it were, invited young Demetrius out of his retirement in Cnidos, to come and recover the crown from him †, Apollonius, then governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, revolted to him, whilſt Jonathan, remembering his late alliance and obligations, ſtuck cloſe to Alexander's intereſt. Apollonius, therefore, having got a conſiderable army together, marched againſt him as far as Jamnia; but not daring to advance farther into the mountainous Year of the flood 2851: Before Chriſt 148.

† See before, vol. ix. p. 116, & ſeq.

The place he pitched upon was the ruins of an ancient Egyptian temple, within the nome of Heliopolis, which, being therefore polluted, gave no ſmall ſcandal to the Jews there, who were moreover very ſtrenuous againſt the ſetting up any temple againſt that of Jeruſalem, as being expreſsly contrary to the Moſaic law. To remove theſe two ſcruples, Onias trumped up a prohecy out of Iſaiah (2), importing, that an altar ſhould be ſet up unto the Lord in the midſt of the land of Egypt, and alluding to the times of the goſpel, which he applied to this new edifice he was about to build; and whereas one of the Egyptian cities there mentionis called הַחֶרֶס עִיר, hair hacheres in the text, which ſignifies the city of the ſun, though the keri or margin reads it עִיר הַהֶרֶס, hair heres, the city of deſtruction (3); Onias took it in the former ſenſe, and ſo is ſuppoſed to have made choice of the territory of Heliopolis, as if it had been alluded to by the prophet (4). Though the laſt quoted adds another reaſon, viz. his being governor of that diſtrict, and having built a city in it, which he had peopled with Jews, and called by his name Onion.

When he had once removed theſe two difficulties, he did not want for prieſts and levites to officiate under him, ſo that the divine ſervice was afterwards performed in this new temple in the ſame manner as it was at Jeruſalem, till both were deſtroyed by the ſame Roman emperor (5).

However, thoſe prieſts, who had once officiated in the Egyptian, were never ſuffered to do ſo in the Jewiſh, but were, if we may believe the talmudiſts (6), looked upon as guilty of the ſame ſchiſm with thoſe who had ſacrificed on the high places, and as ſuch were only admitted to the very loweſt ſervices. They received their elemoſynary ſtipends out of the revenue of the temple, but were excluded from eating any of its holy things.

(2) Iſaiah xix. 18, 19. (3) Vid. Munſter in loc. (4) Scaliger in Chronol. Euſeb. Prid. Connect. ſub an. 149. (5) Vid. Joſeph Bell. Judaic. l. vii. c. 30. (6) Vid. Miſhn. tract. Menachoth, c. 15.

tainous parts of Judæa, for fear of losing the benefit of his cavalry, he sent him a daring message to come and fight him in the plain country. Jonathan readily accepted the challenge, and marched from Jerusalem to Joppa at the head of ten thousand men, and in his way was met by his brother Simon with a reinforcement. The town being garisoned by the troops of Apollonius, they shut the gates against the Jewish general, and obliged him to take it by siege, which he quickly did, and almost in full sight of the enemy's army. As soon as Apollonius perceived it, he came against him with eight thousand foot and three thousand horse, leaving a thousand more of these behind to surprise the Jews on the rear, whilst he attacked them in front, and so made a feint, as if he was marching with the former southward towards Azotus. Jonathan came out as he expected, and he, facing about, fell upon him, not doubting but his stratagem would gain him a complete victory. But he soon found his project discomfited by the experienced Jewish general; for having drawn up his army in the figure of an oblong square, not unlike the Macedonian phalanx, his brave troops bore the brunt of the battle on both sides with unusual firmness till the evening, when Jonathan, observing the enemy's horse to be quite spent, rushed on the sudden upon the foot which was now destitute of their cavalry, and totally routed them. The greatest part of them fled to Azotus, and sheltered themselves in the temple of Dagon, whither the Jewish army pursued them; and having made themselves masters of the town, set it on fire temple and all. The number of the slain, whether by the sword, or the flames, amounted to eight thousand. From Azotus Jonathan went and plundered some other neighbouring towns; only that of Ascalon, which met him with presents and compliments of submission, was spared, after which they returned to Jerusalem loaden with rich plunder. Alexander, soon after hearing of Jonathan's faithfulness and victory, sent him a present of a rich buckle or clasp, such as those only of the royal family used to wear, and which fastened their purple mantle to the shoulder: he gave him moreover the city and territory of Ecron, and some other marks of his esteem [x].

Jonathan challenged by Apollonius.

Defeats him.

Alexander's gratitude to him.

On Philometor's coming with his army into Palestine, on pretence to succour his son-in-law, but in reality to dispossess him of his kingdom, whether to seize it for himself as the author of the Maccabees pretends [y], or, which is more likely from the sequel, in favour of young Demetrius som ſome of the enemies of the Maccabees tried to render them odious to him, by ſhewing him the devaſtations they had lately made, particularly the ruins of Azotus and of the temple of Dagon, and the carcaſes of thoſe they had ſlain, and which were ſtill ſtinking above ground. But that prince, whatever his reaſons were, could not be induced to ſhew any reſentment againſt them for it. On the contrary, he laid all the blame of it upon Apollonius; and when Jonathan came to pay him a viſit at Joppa with a numerous retinue, he met with a kind reception from him, accompanied him to the river Eleutherus, and returned to Jeruſalem [z].

[x] Maccab. ibid. ver. 74. ad fin. [y] Ibid. c. xi. 1. & seq.

THE reader may remember, how this prince, having given the kingdom of Syria and his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander to young Demetrius, ſurnamed Nicanor, died of the wounds he received in the laſt battle, before he could well ſettle him on his throne. Jonathan therefore took this opportunity, Egypt being then imbroiled in a civil war about the ſucceſſion, and neither able nor inclined to aſſiſt the new Syrian king, to begin the ſiege of Acra, which was ſtill gariſoned by Syrian troops, and was a great check to, and always ready to annoy, the Jews, going to and from Jeruſalem. He wanted neither forces nor engines to form it in the beſt manner; but in the height of the ſiege, complaint having been made of it to the young king, he was forced to leave it to appear before him at Ptolemais. However he gave orders that it ſhould be carried on with the ſame vigor, as if no ſuch ſummons had been ſent to him; and taking with him ſome of the moſt conſiderable prieſts and elders of his nation, came to the court, where he pleaded his cauſe ſo well before that prince, and backed it with ſuch rich preſents, that he was received into his favour and friendſhip, and quite diſcomfited his accuſers, who were ſent away with diſgrace. After this, Nicanor confirmed him in his pontifical dignity, inrolled him in the higheſt place among his friends, and, for the annual tribute of three hundred talents, releaſed, not only Judæa, but alſo the three toparchies of Lydda, Apharema, and Ramatha (U), from all future taxes whatſoever [a].

Jonathan beſieges Acra.

JONATHAN

[z] 1 Maccab. xi. 4, & ſeq. See alſo vol. ix. p. 119. [a] 1 Macc. Ibid. ver. 20, & ſeq. Joſeph. ant. lib. xiii. c. 8.

(U) Theſe three with their territories had been diſmembered from Samaria, ſome time before, and joined to Judæa; and the late Demetrius, in his courting letter to Jonathan, confirmed to him the poſſeſſion and immunities of them (13); and now the preſent

(13) Vid. 1 Macc. x. 30.

JONATHAN upon his return to Jerusalem doubled his strength and vigour against the fortress; but finding that it was like to hold out long and to cost him dear, he bethought himself of procuring an order from the king for the evacuation both of that and some other places, from which he complained to him the garisons were still annoying the Jews. He chose a lucky juncture for sending this request: for Demetrius having a little before disbanded his troops, had given occasion to that revolt which Tryphon raised at Antioch, and hath been spoken of in a former volume *. He was therefore glad to grant it to him, upon condition he should assist him with some of his forces to quell the rebels; and we have seen there, how effectually the three thousand men, which he sent him, did it, and at the same time retaliated to the Antiochians the many cruelties which those of their own nation had formerly suffered from the Syrians, both in Judæa and out of it [b]. Demetrius, however, instead of performing his promise to Jonathan, broke even those which he had made to him at Ptolemais, and began to insist on his paying all the taxes and customs which he had remitted to him at that interview. But it was not long before a new insurrection, in which he was driven out of his kingdom by Antiochus, the son of Alexander, made him repent of his perfidy to the Jews, and of his tyranny to his own subiects.

Demetrius's treachery to the Jews punished.

THE new king did not forget to secure the Jewish general to his interest; he confirmed to him all the former grants, and added some others to them: and among them he made his brother Simon general of all his forces, and governor of all the sea-coasts, from the ladder of Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt, upon condition, that those two brothers should declare for him. Jonathan was easily prevailed upon to forsake his old treacherous ally, and to acccept of the offers of the present king renews the same grant, and allots the revenues of it towards the maintenance of the service of the temple, and of the priests in duty (14).

Antiochus mounts the Syrian throne. Year of the flood 2855. Before Christ 144.

* See before, vol ix. p. 129. [b] 1 Macc. xi. ver. 41, & seq.

The reader may see the letter which he sent to Lasthenes in favour of the Jews in the place last quoted. He there styles that Cretan general his father, because he had assisted him in the recovery and preserving of his crown; and commands him to send a copy of his letter to the Jewish general, to be set up on some eminent place of the temple, to be perused by all comers.

(14) Ibid. xi. 22. ad. 30. Ant. l. xiii. c 8. ad fin.

the new one: he sent him immediately an embassy to thank him for his favours, and to assure him of his best services. In pursuance of which, having obtained a commission for raising a good army, the two Jewish generals put themselves at the head of it, crossed the Jordan, and defeated Demetrius's troops that were sent to make a diversion in Galilee. In this expedition, Jonathan was in imminent danger of being cut in pieces by the enemy: he had incamped his army near the lake of Genezareth, and was advancing early one morning towards Azor. In his march he fell unexpectedly into an ambush, which had been placed among the defiles of the mountains to surprise him. As soon as he perceived his danger, he disposed his men the best he could for a brave defence; but the greatest part of them, being seized with a panic, forsook him and fled; so that he was left with only fifty resolute fellows, and two of his commanding officers, Mattathias and Judas. With these he faced about, and fought so desperately, that the enemy began to give way; which being perceived at a distance by his runaways, they rallied again to him, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that they gained a complete victory, and pursued the Demetrians to their very camp at Cadesh. They killed of them about three thousand men [c]; after this Jonathan sent his brother to go and besiege Bethzura, which had till then been garisoned by heathens and renegado Jews, whilst himself went and secured some of the principal cities of that province; particularly that of Ascalon, which opened its gates to him; that of Gaza, which he forced to surrender, and, in a word, all the towns from thence to Damascus. Simon on his side, having made himself master of Bethzura, freed that neighbourhood from the continual insults of that garison, and returned to Jerusalem, whither his brother came also presently after.

Jonathan falls into an ambush.

Fights desperately and beats the enemy.

THESE successes of the two brothers abroad had cast such a damp on their enemies at home, that they found all things in quietness at their return. However, Jonathan did not think fit to trust to the gratitude of the new king, to whom he had done such signal services; but set about means of preserving the peace and liberty of his nation, on the foot he had so happily established it. To this end he sent a new embassy to Rome to renew his alliance with the senate, which was done with great readiness on their part. In their return, his embassadors were ordered to do the same with the Lacedæmonians and other Grecian states, with whom they were in Alliance with Rome renewed.

[c] Ibid. ver. 67, & seq. Joseph. ubi supra, c 9.

friendſhip, which they did with the ſame eaſe and ſucceſs.

And with Sparta.

In their letter to the Lacedæmonians, the ſubſtance of which the reader will find in the margin (W), they reminded them of their letter formerly ſent to their high-prieſt (Onias III.) by Arius their king †, and incloſed a copy of it with their own. But whilſt theſe alliances, were tranſacting, news were brought to him that the Demetrian generals, whom he had latley defeated, were advancing towards him with a more numerous army. To pervent therefore their entering into Judæa, he marched out with utmoſt expedition at the head of his forces, reſolved, if poſſible, to attack them in their own territories. He made ſuch good ſpeed, that he reached Amathis, a place on the frontiers of Syria, and incamped over-againſt them. Their deſign it ſeems was to ſurpriſe his camp on the following night, but Jonathan having timely notice of it, kept his men under arms

† See before, vol vi. p. 517, & note

(W) Jonathan, high-prieſt, with the elders and prieſts of the Jewiſh nation, unto the ephori, ſenate, and people of Lacedæmon, their brethren, greeting:

" Whereas we have found, among our records, a letter long
" ſince written by Arius, one of your kings, to Onias, formerly " high prieſt of the Jews, wherein he expreſſed your friendſhip
" and affinity to our nation, which affinity we acknowledged with " greater honour, becauſe we find it confirmed by our ſacred " books: We have ſent theſe our deputies unto you to renew
" the ſaid alliance and brotherly union with you, leſt we ſhould
" be thought unmindful of it, by reaſon of the long interval " which has elapſed ſince the receipt of it.

" Be it therefore known unto you, that we have had you al" ways in our minds, both in our ſolemn feſtivals and in our " prayers and ſacrifices, as our brethren and allies, rejoycing at " your ſucceſſes, and holding with pleaſure the proſperity and " ſplendor of your republic. As for us, though we thought " ourſelves honoured by your friendſhip and alliance, yet we " have hitherto forborn to be chargeable or troubleſome to you
" during all the grievous wars and perſecutions which we have been expoſed to from our tyrannous neighbours; but now, ſince
" heaven has bleſt us us with better times, we have thought fit " to ſend to you Numenius and Antipater, our late deputies " to the Roman ſenate, with freſh offers of our beſt ſervices to " you, not doubting but they will be as heartily accepted of
" by you, as they are tendered by us (15)".

(15) Vid. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9.

arms all that night, ready to receive them; which being perceived by the enemy, they retired immediately into their camp; where having lighted a good number of fires, to conceal their flight, they forsook it, and marched off unperceived. When the rising morning gave the Jews notice of their flight, Jonathan strove in vain to pursue them; they were already got far enough beyond the Eleutherus, before he could reach that river. To make himself therefore some amends for his disappointment, he fell upon some Demetrian Arabs, whom he defeated, and carried off a considerable plunder, and from thence passing through Damascus, making still some excursions all the way, he arrived at Jerusalem [d].

Whilst these things were doing, Simon, who had been left to take care of Judæa and Galilee, kept a watchful eye over those places he had lately secured to Antiochus in the last of those provinces. He went and took a review of the garison of Ascalon and other fortresses in that neighbourhood; and being told that the citizens of Joppa were inclined to receive a Demetrian governor and some Syrian forces, he went and took it, and put a strong garison of his own in it, and returned to join his brother at Jerusalem. Here they called a council, wherein it was resolved, that all the forts and sconces of Judæa should be forthwith repaired; that new ones should be erected where they were wanted; that the wall of the city should be rebuilt; and a new one be raised between mount Sion and the rest of the city, of such a height, as might effectually cut off all communication between them; to the end, that the garison off Acra, being thereby deprived from all future supply, might be the sooner either forced to surrender, or be starved in it. All these wholesome resolutions were immediately put in execution; Jonathan undertook to oversee the work within the city, and Simon that without. A strong and high wall was accordingly built by the former, which reached quite close to the old one that was then repairing, and made up that place which was called Chaphenatha, towards the east of the city, near the brook Cedron. This did so effectually inclose that mount, that the garison was not long after forced to surrender. Simon on his part went and repaired all the old forts, and added to them that of Adiba, or Adiaba, in the region of Sephala, westward of Eleutheropolis; by all which Judæa was now in a better condition for defence, than it had ever been since their return from captivity [e].

Jerusalem new fortified.

[d] 1 Macc. xi. 62. ad fin. Antiq. l xiii. c 9.

Jonathan treacherously murdered by Tryphon.

By this time Jonathan had governed the Jewish state near seventeen years, with great wisdom and success, when he was unwarily decoyed into the perfidious Tryphon's power, and soon after murdered by him, That traytor knew but too well how vain it would be to attempt to wrench the crown from the young monarch, whilst he had so faithful and powerful an ally; and therefore spared neither promises, oaths, nor any other treacherous means to persuade him to disband his numerous army, now become, as he pretended, useless and burdensome. Jonathan, too easily prevailed upon to take that destructive step, was soon after as unhappily decoyed into the city of Ptolemais, attended only by one thousand of his men, who were all treacherously murdered by his orders, and their chief only spared till the villian had obtained a large sum from Judæa under the name of a ransom, and caused him to be massacred as soon as he had got it into his hands*. So that Jonathan died as much a sacrifice to his too generous credulity, as to his unshaken fidelity to Antiochus. As soon as the news of his being seized and kept prisoner, and of the murder of his men, reached Jerusalem, the whole city was in the utmost consternation. They doubted not, but the perfidious murderer would soon be at their gates, and be joined by all the heathens and apostate Jews, whom the bravery of their late leader had suppressed hitherto; and indeed their fears were but too well grounded; for Tryphon was making great preparations to march into Judæa, with a full resolution to extirpate, if possible, the whole nation; and all their enemies, who had been till now kept in awe, but had received a kind of new life at the news of Jonathan's being in his hands, had began to express an impatient desire to see the land once more invaded, and threatened the Jews with a severe retaliation. Simon was now the only one of the sons of Mattathias that was left, and the courage and conduct which he had shewed hitherto made him looked upon as the only fit person to succeed his brother. An assembly was therefore called at the outer court of the temple, in which he was by their unanimous consent desired to take the command upon him; which he readily did, not only as he was the next in succession, but that he might find some means, either of releasing, or, at the worst, of revenging his his worthey brother. To diſſipate therefore, as much as poſſible, that fear which he obſerved in their countenences, he addreſſed himſelf to them in words to this effect: You are not ignorant how bravely my father, brothers, and I, have fought in the defence of our laws and religion, our temple and our nation. They have already ſacrificed their lives for that glorious cauſe, and I am now the only ſurviving one to maintain it. God forbid! I ſhould value my own more than they did theirs, as long as I ſee you groaning under any oppreſſion. Behold me then as ready and willing as they to undertake the defence of our nation and temple, of our wives and of our children. This ſpeech was received with univerſal applauſe, and the people, having in great meaſure recovered their drooping ſpirits, proclaimed him their commander and high-prieſt (X), promiſing at the ſame time to follow him through all difficulties and dangers in defence of their religion and country [g].

Simon succeeds his brother.

[e] 1 Macc. xii. Antiq. ibid. * See before, vol. ix. p 133, & seq.

As ſoon as he was inſtalled in his new dignity, his firſt care was to finiſh the fortifications of the city with all ſpeed, and to get together an army ſufficient to make head againſt that of Tryphon. who was in full march againſt him, but when that traitor came to find the Jews in ſuch a brave condition of defence, he contented himſelf with ſending him word that he had ſeized his brother for a debt of a hundred talents, which he owed him, and that if he would ſend them to him, and his two ſons as hoſtages, their father ſhould be immediately releaſed. Simon eaſily ſaw through this treacherous pretence, but dared not refuſe his demand, for fear of bringing ſome unjuſt ſuſpicion on himſelf, as if he was the cauſe of his brother's detention. In the mean time, the Syrian gariſon, being ſorely preſt for want of proviſion, found means to ſend Tryphon word, and to beg his aſſiſtance; and he, having increaſed the number of his forces, was coming to their relief, but was prevented with a deep Typhon's treachery.

[f] 1 Macc. xii. 39, & ſeq. Antiq. xiii. 10. [g] 1 Macc. xiii. paſſ. Joſeph. ubi ſupra. c. 11.

(X) It ſeems as if the aſſembly, however, had ſome ſcruple about the regularity of this election to the pontifical dignity; and therefore we find a kind of an apology made for it in the enſuing chapter (16); where, having recapitulated all his glorious deeds and his lineal deſcent from Joarib, they add, that they had choſen him their governor and high-prieſt, and intailed thoſe dignities on his poſterity, until there ſhould ariſe a faithful prophet (17), who might ſet them to rights about it.

(16) 1 Macc. xiv. 26, & ſeq. (17) Ver. 41.

snow, and forced to withdraw into winter quarters; soon after which he caused both Antiochus and Jonathan, with his two sons, to be murdered (Y), as we have elsewhere related; and returned to Syria. As soon as he was gone, Simon ordered their bones to be fetched from that place, and to be deposited in the sepulchre of his fathers at Modin, with the solemnity suitable to his rank, and then caused a stately monument to be reared over it (Z) [h].

Jonathan buried at Modin. Year of the flood 2856. Year before Christ 143.

His next care was to send an embassy to the Roman senate, to notify to them the treacherous murther of his brother, his succession to his office, and to renew his alliance with them. They were to do the same with the Lacedæmonians, and in both places they were received with great honour. Both nations shewed an uncommon resentment at Tryphon's treachery, and chearfully renewed their friendship with Simon, to whom they sent back letters of congratulation on his accession to the Jewish high-priesthood and government, together with the ratification of their alliance engraved on copper. All which being received, Simon caused them to be read before their great assembly; and then set about fortifying afresh both Jerusalem and other places of Judæa, and to raise new forces against any future invasion [i]. Having thus far strengthened himself by alliances, and the land with men, arms, and other necessary stores, he sent an embassy to Demetrius, whom Tryphon had by this time stripped of Alliance with Rome and Sparta renewed.

[h] 1 Macc. xiii. 20, & seq. Ant. ubi supra. [i] Id. ibid.

(Y) The text says, that it was at Boscama that he caused the three last to be put to death and buried; but it is not easy to find the situation of that place; only one may conjecture, that it was in the land of Gilead, where he is said to have taken his winter quarters. Josephus calls the place Basca (18).

(Z) This noble piece of architecture stood on an eminence, which commanded the whole country round about; and being in itself raised to a great height, was seen at a great distance at sea, and served for a land-mark. It was made of white marble, curiously carved and polished. Simon caused also seven pyramids to be built round it, viz. two for his father and mother, and four for his four brethren, and the last for himself The whole was surrounded with a stately portico, whose arches were supported by marble pillars, each of a whole piece. The top of it was adorned with shields, armour, ships, and other such embellishments curiously carved. All which were still to be seen, not only in Josephus, but in Eusebius, and St Jerom's time (19).

(18) Ant. l. xiii. c 11. (19) Ibid. Euseb. περὶ τοποτικῶν ὀνομάτων. Hier Loc. Hebr of almoſt his whole kingdom; and, in his letter to him, offered to acknowledge him king of Syria, and to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his kingdom from the uſurper, upon condition that he confirmed him in all his dignities, and his country in all their privileges and immunities. He backed his offers with a rich crown of gold and ſome other preſents; and Demetrius, glad at heart to accept the conditions, ſent him a letter under the royal ſignature, by which he granted all his demands, together with a general amneſty and oblivion for all paſt hoſtilities, and conſtituted Simon ſovereign prince of the Jewiſh nation, and freed his land from all foreign yoke. From this time Simon took upon him the name and authority of prince and high-prieſt of the Jews, which dignities having been confirmed to him and to his deſcendants on the next year, by an act of the ſanhedrin, all public acts were ordered from thenceforward to be made in his name (A).

SIMON'S

(A) In purſuance, and by virtue, of this grant, the Jews from that time ceaſed to date their contracts and other inſtruments, as formerly, by the reigns of the Syrian kings, and dated them by the years of Simon and his ſucceſſors (20). This change was made by the general aſſembly of the Jews, both prieſts and elders, wherein the ſupreme government and high-prieſthood were beſtowed on Simon, upon account of his great exploits and extraordinary merit, which are there enumerated (21); and with this further addition, that thoſe dignities ſhould be intailed on his poſterity, as we obſerved in a late note. Moreover a copy of the grant, which was inſcribed, King Demetrius unto Simon the high-prieſt, and friend of kings, and to the elders and nation of the Jews (22), was ordered to be ingraven on tables of braſs, and to be hung up in the ſanctuary, and the original to be depoſited among the archives of the nation.

This grant, which continued ſome generations in his family, was dated on the eighteenth day of the month Elul, anſwering in part to our Auguſt, in the hundred and ſeventy-ſecond year of the Seleucidæ, and the third of Simon's pontificate. It is ſaid to be given at the general aſſembly held at Sarameel, which the margin of our Engliſh verſion ſuppoſes, with Vatablus and others, to mean Jeruſalem, by tranſpoſition of the letters. The vulgate reads it Aſaramel, which, if right, may be properly enough ſuppoſed to be put according to the Greek way of writing Hebrew words and names, for chazar-mello, or the court or porch

(20) 1 Macc. xiv. 26, & ſeq. (21) Ibid. ver. 4, & ſeq. (22) Ibid. cap. xiii. 36.

Simon fortifies Judæa.

SIMON's main buſineſs now was to ſtrengthen himſelf in this new dignity, to which end, he ſet about repairing and fortifying all his gariſons afreſh, eſpecially that of Bethzura, which, being on the confines of Judæa, had been formerly made the chief magazine of the enemy, and was like to be one of the firſt places they would attempt. He therefore took care to ſecure it with good walls, towers, and ammunition, and with a gariſon of the ſtouteſt Jews. About the ſame time he ſent Jonathan the ſon of Abſalom with a good army to beſiege Joppa, which being taken, he drove out all its inhabitants, filled it with men of his own nation, repaired its fortifications; and, liking the ſituation of it, built himſelf a houſe and ſettled there. The place from this time became the head ſea-port to Jeruſalem and all Judæa, being diſtant about forty miles from Jeruſalem, and opening a trade to all the Mediterranean coaſts and iſlands. Strabo [l] tells us, it was a port of the Jews in his time, and it has continued ſo ever ſince, notwithſtanding its being a dangerous one, by reaſon of the great rocks that lie before it [m]; though in other reſpects very pleaſant, being ſituate on a beautiful plain, and having Jamnia on the ſouth, Cæſarea on the north, and Ramah on the eaſt [n]. About the ſame time Simon went with another army to reduce the city of Gaza, or, as ſome more probably gueſs, that of Gazara (B), which had revolted ever ſince porch of Millo. Millo was the deep valley between old Jeruſalem and the city of David, which that monarch, and after him Solomon, cauſed to be filled up at a vaſt labour and charge, and was therefore called by that name from the Hebrew root, which ſignifies to fill; but whether this conjecture be right, or what the meaning of Sarameel or Aſaramel is, is hard to gueſs.

Takes Joppa.

[l] Geogr. l. xvi. [m] Joſeph. Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 15. [n] Vid. int. al. Rel. Palæſt. illuſt.

(B) Dean Prideaux juſtly ſuſpects the former to have ſlipt in by the inadvertency of the Greek tranſcriber, inſtead of the latter (23), which is the Gazer or Gezer often mentioned by the ſacred hiſtorians (24); and was likewiſe called Gader, Gedara, Gaderoth, and by Strabo Gadaris (25), who places it, as the book of Maccabees (26) doth Gazara, near Aſoth, or Azotus, and Euſebius about two miles from Nicopolis (27).

For, firſt, as the learned dean above-mentioned rightly obſerves, Gazara, and not Gaza, is mentioned among the towns taken since Jonathan's death. He battered it some considerable time with his engines, and was just on the point of storming it, when the inhabitants appeared on the walls, men, women, and children, with their cloaths rent, and implored his mercy with such doleful cries, as prevailed upon him to spare their lives, and to send them away to shift for themselves where they could. He entered the town, and purified it of all its idolatrous monuments, put a strong garison of Jews in it, and caused a house to be built for himself, to which he often retired, either for relaxation, or to keep the neighbourhood in order °. An Gdaza.

(23) Connect. ſub an. 143 note (X) (24) Vid. int. al. 2 Sam. v. ver. ult. (25) Geogr. ubi ſupra. (26) xiv. 34. (27) ubi ſupra.

On the next year, the fortress of Acra, which had been invested, as we hinted above, near two years, without any supply from without, being now reduced by famine, began to capitulate, after it had been held by the Syrians about twenty-five years, to the great nuisance of the Jewish nation. Simon, who wanted to be rid of them at any rate, gave them leave to march out peaceably, whilst he and his troops entered it with palms in their hands at the sound of their trumpets and other instruments, accompanied with songs and other demonstrations of joy. At first he ordered it to be lustrated, and cleansed from all the heathenish idols and other superstitious trash, intending probably to put a Jewish garison in it. But having thought better on it, he called a grand council, and proposed to them the demolishing of both it and of the hill on which it stood. He reminded them, among the other mischiefs it had caused hitherto, of its having been a constant refuge for all the discontented and renegado Jews, and of the danger of its becoming so again, in case it should be taken from them P. This proposal met with a general approbation; the work was immediately set about, and carried on with indefatigable assiduity, during the space of three years, every man taking his turn in it, till the mountain

Year of the flood 2857. Before Christ 142.

Acra surrendered,

And is demolished.

° 1 Macc. xiii. & xiv. pass. Joseph ubi supra. P Iid. ibid. ad fin.

taken by Simon (28). Secondly, Gazara is often mentioned, as in the hands of Simon in this and the foregoing chapter; but Gaza only in this place. Lastly, he is said to have built him a house in that town (29), after he had taken it; and yet we find his son dwelling in Gazara and made governor of it; so that upon the whole, it is most likely, Gaza was only a slip of the pen.

(28) 1 Macc. xiv. 7, 34. (29) Ibid. xiii. 48. (30) Ibid. ver ult.

mountain was brought down to the level of that of the temple, that it might never more be in a condition to annoy it (C). All this while Simon employed another set of hands in repairing and fortifying the outer wall, and other parts of the temple, building of new apartments, particularly a palace for himself, where he dwelt from thenceforth. In memory of the surrender of that fortress, Simon ordered a festival to be kept yearly; and that he might the more fully vacate on the religious and civil affairs of the nation, appointed his son John general of all his forces, and ordered him to fix his residence at Gazara [9], as was observed in a late note. It was in this year that the great sanhedrin and the whole assembly of the Jews confirmed to him all his dignities, and intailed them on his posterity, in consideration of the eminent services he had done to his country; which are therefore recapitulated (D) in [9] 1 Macc. xiii. 49. ad fin.

(C) This circumstance of demolishing the fortress and the hill, which we have mentioned out of Josephus and those who have followed him, is not only omitted, but seems even contradicted by the first book of Maccabees, which affirms (31), that Simon fortified and garisoned it with Jews; and in the very next chapter, that Antiochus sent Simon a challenge to surrender it to him (32), which was three years after,

However, since that fortress was actually demolished, and the hill itself lowered to the level of the temple, it is likely, that Josephus has only antedated it by some years.

(D) Among other things that are there mentioned to his great honour, it was not a small one, that Judæa enjoyed a perfect peace during the whole time of his government, whilst Syria and other neighbouring kingdoms were almost destroyed by the wars which were then raised by competitors to their crowns, by traytors, and hostile depredations; so that it is there observed, that the Jews lived quietly every man under his vine and fig-tree, enjoying without fear the fruits of their labours, and beholding with pleasure the flourishing state of their country; their trade increased by the reduction of Joppa and other maritime places; their territories inlarged; and their religion and liberties secured; their towns and other fortresses well garisoned; their army under good discipline, the land free from heathen enemies and Jewish apostates, their friendship courted by all the nations about them, and even by the Romans and Greeks, and themselves free from all foreign yoke and from danger of invasion (33).

His panegyrist adds, that he was no less zealous for the service of God, in exterminating apostacy, superstition, idolatry, and every (31) xiv. 36, 37. (32) xv. 28. (33) Ibid. xi. 4, & seq.

in the preamble to their decree, which we have had occasion to mention a little higher.

Year of the flood 2859. Before Christ 140.

We have seen in a former chapter *, how Demetrius, driven from his dominions, had been taken and kept prisoner by the Parthians, whilst Tryphon's tyranny caused a general defection from him to Cleopatra. This princess, despairing ever to recover her captive husband, sent to invite his brother Antiochus out of his retirement, to make a push for the Syrian crown. Upon his coming therefore to her, he sent a very obliging letter to the Jewish high-priest, in which he confirmed to him all his dignities, revenues, and authority, and to his nation all the freedom and immunities which had been formerly granted to them by his brother, or which they were now in actual possession of. To this he added, besides many great promises, a power of coining their own money in Judæa, which John immediately made use of (E). But when that prince had established himself on his throne

Alliance renewed with Rome, &c.

* vol. ix. p. 135, & following.

every thing else that was contrary to his laws; that he was a great protector of the true Israelites and a friend to the poor; that he restored the service of the temple to its ancient splendor, and multiplied its sacred utensils; so that we need not wonder, if the Jewish sanhedrin thought no dignity or honour too great for a man of such uncommon merit.

The Jewish chronologers tells us moreover, that in his days, and about this time, flourished those two great lights of their synagogue, Simeon Ben Shetach and Jehuba Ben Tabbai, directors of the divinity school at Jerusalem; and that the former was resident, and the latter vice-president, of the sanhedrin (34).

(E) Several pieces of this Jewish coin are still preserved by the curious: the inscription of some of them is, The shekel, or half-shekel of Israel; in others, the first or second, &c. year of the deliverance of Israel, of Sion, of Jerusalem, &c. Others again are inscribed, Simon prince of Israel. What is remarkable in these inscriptions is, that they are not in the new Assyrian characters, adopted by Ezra, but in the old Samaritan; for which no other reason can be assigned, if they be authentic †, except that Simon was willing to preserve the ancient form of those that had been coined before the captivity, as well in the character, as the metal, and figure, and weight.

Accordingly, these, like the old ones. have on the one side a cup or pitcher, supposed to have been the pot of manna, and on the throne by the marriage of Cleopatra and the death of Tryphon †, Simon, whether he ſuſpected the ſincerity of his late promiſes, or was willing to make his friendſhip to him appear more conſiderable, ſent a freſh embaſſy to Rome, to renew and ſtrengthen his alliance with that nation. Among other valuable preſents which he ſent, one was a ſhield of gold, which weighed a thouſand minæ, amounting, according to the loweſt value of the Attic mina, to ſixty thouſand pounds of our money. His deputies were received with the uſual honours, and procured letters from the ſenate to the kings of Syria, Egypt, Pergamus, and Cappadocia, and to other ſtates, to notify their alliance with the Jews, and to threaten them with an immediate war, who ſhould venture to commit any hoſtilities againſt them, and ordering them, if any Jewiſh criminals, apoſtates, or other Jewiſh outlaws had ſheltered themſelves in their dominions, to ſend them bound to the Jewiſh high-prieſt; if demanded by him.

(34) Seph. Juchasin, Shalshel, &c.

† See what has been said, vol. iii. p. 449, 450, sub note.

Antiochus's ingratitude to Simon.

That to the king of Syria was indeed directed to Demetrius, it being written before that prince's falling into the hands of the Parthians; but had it been directed to Antiochus, it is likely he would have had as little regard to it, as he had to that which he had ſent to the Jewiſh chief. For even whilſt he was beſieging Tryphon in Dora, whither Simon ſent him two thouſand choſen men, with warlike ſtores, engines, and other ammunition, inſtead of accepting of them, he ſent them all back, together with a threatning meſſage to Simon, inſiſting upon his ſurrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the citadel of Jeruſalem, which he ſaid did belong to the crown of Syria, or elſe to pay him five hundred talents for each, and five hundred more for the ravages which the Jews had done in his dominions.

Athenobius ſent to Jeruſalem.

Athenobius, one of that monarch's favourites, was the perſon who was diſpatched upon that errant, and came accordingly to Jeruſalem, and beheld with wonder the richneſs and ſplendor of the high-prieſt's court, at the ſame time that he informed him of his maſter's the other a branch, or the budding rod of Aaron, or a palm branch; ſome a vine, others a bunch of grapes, or a wheat-ſheaf; ſome have two doves, others two towers, or the front of an edifice, ſuppoſed to be that of the temple.

† vol. ix. p. 139, & following.

Thoſe we have left of him are all of ſilver; whether he coined any gold, is not certain; the king's letter mentions neither metal, but permits him in general to coin his own money.

maſter's demands (F). Simon, nothing terrified at this meſſage, anſwered him coolly, that he was in poſſeſſion of nothing but what was the inheritance of his anceſtors; except indeed the fortreſſes of Joppa and Gazara, which he had been forced to ſeize, to ſuppreſs the continual ravages and devaſtations they made in Judæa: that for theſe therefore he was willing to pay the king a hundred talents; but as to the fortreſs of Acra, he could by no means think that he had any right to demand it from him. Athenobius did not ſtay to make any reply, but went off abruptly and returned to Antiochus, who was ſtill carrying on the ſiege of Dora, and to whom he returned the anſwer which the Jewiſh pontiff had given him. He likewiſe related to him the pomp and grandeur of his houſhold, the great quantity of ſilver and gold veſſels uſed at his table, and other ſuch marks of the Jewiſh wealth, which he knew would not fail to incenſe that monarch againſt him; for, as Joſephus obſerves, he was very covetous, and conſequently ungrateful, and could not fail envying him ſo much riches and grandeur; and juſt ſo it happened. Antiochus, forgetting at once his letter, and Simon's ſervices, ordered Cendebeus, one of his nobles, to invade Judæa with a powerful army, whilſt himſelf went with another in purſuit of the traytor Tryphon *.

Judæa invaded: Year of the flood 2860. Before Chriſt 139.

CENDEBEUS, having received the government of all the coaſts of Phœnicia and Paleſtine, and being at the head of a powerful army of horſe and foot, began his expedition with fortifying the town of Cedron, or, as the vulgate perhaps more properly calls it, Gedor [r], a place advantageouſly ſituated, and putting a ſtrong gariſon in it. In the mean time, he himſelf marched towards Jamnia and Joppa, from whence he made many inroads into Judæa, took a great number priſoners, and laid waſte all that part of the country [s]. The news of it ſoon reached John, who, as we hinted above, was made general of the Jewiſh forces, and kept his reſidence at Gazara. He went immediately to Jeruſalem to acquaint his father

* 1 Macc. xv, 38, & ſeq. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 12, & 13. [r] De hac vid. Joſhua xv. 58. [s] 1 Macc. ibid. 40, & ſeq. Joſeph. ubi ſupra.

(F) Thus ſays the book of Maccabees (35); but Joſephus, who takes no notice of this meſſage by Athenobius, relates the ſtory ſomewhat otherwiſe, and tells us (36), that Antiochus having writ to Simon to ſend him men and proviſions for the ſiege, did alter his mind before they were come, and ſent Cendebeus preſently after to invade Judæa.

(35) Ch. xv. 28, & ſeq. (36) Antiq. l xiii. c. 12, & 13.

father with it; and Simon, being at this time too old to head the Jewish troops, called his two brave sons, viz. this John and his brother Judas, to whom he committed the command of them, charging them on his blessing, to imitate the valour of their brave uncles, and to venture their lives in defence of their religion and liberties (G). On this these two setting out at the head of twenty thousand choice foot, besides some horse, they incamped on the first night at Modin; and on the morrow, as they advanced towards the plain, they came in sight of the enemy, and drew so near each other, that only a brook parted the two armies. That of John at first expressed some reluctancy to cross it; but he, ashamed to see their backwardness, flung himself first into it, and moved forward; which so animated his men, that they immediately followed him. As soon as they were got over, he ranged them in order of battle, with his cavalry in the centre. An obstinate onset immediately ensued, in which the enemy, being seized with a sudden fright at the sound of the sacred trumpets, did immediately give way. Many of them were killed and wounded, and the rest fled, some to the sconces, which they had in the plains of Azotus, where about two thousand of them perished in the flames, John, now surnamed Hyrcan (H), having caused them to be set on fire. The rest with Cendebeus

[t] 1 Macc. xvi. 1. & seq.

(G) Here again Josephus (37) differs from the book of Maccabees, and makes the good old priest to forget his age, and to sally out at the head of his troops, with as much vigour and resolution, as if he had been but in his prime; so fond is he to raise the character of his own ancestors.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees, of which we have given an account in a former note †, tells us, that John received the surname of Hyrcan on account of his defeating a famous general of that name, and killing him with his own hand, which some think may be the Cendebeus, whom he here defeated, who might be also surnamed Hyrcanus, either because he was a native of Hyrcania, or on some other account (38).

Josephus Bengorion says, it passed from the eldest son of Simon, who was called Hyrcan, to his brother John (39). Others think he had it given him on account of his beating the Hyrcanians (40), all without any certainty; since neither the first book of (37) Ibid. † sup. p. 97, in fin. note (Q). (38) Calmet. hist. V. T. sub A. M. 3869. (39) l. iv. c 2. (40) Euseb. in chron. S. Sever. hist. l. ii. & al.

Cendebeus fled as far as Cedron, the place lately fortified by him, and John purſued him all the way thither; after which he faced about, and came and rejoined his brother Judas, who, having received ſome wound in the action, had been forced to ſtay behind. The two brothers, having by this defeat cleared thoſe parts from the Syrian troops, led their victorious army back to Jeruſalem, without any conſiderable loſs [t]. After this Judæa continued quiet and free from invaſion, till the murder of their worthy high-prieſt, which happened about three years after, and brought Antiochus again with an army againſt that metropolis. The manner in which this perfidious act was perpetrated, is as follows.

SIMON had then a ſon-in-law named Ptolemy, the ſon of Abadus, whom he had made governor of Jericho and its territories, and who was grown exceeding rich in that government; but ſuch was his ambition, that nothing leſs could ſatisfy him, than his being maſter of all Judæa. This wretch took the opportunity of Simon's taking a progreſs about the country with his two ſons Judas and Mattathias, to invite them to his caſtle of Dog, where he prepared a ſumptuous entertainment for them. The old pontiff, who ſuſpected nothing leſs than what was deſigned againſt him, was eaſily perſuaded to accept of the invitation; but after they had feaſted and drank pretty freely, ſome ruffians, whom he had privately poſted, ruſhed upon the three gueſts and murdered them. His deſign was to have cut off Hyrcan alſo, who was then at Gazara; and to this end he diſpatched ſome meſſengers to invite or bring him to him: but, happily for him, one of his father's retinue had eſcaped the ſlaughter, and had brought notice to him of what had paſſed; ſo that Hyrcan was before-hand with him, and cauſed his meſſengers to be taken and put to death (I). Hyrcan, thinking himſelf now no of the Maccabees, nor Joſephus, give us any reaſon for it; beſides, we have ſeen that all the ſons of Mattathias had their particular ſurnames; ſome of them more uncommon, and as little to be accounted for as this of Hyrcan.

Simon treacherouſly murdered.

[t] 1 Macc. xvi. 1, & ſeq.

(I) Thus far goes the firſt book of the Maccabees, which concludes its epocha of forty years with this eſcape of Hyrcan, and refers us for the remainder of his life and actions to a book of chronicles (41) long ſince loſt; ſo that we muſt now fill up the ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory for the moſt part out of Joſephus; in the following of whom care ſhall be taken to diſcover ſuch errors of

(41) Cap. ult. ver. ult.

no longer safe there, made the best of his way to Jerusalem, whither Ptolemy arrived as soon as he. Both offered themselves of his, as are either accidental or otherwise, by comparing him with himself or other historians, till we come to the sacred ones of the New Testament; so that whatever we find in him, either that bears not an authentic face, or clashes, or has been confuted by other authors, will be either thrown into the margin, or, if of small moment, quite set aside.

To begin then with some of the improbabilities with which he continues the history of this high-priest, he tells us (42), that as soon as he was installed in his new dignities, he put himself at the head of the Jewish army, and went and besieged Ptolemy in his castle of Dog or Dagon, where he still kept alive Simon's wife and his two sons, contrary to the book of Maccabees, which says, that he assassinated the two latter with their old father, and mentions nothing of the wife.

He goes on, and tells us, that, as Hyrcan went on with the siege, Ptolemy caused his mother and two brothers to be brought upon the walls of the castle, and there had them severely scourged, threatening at the same time to cast them headlong down, if he did not desist; and that the old lady, observing her son to relent at the sight of her danger and cruel usage, made signs for him to go on with the siege, and to take no thought of her safety or life; and that her son, being unable to see them so cruelly tortured, did as often slacken his hand.

At length, continues he, the sabbatic, or seventh, year being come, which was a year of rest as well as the seventh day, and Hyrcan upon that account being obliged to raise the siege, gave the murderer an opportunity to escape beyond Jordan; so that having put to death his three prisoners, he retired to Zeno surnamed Cotylas, who had usurped the government of the city of Philadelphia.

The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us much the same story, and only differs in two circumstances from Josephus The first is, that Gaza, and not Jerusalem, was the place where Hyrcan was received and preferred to the assassin; and the second, that the feast of the tabernacles, and not the sabbatic year, obliged that pontiff to repair to Jerusalem to perform the function of his office; during which solemnity Ptolemy found means to escape far enough out of his reach.

This account, did it not contradict the first book of Maccabees, which expressly says, that the father and the two sons were murdered at the same time (43), would be much more probable than that of Josephus, at least with regard to the suspension of the siege; since ſelves at different gates and demanded admittance; but Hyrcan was received out of reſpect to his worthy father, whilſt his murderer, and the men that came with him, had the mortification to be repulſed. Hyrcan was immediately declared prince and high-prieſt in his father's ſtead, and put himſelf at the head of his army, fortified himſelf in the mountain of the temple, and provided every way for his own ſafety, and for that of the city and country. On the other hand, Ptolemy, ſeeing himſelf diſappointed of his deſigns on Hyrcan and Jeruſalem, and having in vain endeavoured to bribe ſome of the heads of the Jews over to his intereſt by ſumptuous promiſes, was at length reduced to the neceſſity of writing to Antiochus, to acquaint him with what he had done, and to beg of him to come to his aſſiſtance; promiſing him at the ſame time to reduce all Judæa under him, provided he made him governor of it. Antiochus, whom the late defeat of Cendebus had ſtill more exaſperated againſt the Jews, did eaſily embrace his offer, and was actually coming with a powerful army to his aſſiſtance; but whether through fear, or for whatever other reaſon, the rebel did not think fit to ſtay till his arrival, but fled to Zeno, tyrant of the city of Philadelphia. What became of the wretch afterwards, we cannot find. The author of the fourth book of the Maccabees adds to what we obſerved in the laſt note, that after he had killed the mother and two brothers of Hyrcan, he fled, and retired into ſome place where he could not be come at, whilſt Hyrcan was detained at Jeruſalem to perform the prieſtly function, it being then the feaſt of tabernacles. All that we know is, that no further mention is made of him, either by Joſephus or the firſt book of the Maccabees, ſince his flight into Philadelphia.

(42) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 14, & 15, & bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 2.
(43) Cap. ult. ver. 16.

ANTIOCHUS, allured into Judæa, partly at the news of the brave Simon's death and of the riches of his ſucceſſor, and partly ſince there is no law that obliged the Jews to abſtain from war, eſpecially a defenſive one, during the ſabbatic year: if there had, how could they have continued a nation without a miracle? And yet Joſephus not only affirms it to have been the cauſe of Hyrcan's raiſing the ſiege of Dagon, but of Antiochus's taking the advantage of it to invade Judæa and beſiege its metropolis. This ſiege of Dagon is therefore juſtly called in queſtion by ſeveral learned men (44).

(44) Vid. int. al Salien. annal. ſub A. M. 3919, & 3920. Vide & Uſſer. ſub A. M. 3869.

Judæa invaded. Year of the flood 2834. Year before Christ 135.

partly by the fair offers which the traitor Ptolemy had made to him, entered Judæa on the ensuing year with a powerful army, and went directly to besiege Jerusalem, driving Hyrcan all the way before him, till he had shut himself up with his men into that metropolis. To inclose him the more effectually, Josephus tells us [u], that he caused two deep and spacious trenches to be dug round the city, and divided his army into seven camps; so that all possibility of ingress or regress was entirely stopped. He reared likewise one hundred towers; the fourth book of the Maccabees says one hundred and thirty, which were three stories high, upon which he placed his men to annoy those that defended the walls, whilst he was battering them from below. Josephus adds that his army suffered some time for want of water, and was at length relieved with a good lasting rain. On the other hand, the besieged made a vigorous defence, and, by their frequent sallies, did greatly annoy the besiegers (K). As therefore no relief could be expected from without, either of men or provisions, Hyrcan bethought himself at first of a way of ridding himself of all useless mouths, by putting them out of the city; by which means they, being pent up between the wall and the enemies ditch, must infallibly have been starved in a little time, had they not been taken in again. What raised the compassion of those within the walls was the approaching feast of tabernacles, which was usually solemnized with great joy and feasting, and could not but have been very much disturbed by the cries of their perishing brethren without. Hyrcan then sent to Antiochus to desire a truce of seven days, that they might quietly celebrate that festival; which was not only readily granted, but that prince, being thereby stirred up to some sense of religion, sent them a considerable number of victims, with their horns gilt, together with Antiochus's piety.

Jerusalem besieged.

[u] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16.

(K) To what we have related of this siege out of Josephus, the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that as Antiochus was ordering the sapping of the walls, he observed, that the foundations were of timber; upon which he caused them to be set on fire, which soon brought down a great part of the wall; but that the besieged coming instantly to defend the breach, not only hindered the besiegers from entering the town, but drove them back, and made a stout sally after them, in which, besides a great number of the Syrians, which they killed, they destroyed most of the enemies towers.

with several rich vessels of gold and silver [w], filled with precious perfumes, and some money and other necessaries; which were, by Hyrcan's orders, thankfully received by the priests at one of the gates of the city, and thence conveyed into the temple (L). This unexpected instance of the king's piety and liberality gave him some hopes, that a peace might probably be obtained from him with the same ease. He was not mistaken, and Antiochus, whether tired with the brave and constant defence of the besieged, which is not unlikely, if the account we have just now given in a note out of the fourth book of the Maccabees is not exaggerated, or moved by some other reason, granted it to him, upon the conditions following:

Grants peace to the Jews.

THAT the Jews should deliver up their arms; that the city wall should be demolished; and that John should pay him a certain tribute for Joppa and other towns he held out of Judæa. The king insisted hard upon two other conditions, namely, that they should receive a Syrian garrison into their metropolis; and secondly, that the fortress of Acra should be rebuilt. The first of these they bought off at the price of five hundred talents, three hundred of which were to be paid instantly, and the rest at some distance of time. They likewise engaged to put into the king's hands a sufficient number of hostages to secure him of their future allegiance, that they might be wholly free from any commerce with strangers. As for the second, Hyrcan, who remembered what a grievous thorn in their side the late fortress had been to them, would by no means agree to the building of a new one; and the king, according to his usual clemency, remitted this also. And yet Josephus tells us, that when this peace was transacting, the city was reduced to the last extremity, having quite exhausted all their provisions; and, which is still more surprizing, that the besiegers were so well informed of it, that they earnestly pressed the king to make use of so favourable an opportunity to destroy and extirpate the whole Jewish nation, which they traduced to him in the bittersest terms, as the pest of mankind, and sworn enemies of all other nations; so that, all things considered, it seems as if providence had interposed in their behalf, and had mollified that monarch's heart towards them. And a heathen author owns [x] with Joſephus, that it was owing to his ſurprizing goodneſs and generoſity, that the whole nation had not then been entirely deſtroyed, and that they obtained a peace upon ſuch eaſy terms.

[w] Idem ibid. Vide & Plut. in Apophtheg.

(L) In this, and the following particulars relating to the peace, Josephus and the fourth book of the Maccabees agree, tho' they seem to differ in those which relate to the siege and the defence made by the besieged.

HOWEVER that was, the peace was ſigned on both ſides, and the proper hoſtages ſent to Antiochus, among whom was Hyrcan's brother; the city was diſmantled; the money paid; and the ſiege raiſed: but Hyrcan was forced to make uſe of a ſtrange expedient to procure the three hundred talents ſtipulated. It ſeems their treaſury was then at ſo low an ebb, that it could not furniſh him with that ſum; ſo that John was forced to open a hidden treaſure, which had been laid up by ſome of the kings of Judah [y]; Joſephus ſays the tomb of David [z], from which he took out three thouſand talents; a thing which had never been attempted before by any of his predeceſſors, nor was after him by any, except by Herod (M). With this freſh ſupply he paid Antiochus

[x] Diodor. Sicul. Bibl. l. xxxiv. & apud Phot. cod. 244. [y] Lib. 4. Maccab. [z] Ubi ſupra. ad fin. & bell Judaic. l. iv. c. 2. & alib.

(M) The ſtory of a hidden treaſure, whether laid up by David, or by any of his ſucceſſors, is juſtly ſuſpected by the judicious, as a fable invented by thoſe two authors, without any foundation; only that of the Maccabees delivers it as a common report; whereas Joſephus affirms it both of Hyrcan and Herod without heſitation.

That both David and Solomon heaped immenſe riches, we have formerly ſeen; but that they cauſed any part of them to be hidden under ground, much leſs in their own tombs, is no-where ſaid, either by the ſacred or apocryphal writers; but the contrary may be fairly deducted from them. For, if they had left any ſuch hidden treaſure, is it likely, that their wicked ſucceſſors, who made no ſcruple to rifle the temple of its ſacred utenſils and ornaments (45), would have left it untouched? Is it likely, that good king Hezekiah would have choſen to take all the ſilver and the gold veſſels of the temple, and even tear off the gold with which the gates, pillars, and other parts of that ſacred building were covered (46), rather than to break into this immenſe, but uſeleſs, treaſure?

Again, is it probable, had there been any ſuch depoſitory, that ſo many Aſſyrian and Chaldean monarchs, as had formerly rifled both city and temple, would not have got ſome knowledge of it, and gutted it of all its riches? And if they had till then been tiochus, and undertook, what had never been done before, to take a number of foreign troops into his ſervice. This peace was followed with an alliance with Antiochus, after which that monarch was invited into Jeruſalem with his chief officers, where he was received and feaſted in a ſumptuous manner, and, after mutual aſſurances of friendſhip and aſſiſtance, the king ſet out for Syria, and Hyrcan about repairing the breaches and damages which had been made during the ſiege. This peace was made on the ninth month after Simons death (N). Hyrcan was punctual in his promiſes to that prince

(45) Vide int. al. 2 Kings xvi. 8, & ſeq. xvii. 18. (46) Ibid xviii. 15, & ſeq.

Year of the flood 2868. Before Chriſt 131.

 for

been preſerved by ſome kind of miracle (for nothing leſs could do it) how ſhould Hyrcan dare to break in upon them, and not rather, like the good king abovementioned, have rifled the temple of ſome of its valuable ornaments, which, by what we have ſeen hitherto, were by this time grown very numerous and coſtly, by the generoſity not only of his predeceſſors, but of foreign princes?

We have lately ſeen, that there was a treaſury or bank in the temple, part of which conſiſted of donatives for the ſupport of the poor, partly of the portions and dowries of the fatherleſs and widows, and partly of the ſubſtance of the richer ſort, who depoſited their wealth there for ſecurity *, beſides that which was allotted for the maintenance of the divine ſervice (47). Now, if we conſider, that they were ſo continually harraſſed with wars, invaſions, and oppreſſions, it is not improbable, that they kept theſe riches in ſome proper ſubterranean places, known but to a few truſty men at the head of affairs, and kept the whole as much a ſecret as poſſible; if therefore Hyrcan was now hard put to to raiſe money, is it not more probable, that he borrowed it out of this bank, till better times enabled him to repay it?

But when Herod did totally rifle it for his own uſe, if ever he really did, might he not trump up this plauſible ſtory, that it had been depoſited there by David, or his ſucceſſors, againſt times of need? And might not that cunning monarch colour this wicked deed with the ſpecious pretence, that Hyrcan, a perſon of unexceptionable character, had done the ſame thing upon the like emergency †?

(N) Joſephus (48) tells us, that, in the firſt year of Hyrcan's pontificate, a prieſt of the family of Joarib, named Matthias Aphlias, was married to a daughter of the late Jonathan, by whom he had Matthias Curtus, who begot Joſephus, who was his grandfather.

In the ſecond year of the ſame Hyrcan, came from Jeruſalem into Egypt Jeſus the ſon of Sirac, a learned Jew, who there tranſlated for some years after, and did him several signal services in his war against Phates, spoken of a little higher *, and bore a great share in the victories which that prince gained against him. Some authors think [a], that it was in this war that John got the name of Hyrcan, on account of some signal victory he gained over the Hyrcanians. However that be, Josephus tells us [b], on the authority of N. Damascen, that Antiochus shewed him so much regard, as to halt two days on account of the feast of pentecost, because it beginning that year on the day immediately following the sabbath, it was not lawful for the Jews to march on these two days.

* Supra p. 101, ex. 2 Maccab iii. 10. (47) Ibid. ver. 6. † Vide Salien. Uſſer. & Prid. (48) In vita ſua.

Antiochus's death. Year of the flood 2869. Before Christ 130.

Antiochus was soon after defeated and killed, as has been elsewhere related †; and Hyrcan, in his return to Jerusalem, took Aleppo, and laid it under a tribute [c]. After this, finding that the kingdom of Syria was rent with intestine disturbances, and their cities naked and defenceless, he marched thither with a good army, resolved to seize upon such of them as lay most convenient for him. The first he took was that of Madeba, which cost him a six month's siege. From thence he went to that of Samega, which he subdued, with several others both in Arabia and Phænicia [d]. From this time we may date the total deliverance of the Jews from the Syrian yoke; for neither he nor any of his descendents paid either homage or obedience to those monarchs ever afterwards, but lived free and independent from them [e]. From thence he turned his arms against the Samaritans, and took Shechem and mount Garizzim, and the temple formerly built by Sanballat, and demolished it, after it had stood two hundred years; together with all the edifices, altars, and monuments which had been built there by Jezabel, and put several of the Samaritan priests to death (O). The following year translated the book of Wisdom, written by Jesus his grandfather, into Greek, for the use of the hellenistical Jews (49). We have already spoken of that work and its author in a former note, to which we refer (50).

Hyrcan shakes off the Syrian yoke.

His conquests.

* See vol. ix. p. 141. [a] Euseb. in Chron, Sulp. Sever. & al. [b] Antiq. l. xiii. 16 † See vol. ix. p. 141, 142. [c] 4 Maccab. [d] Idem. Joseph. Antiq. l xiii. 17. Strabo, Geogr. l. xvi. [e] Justin. ex. Trog. l. xxxvi. c. 1.

(O) These two last particulars, which we have out of the fourth book of the Maccabees, Josephus says nothing of; but only year Idumea was likewise conquered by him [f], where he caused proclamation to be made throughout that province, obliging all those that would not be circumcised to depart out of the land; but the Idumeans chusing rather to forsake their old idolatry than their country, submitted to his conditions, and were from that time incorporated into the Jewish commonwealth (P).

(49) Vide prolog. in eund. (50) Pag. 113, note (F).

In the year following Hyrcan sent Simon the son of Dositheus and Apollonius the son of Alexander, on an embassy to the Roman senate, to renew the alliance they had lately made with Simon his father, and sent some valuable presents only mentions the demolishing of their temple, which was from that time never attempted to be rebuilt; however, the Shechemites built themselves an altar there, on which they offered their sacrifices, according to the Mosaic law, and have continued to do so ever since.

Hyrcan renews his alliance with Rome.

[f] Joseph. ubi. supra. & al. xv. c. 11. Strabo, ubi. supra, See also, vol. ii. p. 171.

(P) From that time downward to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, they continued in the Jewish religion; so that the word Idumean signified no more than incorporated Jews, in contradistinction to those that were so by natural descent (1); and from their total dispersion, the former name has been entirely absorbed in the latter.

With respect to these Idumean proselytes, it will be proper to observe here, that Herod, who obtained afterwards the kingdom of Judæa, was of that race. From his reign therefore the Jewish writers began to style it מלכות הגרים malkuth hagerim, the kingdom or reign of proselytes or strangers; which not being observed by Scaliger and Munster, they have translated it the kingdom of the Hagarens; but our learned Usher has sufficiently confuted that mistake (2); and we shall further shew, when we come to the reign of that prince, that he was really one of these Idumeans, incorporated into, and thereby intitled to all the privileges of a natural Israelite. There was indeed to be this difference in the true Edomites, that they could not intermarry with them till the third generation, according to the law of Moses (3); but as we have shewn these Idumeans to be of a different race, or rather a mixture of other nations, how that matter was regulated by the sanhedrin, we know not. We by them (Q). These met with an honourable reception at Rome, and a ready compliance with all their demands. The senate, besides the renewing of the alliance, granted the Jews the possession of Joppa, Gazara, and some other places, which Antiochus had taken from them, and ordered the embassadors a sum out of the publick treasury, to defray their charges homewards. They likewise sent letters to all the governors of the provinces through which they were to pass in their return, to see them treated with all the marks of honour due to their charecter. The senate likewise ordered, that all the complaints they had exhibited against the Syrians should be redressed; declared null and void all that Antiochus, or his successor, had done, or should do, contrary to their late league with the late Jewish high-priest; that the Syrians should reimburse to them all the losses sustained by them, and appointed commissaries to come and see the purport of their decree fully executed. The embassadors had likewise desired letters from the senate, directed to all the princes and free states with whom they were in alliance, to recommend the Jewish interest to them; but there being at that time other important matters on the tapis, the affair was deferred for further deliberation; and they returned to Jerusalem highly satisfied with what they had.

(1) Vide Prid. connect. sub. ann. 129. note t. & Buxtorf. lexic. Rabbin. sub voce אדום (2) Sub. A. M 3875. (3) See before, vol. ii. p. 171, & iii. p 321, Vide & Deut. xxiii. 7, 8.

A second embassy sent to Rome.

This embassy having so well succeeded, Hyrcan, on the next year, sent a new one with fresh presents, to thank the senate

We have heretofore observed †, that the word Edomite and Idumean, which often occurs in the rabbinic writings, is not that of any nation, but the name by which they call the Christians, against whom they write, and is indeed one of the civileſt; but they oftner use those of goi, heathen, and Nozri or Nazarite, and sometimes that of Samaritan and Cuthean; which caution we here repeat, to prevent those that read them being mistaken by any of those feigned names.

(Q) Among these the fourth book of Maccabees mentions a large dish and a shield, amounting to fifty thousand pieces of gold. That author mentions some other particulars, which are not in Josephus; such as, that the embassadors were made to sit down with the Roman consul; that they were allowed the free exercise of their religion; and that the letter which they brought from the senate to Hyrcan, did give him the name and title of king, which that pontiff took upon him, and bore it thenceforward. The letter is there related at full length; but as it contains nothing particular except that inscription, we shall refer the reader to that book for it.

† Vol. ii. p. 171. note.

ſenate for their laſt favour and to obtain a ratification of all their former decrees in their behalf; all which was readily granted, and the embaſſadors returning, brought this new act, which the reader may ſee at full length in Joſephus (R). By theſe

(R) Here Joſephus has again committed a manifeſt blunder, by inſerting this decree in the wrong place (4), and inſtead of another then granted by the ſenate upon another occaſion, and at the recommendation of Julius Cæſar, to Hyrcanus the ſecond. This has been fully proved by ſeveral learned men whom the reader will find in the margin (5); and he may further convince himſelf by comparing the contrariety between the decree itſelf and the occaſion upon which the Jewiſh hiſtorian there quotes it, with reſpect to the following particulars;

1. He ſays it was obtained for the rebuilding of the city wall demoliſhed by Pompey: but there is not a word in the decree about the wall, but only of renewing and confirming the former alliances. 2. The decree was dated on the ninth year of Hyrcanus, who could not be the ſecond of the name; for if it had been obtained to this laſt by Julius Cæſar, it muſt have fallen in the ſeventeenth, not of his reign, for that he had been diſpoſſeſſed of by Gabinius, but of his prieſthood, which was all the dignity that was left to him, as Joſephus himſelf owns in another place (6); and if his reign were to be dated, not from his reſtauration by Pompey, but from the death of his mother, it muſt have been the twenty-third, and not the ninth of his reign.

Again, there is a manifeſt difference between the dates of the preamble to and the decree itſelf. The one dates it the ninth of Hyrcan, in the month Panemus, anſwering to our July, and the other the ides (or thirteenth) of December. From all which it is evident, that Joſephus has, by a miſtake, inſerted here one decree for another; and that this belonged not to any year of Hyrcanus the ſecond, but to the ninth year of Hyrcanus the firſt.

Another ſtrong proof of this is; Numenius the ſon of Antiochus, who is mentioned in the decree as one of the embaſſadors ſent by Hyrcan to procure it, is the ſame who had been ſent about ſeventeen years before, on the like errand, to Rome by Jonathan, as we have already ſeen; he might therefore be ſtill young enough to be ſent on this new embaſſy in the ninth year of Hyrcanus the firſt; but muſt have been long dead and rotten before the decree obtained by Cæſar in favour of Hyrcanus the ſecond, there being near eighty years diſtance between them. To theſe alliances John ſaw himſelf more and more ſtrengthened in his dominions, whilſt the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt were ſtill troubled with continual wars. Alexander Zebina having by this time mounted the Syrian throne *, was glad to make him his friend; but being ſoon after killed, and ſucceeded by Antiochus Gryphus, this laſt did ſo reſent it, that he was preparing himſelf to invade Judæa; but was happily prevented by his brother, who was then levying an army at Cyzicum, and coming againſt him. Hyrcan left them to fight it out between them, without concerning himſelf on either ſide, chuſing rather to enjoy his ſovereign authority peacefully, which gave him an opportunity of heaping up immenſe treaſures, by the tributes which he received both from his own now flouriſhing land, and from thoſe countries which he had lately ſubjected to his dominions. At length ſome hoſtilities, which the Samaritans committed againſt the Mareſſans (S), who were then in friendſhip with him, gave him a fair handle for renewing the war, which he had lately begun againſt thoſe of the city of Shechem. He went therefore with his two ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, at the head of a powerful army, and with all the proper engines for the ſiege of Samaria, which had been ſince rebuilt and fortified (T). Theſe

(4) Antiq. l. xiv. 16. (5) Scalig. animad. in chron. Euſeb. num 1671. Uſſer. annal. ſub. A. M. 3877. Salien. ſub. A. M. 4007. ſect. 36. Prid. connect. ſub. ann. 127. (6) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 10.

* See vol. ix. p. 146, & ſeq.

To all this may be added, that the decree here inſerted is that of an alliance made by proper embaſſadors between the Roman ſenate and a free ſtate, ſuch as the Jewiſh was in Hyrcan the firſt's time; whereas that obtained by Cæſar for Hyrcan the ſecond was not an alliance by embaſſy, but a favour conferred on the Jews, in conſideration of the ſervices they had done the Roman general in the Alexandrian war; at which time they were no longer a free, but a conquered nation, as the ſequel of this hiſtory will ſoon ſhew.

(S) The city of Mareſſa, or Mareſa, which ſtood at about two miles diſtance from Eleutheropolis, had been ſome time before taken by him, and ſince retaken by the Syrians, under whom it now was; but ſtill in alliance and friendſhip with the Jews (7).

(T) It will be proper here to remind our readers, that theſe Samaritans were not of the old race and ſect ſo much hated by the Jews; for theſe, we have ſeen a little higher, had been either deſtroyed, or driven out of that metropolis, by Alexander the Great, for the murder of his favourite Andronicus; immediately after

(7) Vide antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

Theſe encompaſſed the city with a wall and a deep ditch, of about eighty furlongs, or four thouſand paces circuit; by which they ſoon reduced the city to ſuch ſcarcity of proviſions, that they began to eat all manner of unclean beaſts, ſuch as cats, dogs, and other carrion. In this extremity they found means to ſend and implore the aſſiſtance of Antiochus Cyzicenus, who was now on the Syrian throne*, and who came accordingly with a great army to their relief [g].

Samaria beſieged. Year of the flood 2889. Before Chriſt 110.

In the mean time, the grand expiation day being at hand, Hyrcan was obliged to go to Jeruſalem to perform the office of it, and left his two ſons to carry on the ſiege. Upon their hearing that Antiochus was coming againſt them, Ariſtobulus was diſpatched with part of the army to meet him. A bloody engagement enſued, in which the Syrians were totally routed, and purſued as far as Scythopolis; and Antiochus eſcaped with great difficulty. After this defeat, the ſiege was renewed with ſuch vigour, that Antiochus was again applied to; but he not caring to hazard a ſecond battle, contented himſelf with ſending ſix thouſand men to make a diverſion in Judæa, in hopes to oblige the Jews to raiſe the ſiege; neither were theſe his own troops, but ſuch as he had with ſome dificulty obtained from the king of Egypt. We have already ſeen the ill ſucceſs of this expedition in a former volume, as well as the betraying of Scythopolis to Hyrcan by Epicrates, and the ſurrender and utter demolition of Samaria †. From this time Hyrcan became more and more powerful, and made himſelf maſter not only of all Paleſtine, but added alſo unto it the provinces of Samaria and Galilee; all which he enjoyed to the end of his life without any moleſtation from without, or diſcords from within his dominions. His reign was no leſs remarkable on the account of his great wiſdom and piety at home, than his conqueſts abroad. Never did the Jewiſh religion or commonwealth appear in greater luſtre ſince the return from captivity; but that which raiſes his after which he repeopled the place with Syro-Macedonians, or a mixture of Syrians, Macedonians, and Greeks.

* See vol ix. p. 151. [g] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. † See vol. ix. p. 154.

Theſe being ſettl:d there did encompaſs the town with a double high wall, a deep ditch, and other fortifications; thoſe therefore are miſtaken, who think, that the Jewiſh hatred againſt the former ſort of Samaritans was the occaſion of this war; for theſe were all heathens, and conſequently ſtrangers to the diſputes and intailed enmity between theſe two.

his glory, above any of his predeceſſors or ſucceſſors, was, if we may believe Joſephus [h] and the fourth book of Maccabees[i], his enjoying three dignities, which never all met in any but him; namely, the royal dignity, the high-prieſthood, and the gift of propheey. Of the laſt of theſe we ſhall give two or three inſtances out of thoſe authors in the margin (V); but the ſecond, or high-prieſthood, tho' he had exerciſed it in ſuch a manner as ought to have rendered him doubly venerable, yet in the end proved the ſource of ſuch perſecutions from the proud and hot-headed Phariſees, as quite embittered the latter end of his reign, if not ſhortened his days. It is under his reign that this ſect, as well as thoſe of the Sadducees, and Eſſenians, of which we have already ſpoken ſomething, are ſuppoſed to have ſtarted up. This therefore may be thought a proper place of ſpeaking of them more at large, as well as of that of the Caraites, which ſprung up afterwards; but as each of thoſe four ſects had many favourite tenets, quite oppoſite to the ſpirit and doctrine of the goſpel and its divine author, and proved ſo many invincible obſtacles againſt its reception, we ſhall defer ſpeaking of them, till we come to that glorious epocha. By this means the reader will have them ſo freſh in his mind, and, as it were, in one

[h] Antiq. ubi ſupra, & bell. Judaic. l. ii. c. 3. [i] Cap. vii.

(V) Joſephus affirms him to have had very extraordinary viſions and revelations, more particularly about his own children. He tells us for inſtance, that on the day on which his forces defeated thoſe of Antiochus, himſelf was then offering up incenſe in the moſt holy place, where he heard a voice telling him of the victory gained by his ſons.

As he was very fond of thoſe two brave youths, he was no leſs importunate with heaven to know which of them was to ſucceed him; but, to his great mortification, he ſaw in a viſion a third ſon, not yet born, who was pointed at as his ſucceſſor. This grieved the good old man ſo much, it ſeems, that when Alexander was ſoon after born, he ſent him to be privately brought up in Galilee; but this did not hinder the viſion being verified by the ſequel; of which he was made, however, ſo ſenſible before he died, that he foretold the reigns of his two eldeſt ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus to be but ſhort, after which Alexander would ſucceed them.

There are ſome other ſingularities related of him, which have ſtill more the air of fables, and therefore not worth mentioning; only this one is very remarkable, if true, that the ſtones of the breaſt-plate and the carbuncle on his ſhoulder quite loſt their luſtre after his death, and never recovered it ſince.

one view, that, instead of wondering at the Jews rejecting so universally the person and doctrine of the Messiah, he will rather look upon it as a kind of miracle, that so many of that blind and prepossessed nation should so readily embrace them.

But, to return to our subject, Hyrcan had always shewed himself a zealous stickler for the Pharisees; they had hitherto monopolized his favours, and enjoyed the most considerable posts under him, whilst the other two were despised and kept under by him. But an untimely piece of condescension towards them, or perhaps rather of vanity, from which the best of men are not always exempt, gave one of the heads of that imperious sect, named Eleazar, an opportunity to cast a reflection against him, which touched him in the most sensible part. It was no less than calling in question his legitimacy, at least as being less pure and undefiled than the Mosaic law requires in a high-priest; and this he did by pretending, that his mother had been formerly a slave, intimating thereby, that either she was not of Jewish extraction, or else, that being so, she had been taken captive by the enemy, and forced to prostitute herself for a maintenance. The story being as Josephus assures us, absolutely false, and only trumped up by that proud Pharisee to mortify the good old prelate, we shall throw it in the margin (W), and only add, that Eleazar's

(W) Hyrcan's desire to ingratiate himself still farther to this imperious sect, which he observed to grow daily more and more the darling of the people, by reason of their specious pretence to a greater degree of sanctity, made him one day, after he had given some of the heads of them a most sumptuous entertainment, ask them, if they had any thing to object or to find fault with against his government, that he might rectify it; since he had always made it his chief study and delight to act with the utmost regard to God, and according to the rules and maxims of their sect.

Whilst therefore the rest of the company were extolling his piety, zeal, valour, and conduct up to the skies, the surly and turbulent Eleazar started up, and, with his wonted ill-nature, told him, that if he was really desirous to deserve the praises which his brethren had so lavishly given him, he ought to devest himself of his high-priesthood, and be content with the civil government of the nation. Being asked the reason of so strange a proposal, he answered him, That they were well assured, upon the testimony of antient persons still living, that his mother had been taken captive in the wars, which rendered him incapable by the law of Moses † to succeed to the pontifical dignity.

This

† See what has been said of these marriages, vol. iii. p. 255.

zar's baſe ſuggeſtion, and the partiality of his brotherhood in aſſigning him a condign puniſhment, did ſo exaſperate the high-prieſt againſt the whole ſect, that from that time he gave himſelf up wholly to that of the Sadducees, who were not a little glad to aggravate the affront as hatched againſt him by the whole Phariſaic body, tho' one only of them had had the courage to blab it out. From thenceforth therefore there grew the bittereſt enmity between him and that revengeful ſect, who ceaſed not to raiſe troubles and ſeditions againſt him during the ſhort time he lived, and againſt his ſons after him. Hyrcan was then in the twenty eighth year of his pontificate, when this quarrel happened, and he died in the very next year, greatly lamented by all but the Phariſaic crew, who left no ſtone unturned to blacken his memory, and to get into the ſame credit and authority they had formerly enjoyed under him (X) [k].

HYRCAN

[k] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18.

This malicious ſuggeſtion, it ſeems was reſented by all the company; but much more by the old pontiff, who thereupon reſolved to take ſome ſignal ſatisfaction for the calumny caſt on his mother and himſelf. He had then a favourite friend named Jonathan, a zealous Sadducee, who took occaſion from it to intimate to him, that Eleazar was but the tool and mouth of the Phariſaic ſect; but that the ſlander muſt have been concerted by the whole party. To convince him of it, he adviſed him to conſult the brotherhood concerning the puniſhment of the calumniator, and he would ſoon find, either by their lenity or ſeverity towards him, whether they had any hand in the calumny.

Hyrcan took his advice, and aſked the heads of that ſect, what puniſhment they thought Eleazar deſerved for raiſing ſuch an impious and unjuſt ſlander on the prince and high-prieſt of their nation? expecting, no doubt, but they would have condemned him to death; but, to his ſurprize, they told him, that as calumny was no capital crime, the ſevereſt puniſhment, he could inflict on him, was that of ſcourging and impriſonment.

There wanted no more to convince the pontiff of the truth of what Jonathan had ſuggeſted to him; ſo that from that time he became an irreconcileable enemy to the whole ſect, forbad, under ſevere penalties, the obſervance of their commandments and traditions, and became a zealous patron of the oppoſite ſect of the Sadducees. On the other hand, the Phariſees became mortal enemies, not only to him and his family, but to the whole Sadducean party; and never ceaſed plotting againſt them till they had gained the ſaddle again; which they did in ſome few years after, as the ſequel will ſhew.

(X) Joſephus is very inconſiſtent in the years of this prelate's reign

HYRCAN is affirmed by Josephus to have built the stately tower, or rather castle, of Baris (Y), the same which served afterwards for a palace to the Asmonean princes. and was some time after rebuilt, enlarged, and fortified by Herod, and called by him Antonia, in honour of Marc Antony. This castle was built upon a steep rock, fifty cubits high from the valley that ran beneath it to the top on which the building stood, and was inaccessible on all sides, except that towards the temple, with which it was even. It was of a square figure, two forlongs in compass; that is, half a furlong, or three hundred feet, on every side. The rock stood without the outer square of the temple, and upon the same mountain with, and on the north-side of it, running parallel with its outer wall, but encompassed with that which Simon had built to stop the communication between the temple and the fortress of Acra. Here Hyrcan built an appartment where he deposited reign, if there be not some error crept into the copies we have of him, and in the Latin version of Ruffinus; for in one place (8) he gives him thirty-three, and in two others (9) thirty-one; yet Eusebius out of him gives him but twenty-nine (10), and so doth St. Jerom in his Latin version of him, and elsewhere (11), and rightly too; for, as the learned Usher observes in the place last-quoted, Simon, Hyrcan's father, died in the 177th year of the Grecian kingdom, and in the 11th month Sebat (12) answering to the 4579th of the Julian period; and his wife Alexandra, who reigned after his sons, died, as the sequel will shew, in December 4644 of the same period; so that the distance is 65 years, and about nine months; from which if we subtract the 37 years which Josephus allows to her and her sons, the remainder will be 28 years and 9 months.

(Y) St. Jerom, in his comments on those sacred books, which were written after the Babylonish captivity, such as those of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, and on some other prophets (13), observes the word Baris to be of Chaldee extraction, peculiar to Palestine, and to signify a house or castle incloſed on every side. In the same sense the Septuagint have used it likewise; and as that word in the plural is Βαρεις, which likewise signifies heavy, their interpreters have sometimes taken it in the latter sense without any reason, and puzzled thereby several places of scripture, which were plain enough in the former signification, particularly the ivory palaces mentioned by the psalmist (14).

(8) Bell. Judaic. l. i. 3. (9) Antiq. l. xiii. 18. & l. xx. 8. (10) In chronic. & demonst. Evang. l.viii. 2. (11) Comm. in ix. Dan. Vide & Usser. annal. sub. A. M. 3896. (12) Vide 1 Maccab. xvi. 14. (13) Vide & comm. in Ferem. xvii. & Hos. ix. (14) Psal. xliv. 8. Vide Calm. sub voce Baris.

depoſited his pontifical robes and ornaments, whenever he deveſted himſelf of them to vacate on his other affairs; which method was afterwards obſerved by his ſucceſſors. Here he kept his court and ſpent moſt of his time; and ſo did they after him [l], till Herod, obſerving the ſtrength of its ſituation, turned it into a fortreſs; in which, however, the prieſtly attire was ſtill kept, even after the Jews were ſubdued by the Romans, and under the cuſtody of the commander of that garriſon, called by St. Luke the captain of the temple [m]. This officer kept them in his cuſtody under lock and ſeal, and delivered them up to the high-prieſts upon all ſolemnities in which they were required; immediately after which they were put into his hands again, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection.

HYRCAN left three ſons, according to the fourth book of Maccabees (Z), or five, according to Joſephus [n], who gives us, however, the names but of four of them; namely, Ariſtobulus, who was alſo called Judas, and ſurnamed Philellen, by reaſon of his fondneſs for the Greeks; 2. Antigonus; 3. Alexander, and Abſalom, who was the youngeſt. What was the name of the fourth he no-where tells us. Ariſtobulus ſucceeded his father in all dignities in right of primogeniture, according to the Moſaic law; and having a great affection for his brother Antigonus, he admitted him to ſhare the government with him for ſome ſhort ſpace; after which, upon ſome ſuſpicion or diſlike, he cauſed him to be put to death. The other three he kept cloſe priſoners during his ſhort reign, which laſted but one year, which he yet ſtained with Ariſtobulus ſucceeds Hyrcan. Year of the flood 2892. Before Chriſt 107.

His cruel reign.

[l] Bell. Judaic. l. vi. 5. Antiq. l. xviii. 6. Vide & Lightfoot's view of the temple, c. 7. [m] Acts xxi 31. & ſeq. & alib. [n] Antiq. l. xiii. 19. & l. xiv. 8. bell. Judaic. l. i. 3.

(Z) This author adds (15), that Hyrcan was ſo exceſſively fond of his two eldeſt ſons, that he would name neither to the ſucceſſion, but left it wholly to providence to direct it. On the other hand he bore as great an averſion to Alexander, who had been pointed out to him as his ſucceſſor in a viſion, of which we have ſpoken in a late note, but yet without attempting any thing againſt him to prevent it.

Joſephus, on the contrary, tells us, that he left the government to his wife during her life, tho', by the cruelty with which her eldeſt ſon uſed her, one would rather think, that ſhe had forged ſome ſuch will againſt him.

(15) Cap. vii.

with his own mother's blood; for that princeſs having claimed a right to the ſovereignty, by virtue of Hyrcan's will, her unnatural ſon not only ſhut her up in a priſon, but there barbarouſly ſtarved her to death. Soon after this he aſſumed the title of king, and began to wear the royal diadem, which, if we may believe Joſephus, had never been done by any of his predeceſſors [o], who had till then contented themſelves with the title of governors, or at moſt with that of prince (A). As ſoon as he had ſettled his affairs at home, he marched at the head of his army to invade Iturea; but being taken ill in the midſt of his ſucceſſes, he was forced to be brought back to Jeruſalem, and to leave his brother to complete the conqueſt of that province (B); which he ſoon after did, cauſing all the Itureans either to be circumciſed and incorporated with the Jews, or elſe to depart into ſome other country [p].

Invades Iturea.

WHILST he was carrying on this ſucceſsful war, there wanted not thoſe at court, who, envying his happineſs, endeavoured to prepoſſeſs the ſick king with ſtrange ſuſpicions againſt him. The queen more particularly ſeemed to have conceived ſome irreconcileable hatred againſt that prince, and to have been the chief engine of his ruin; which happened ſoon after, when Antigonus innocently furniſhed her with the means of working it more effectually. For as ſoon as he had finiſhed the conqueſt of Iturea, he marched directly to Jeruſalem, it being then the feaſt of tabernacles; and being Antigonus murdered.

[o] Antiq. l. xiii. 19. & bell. Judaic. ubi ſupra. [p] Id ibid. c. 20.

(A) We have ſeen, however, in a late note *, that Hyrcan took the royal name and dignity upon him long before. Strabo ſays (16), that it was Alexander, Ariſtobulus's ſucceſſor, who firſt took that title upon him.

(B) This province was ſo called from Itur the ſon of Iſhmael, whom our Engliſh and ſome other verſions wrongly call Jetur. It was ſituate on the other ſide of Jordan, on the north-ſide of the half tribe of Manaſſeh, between that and the territories of Damaſcus; ſo that it made one part of Cœle-Syria, and did lie on the one ſide of Judæa, as Idumæa, formerly conquered in the ſame manner, did lie on the other. It had the province of Battanea on the eaſt, and the Trachonitis mentioned by St. Luke (17) on the ſouth (18). The Reubenites, Simeonites, and Manaſſites, are ſaid in the chronicles to have invaded theſe territories (19), and to have ſubdued the Itureans.

* Supra, p. 200. (Q). (16) Lib. xvi. (17) c. iii. 1. (18) Vide Reland. Paleſt. l. i. c. 22. (19) 1 Chron. v. 19.

ing in haſte to repair to the temple, to offer up his thanks for his ſucceſs and his vows for his brother's recovery; he went directly thither in his armour, without ſtaying to ſhift his cloaths, and accompanied with a number of his men. This was immediately interpreted to the timorous king as a manifeſt attempt upon his life, to which he gave but too eaſy credit. However, to ſatisfy himſelf more fully about it, he ſent him orders to put of his armour, and to come immediately to him, which, if he complied with, would ſufficiently juſtify him; but if not, would fully prove his treaſonable intent. The king was then at his caſtle of Baris, mentioned a little higher, where he ordered ſome of his guards to be privately poſted in the ſubterranean gallery, through which Antigonus was to paſs, and who were charged to murder him, if he preſumed to come armed to him. But the miſchievous queen corrupted the meſſenger, and made him go and tell the young prince, that his brother having heard his armour highly commended, deſired to ſee him in it immediately; ſo that when Antigonus came to paſs through the gallery, the guards fell immediately upon him and killed him (C). The king however, was ſoon undeceived, and could not think upon his brother's murder without reflecting on the more cruel one, which he had lately committed on his own mother; the remorſe of

(C) The gallery here ſpoken of was, it ſeems, under one of the towers of the caſtle called upon ſome account or other Straton's tower; and ſo verified according to Joſephus, the prediction of one Judas, of the ſect of the Eſſenians, concerning this prince's death. This man, who was then at Jeruſalem, had foretold, ſome time before, that Antigonus ſhould be killed on that very day at Straton's tower; but as he underſtood it of another more famed on the ſea-coaſt, and at a diſtance from this, he was not a little ſurprized to ſee that prince come to the temple, looking upon it as a demonſtration of the falſhood of his prediction, ſince, the day being already far advanced, it was impoſſible for him to reach it, it being above ſix hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem.

This threw him into ſuch a fit of raving, that he vented his complaints for the ſuppoſed deluſion in a very indecent manner, and, Jonas like, cried out, it had been better for him to have been dead, before he had been found a falſe prophet. Whilſt he was in the height of his murmuring, news was brought of Antigonus's murder, and the name of the tower convinced both him and the reſt of the truth of his prediction (20).

(20) Antiq. l xiii c. 19. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3.

of which encreaſing his diſeaſe, he fell into a violent vomiting of blood. A ſervant happening ſoon after to ſpill ſome of that blood, which he was carrying away in a baſon, upon the very ſpot where that of his brother Antigonus was ſtill to be ſeen; ſome of the by-ſtanders, thinking he had done it wilfully, gave a great cry, which was heard by the king. He ſent to aſk the meaning of it, and found them unwilling to acquaint him with it; which made him ſtill more deſirous of knowing it. At length he forced the fatal ſecret from them, which threw him into an exceſs of grief and deſpair, which he vented in words to this effect: Since the privacy of the place could not hide from God's all-ſeeing eye the deteſtable deed I have committed, but I muſt now vomit up my own blood, as it were, by drops, to atone for that which I have ſo inhumanly ſhed, would not a ſpeedy death be much more deſirable to me? He gave up the ghoſt ſoon after, having reigned but one year (D), and was ſucceeded by his brother Jannæus, or Alexander, whom the queen Salome, called by the Greeks Alexandra, releaſed out of priſon with his other two brethren, and cauſed him to be proclaimed king, as being the eldeſt of the three, and of a milder diſpoſition than either of them.

He was, however, forced to begin his reign with the death of his fourth brother, who had made ſome treaſonable attempt againſt him; but was much kinder to Abſalom the youngeſt of all, whom finding contented to lead a private life under him, he took under his protection as long as he lived; and ſo privately did this prince live, that we hear no more of him, till about forty-two years after, when, having engaged in the war againſt the Romans, he was taken by Pompey and ſent priſoner to Rome. Alexander being a ſubtle and warlike prince, and Syria being then torn by civil wars between the contending brothers, Antiochus Cyzicenus and Antiochus Gryphus *, and therefore in no capacity to

* See before, Vol. ix. p. 151, & ſeq.

(D) Ariſtobulus had ſo far ingratiated himſelf to the Greeks, of whom he was exceſſive fond, that they were great admirers of him; and Joſephus quotes one of their authors (21), who gives him the character of a prince of great equity and beneficence; but the actions of his ſhort reign ſhew him to have been of a quite different diſpoſition.

(21) Timagen. ap. Strabon. ex Joſeph. Antiq. ubi ſupra.

oppoſe him, he led an army in the very firſt year of his reign againſt the city of Ptolemais; but met with worſe ſucceſs in that ſiege than any of his predeceſſors had done, being forced to raiſe it to ſuccour his own territories, which were invaded by Ptolemy Lathyrus, who took from him the city of Azochis in Galilee, and carried off ten thouſand captives, and gave him ſoon after a dreadful overthrow near the banks of the Jordan, as we have ſeen in a former chapter †. This defeat, in which he loſt thirty thouſand men, beſides thoſe that were taken priſoners, and which was a juſt reward for his treachery to that prince, would infallibly have opened a way for the latter into Judæa, Alexander being now in no condition to have ſtopped his progreſs; had not Cleopatra come to his aſſiſtance. It was indeed that princeſs's intereſt not to let Lathyrus grow too great, and be thereby enabled to come and wreſt the crown from her; but there was another ſpring that moved her to what ſhe did. The Jews of Alexandria were highly in her favour, and Chelkias and Ananias, two of the moſt conſiderable, being the ſons of Onias the high-prieſt, who built the Jewiſh temple at Alexandria, were at the head of affairs: and theſe could not behold Judæa in ſuch imminent danger from an exaſperated enemy, without uſing all their intereſt with that queen to prevent it. We ſhall not repeat what has been ſaid in a former chapter  concerning the ſucceſs of her arms againſt that competitor. Alexander reaped ſo far the benefit of it, that it obliged Lathyrus to ſet aſide the invaſion of Paleſtine for ſome time; and Cleopatra being come to Ptolemais, which had ſurrendered to her, the Jewiſh monarch came to acknowledge her favour to him by preſents ſuitable to her dignity. He was received outwardly like a prince in diſtreſs, and who had no other refuge than her friendſhip; but that which ingratiated him moſt to that politic princeſs was, his being an enemy to her ſon Lathyrus, who was by that time returned into Paleſtine, and had taken his winter quarters at Gaza.

Year of the flood 2895. Before Chriſt 104.

Year of the flood 2897. Before Chriſt 102. Alexander aſſiſted by Cleopatra.

During Alexander's ſtay with Cleopatra, ſome of her friends adviſed her to take ſo favourable an opportunity to make herſelf miſtreſs of Judæa; which would at once encreaſe her dominions and ſtrength, and give her a ſuperiority over her competitor. But Ananias the Jew lately mentioned, who was one of her head generals, diſſuaded her from ſuch an attempt, attempt, alledging that it would be very ungenerous and unjuſt to diſpoſſeſs of his dominions an ally, who was come to implore her friendſhip and aſſiſtance; that it would leſſen her character in the eyes of the world, and, above all, make her deteſted by all the Jews. Theſe reaſons, joined to the influence which that general, who was Alexander's kinſman, had over her, did not only divert her from her deſign, but procured an alliance between them, which was concluded in the city of Scythopolis; after which Alexander returned to Jeruſalem, where, being now pretty ſecure of any danger from Lathyrus, he recruited his broken army, and, croſſing the Jordan, went to beſiege Gadara, and took it at the end of ten months. From thence he marched to Amathus, another ſtrong fortreſs on that ſide of the river, into which Theodotus the ſon of Zeno tyrant of Philadelphia, had laid up an immenſe treaſure; and took it in a much ſhorter time than he had that of Gadara; and with it all Theodotus's treaſure, But he did not keep it long; that prince, having got together a numerous army, fell ſuddenly upon him, as he was returning from the ſiege, killed him ten thouſand men, routed the reſt, recovered all his wealth, ſeized on Alexander's baggage, and carried off a conſiderable plunder from his men [q]. This defeat, however, did not diſcourage Alexander from purſuing his warlike views, only it afforded great matter of triumph to the Phariſees, his implacable enemies, who took occaſion from thence to vilify him to the people, and to uſe all poſſible means to make his crown ſit uneaſy on him.—

† Ibid. p. 249, & ſeq.  Ibid. p 247, & ſeq.

Takes Gadara.

Year of the flood 2899. Before Chriſt 100.

As ſoon as Alexander had recruited his army, he ſtayed not in Jeruſalem to quell the Phariſaic faction, but left them to make the moſt of his late diſgrace, whilſt he went to vent his reſentment on the treacherous Gazeans, who, by inviting Lathyrus againſt him and furniſhing him with auxiliaries, had been the cauſe of his late overthrow. He immediately beſieged the towns of Raphia and Anthedon, ſince called Agrippias by Herod: theſe two places ſtood at a few miles diſtance from Gaza, by which means having in ſome meaſure blocked up this laſt, he on the next year ſet about beſieging it with a powerful army. The city, being then under the command of Apollodotus, a man of great valour and conduct, made a ſtout defence againſt him one whole year, and in one ſally were like to have routed him and his army; and much longer it might have held out in all likelyhood, had not the brave governor been treacherouſly murdered by his own brother Lyſimachus, and the place betrayed by him to the beſiegers. Alexander upon his entering it made great ſhew of clemency to the Gazeans, but ſoon betrayed his rancour and cruelty againſt them, by abandoning them to the fury of his men; who thereupon made ſuch horrid ſlaughter of them, as was like to have proved a dear revenge to him; for the Gazeans, ſtanding deſperately on their own defence, killed him almoſt as many of his men as he did of theirs. Having at laſt glutted himſelf with the blood of thoſe unfortunate wretches, he vented the reſt of his reſentment on that great and antient city, by reducing it into a heap of ruins; after which he returned with his army to Jeruſalem [r]. The fourth book of Maccabees adds [s], that he took afterwards the cities of Emath and Tyre, but Joſephus ſays nothing of it.

Goes againſt Gaza.

[q] Antiq. xiii. 21.

His cruelty to the Gazeans.

But whilſt he had been abroad with his army, the Phariſees, who, as we hinted before, bore a mortal hatred to him and his whole family, had taken ſuch means to exaſperate the people againſt him by evil ſurmiſes and ſlanders, which they privately inſtilled into them, that it broke out at laſt into an open affront, which came little ſhort of rebellion. They choſe the feaſt of tabernacles, on which ſolemnity they go to the temple with palm and other branches in their hands, eſpecially that of a kind of citron, which they call attrog, with the fruit upon it (E); and when he was performing the

[r] Ibid. [s] cap. xxix.

(E) This attrog, which the Jews imagine to have been the forbidden fruit which our firſt parents eat in paradiſe, very much reſembles a citron or lemon, except that it has on the rind ſome unevenneſs, (ſuch as we obſerve ſometimes in the Seville orange) and which they fondly believe to have been originally impreſt upon it by Eve's planting her teeth upon it, from which time they think that fruit has retained the print of it on both ſides.

Where-ever therefore it is to be had, they carry it during this feſtival in their hands to the ſynagogues, as they did then to the temple, and are very curious in the choice of ſuch only as beſt repreſent that fatal bite; and as our Jews here, and in Holland, Germany, &c are forced to have it from ſome parts of Greece, none but the richer ſort are able to purchaſe it; and it ſometimes happens, either through contrary winds, ſhips being taken or caſt away, that there is ſuch a ſcarcity of them, that the price of them advances to a guinea a ſprig. Thoſe who are curious enough the prieſtly office at the great altar, probably on the laſt day of that ſolemnity, they pelted him, not only with thoſe attrogs, but with the moſt injurious reflections and opprobrious language, crying aloud, that ſuch a ſlave as he (F) was unworthy of either the pontifical or regal dignity. This inſolence, which ſeemed the fore-runner of ſomething worſe, did ſo exaſperate the pontiff, that, ſuſpending his office for a while, he ordered his ſoldiers to fall upon the mutinous mob; which they did with ſuch ſpeed and fury, that they killed ſix thouſand of them, and diſperſed the reſt [t]. As ſoon as the tumult was quelled, he cauſed the court of the prieſts to be incloſed with a wooden wall, to prevent ſuch inſults being offered to him for the future, and at the ſame time provided for his further ſafety, by taking into his pay ſix thouſand auxiliaries out of Piſidia and Cilicia, being afraid to truſt his perſon any longer to the guard of thoſe of his exaſperated nation, who, as he found now to his great grief, were not to be quelled by the greateſt ſeverities, nor mollified by the greateſt lenitives. So that being quite wearied out with their continual clamours, he marched out of Jeruſalem at the head of his army, croſſed the Jordan, and went and deſtroyed the city of Amathus, without meeting with any oppoſition from Theodotus, who contented himſelf with carrying off his treaſure and garriſon, leaving the city to his mercy; ſo dreadful was become the name of Alexander by Alexander pelted by the people. Year of the flood 2904. Year before Chriſt 95.

[t] Antiq. xiii. 21. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3.

enough may ſee them on that feſtival in their ſynagogues, it ſeldom or never happening but ſome quantity is brought over againſt that time. But when it doth, they are forced to ſubſtitute ſome other odoriferous tree inſtead of it; but the poorer ſort content themſelves with branches of willows.

On the ſeventh day, which cloſes the feſtival, they break their branches or throw them away; and we ſuppoſe it was on this day that the mutinous crowd did pelt the high-prieſt with thoſe attrogs, they being ſo common at that time in Paleſtine, that the meaneſt people might purchaſe them.

(F) By calling him a ſlave, it is plain, they harped upon that ſcandalous ſuggeſtion of Eleazar mentioned in a late note, of his mother having been a ſlave. But the true foundation of the Phariſaic grudge was his treading in his father's ſteps, not only in careſſing the oppoſite ſect, but in continuing the penal laws againſt thoſe who ſhould obſerve the traditions and cuſtoms introduced by the Phariſees. This was ſuch a crime againſt them, that nothing but his blood could expiate, and they did not ſcruple to tell him ſo ſoon after, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

this time to all the nations round about. From thence he marched againſt the Arabians, whom he ſubdued; after which he laid the Moabites and the mountaineers of the land of Gilead under tribute. Soon after this, as he was carrying on the war againſt Obedas king of the Arabians, he fell into an ambuſh near Gadara, where he was forced by a large drove of camels into a ſtreight ſo narrow and craggy, that it was with the greateſt difficulty that he eſcaped and regained his own metropolis (G). Here he found, to his great mortification, that the news of this laſt defeat had not only reached the place, but had given a new life to his enemies, who began to exclaim louder than ever againſt him. His endeavours to quell them, as he had done before, did now but encreaſe the tumult, till it broke out into an open inſurrection againſt him. He was, however, too wiſe and brave to be either ſurpriſed or terrified by it, but quickly gathered a number of forces to make head againſt them. A civil war immediately enſued, which laſted ſix whole years, during which above fifty thouſand of the rebels loſt their lives, beſides thoſe he loſt on his own ſide (H), and the innumerable calamities it brought on the Jewiſh nation.

Makes war abroad.

The Phariſees cauſe a rebellion.

ALEXANDER, however, though he ſtill got the better of them, was ſo weary with deſtroying both his people and country, that he ſpared no means, no offers or promiſes, to bring matters to a pacification. But as he had to do with a crew of rebels, and they of the Phariſaic leaven, every advance

(G) Joſephus mentions theſe wars ſo confuſedly, that it is impoſſible to gueſs at what time they happened, or how long they laſted. It ſeems as if he had lumped them thus together at the fag end of a chapter (22), to ſhew his readers what a warlike prince Alexander was, and that his neighbours led but a weary life during his reign. Perhaps it would have been better for him to have continued them longer, ſince his return to Jeruſalem proved the cauſe of freſh tumults, which ended at laſt in an open rebellion.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us, that this inteſtine war was between the Phariſees and Sadducees; and that Alexander having declared himſelf againſt the former, had put fifty thouſand of them to death, within the ſpace of theſe ſix years; which did ſo exaſperate the reſt of them, that they would hearken to no accommodation, but ſent to invite Demetrius king of Syria to come to their aſſiſtance againſt him (23).

(22) Ant. l. xiii. in fin. cap. 21. & Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3. (23) Cap. 29.

vance he made did but harden them the more. At length, being resolved, if possible, to bring them to a better mind, he sent some of his friends to know what would satisfy them, promising to grant them whatever they should in reason and justice demand. To this they unanimously cried out, that he must cut his own throat, telling him at the same time, that he ought to think highly of them, if they thought his death a sufficient recompence for the blood he had shed, and the mischiefs he had brought upon his nation [u]. This answer made him lose all hopes of an accommodation, and look out for some more effectual means to suppress their horrid insolence, whilst they, on the other hand, sent to Damascus, to beg of Demetrius, sirnamed Eucherus, to come to their assistance [w].

DEMETRIUS came accordingly into Judæa with an army of three thousand horse and forty thousand foot, who were partly Jews and partly Syrians; and Alexander came against him with another, consisting of six thousand Greek auxiliaries and twenty thousand Jews; each of them tried some time to gain over the troops of his competitor, Demetrius to debauch the Greek auxiliaries to forsake the Jewish king, and this latter to bring over those Jews that were in the Syrian army. But all their efforts proving vain, they came at length to a decisive battle, in which Alexander was defeated, and forced to flee to the mountains for shelter, with the small number of men that stuck close to him. This is the account which Josephus gives us of this action, wherein he again clashes with the fourth book of Maccabees, which makes the advantage to have been vastly on Alexander's side, as the reader nay see in the margin (I). But be that as Alexander defeated by Demetrius.

[u] Id. ibid. [w] Ibid. c. 22. Bell. Judaic. ubi supra.

(I) This author tells us (24), that Alexander defeated the Syrian king, and pursued him quite to Antioch, where he kept him besieged three whole years; that at length Demetrius, having ventured out with his army against him, was killed; and that Alexander after this second victory came back to Jerusalem, where he was well received by the people; that he went afterwards and subdued the Idumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and Arabian mountaineers; but all this seems exaggerated, and Josephus's account is perhaps more justly preferred to it, who is seldom less liable to suspicion, than when he speaks against his

(24) Chap. xxix.

as it will, the former tells us, that he was reduced by this defeat to such a low ebb, that he seemed irrecoverably lost, when an unexpected accident turned again the balance on his side. Those Jewish troops, whom he could not, with all his art and fair promises, withdraw from the enemies army, before the battle was fought, were now, upon his losing it, taken with such a fit of compassion, that they came all over to him; so that Demetrius, fearing lest the defection should still encrease, left Judæa and marched against his brother Philip. This retreat gave Alexander an opportunity of getting his army together, with which he marched against the rebellious Jews, and beat them in every engagement he had against them; though without being able to bring them to submission, or in the least abate the fury of their resentment against him, till a decisive battle put an end to the war. In this last action Alexander cut off the greater part of their army, and drove the rest, at least the chief of them, to Bethome, where he closely besieged them, and on the next year made himself master of the place; and here it was that he began to let loose the reins of his fury against them, in such barbarous manner, as can hardly be read without horror, if our historian has not exaggerated the matter. He caused eight hundered of the principal of them to be carried to Jerusalem, and there to be all crucified, in one day and at one place; and as if this had not been punishment sufficient to appease his resentment, he caused their wives and children to be brought and butchered before their faces, whilst they were hanging each upon their cross. But what swells the account of his barbarity almost beyond all credibility is, that he caused a banquet to be prepared for himself and his concubines, near enough to this scene of horror, from whence he might glut his eyes with their sufferings. Hence the historian adds [x], that he had the name of Tracidas or Thracian giving him, that nation being infamous above all others for their horrid barbarities; and was indeed a name

Relieved.

Year of the flood 2913, Before Christ 86.

His cruelty to the rebels.

[x] Id. ibid.

his own nation. Yet it must be remembered here, that Josephus was a zealous pharisee, and Alexander an inveterate enemy to, not to say in some measure a prosecutor of, that whole sect; and how far this consideration may have sowered the pharisaic leaven in that historian, and have made him represent that prince as less successful than he really was, and guilty of such cruelties as he was a stranger to, may be easily guessed.

a name rather too good for him, if he was really guilty of all theſe cruelties.

AFTER this dreadful havock the rebels did quite diſperſe themſelves, and eight thouſand of them diſappeared on the very night following, aud never more moleſted him during the remainder of his reign, ſo that from that time forth the phariſaic faction never dared to lift up their heads as long as he lived. Soon after this, the king of Syria, intending to invade the territories of Arabia Petrea, marched his army through part of Judæa, which was the only paſſage he could have to come thither. Alexander, who ſuſpected him to have ſome deſign againſt him, endeavoured in vain to obſtruct him, by drawing a deep trench twenty miles long, that is, from the town of Capherſaba, now Antipatris, quite to the ſea of Joppa, and fortifying it with wooden towers at convenient diſtances. Antiochus forced his way through them and penetrated into Arabia, where he loſt his life, as we have ſeen elſewhere*; and Alexander, being rid of that fear, marched his army over Jordan, to recover ſome of thoſe places in Arabia and the lands of Moab and Gilead, which he had formerly taken, but had been forced to ſurrender during the civil wars, to prevent the Arabian king's ſupporting his rebellious ſubjects. This brought Aretas, now both king of Arabia and Cœle-Syria, into Judæa, where he defeated Alexander; but having ſoon after made a treaty with him, he retired with his forces, and left him to purſue his other conqueſts. Alexander accordingly marched againſt the city of Dion, and took it by aſſault[y]. Pella was taken next[z], after which he went and beſieged Eſſa, alias Geraſa, into which Theodotus had ſecured all his treaſure; and having built a treble wall about it, took it by ſtorm, and carried off all the rich plunder he found in it. The inhabitants of Pella having refuſed to be circumciſed, he forced them, according to the cuſtom of the Aſmonean princes, to leave the country, and their city was demoliſhed. Alexander marched from thence and took Gaulana, Seleucia, the valley of Antiochus, and Gamala, and ſtripped Demetrius, who commanded in thoſe places, of his principality, becauſe he had been guilty of ſome foul crimes and malverſations. This expedition took him up three whole years, after which he returned triumphant to Jeruſalem, and brought Demetrius priſoner with him thither, where his late conqueſts gained him the loud acclamations of his ſubjects[a]. But giving himſelf from thenceforward to drinking drinking and other debaucheries, he was seized with an obstinate quartan ague, which stuck to him till the day of his death, which happened about three years after. All this while, neither his distemper, nor his pleasures, which he still pursued, could alleviate his invincible thirst after conquests (K). Perhaps also he was in hopes to overcome the one by the other; but it happened quite otherwise, and his strength being quite exhausted by fatigues and debauch, he died in his camp before Ragaba, a fortress in the territories of the Gerasens, beyond Jordan, which he was then besieging, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign [b].

His conqueſt,

* See Vol. ix. p. 157. & ſeq. [y] Antiq. ibid. 23. [z] Bell. Jud. l. i. 4. [a] Antiq. ubi ſupra.

His death. Year of the flood 2920, Before Christ 79.

He left two sons at his death, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, but bequeathed the government of the kingdom to his wife Alexandra, during her life, and then to which of her two sons she should think fit to leave it. The queen, who was then with him at the siege, seeing him to be past recovery, addressed herself to him, all in tears; and, in a most pathetic speech, represented to him the extreme danger she and her children were going to be exposed to, from the inveterate grudge which the pharisaic faction did still bear to him and to all that belonged to him; and who, being the idol of the people, would not fail to make her feel the effects of their bittersest rancour, by raising up new seditions against her, as they had formerly done against him, and perhaps to the total extirpation of his race. As her fears were but too well grounded, they could not but awake those of her dying husband

[b] Ibid. & bell. Jud. ubi supra.

(K) Witness the vast number of places he died possessed of, in Syria, Idumea, Phœnicia, Arabia, &c. beyond all his predecessors, and which we shall here subjoin out of Josephus, that the reader may have them all in one view †.

Along the sea, the tower of Straton, the ports of Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, and Rhinocorura. In the mid-land of Idumæa, Adora, Marissa, and all Samaria, with the mountains of Carmel and Itabyr, and the cities of Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulona, Seleucia, and Gabala. In the land of Moab, Heshbon, or Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oron, Telithon, and Zara In Cilicia, Aulon and Pella; this last and that of Gaza were demolished, as we have seen before. Besides those he conquered in Arabia, and was forced to surrender to Aretas, and many more in the land of Gilead, and some fresh ones in the land of Syria, whose names our author has omitted; and what a subject would there have been for a lofty panegyric, had the historian been a sadducee, or the prince a pharisee! and how truly is the saying verified, Cedunt arma togæ!

† Antiq. l. iii. 23.

band, who, luckily for her, happened to have ſtill preſence of mind enough to bethink himſelf of an expedient, which would effectually put her out of all danger from that revengeful ſect. Having therefore thought ſome time upon it, he ſpoke to her to this effect: "You know, ſaid he, but too well the cauſe of our mutual enmity; and ſince your ſecurity and happineſs muſt riſe or fall, according as you make them your friends or your foes, when I am dead, be ſure to conceal the ſecret from my army, till they have taken the fort; and then lead them triumphant to Jeruſalem, carry my body along with you, and, as ſoon as you are come thither, ſend for the principal leaders of that factious ſect, and lay it before them, and tell them that you wholly ſubmit it to them, either to give it a burial, or to throw it in the high-way, for the injuries I have done them. Aſſure them at the ſame time, that as to yourſelf, you are ſo entirely devoted to them, that you deſign to place them again at the head of affairs, and that you will do nothing without their advice and conſent. Give them immediately ſome marks of your favour and friendſhip, and then you need not doubt, but they will not only extol me to the ſkies and give me a royal burial, but will likewiſe ſupport you, and my ſons after you, in the peaceful enjoyment of your kingdom". He juſt lived to give her this ſalutary counſel, and then expired in the forty-ninth year of his age.

His dying advice to his queen,

ALEXANDRA was too wiſe not to follow his injunctions, if they were really his, and not a pretence trumped up by that politic princeſs. However, it had the deſired effect; and the Phariſees, glad to ſee themſelves again at the head of affairs, were beyond meaſure laviſh of their praiſes and honours to the deceaſed king. They extolled him for a great conqueror and patriot, they beſtowed a magnificent funeral on him, and applauded above all his wiſdom in bequeathing the government to his queen. He did certainly right in that, ſeeing his eldeſt ſon Hyrcanus, who was then about thirty years of age, was a prince of a ſluggiſh diſpoſition, without ambition or ſpirit. Him therefore the queen thought fit to nominate to ſucceed his father in the pontifical function, not ſo much out of reſpect to his primogeniture, as becauſe he was leſs likely to interfere with the affairs of ſtate than the younger brother; who, being of a more enterprizing genius, was for that very reaſon ſecluded and confined to a private life. But though ſhe had ſo carefully ſecured her prerogative from any attempt from her two ſons, yet was ſhe far enough

from

from enjoying it so absolutely and quietly as she expected. For the Pharisees, as they grew more and more powerful, grew also more and more insolent and intractable, insomuch, that the fear of their raising a new rebellion forced her to consent to many of their demands, much against her will, as well as her interest.

The first thing they obtained of her was, a total revocation of all the edicts which Hyrcan the first, and the late king, had made against their constitutions and traditional doctrines; the next was, an amnesty for all their faction, together with the release of such of their brethren as had been confined since the late civil war; and the third was, the recalling of all those who had been either banished or forced to fly the country since the conclusion of it, and their being re-admitted into the possession of all their forfeited estates. By the first of these, the Pharisaic traditions grew again into credit, by which means they became more and more numerous; and that sect being at full liberty to impose them on the people at their pleasure, they not only became an intolerable burden to the people, but by degrees quite obliterated the written word, of which they were pretended to be the true sense and explanation; and by the other two decrees, they so encreased and strengthened the party, that the queen was now afraid to deny them any thing; whereby they became still more exorbitant in their demands, till they let her see plainly that they designed to leave her only the name of sovereignty, and the power to command her subjects to obey them. She retained indeed six thousand auxiliary troops in her pay, by which she kept at least her neighbours and conquered provinces in awe, and received from time to time fresh hostages from them [c]. But as the Pharisaic crew looked upon this as the effects of their friendship to her, they claimed all the merit of her peaceful reign to themselves, and soon gave her to understand, that nothing less than the total extirpation of the Sadducees, who were the only ones that stuck close to the late king, should purchase the continuance of their friendship and assistance. They began with insisting upon her punishing all those, who had counselled him to crucify the eight hundred rebels lately mentioned, with immediate death. Accordingly Diogenes, one of the chiefs of the Sadducees and a confident of Alexander, was presently dispatched, and after him a great many others, against whom they laid the same accusation, right or wrong, that is, against as many of that sect, as they thought had been too attached to that monarch's service [d].

Year of the flood 2922, Before Christ 77,

Sadducees prosecuted,

These

[c] Antiq. ubi supra, comp with l. xx. c. 8. & bell Jud. l. i c. 4

[d] Id ibid.

THESE prosecutions were continued several years, though much against the queen's mind, who could not but feel some lively remorse to see so many of her husband's most zealous friends daily butchered; but the Pharisees still insisting, that to put a stop to these severities would be to stop the course of justice, contrary to the laws of God, and the security of every good government; the fear of a new insurrection, the dreadful effects of which she had so lately felt, made her still look upon those executions as the lesser evil of the two. At length some of the most considerable persons of that persecuted party, having got young Aristobulus at their head, came to the royal palace, to beseech the queen that she would put an end to their misery. They reminded her of their great services and invincible loyalty to her late husband, and that it was in consideration of them that he had bestowed on them those marks of his favour and esteem, which exposed them now to the fury of their enemies. They conjured her not to suffer the late king's best and most loyal friends, to be thus daily sacrificed to the rancour of his ambitious and bitterest enemies, in a time especially of a profound peace, and under her government, who had been a witness of all the difficulties and hardships they had suffered with and for him. They concluded with their earnest prayer, that if she could not suppress the pharisaic rage against them, she would at least give them the liberty of sheltering themselves from it, either by retiring into some foreign countries, or by her placing them in such of her garrisons, where they might be out of the reach of their enemies. Aristobulus at the same time backed their petition in such manner, as sufficiently shewed his disgust to such cruel proceedings. The queen, though doubtless highly affected with their distress, dared not grant the first part of their petition, for fear of exasperating the pharisees. To grant them the second, that is, to permit them to depart the kingdom, was in fact depriving herself of so many faithful subjects, whose friendship might one time or other be of service to suppress the arrogance of that tyrannic sect. Upon mature deliberation therefore, she agreed to the last expedient proposed, of placing them in the several garrisons of her kingdom, whence she might at any time fetch them when occasion served, and where they might be either safe from their enemies, or at least in a condition to stand in their own defence. She excepted, however, those of Hyrcania, Alexandria, and Macheron, in which she had deposited her most valuable treasures, lest by shewing too great a confidence in them, she should give umbrage to their enemies the Petition the queen,

Pharisees

Phariſees (L). How ſhe took her ſon's interceſſion on their behalf, our hiſtorian doth not tell us; but intimates, that ſhe ſent

(L) The fourth book of the Maccabees (25) takes no notice of their being ſent into garriſons; but only tells us, that ſhe gave them liberty to retire into what cities of Judæa they pleaſed: and that the Eſſenians, no leſs hated by the Phariſees, joined themſelves to them.

In this year, our learned Uſher obſerves, (26) was born Herod, ſince king of Judæa, of whom we ſhall have a great deal to ſpeak in the ſequel; for he was twenty-five years old when he was made governor of Galilee in the year before Chriſt 47.

Concerning his father Antipas, or, as he grecified his name, Antipater, authors have given us various accounts, according as they were well or ill affected towards his ſon. Thus N. Damaſcen, who had received great obligations from him and publiſhed his hiſtory in Herod's life, derives his pedigree from one of the principal Jews that returned from the Babyloniſh captivity; for which flagrant flattery Joſephus, who muſt have been better informed, doth ſharply reprove him, and aſſures us (27), that Antipater was of a noble Idumæan family, and had been made governor of Idumæa by Alexander Jannæus, and continued ſo under his queen Alexandra; ſo that, according to this laſt hiſtorian, he was of Idumæan race, but by religion a Jew, the Idumæans having long ſince been proſelyted, and incorporated into the Jewiſh church and ſtate, as we have ſeen before.

But a modern jeſuit (28), who has pretended to prove Joſephus's hiſtory to be a mere forgery, makes Herod to have been an Athenian; his proofs are, that he is called in ſome medals a benefactor to Athens, and that there actually was one of his name in that city in Cæſar's time. He has advanced ſeveral other ſingularities concerning that prince, which we may have occaſion to mention, when we come to ſpeak of his reign.

But none have more debaſed his origin than Julius Africanus, who, in his letter to Ariſtides mentioned by Euſebius (29), makes Antipater to have been the ſon of one Herod an Aſcalonite, who was veſtry-keeper of Apollo's temple in that city; and withal ſo poor, that when his ſon (this our great Herod) was taken priſoner by ſome Idumæan robbers, he was not able to redeem him, ſo that he was brought up among thoſe banditti, who were, however, of the Jewiſh religion; and this notion, it ſeems, was readily adopted by ſeveral of the fathers (30).

One

(25) Ch. xxxii. (26) Sub A. M Jul. per. 4642. (27) Antiq. l xiv. c. 2. (28) Hardouin de Numm. Herodian. (29) Eccl Hiſt. l. i. c. 6 & 7. (30) Vid. Ambr. Comment. in Luc. c. iii.

ſent him ſoon after with an army into Syria againſt Ptolemy Meneus, who infeſted all the neighbouring countries, and that he returned ſoon after without effecting any thing worth notice [e].

ABOUT the ſame time news came to her, that Tigranes king of Armenia was come into Syria with an Army of fifty thouſand men, and had beſieged Ptolemais, and that his deſign was to march from thence into Judæa. This knews threw the whole kingdom into the greateſt conſternation, it not being in a condition to make head againſt ſuch a powerful invader. She therefore haſtened ſome embaſſadors, laden with the richeſt preſents, to beſeech him to ſpare her dominions and to grant her his friendſhip. Both preſents and embaſſy were received with marks of the ſincereſt kindneſs and affection, not ſo much out of regard to that princeſs, as to his own affairs, which had by this time taken a different turn; his territories being now threatened with an invaſion from the Romans, who had already penetrated into Pontus and Cappadocia, where Lucullus was then ravaging all that country. So that he was forced to go and defend his own territories, inſtead of invading thoſe of his neighbours [f].

THE queen was ſcarcely rid of this danger before ſhe fell into new ones. A fit of ſickneſs, which ſeized her about this time, dangerous in its nature and much more ſo on account of her great age, made her youngeſt ſon believe that her death was near at hand, and that it was therefore high time for him to think of ſecuring the crown for himſelf, which his

The queen's ſickneſs.

[e] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 24. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 4. [f] Id. ibid.

One thing ſeems beyond contradiction, namely, that one of the main cauſes of the invincible hatred which the whole Jewiſh nation bore againſt that prince, in ſpight of all his grandeur, generoſity, and munificence, was his not being of Jewiſh extract; ſo that what Damaſcen and after him the Arabic hiſtory, printed at the end of the Paris polyglot, affirm of his noble deſcent, from a Jewiſh ſtock, muſt be falſe and groundleſs.

His oppoſite pedigree from a ſexton of Apollo's temple, is at beſt founded on a tradition, attributed to Chriſt's kinſmen, according to the fleſh, without the leaſt authority, and ſeems to be trumped up to debaſe the whole Herodian family, which was univerſally hated; and can conſequently never outweigh the teſtimony of Joſephus, who wanted neither means nor inclination to inform himſelf of his genealogy, and whoſe authority is ſtill univerſally received, in ſpite of all the cavils which the jeſuit above-quoted has raiſed againſt it.

his elder brother was unfit for. To this end he went out of Jeruſalem one night accompanied by one ſingle confident, with a deſign to go and bring over to his intereſt thoſe friends of his father, who had the cuſtody of the ſeveral fortifications, of which we have lately ſpoken. This ſecret he entruſted with none but his own wife, whom he left behind with her children, till he came to the caſtle of Agaba, where Gabeſtus, one of his father's chief confidents, who commanded there, received him with no ſmall joy. He immediately declared to him the deſign of his coming, and the reaſons he had to fear, leſt, if his mother died before he had made ſure of the crown, not only he and his whole family, but all their friends in general, ſhould again fall under the tyranny of the Phariſaic ſect, through the indolence and ſtupidity of his elder brother, who would doubtleſs ſuffer himſelf to be wholly governed by them. As his fears were but too well grounded, he eaſily gained Gabeſtus, whoſe example was ſoon followed by all the governors of the other fortreſſes, who all declared for him. The queen miſſed her ſon from the firſt night, but did not ſuſpect him of any deſign, till the alarmed Phariſees brought her word, that theſe fortreſſes were gone over to his intereſt, by which means he had got in ſome meaſure the whole ſtrength of the kingdom into his hands. As to the army, and even the people who were heretofore ſo ready to idolize their feet, they were ſenſible they had uſed them of late with ſuch ſeverity and inſolence, that, inſtead of expecting any ſupport from them, they had great reaſon to fear they would upon the very firſt occaſion go over to Ariſtobulus, and embrace the milder government of the Sadducees [g].

Ariſtobulus ſecures the crown.

They had brought Hyrcan with them to the queen, when they came to acquaint her with the diſmal ſituation of their affairs, and both he and they were very preſſing with her to adviſe them what to do in ſuch a dangerous caſe. The queen who found herſelf dying, had juſt ſtrength enough to tell them that her condition would not now permit her to think of their ſafety, and that ſhe left it wholly to them to ſee to it themſelves. She added, that they wanted neither ſoldiers, arms, nor money to make head againſt her other ſon, and that ſhe appointed Hyrcan her ſucceſſor. She expired immediately after, in the ſeventy-third year of her age and the ninth of her reign, to the inexpreſſible grief of the Phariſaic faction, who now could expect nothing elſe but a ſevere retaliation retaliation for all their cruelties to the late king's friends; but to the great joy of all the reſt of the kingdom, who nôw hoped to ſee an effectual end put to the Phariſaic tyranny, by her brave ſon Ariſtobulus (M).

The queen's death.

[g] Ant. l. xiii. c. ult. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 4.

Whilst therefore the hopes of ſuch a happy change brought daily both army and people over to him, the Phariſees found no other expedient to provide for their own ſafety, than ſeizing on his wife and children, and confining them in the caſtle of Baris, to be kept there as hoſtages againſt him. But when they found that this did not ſtop his progreſs, but that he took the royal title and ſtate upon him, and daily gained ſtrength, they raiſed an army againſt him; and Ariſtobulus, who deſired nothing more than a deciſive battle, well knowing the valour and fidelity of his army, and that he had little to fear from that of his brother, ſoon gave him an opportunity of joining iſſue with him. A battle was accordingly fought near Jericho, in which moſt of Hyrcan's forces went over to his brother, ſo that he had no way left but to retire to Jeruſalem, and to ſhut himſelf up in the ſame

(M) This defection from Hyrcan, whom ſhe had nominated her ſucceſſor, to her younger ſon, who was in ſome meaſure in open rebellion againſt her, did not proceed from any diſreſpect the people had for her; for ſhe appears to have been a princeſs of great wiſdom and conduct; and could ſhe have ſuppreſt the Phariſaic tyranny, would have left an unblemiſhed character behind her; and even this circumſtance of her giving too much way to it, appears to have been rather her misfortune than her fault.

Some authors (31) have abſurdly confounded this queen with Salome the wife, and afterwards the widow, of Ariſtobulus, the elder brother of the late Alexander, and who, as we obſerved a little higher, out of Joſephus, was alſo called Alexandra; ſo that they have ſuppoſed her to have been the ſame perſon, and that being left a widow, Alexander the next brother had been obliged, according to the Moſaic law, to marry her, and to raiſe up ſeed to his brother.

But this has been fully confuted by our learned Prideaux in the place above-quoted, ſince Hyrcan, who is every-where allowed to have been the ſon of Alexander, is there proved to have been five years old before Ariſtobulus died; for Hyrcan being according to Joſephus above eighty years of age when he died, which happened in the year before Chriſt 30, eighty-one years will carry us back to the year before Chriſt 111, whereas Ariſtobulus did not die till the year 106.

(31) Capel. & al. Vid. Prid. Connect. ſub. A. 70.

caſtle, where they had confined Ariſtobulus's wife and children. The few forces that ſtuck by him followed his example, and took ſanctuary within the verge of the temple, where they had not been long, ere they came over to his victorious brother. Things being brought to this deſperate ſtate, Hyrcan was glad to accept of a peace upon any terms; and Ariſtobulus granted it to him, upon condition that he deveſted himſelf of his regal and pontifical dignity, and wholly reſigned them to him, and contented himſelf with a private life, with the enjoyment of his private fortunes. Hyrcan, who, as we have obſerved more than once, was a man without ambition or ſpirit, made no difficulty to yield to thoſe conditions, and to deveſt himſelf of a government he could keep no longer, after a three months troubleſome poſſeſſion of it (N) [h].

THIS

[h] Ant. l. xiv. c. 1, 2, 3. Bell Jud. l. i. c. 5.

(N) So ſays the text in Joſephus; but our excellent Uſher has clearly ſhewn from the ſix years which elapſed between the conſulate of Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus, in which Hyrcan began his reign, and that of C. Antonius and M. T. Cicero, in which his brother Ariſtobulus was depoſed by Pompey, that there muſt be an error crept into Joſephus, who allows but three months reign to the former, and three years and ſix months to the latter.

But the learned prelate has not ſo well ſucceeded in correcting that miſtake, by ſuppoſing that Hyrcan reigned three years and three months (32), and that the former of the two numbers had been dropped by the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers; but this ſeems quite contrary to the tenor of Joſephus, who makes his reign and depoſition to have followed much cloſer than this ſuppoſition will admit of.

Another great antiquary (33) has taken a different way to ſolve the difficulty, by ſuppoſing that Hyrcan was deveſted of his regal dignity after the firſt three months; but that he preſerved the high-prieſthood three years longer, that is, till his flight to Aretas, of which we ſhall ſpeak by and-by; and that the three years and ſix months allowed to his brother by the Jewiſh hiſtorian are to be reckoned only from the time that he aſſumed the pontifical dignity. But this is again contradicted by Joſephus, who makes Ariſtobulus to have deveſted his brother of both dignities, and to have taken them upon himſelf at one and the ſame time, and Hyrcan to have been reduced to a private ſtate.

Dean Prideaux, in the place above quoted, ſuppoſes therefore, that the original had ſix years and ſix months, it being more reaſonable (32) Sub A. Jul. per 4647. (33) Petav. ap. Prid. ubi ſupra.

THIS depoſition did not, however, hinder Hyrcan's retaining ſtill a powerful party, which conſiſting chiefly of Phariſees; who had nothing to hope for, but a great deal to fear, from his ſucceſsful brother, were ſtill buſily plotting to raiſe up their old idol over him. This was gladly obſerved by Antipater the father of Herod, whoſe nation and pedigree we have ſpoken of in a late note. This perſon, though in all likelihood indifferent as to the diſtinction between Phariſee and Sadducee, being, as we there obſerved, an Idumean proſelyte, was in as great danger of feeling the reſentments of Ariſtobulus, as any of the former ſect. His peculiar ſkill and addreſs, backed by an unmeaſurable ambition, had long before recommended him to the favour of the late king Alexander and of his queen Alexandra, who had beſtowed the government of Idumæa upon him; and as he ſtill looked upon ſonable that a numerical letter ſhould be changed by the careleſsneſs of the ſcribe, than a whole word, that is, that he ſhould miſtake a three for a ſix, rather than a month for a year, as in the ſuppoſition of archbiſhop Uſher.

From the objection that Joſephus in another place (34) gives him but three years reign, and that not in numerical letters, but in words at length, which might be therefore looked upon as a confirmation of the former; the ſame judicious author rather confirms his own hypotheſis in as clear a manner as the ſubject can admit of. To give his anſwer at length would ſwell this note too much; we ſhall therefore content our ſelves with hinting at the main ſtreſs of his argument.

He obſerves, that this laſt place has three years, and the ſame number of months, whereas the former has three years and ſix months; from whence he ſuppoſes, that ſome critic, finding this difference between thoſe two places, and not ſuſpecting this laſt to have been corrupted, that is, three to have been put inſtead of ſix years, has altered the other place according to it, in order to reconcile the Jewiſh hiſtorian; and ſo inſtead of ſix years and juſt as many months, as he found it written, he made it three years and as many months, as he found it corrupted in the other place.

This ſuppoſition, which cannot but appear very probable to thoſe who are acquainted with manuſcripts, and with the inadvertency of tranſcribers, as well as the boldneſs of critics in correcting them, takes away at once all the difficulties, reconciles Joſephus to himſelf, and fills up the ſix years ſpace between Hyrcan's reign and Ariſtobulus's depoſition, according to the conſulates under which each of them happened according to the ſame hiſtorian (35).

(34) Antiq. l xx. c. 8. ad fin. Conf. cum. l. xiv. 11. & xv. 9.
(35) Conf. aut. l. xiv. c. 1, & 8.

Hyrcan as their ſucceſſor, the hopes of advancing himſelf ſtill higher under that ſoft prince, had betrayed him into a more than ordinary zeal for him. So that when he came to ſee his brother on the throne, he had all the reaſon in the world, not only to deſpair of further advancement, but to dread his reſentment. This determined him to join with the diſcontented Phariſees, whom from that time he ſtill took care to fill with fears and jealouſies from that prince, whom he ſtyled an uſurper; and who, he told them, would never think himſelf ſecure, till he had cut off his brother, and with him all that had been in his intereſt. By theſe inſinuations he ſoon drew them into his deſign to dethrone him, and ſet up his brother again; but his great difficulty was to prevail upon Hyrcan to join with them. That prince, being of an eaſy and indolent diſpoſition, could not be perſuaded that his brother would attempt any thing againſt his life; neither had he any ambition to recover his loſt dignities, or, if he had, it was eaſily cooled by the danger of attempting it, which he viewed in the moſt diſmal light. When therefore Antipater perceived that fear was his predominant paſſion, he raiſed ſuch a battery againſt it by repeated aſſurances that his life was in manifeſt danger, and that he muſt reſolve either to reign or die; that the weak prince was at length wrought upon to ſeek for ſafety and aſſiſtance from Aretas king of Arabia.

Antipater cabals with the Phariſees.

As ſoon as he had gained his conſent, he offered himſelf to go and negotiate that affair; which he did with ſuch privacy and diſpatch, that he came back very ſoon after, took Hyrcan with him in the night, and by long journies brought him to Petra, the metropolis of Arabia, where he preſented him to the king. It is likely that Antipater, at his firſt interview with Aretas, had only engaged him to protect Hyrcan againſt his brother; but now they were both at his court, he began to open to him the other part of his deſign, and to convince him how much it would be his intereſt to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his kingdom, by aſſuring him that he ſhould have all the places reſtored to him, which had been heretofore taken from him by the Jewiſh kings, which were very conſiderable (O), and which he muſt never hope to recover, as Carries Hyrcan into Arabia.

(O) Theſe were Medeba Neballo, probably Abela, al. Arbela, and Abel of the vineyards; and Rabbah, once the capital of the Ammonites; Livias Agalla, perhaps the ſame with Gallim; Therabaſa, as long as Aristobulus was on the throne. He told him moreover, that Hyrcan had such a powerful party in Judæa, ready to join with his forces, that he looked upon the dethroning of the usurper as a very easy task. Hyrcan was easily persuaded to confirm all his minister had said, and to ratify all the engagements he had made to the Arabian king, who came soon after with them into Judæa, at the head of an army of five thousand men, where he was joined by those of Hyrcan's party. Aristobulus marched against him, and an obstinate fight ensued, in which he was totally defeated, and forced to flee into Jerusalem. Aretas pursued him thither, and entered that metropolis without opposition, drove him and his few men, most of them priests, into the precinct of the temple, and there closely besieged him, whilst the rest of the people declared for the conqueror.

Aretas invades Judæa.

Aristobulus defeated.

THE temple being thus besieged, and the approaching feast of the passover thereby likely to be wholly obstructed, many of the chief of the Jews retired into Egypt to celebrate it there. On the other hand, the besieged having neither lambs or other victims for the sacrifices of that solemnity, Aristobulus applied himself to the besiegers to supply them with a competent number of them; which those at first promised, upon condition that they payed them a thousand drachms of silver for every head, and had the money delivered before-hand. But when the sum stipulated was let down to them by a rope from the top of the wall, they refused to send the victims; upon which the priests went to the altar, and instead of them, offered up their prayers to God that he would speedily punish their perfidious contempt of his religion. To this guilt the besiegers added another, neither of which went long unpunished.

Besieges the temple.

THERE was at that time in Jerusalem one Onias, a man in high esteem for his sanctity; and who was thought to have saved the land from a famine, by obtaining from heaven a comfortable rain, after a long and grievous drought. This good man, seeing his unhappy country involved in a civil war, had retired into some of the neighbouring deserts, and hid himself there. Him they found out, and brought by main force to the siege, and would have obliged him to curse Aristobulus Therabasa, Athone, Zoara, probably Segor; Oronæ, or Oronaim, on the dead sea; Mariſſa, Rydda, Lusa, and Oryba (36).

(36) Ibid. cap. ii. ad fin. De his vid. Euseb. loc. Hebr. Bochart. &c.

ſtobulus and his adherents. He reſiſted a long time, till conſtrained at length by their threats, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and addreſſed it in words to this effect: O Lord God, ſovereign Governor of the world, ſince theſe that beſiege thy temple are thy people, and thoſe that are beſieged in it are thy prieſts, I beſeech thee to hear the prayers of neither ſide. He had ſcarce pronounced theſe words, before the exaſperated multitude let fly on him ſuch vollies of ſtones as put an end to his life. This double crime brought a double puniſhment very ſpeedily upon them: a vehement ſtormy wind did ſhortly after deſtroy all their fruit and grain, inſomuch, that a meaſure of wheat ſold for eleven drachms, and other proviſions in proportion [i]. But the moſt dreadful of all was, their falling preſently after under the yoke of the Romans; a yoke which they never more could ſhake off, but groaned under the ſevere weight of it, till the utter deſtruction of their city and temple, and their total diſperſion throughout the world as will be ſeen in the next ſections.

Onias's murder puniſhed.

[i] Ibid. & ſeq.

SECT. IV.

The hiſtory of the Jews from their being ſubdued by the Romans to the reign of Herod the Great.

ARISTOBULUS being thus ſtreightly beſieged by the Arabian king, and forſaken by all his party, was forced to have recourſe to the Romans; for Pompey, having by this time overcame Tigranes, was retired into the Leſſer Armenia, and from thence had diſpatched Gabinius into Judæa; and this laſt having received three hundred talents from Ariſtobulus, was gone back without acting for or againſt him. Scaurus came next from Syria into Judæa, and in his way was met by ſome embaſſadors from the two contending brothers (P), each to implore his friendſhip and alliance, for which they offered him four hundred talents. Scaurus,

The Romans invited by Ariſtobulus. Year of the flood 2934. Year before Chriſt 65.

(P) The fourth book of Maccabees ſays (37), that only Ariſtobulus ſent preſents to Scaurus, and that Hyrcan omitted it, which determined the Roman general in favour of the former, and made him come to his aſſiſtance; but that he retired as ſoon as he heard that Aretas had raiſed the ſiege.

(37) Cap. xxxvi.

Scaurus, who knew Ariſtobulus to be the more liberal and the braver of the two, ſuffered himſelf to be gained by him; beſides, as he rightly judged, it would be the eaſier task to reſtore him, ſince he need but oblige Aretas to raiſe the ſiege, and to depart out of Judæa, and Hyrcan would ſoon be abandoned by his party. He therefore wrote a threatening letter to Aretas, in which he told him, that if he did not forthwith withdraw his troops, he ſhould be declared an enemy to Rome, and oblige Pompey to turn his army againſt him. Aretas, who had no mind to exaſperate the Roman general, did readily obey, and led his army out of Judæa, Scaurus returned to Damaſcus, and Ariſtobulus being thus timely relieved, gathered up what forces he could, and purſued after the Arabian king. He overtook him and his brother Hyrcan at a place called Papyrion, and gave him a great overthrow, in which he killed ſeven thouſand of his men, and amongſt them Cephalion the brother of Antipater [a]. Much about the ſame time, Pompey being come to Damaſcus, received embaſſadors from all the neighbouring ſtates, eſpecially thoſe of Judæa, Syria, and Egypt. Theſe three laſt being but a kind of uſurpers, were extremely deſirous to bring the Romans over to their intereſt, and endeavoured to gain their general by moſt magnificent preſents. Ariſtobulus for his part ſent him a golden vine, upon a ſquare mount, with the fruit on it, and deer, lions and other beaſts about it, all of the ſame precious metal. This curious piece had been formerly made by Alexander Jannæus, and was now ſent by his ſon to Pompey, who conveyed it to Rome, where it was depoſited, in the temple of Jupiter, in the capitol. Strabo tells us [b], that he ſaw it there, and that it was reckoned worth five thouſand talents. However, the ſenate not being willing to acknowledge Ariſtobulus for king of Judæa, cauſed the preſent to be inſcribed to his father Alexander, king of the Jews.

Aretas defeated by Ariſtobulus.

The two brothers ſend preſents to Pompey.

Soon after this the two contending brothers ſent a ſeparate embaſſy to Pompey, on his coming into Cœle-Syria, each to implore his friendſhip and patronage againſt the other; Antipater in behalf of Hyrcan, and Nicodemus in behalf of Ariſtobulus. Both were heard with ſeeming equanimity, and diſmiſſed with fair promiſes, and the two brothers ordered to appear in perſon, and to plead their cauſes before him, and, after a full hearing, he engaged to decide the controverſy controverſy as juſtice ſhould direct. Unfortunately for Ariſtobulus, his embaſſador took it into his head to complain of Scaurus and Gabinius, for having received the former four hundred, and the latter three hundred, talents from his maſter, by which he made thoſe two generals, who had a great influence on Pompey, to become his enemies [c]; and the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that the Roman general did acordingly promiſe him to decide in favour of Ariſtobulus, but did underhand act in favour of his brother [d].

Send a ſecond embaſſy.

[a] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 4. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 5. [b] Strab. ap. Joſeph. ubi ſupra. Vid. & Plin. hiſt. l, xxxvii. c. 2.

EARLY in the following year, Pompey came again into Syria, where he depoſed ſeveral petty tyrants, took ſeveral fortreſſes, particularly that of Lyſiad, of which Silas a Jew had made himſelf maſter, and came at length to Damaſcus. Here he found the two brothers, who were come to plead their cauſe and pretenſions before him, and had brought a great number of witneſſes to their reſpective pleas. But, beſides theſe, there came alſo another ſet of Jews, to plead againſt them both, alledging, that their nation had been for a long time governed only by the high-prieſts of the God of Iſrael, without the regal dignity; and that, though the two brothers were of the ſacerdotal race, they had governed them contrary to their antient laws, by taking the power and title of kings, and thereby reducing the Jewiſh nation into a ſtate of ſlavery. Hyrcan ſpoke next, and complained, that, being the elder brother, he had been unjuſtly depoſed by Ariſtobulus, and by him forced into a private ſtate, with only the income of a few paternal lands, whiſt he, not contented with the revenues of the whole kingdom, committed continualy depredations on his neighbours both by ſea and land. For proof of all which he brought a thouſand of the principal Jews, who had been gained by Antipater, to witneſs what he had alledged. To this Ariſtobulus replied, that he had indeed turned his brother out of the government; but that it was, becauſe he was incapable of holding of it, and not from any ambitious views of his own; that Hyrcan was a perſon of ſuch inactive and ſluggiſh diſpoſition, and ſo deſpiſed by the people, that he had been forced to wreſt the power out of his hands, leſt it ſhould be transferred into another family. He added, that as to the royal title, it was no other than his father Alexander had bore before him. The witneſſes he brought to juſtify his pretenſions were, a numerous ſet of young gentlemen ſo ſumptuouſly cloathed, that they Plead their cauſe in perſon.

[c] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 5. [d] c. xxxviii.

they rather discredited him, and seemed to have been introduced to expose his vanity more than to back his cause. However, Pompey, after a full hearing of all parties, wisely deferred giving his sentence, lest Aristobulus, against whom he designed to declare, should obstruct his intended expedition against the Nabatheans, and contented himself with dismissing them with a promise, that, as soon as he had subdued Aretas, he would come himself into Judæa, and there determine their controversy. Aristobulus, who looked upon this delay as an ill omen, and did not perhaps care to see Pompey in Judæa, went away in a huff, first to Delion, and thence into Judæa, without so much as taking leave of him [e].

This proceeding highly offended the Roman general against him, who thereupon sent for his troops, which he had in Syria, and with those which he designed against the Arabians, and the legions which he had with him, marched streight against Judæa. Aristobulus had not been idle, but had got a good army under him, and was himself at the castle of Alexandrion, a place of no small strength (Q), when Pompey entered Judæa. As soon as this last had reached Corea, he sent for Aristobulus to come to him; who would have willingly excused himself from it, but was at lenght prevailed upon by those that were about him to obey the summons, and prevent thereby a war with the Roman general. He came accordingly, more than once or twice, to him, and conferred with him about the dispute between his brother and him, sparing neither compliments, promises, nor presents, to engage him on his side. Pompey as often dismissed him with a shew of friendship, and suffered him to return to his castle. At length he proposed to him that he should put all his

[e] Antiq. & bell. Jud. ubi supra.

(Q) This fortress had been built by his father Alexander Jannæus, and was from him called Alexandrion; it was situate on a high mountain, in the very entrance into Judæa, near to the town of Corea (38), which was the first place in Judæa on the Samaritan side, and upon the road to Jericho, on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin (39). Alexandrion was afterwards the burying-place of the Jewish kings, so that, though it was demolished by the Romans, it was rebuilt by Herod, and his sons sent thither to be buried, as we shall see in the sequel.

(38) Vid. Joseph. antiq. l. xiii. c. ult. xiv. 6. & alib. (39) Ibid. & bell. Jud. l. v. c. 4.

his fortreſſes into his hands, and ſend orders to all his governors to reſign them to him without heſitation. It was eaſy for him to ſee now that the Roman general was in his brother's intereſt, and wanted only to put it out of his power to maintain himſelf againſt him. But though he had been long before ſuſpecting this partiality, and had taken all poſſible methods to ſecure himſelf againſt it, yet was he forced, though much againſt his will, to comply with the propoſal, being now in that general's hands. But as ſoon as he was got away from him, he fled with all ſpeed to Jeruſalem, with full reſolution to defeat his deſign [f].

Pompey comes againſt Jeruſalem.

POMPEY was not long in following him thither, and upon his encamping in the plain of Jericho, received the agreeable news, that Mithridates had killed himſelf, and that his treacherous ſon had ſeized upon the kingdom; and in ſuch haſte was the army to know it, that the general, for want of tribunal to communicate it to them, according to cuſtom, cauſed one to be raiſed by laying a number of ſaddles one upon another, from which he acquainted them with the Pontick king's death, and received their congratulations with the uſual ſignals of joy [g]. He purſued his march on the next day towards Jeruſalem, whence Ariſtobulus, repenting now of what he had done, came out, and went to throw himſelf at his feet, and to beg of him to forbear any hoſtilities againſt the Jewiſh nation, promiſing him a conſiderable ſum of money upon that condition. The general agreed to it, and, keeping him in his camp, ſent Gabinius with ſome troops to receive the money; but he was repulſed by the garriſon, who ſhut the gates againſt him and refuſed to perform the agreement. This diſappointment ſo exaſperated Pompey, that he ordered Ariſtobulus to be clapt in chains, and marched directly with his whole army againſt the city (R). We have had [f] Ant. ubi ſupra, c. 6. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra. [g] Plutarch. in vit. Pomp.

(R) The fourth book of the Maccabees differs a little from Joſephus, and mentions nothing of this ſubmiſſion of Ariſtobulus to the Roman general; but tells us (40), that Pompey marched directly againſt Jeruſalem, where, obſerving the ſituation of the place, the ſtrength of its walls, towers, &c. he reſolved to try to gain Ariſtobulus by fair means; that he invited him had frequent occaſion to ſpeak of the ſtrength of this place, both with reſpect to its excellent ſituation, and of its other fortifications; ſo that being now ſo well garriſoned and provided, it might in all likelihood have found the Roman general work enough to have taken it by ſiege; but unfortunately for it, thoſe that ſhould have defended it were divided into two parties; that for Ariſtobulus were for ſtanding out to the laſt againſt a general, who dared to keep their king in chains; but that for Hyrcan, which were the more numerous, were on the contrary for opening the gates to him, and prevent thereby the ſad effects of a ſiege and deſtructive war. The prieſts declared for the former, but the generality of the people were for the latter; ſo that Ariſtobulus, finding himſelf overpowered, was forced to retire with his men within the precinct of the temple, breaking down all the bridges between that and the city, that were over the deep valley, which parted thoſe two places, before Pompey could be admitted into the latter. Beſieges it.

(40) c. xxxvi.

He was accordingly invited ſoon after, and ſent Piſo, one of his generals, with a number of troops, to ſecure the place and the royal palace, whilſt thoſe that were in the temple were buſy in fortifying every part of it, that could be of ſervice to them to hold on the ſiege. Pompey at firſt ſent to them ſome propoſals of peace, but finding them reſolved to ſtand it out, he ſet himſelf immediately to beſiege them in form. He began with incloſing the place with a ſtrong wall, to prevent either their flight, or their receiving any help from without; Hyrcan gladly furniſhing him with all neceſſary things to carry on the work. Battering rams and other engines of war being brought to him from Tyre, he ordered the attack to be made on the north ſide of the temple, which was the weakeſt, though incloſed with ſtrong walls, high towers, and other fortifications; and had a large deep ditch and a ſpacious valley beneath it. As for the other ſides of it they were in a manner inacceſſible, after the bridges had been broken down, by reaſon of their craggineſs and ſteepneſs. The battering engines were accordingly raiſed on mounds and plat-forms, and began to play in earneſt againſt to come to his camp, and promiſed him all the ſafety he could deſire; that he came accordingly, and promiſed that general to deliver up all the treaſure of the temple, if he would declare for him. But that the prieſts having refuſed to ratify their king's promiſe, made the diſappointed general lay ſiege to the temple.

gainſt the place, and to fling large ſtones into it, whilſt the beſieged were as induſtrious in levelling the one and diſmounting the other, as faſt as they were raiſed by the beſiegers. The ſiege had already took him up three months, and might in all likelihood have laſted much longer, if not perhaps been raiſed, had not the beſieged been ſeized again with their old and fatal ſuperſtition about the breach of the ſabbath, which hindered them from making ſuch a defence as they had formerly, and ſhould now have done.

Strange ſuperſtition of the Jews.

We have had occaſion heretofore to ſhew how deſtructive that notion had been to their forefathers, and how wiſely it had been condemned by the brave Maccabees, ſo that from their time they had made no ſcruple to take up arms againſt an offending enemy; but now they were, it ſeems, taken with a qualm of conſcience, that though it was lawful to ſtand in their defence on the ſabbath, when an actual aſſault was made upon them, it did not therefore follow, that they might do any thing on that day towards preventing thoſe preparatives which the enemy made towards ſuch future aſſaults. This ſcruple had ſuch an effect upon them, that they never moved a hand on that day to hinder either mounds and batteries being raiſed, or breaches being made on their walls; which being at laſt perceived by the beſiegers, they took the advantage of getting all things ready for an aſſault on that day, without throwing either ſtones or any miſſive weapons that might force them on their own defence, ſo that the beſieged let them go on with their other works without the leaſt oppoſition; and ſuch was their zeal for the divine ſervice of the temple, that no annoyance from the enemy could obſtruct it from being performed, with the ſame regularity and calmneſs, as in time of the profoundeſt peace. By theſe means the beſiegers made at length ſo deep a breach by playing down one of their towers, which in its fall brought down a conſiderable part of the wall (S), that they eaſily maſtered the place. Cornelius Fauſtus, the ſon of Sylla, at the head of a number of troops, mounted one end of the breach, Furius the other end, and Fabius in the middle. A horrid ſlaughter immediately enſued, in which no leſs than twelve thouſand of the beſieged were killed by the Romans, beſides

(S) The fourth book of the Maccabees (41) ſays, that ſome of the Jews, who were on Pompey's ſide, ſcaled the wall, and, having ſlain all the prieſts that oppoſed them, opened the temple gates to him.

(41) Ibid.

beſides many more, who died by their own hands; in this action the Jews of the contrary faction acted with greater fury and cruelty againſt them than the heathen.

The city taken. Year of the flood 2936. Before Chriſt 63.

WHAT was moſt ſurpriſing, during this horrid ſcene of action, was the conſtancy of the prieſts, who never intermitted one moment the divine ſervice of the temple, but continued to offer up their uſual prayers, praiſes, and ſacrifices, with the ſame calmneſs and aſſiduity, as if no ſuch ſlaughter had been then acting in the ſacred place; and at laſt ſuffered themſelves to be butchered before the altar, with as much meekneſs and conſtancy, as the victims they were then offering upon it (T). Pompey, though ſurpriſed at their religious conſtancy, cauſed all the priſoners that were found to have been zealous againſt him to be put to death (U), whilſt a great number of the reſt prevented him by a deſperate exit, ſome throwing themſelves down the deepeſt precipices, and others ſetting their apartments on fire, burnt themſelves in it. Theſe were the fruits of Ariſtobulus's ambition, and of the two contending brothers calling in the Romans. Theſe new maſters, who ſeldom, if ever, lent their aſſiſtance but with a view of enſlaving, ſoon altered the face of the Jewiſh affairs, according to their uſual method. Hyrcan was indeed reſtored to the pontifical dignity, with the Admirable conſtancy of the prieſts.

Hyrcan half reſtored.

(T) It is obſervable, that the city was taken on the very day on which the Jews were keeping a ſolemn faſt in memory of its having been formerly taken by Nebuchadnezzar, viz. on the 28th of the month Ciſleu, anſwering to our December, according to the learned Uſher (42), who takes the third month here mentioned to have been that of the ſacred year; but it is more probable to have been the third of the civil year called Thammus, anſwering to our June, as dean Prideaux has ſhewn (43). On the ſame day, twenty-ſix years after, it was likewiſe taken by Soſius, by which the Jews became ſubject to the Herodian ſceptre (44).

(U) Among theſe is ſuppoſed to have been Abſalom, the uncle and father-in-law of Ariſtobulus. This prince, who was a younger ſon of the famed John Hyrcanus, had led a private life under the protection of his brother Jannæus, without meddling with public affairs, till he unfortunately gave his daughter to Ariſtobulus. For this marriage having drawn him into his ſon-in law's party, he was taken priſoner, and in all probability put to death. At leaſt no further mention is made of him from that time (45).

(42) Sub. A. M. 3641. (43) Sub. A. ant. Chriſt 64. (44) Ant. l. xiv. c. ult. (45) Ant. l. xiv. c. 8.

the ſpecious title of prince, though from thenceforth tributary to Rome; but he was wholly deveſted of his regal one, and forbid to reſume either the diadem or royal ſtyle, or to extend his territory beyond the old borders of Judæa. All the cities, which had been taken by his predeceſſors in Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, were taken from him and reſtored to Syria (W), of which province Scaurus was left governor, at the head of two Roman legions, to keep the country in awe, whilſt the conqueror prepared himſelf to return to Rome.

Pompey enters into the temple.

But before he left Jeruſalem, he gave the Jews a more mortifying ſtroke than any we have yet mentioned. We have had frequent occaſion to mention how jealous they were of having their temple profaned by ſtrangers, whom they abſolutely debarred not only ſetting a foot into that holy place, but even caſting a diſtant look towards it. But Pompey was above humouring them in what he looked upon as a piece of Jewiſh ſuperſtition. Reſolved theretofore to ſatisfy his curioſity, and to view the moſt ſacred receſſes of that building, he cauſed them to be opened to him; and, attended with a number of his chief commanders, penetrated even into the moſt holy place, into which the high-prieſt alone was permitted to enter once a year, on the grand day of expiation †. He viewed with a curious eye the golden table, candleſtick, cenſers, lamps, and other golden veſſels, the great quantity of rich perfumes and ſpices uſed in the divine worſhip; and in the treaſury he found about two thouſand talents. But whether the ſacredneſs of the place inſpired him with an uncommon reſpect for thoſe coſtly things, which he there ſaw, our author tells us, that he not only forbore

† See before, vol. iii, p. 220, & ſeq.

(W) Theſe were, among many others of leſs note, thoſe of Hyrcan, Scythopolis, Pella, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethuſa in the inland, together with Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton on the ſea-coaſts. This laſt was afterwards magnificently rebuilt by Herod, and by him called Cæſarea, as ſhall be ſeen in the ſequel.

Among thoſe cities which had been deſtroyed during the wars, that of Gadara was rebuilt by Demetrius, a native of it, and a freed-man and favourite of Pompey (46), of whoſe exceſſive inſolence Plutarch gives us ſeveral inſtances in the life of that general.

(46) Id. ibid.

forbore to touch any of them, but that he immediately ordered the prieſts and officers of the temple to purify it, and to offer up their ſacrifices according to cuſtom. But this moderation of his did not hinder the Jews from reſenting the indignity he had offered to that holy place, more than all the miſchiefs they had ſuffered from him, and from aſcribing all the misfortunes that befel him afterwards to this ſacrilegious attempt [h]. Many chriſtians have been of the ſame mind, and men are indeed too apt to judge raſhly in matters of this nature; but whatever may have been the cauſe of that great general's misfortunes, it is plain, that this victory over the Jews was the laſt he ever gained, and that from this time his affairs went from bad to worſe, as we ſhall ſhew when we come to the Roman hiſtory.

POMPEY, having thus ſubdued the Jewiſh nation, to prevent a future revolt, pulled down the walls of Jeruſalem, and left Scaurus governor with a ſufficient force. He ſet out for Rome ſoon after, and took Ariſtobulus, his two ſons, Alexander and Antigonus, and his two daughters with him, as captives fit to adorn his future triumph (X). However, they were not, it ſeems, ſo cloſely guarded, but Alexander found Ariſtobulus carried to Rome.

Alexander returns into Judæa.

[h] Joſeph. antiq. l. xiv. c. 8.

(X) The fourth book of the Maccabees ſays (47), that Pompey reſtored the kingdom to Hyrcanus, and ſent Ariſtobulus in chains to Rome. As to Alexander, he tells us, that he could not be taken, but continued hid in Judæa, till he appeared at the head of a ſtrong party; and as for Hyrcan, though he had the title of king, yet he was to pay a yearly tribute and acknowledgment for his crown.

This expedition and ſucceſs of Pompey againſt the Jews is alſo related by ſeveral heathen authors, and, excepting ſome difference in ſmall particulars, almoſt to the ſame purport with Joſephus. Cicero highly commends the reſpect that general ſhewed to the ſacred utenſils of the temple (48). Livy Oroſius, Eutropius, Strabo, Lucan, Plutarch, Tacitus, Florus, Dio, and Appian, have made likewiſe mention of it. Only Appian (49) will have it, that Pompey cauſed Ariſtobulus and Tigranes to be put to death, which is not taken notice of by any other. On the contrary, Joſephus and Dio (50) tell us, that he ſpared them; and accordingly we ſhall find in the ſequel, that Ariſtobulus found means to return into Judæa, and to raiſe new troubles there.

(47) Cap. xxxvii. (48) Orat. pro L. Flacc. (49) In Syriac. & bell. civil. l. v. (50) Lib. xxxvii.

means to eſcape and return into Judæa; where he ſoon drew a conſiderable party after him, which proved the ſource of new and more grievous troubles. As for his father and brother, they were brought to Rome, and led in triumph among the many other princes whom Pompey had conquered. What became of Ariſtobulus afterwards, we have mentioned in the cloſe of the laſt note. Among the rich ſpoils which Pompey carried with him, was the golden vine we have ſpoken of in the laſt ſection, the worth of which is ſaid to have amounted to five or ſix hundred talents, and which he dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus [i].

Antipater's policy.

As ſoon as Hyrcan found himſelf rid of his rival brother, he relapſed afreſh into his indolence, leaving the care of his affairs to Antipater, who, like a true politician, failed not to turn it to his advantage and the aggrandiſing of his family. He foreſaw, however, that he could not eaſily compaſs his ends, unleſs he indeared himſelf to the Romans; and therefore ſpared neither pains nor coſt to gain their favour. Scaurus was ſoon after beholding to him for a ſupply of corn and other proviſions, without which his army, which he had led againſt the metropolis of Arabia, muſt have been in danger of periſhing. This ſervice was followed by another, and Antipater, who was ſo well known to the king of Arabia, went and prevailed on that prince to pay three hundred talents to the Roman general [k], and thereby ſave his country from being ravaged by him (Y). It is alſo very probable, that Antipater was the perſon who procured thoſe ſervices from Hyrcan to the Athenians, for which, Joſephus tells us [l], they made that honourable act of their ſenate, in which the pontiff is ſtyled a great friend and benefactor to all the Greeks, and more particularly to the Athenians, and for which they decreed

[i] Antiq. ubi ſupra. See alſo the authors quoted in the laſt note. [k] Ant. l. xiv. c. 9. [l] Ibid. c. 10.

(Y) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (1), that Hyrcan and Antipater accompanied Scaurus into Arabia with ſome forces, and that during that time Alexander took the opportunity of ſeizing on Jeruſalem, rebuilding its fortifications, and of raiſing an army, with which he overthrew the high-prieſt on his return from the Arabian expedition: but if he got ſuch advantages over his uncle, he did not keep them long; for, according to Joſephus, we find that pontiff in Jeruſalem, and Alexander only plundering the countries round about, till ſuppreſſed by Gabinius creed him a crown of gold, and a ſtatue of braſs, to be placed in the temple of Demus (Z) and the Graces [m]. Thus did that politic miniſter lay the foundations for his future grandeur, by ſecuring the friendſhip of the moſt powerful ſtates. Herod his ſon followed the ſame maxims, eſpecially with regard to the Romans and Athenians, and thereby completed what his father had begun, as the ſequel will ſoon ſhew.

(1) Ubi ſupra.

Alexander waſtes Judæa.

In the mean time Alexander, having got a ſtrong party in Judæa, and an army of ten thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe, began to ſeize and fortify ſeveral eminent fortreſſes, ſuch as thoſe of Alexandrion and Macheron, ſituate near the foot of the Arabian mountains, and from them made frequent incurſions into Judæa. Hyrcan was not in a condition to ſuppreſs him; on the contrary, having endeavoured to ſhelter himſelf from him by rebuilding the walls of his metropolis, which Pompey had cauſed to be demoliſhed, the Romans, always jealous of their new conqueſts, had forced him to deſiſt; ſo that he was forced to call them to ſuppreſs this new invader. Accordingly Gabinius, who was preſident of Syria and was lately come into that province, ſent Marc Antony with ſome troops againſt him, whilſt himſelf and the reſt of his army were preparing to follow him. Antipater ſent likewiſe ſuch forces as he had raiſed to join the Roman general, and theſe being followed by a number of Jews in the Roman intereſt, with Pitolaus at their head, Alexander

[m] Id. ibid. cap. xvi.

(Z) The original has τὸ Δημὸς, which ſome verſions render Demus, as we have above, though our Engliſh one render it of the people, &c. A learned critic conjectures, that there is an error crept into Joſephus, and that it probably was the temple of the Muſes and Graces, or perhaps the temple of Academus and the Graces (2). For we are told by an antient writer (3), that there was a temple in their academy dedicated to the Muſes, in which Plato did ſet up the ſtatues of the Graces; and we don't read that the Athenians had any other temple of the Muſes beſides that.

Archbiſhop Uſher places this decree and preſents in the ninth year of Hyrcan's reign, from the death of his mother (4); he there rectifies an anachroniſm in Joſephus concerning it, which the reader may ſee in that learned author.

(2) Calmet. Hiſt. v. Teſt. l. viii. ſub A. M. 3943. (3) Diog. Laert. in vit. Leucipp. (4) Annal. ſub an. ant. Chr. 63.

Defeated. was forced to retire into the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where a battle was soon after fought, in which he was defeated, and lost three thousand of his men, besides those that were taken prisoners. He was thence pursued to Alexandrion, where he had refuged himself, and there besieged by Gabinius; but, the place being strong and well provided, that general ordered a number of troops to invest the place, whilst he marched with the rest into Judæa, where he caused the cities mentioned in a former note to be rebuilt, according to Pompey's order. That of Samaria being one of them, he called it from his own name Gabiniana; but Herod soon after changed it into that of Sebaste,[n] as we shall see in its proper place. Whilst Alexander was closely besieged, he sent to desire peace of the Roman general, promising to surrender that fortress, and those of Macheron and Hyrcanion. About the same time his mother, a wise and discreet woman, whose husband (Aristobulus) and her children were still kept prisoners at Rome, came to the Roman general; and, partly by her address, and partly by her services to him, did insinuate herself so much in his favour, that she procured the peace offered by her son to be accepted, and him to be dismissed with pardon and impunity for what he had done. After this Gabinius ordered the three fortresses delivered up to him to be demolished, that they might be no longer an occasion of future revolts; and then led Hyrcan, who had it seems assisted him in the siege, to Jerusalem, where he reinstated him afresh into his pontifical dignity. He then divided the province into five several districts, in each of which he erected a separate court of judicature; the first at Jerusalem, the second at Gadara, the third at Amath, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sephoris in Galilee[o]; by which the government was changed from a monarchy into an aristocracy, and the Jews, who had been till then governed by their own monarchical pontiffs, fell under the subjection of a set of domineering lords (A).

Besieged.

Change of the Jewish government.

In

[n] Vid. Syncel. ap. Usser. sub. A. M. 3979. [o] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 10. Id. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 6.

(A) The Jews had till now been governed by two sorts of councils or courts of judicature under their sovereign. These councils or sanhedrins were of two sorts, the inferior consisting of twenty-three, and the greater one of seventy-two, persons; and this latter was emphatically called the grand sanhedrin. Of the lesser sort there was one in every city, and two at Jerusalem, were

In the mean time Ariſtobulus, towards the latter end of the year, found means to eſcape out of the priſon, into which he had been remanded after Pompey's triumph, and to return into Judæa with his ſon Antigonus. Here he was ſoon joined by a conſiderable number of Jews, and among the reſt by Pitolaus, who had till then been a chief leader of the Roman party. But a great number of them coming to him without arms, he was forced to diſmiſs them, and only reſerved eight thouſand ſtout men, with whom he went to ſecure and rebuild the caſtle of Alexandrion, which had been demoliſhed by Gabinius; but this laſt ſent Ciſenna, Marc Antony, and Servilius againſt him, who, in ſpight of the bravery of his ſmall army, defeated him, killed five thouſand of his men, and forced him to fly into the ruinated caſtle of Macheron, with only a thouſand men he had left, the reſt having taken their flight where they could. The Romans did not give him time to fortify himſelf, but came and beſieged him, and, after a two days ſtout reſiſtance, took him by aſſault, covered with wounds, and ſent him and his ſon priſoners to Rome, where he was conveyed into his old priſon. But Gabinius wrote ſoon after to the ſenate, and informed them of the promiſe he had made to Ariſtobulus's wife, upon the delivery of the Jewiſh fortreſſes; whereupon the reſt of his family were ordered to be ſet at liberty, and he only was kept priſoner during the reſt of his life [p]. Gabinius being on the next year invited into Egypt, to aſſiſt Ptolemy Ariſtobulus eſcapes into Judæa.

Defeated and ſent priſoner.

Gabinius goes into Egypt. Year of the flood 2943. Before Chriſt 56.

[p] Id. ibid. 4 Maccab. cxl.

where there was a greater concourſe of people and buſineſs. The grand one ſat only at Jeruſalem, and had a place appropriated to them in the temple. We have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak of this laſt in ſeveral parts of this hiſtory; and ſhall only add here, that it was the laſt reſort to which all other inferior ones might appeal, and from whoſe ſentence there could be no appeal. Both ſorts were aboliſhed by Gabinius, who erected in lieu of them a court in each of the five diſtricts independent of each other, and endowed them with the ſovereign power, from which no appeal could be made but to Rome.

The talmud, however, tells us (5), that they retained a kind of council of three to decide all their controverſies about bargains, ſales, and other ſuch private matters; each of the contending parties choſe a judge from among themſelves, and thoſe two choſe a third, and the three uſed to decide thoſe controverſies among them; which was perhaps done chiefly to avoid the charge, trouble, or rather injuſtice and arbitrarineſs of the courts erected by the Romans.

(5) Tract. Sanhedrin.

Ptolemy Auletes in the recovery of his kingdom, as has been related in another volume †, Hyrcan, or rather Antipater, proved very serviceable to that general, not only by furnishing him with necessary provisions of corn, arms, and money, for his army; but also by writing to the Jews of Onion near Pelusium, which was the key of that part of Egypt, to forward the Romans to the best of their power. By this means Gabinius and Marc Antony easily succeeded in the expedition, which might otherwise have proved too hard for them. The fourth book of the Maccabees, in the place last quoted, tells us, that Gabinius having sent to desire Hyrcan to come and join him in Egypt, the high-priest sent his favourite Antipater, with an army to him, who helped him to beat the Egyptians and restore the king; after which, they returning into Judæa, the Roman general renewed his alliance and friendship with the Jewish pontiff, and then returned to Rome.

Alexander raises new troubles.

During this Egyptian expedition, Alexander, taking the advantage of Cisenna's weakness, a rash unexperienced youth, whom Gabinius had left to command in Syria with a small number of troops, had got a considerable army, and was entered Judæa, which was by this time filled with banditti and free-booters, who plundered every where without controul. He fell on the Romans where-ever he met them, and killed a great number of them: the rest retired to mount Garizzim, where he came soon after, and closely besieged them. The news of this having brought Gabinius into Judæa, the first thing, he did was to send Antipater to try by fair means to withdraw the revolters from Alexander's party; and this consummate politician acted his part so well, that he brought back a considerable number of them. But all his address could not persuade Alexander to come to any terms. On the contrary, this last, enraged to see such defection of his men, resolved with the thirty thousand he had left, to put it to the issue of a battle. It was accordingly fought near mount Tabor, and he totally defeated, with the loss of ten thousand men killed on the spot, and the rest put to flight.

Defeated by Gabinius.

Gabinius after this victory returned to Jerusalem, where he settled the Jewish affairs according to Antipater's mind, and left Judæa, and soon after the government of Syria (B), and was succeeded by Crassus [q].

This

† See before, vol. ix. p. 269, & seq. [q] Joseph. 4 Maccab. Dio Cass. ubi supra.

(B) We shall not so far anticipate the Roman history as to enter into

THIS laſt upon his coming into his new government, found the whole province, and particularly Judæa, in peace, ſo that he was at leiſure to purſue his favourite deſign of invading the Parthians; for which expedition he had obtained, though with ſome difficulty, a decree from the ſenate[r]. As avarice was the chief paſſion that puſhed him to it, he began with plundering the temple of Jeruſalem, not only of the two thouſand talents which Pompey had left there untouched, but of every thing he found valuable in it, to the ſum of eight thouſand Attic talents more. Among theſe there was a large beam of maſſive gold, covered with another hollow beam, which went acroſs the partition, which divided the holy from the moſt holy place. The veil that ſeparated thoſe two rooms was faſtened to it, and over it they threw all the old veils, whenever they hanged a new one; ſo that this valuable piece, which weighed three hundred Hebrew minæ (C), was ſo well concealed, that none knew of it but into the merit of this general, and the cauſes of his being deprived of his government. It will be ſufficient here to obſerve, that though he was accuſed to the ſenate of great corruptions, extortions, and ſuch-like crimes, yet Joſephus (6) gives him a quite different character, and ſpeaks of him as of a perſon who had filled that poſt with great exactneſs, honour, and applauſe. But Pompey and Craſſus were then Conſuls, and the latter, as we ſhall ſoon ſee, had got an invincible itch after the province of Syria, ever ſince he had heard what treaſures the former had left untouched at Jeruſalem. Thoſe riches he thought would come in a good time to help him forward in his Parthian expedition. In all this he only followed the motions of his inſatiable avarice; and what crimes might not ſuch a man trump up againſt Gabinius, in order to deveſt him of that government?

[r] Dio. lib. xxxix. Vid. & Plutarch. in Craſſ.

But whether the latter was really ſuch as Joſephus has repreſented him, or had really given cauſe for thoſe accuſations preferred againſt him, two things are ſure; 1. that he was grown exceeding rich; and, 2. that he was forced to diſgorge all his wealth, to bribe his judges and ſave his life, as the ſequel will ſhew.

(C) The mina amounted to about two pounds and a half of our weight, ſo that the whole bar or beam weighed about ſeven hundred and fifty pounds. The fourth book of Maccabees adds, that all the old veils, which were taken down when a new one was hung up (and which were all extremely rich and beautiful), uſed

(6) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 11.

the treasurer of the temple. A priest named Eleazar, then in that post, and being apprised of Crassus's plundering design, was imprudent enough to endeavour to save all the rest of the costly temple furniture at the expence of this; but did not discover it to him, till he had made him swear that he would save the rest; but the greedy governor made no scruple to break his oath, and to plunder that holy place of every valuable thing he could lay his hands on, without sparing the most sacred utensils belonging to it. The whole amount of this sacrilegous plunder was so great, that Josephus, fearing it would scarcely be credited by other nations, is forced to appeal to the writings of Strabo of Cappadocia, and other records not now extant [s]. What we have said at the end of the last note will further confirm his account, and the immense treasures of which that rapacious governor stripped that sacred place, though it amounts to above two millions of our money.

Crassus's treachery and sacrilege.

We have seen, in the close of the last volume *, the ill success of his expedition against the Parthians. That general having been defeated and killed, Cassius brought the shattered remnant of his army into Syria, to suppress the incursions which the now elated Parthians made into that province; and here he gave them so many overthrows, that he soon forced them to send home for a fresh supply of troops. From thence he marched into Judæa, where he besieged Tarichæa, a city on the south shore of the lake Gennezareth, where Pitolaus had shut himself up with the few remains of Aristobulus's faction; and having taken it, carried thirty thousand Jews prisoners. Pitolaus was put to death by the advice of Antipater, to prevent his raising new troubles in favour of Aristobulus (D). As for Alexander, Cassius contented himself used to be thrown over it (7). Besides these and other costly utensils and ornaments of the temple, we may add the continual offerings sent to it by the Jews from all parts of Asia and Europe; but especially those which were presented to it, not only by the Jewish monarchs, but by those of other nations, of which we have given some instances in a former section out of the books of the Maccabees (8).

Cassius's success in Syria. Year of the flood 2947. Before Christ 52.

[s] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 12. * vol. ix. p. 502.

(D) The fourth of the Maccabees adds (9), that Cassius came afterwards to Jerusalem, and there reconciled Hyrcan and his subjects, who were then in open rebellion against him.

This

(7) ubi suppra. (8) Cap. xli. (9) Ibid.

ſelf with forcing him to be quiet, whilſt he marched towards the Euphrates to ſtop the incurſions of the Parthians [t].

THREE years after, Julius Cæſar having made himſelf maſter of Rome, and thinking that Ariſtobulus might be of ſervice to him againſt Pompey, releaſed him out of his priſon, and ſent him into Paleſtine [u], with two legions under his command, to keep Syria in awe; but thoſe of Pompey's party found means to poiſon him, and thereby fruſtrated the deſigns of that crafty general. His body was afterwards imbalmed by ſome of Cæſar's partiſans, and kept in honey in a coffin, till they could convey him into Judæa, there to be interred with his anceſtors [w]. His ſon Alexander did not meet with better fate; the news of his father's return into Judæa had made him raiſe forces there, to join him on his arrival; but Pompey, who kept a watchful eye over him, ſent orders to his ſon-in-law Q. Metellus Scipio, formerly his collegue in the conſulſhip and now preſident of Syria, to put him to death. Scipio cauſed the unhappy prince to be ſeized, and brought before his tribunal at Antioch, where he condemned him, and cauſed his head to be ſtruck off. Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, hearing of their death, ſent to Alexandra the widow of Ariſtobulus, who was then retired to Aſcalon, and offered to take her ſon Antigonus, and her two daughters under his care, who ſent them to him accordingly. His ſon Philippion married one of the daughters, named alſo Alexandra; but ſome time after either for ſome miſbehaviour, or perhaps out of love to that princeſs, Mennæus cauſed him to be put to death, and married her himſelf ſoon after [x].

Ariſtobulus poiſoned.

Alexander beheaded.

IN the mean time, the war between Cæſar and Pompey, as well as thoſe that followed between the former and the aſſerters

[t] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 12. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 6. [u] Dio. lib. xli. [w] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 13. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 7. [x] Id. ibid. Vid. & Plutarch. in Pompei. Dio, ubi ſupra. Cæſar. Bell. Civil. l. iii. & Comment. lib. i.

This is that Caſſius who had formerly refuſed the command which the ſoldiers had offered him, out of hatred to Craſſus; but now that general being dead, and the Roman army miſeraby ſhattered, he was forced to take the government of Syria upon him, in order to ſuppreſs the inſolence of the Parthians (10). He was afterwards one of thoſe who aſſaſſinated Julius Cæſar, as we ſhall ſee in due time.

(10) Dio Caſſ. lib. xl.

asserters of the Roman liberty, afforded the Jews, not only a long breathing, but also an opportunity of ingratiating themselves to that conqueror. He was now in Egypt waiting impatiently for those new levies which Mithridates the Pergamenian was bringing to him from Syria and Cilicia, where he had been raising them. But, these not being sufficient to break through Pelusium, the strong key of Egypt on that side, he was forced to stop at Askalon till new reinforcements came to him. But what did him the greatest service at this juncture, and facilitated the taking of that city, was the coming of Antipater, at the head of three thousand Jews well armed, together with some other succours which he had drawn from Armenia, and Syria, and mount Libanus. He also brought letters from Hyrcan, whether real, or forged by himself; exhorting the Jews of the territories of Onion, Delta, and Memphis, to assist the Roman emperor with all their might. By these means the city of Pelusium was easily carried by assault, Antipater himself being one of the foremost in scaling it, and a way thereby was made into Egypt. We have seen in a former volume the success of that expedition †; some have imagined, that Hyrcan came thither in person at the head of fifteen hundred men [y], but without any likelihood. That pontiff was wholly governed by Antipater, whose main view was the aggrandising of himself, rather than recommending of the Jewish pontiff to that conqueror; and Hyrcan being in himself a man of no genius or ambition, it is more probable he contented himself with the credit of sending such seasonable aid to Cæsar, whilst Antipater, like a consummate politician, took the advantage of ingratiating himself to him by his valour and gallantry, as well as by his good offices with his master. Accordingly, we find in the subsequent battle, which was fought in the place called the Jewish camp [z], that Mithridates, who commanded the right wing, must have been totally defeated, had not Antipater, who had been victorious in the left, which he commanded, came to his rescue, and gained him that signal victory over the Egyptians, which enabled him to join Cæsar's army, and soon made that emperor master of all Egypt. In all these actions Antipater behaved with such valour and gallantry, that Mithridates did not scruple to own his late successes to be owing to him; and in a letter he wrote to Cæsar, he Antipater succours Cæsar in Egypt.

His valour rewarded.

† See before, vol. ix. p. 286, & seq.

[y] Ipsicrat. ap. Strab. Joseph. Ant. l. xiv. c. 17. Cæsar. tabul. æn. ap. eund.

[z] Ant. l. xiv. c. 15.

he gave the Jewiſh commander ſuch encomiums, that he conceived a more than ordinary eſteem for him; and in token of it, before he left Alexandria, he gave him ſome conſiderable poſts in his army, made him procurator or lieutenant of Judæa, and citizen of Rome, with all the privileges belonging to it, which places he held with great credit all the time of the war (E). Cæſar alſo confirmed Hyrcan in his prieſthood, added to it the principality of Judæa, to be intailed on his poſterity for ever; and the Jewiſh nation their antient rights and privileges; and ordered a pillar to be erected, whereon all theſe grants and his own decree ſhould be engraven, which was accordingly done, ſoon after Antipater's return into Judæa. Cæſar being come into Syria, Antigonus came to him; and preferred a ſevere complaint againſt Hyrcan and Antipater, for the injuries which he pretended they had done to him; and at the ſame time repreſented to him the misfortunes of his family, for having ſtuck cloſe to his intereſt; and particularly the poiſoning of his father by Pompey, and the beheading of his brother by Scipio. In conſideration of all which, he concluded with a petition to the emperor, that he would reſtore him to his fathers principality, of which Hyrcan had unjuſtly ſtripped him. But unfortunately for him, Antipater was then attending upon Cæſar, who defended his own and Hyrcan's cauſe ſo well, that they were both abſolved with applauſe, and Antigonus repulſed as a factious and turbulent perſon, that could never be at reſt. Antipater added farther, that as to Antigonus's father, he had been juſtly ſent priſoner to Rome for being a conſtant enemy to the Roman nation, and that his brother had been deſervedly beheaded for plundering and ravaging that of the Jews. Cæſar had too many obligations to Hyrcan and Antipater, not to admit of a much weaker vindication of their cauſe. But he was reſolved to do more than the bare acquitting of them: he Cæſar's gratitude to the Jews.

Rejects Antigonus's ſuit.

(E) The fourth book of Maccabees (11) adds, that Mithridates, being totally defeated in the action, was ſo cloſely ſurrounded by the Egyptians, that he muſt have been cut in pieces by them, had not Antipater come in a lucky minute, and reſcued him and the victory out of their hands. But what the ſame author adds, that Cæſar gave him the command of his own troops, and took him with him into Perſia, ſeems quite to claſh with Joſephus, who doth not ſo much as hint, that he had the command of any of the Roman troops, neither doth it appear, that Cæſar carried any war againſt the Perſians.

(11) Cap. xlii.

he confirmed his former decree in favour of them and of the Jewish nation, and caused it to be engraven on brazen tables in Latin and Greek, and to be hung up in the temples of Tyre, Sidon and Askalon (F), as well as in the capitol at Rome, whither Hyrcan sent soon after his embassadors to renew the old alliance with that nation; which was by his order published in all the principal cities of the empire, that all the world might know that the Jews were acknowledged the friends and allies of Rome. These embassadors, who were there received with great marks of honour, did likewise obtain a permissory decree for the fortifying of Jerusalem, and for rebuilding of the wall which had been pulled down by Pompey (G) [a].

CÆSAR

[a] Ibid. l. xx. c. 7. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 7.

(F) This decree, which at once abolished the aristocracy lately set up by Gabinius, and restored the Jewish state to its pristine sovereignty, has been preserved to us by Josephus (12), and runs to this effect:

"Julius Cæsar, emperor and dictator the second time, &c. "Forasmuch as Hyrcanus the son of Alexander, a Jew, hath "given us many singular proofs of his affection, both in time "of peace and war, and particularly by the supply sent to me "in the late war; in consideration of these his services, I do "hereby confirm unto him and his heirs the perpetual govern- "ment of the Jews, both as their prince and high-priest, after "the manner and rule of their own laws. I inroll him from "henceforth among my trusty friends; and ordain, that all the "regal and pontifical rights and privileges be devolved upon him "and his sons for ever; and that in all controversies, that shall "arise concerning the rights and discipline of the Jews, he or "they be the only Judges; and further, that the Jews be "henceforth discharged from the burden of winter-quarters and "all public tribute."

About the same time the Athenians renewed their alliance with Hyrcan, and sent their decree to Jerusalem, in which they acknowledged that pontiff's singular and constant friendship to all the Greeks, and to their own republic in particular. The reader may see it at length in Josephus in the place last quoted.

(G) The fourth of Maccabees adds (13), that Cæsar did those embassadors the singular honour of making them sit down in his presence; and a little lower, that that emperor had decreed for himself and successors, that all the maritime part of the Syrian province, from Gaza to Sidon, should pay yearly to the Jewish temple

(12) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 17. (13) Cap. xliv.

CÆSAR, having left the government of Syria to Sextus Cæsar his near relation, was accompanied by Antipater as far as Tyre, where he embarqued for Sicily. On his return to Jerusalem, Antipater took care in every place he came through to extol the Roman emperor and nation, and to exhort the people to peace and obedience; representing to them with his usual eloquence, that, whilst they behaved like faithful subjects, they would be blest with a mild government, and enjoy their rights, liberties, and religion; but that, if they grew discontented and mutinous, they would soon find themselves forced to submit to a severer yoke, and that Hyrcan, from a mild and pacific prince, might easily become their tyrant, and the Romans, from friends and protectors, would not fail to turn their bitter enemies. This was not said so much to keep the Jews in obedience to Hyrcan, whose stupidity and indolence Josephus himself tells us was but too visible to all his subjects. But, by thus over-awing them with the dread of the Romans anger, he plainly intimated to them his own credit and interest with them to be such, that they would never see his measures opposed, without interposing their own authority; and therefore closed the whole with these words; For they (the Romans) will be obeyed [b]. By these speeches he gained two main ends, he kept a divided and factious people in awe, and took the advantage of his own established power, and of Hyrcan's weakness, to aggrandize his family.

Antipater's speech.

UPON his arrival at Jerusalem, he set himself about putting Cæsar's decree in force, and settling, or rather restoring, the Jewish government to its antient model, and ordering the repairs of the walls and fortifications of Jerusalem. He made his eldest son Phasaelus governor of that metropolis, and temple the tribute they were wont to pay to the empire; and that that of the town of Sidon amounted yearly to twenty thousand five hundred and fifty measures of wheat; and that the cities of Laodice and others, which had been formerly in the possession of the high-priests, should be now surrendered to Hyrcan.

[b] Antiq. ubi supra in fin c, 16.

All these grants, our author says, were bestowed on the Jewish nation in consideration of the eminent services which they and Antipater at their head had done the emperor in his Parthian expedition. But whether he really was sent thither by the high-priest, as is there affirmed, 'tis certain that this great change in favour of the Jews was owing to the wisdom, conduct, and valour of Antipater; and how much it contributed to raise his power and interest, not only in Judæa, but in Rome and other nations, the sequel will soon shew.

and Herod his second son governor of Galilee (H); whilst he and the high-priest took a progress about Judæa, to settle the government and peace of the kingdom. Herod soon signalized himself by the suppression of a band of thieves, who had till then much infested that and the neighbouring provinces. He took their chief, named Hezekiah, with some others of his companions, whom he put to immediate death, and thereby dispersed the rest of their gang. This action failed not to recommend him, not only to the whole province, but more particularly to Sextus Cæsar, the new president of Syria. On the other hand, his elder brother neglected nothing that could recommend him to the people of Jerusalem, over which he was governor; so that Antipater saw with pleasure himself and his sons become the darlings of the nation, without lessening, at least outwardly, any part of their respect to the high-priest, who seemed still to be at the head of all the national affairs, and to give his sanction to them.

But it was this greatness, this excessive growing power, of Antipater, which raised at length the envy and jealousy of the principal Jews. Herod's action was doubtless a noble one, and the country felt the benefit of it: but he had gone some unjustifiable lengths in it, in putting the banditti to death, by his own authority, and without any formal tryal; and this they looked upon as an earnest of what he might do in time, if his enterprising genius was not nipped in the bud. This made them at length resolve to try to open the eyes of their indolent pontiff, and to prevail upon him to summon that

(H) Antipater had four sons by his wife Cypris, who were by this time grown up to maturity, and in great reputation for their wisdom and valour. We have mentioned the two first in the text: Josephus indeed allows the latter of them but fifteen years of age, but that must be a mistake, either of that historian, or rather of his copyists; for both Ptolemy and Nicolas Damascen give him twenty-five years, and our learned Usher has made it appear that he could have been no less (14).

The third son was called Joseph, and the fourth Pheroras. He had likewise a daughter named Salome, who became afterwards infamous for the feuds and divisions which she created in her family, as we shall see in the sequel.

(14) Sub. A. M. 3937. Vid. & Prid. Connect. sub. an A. C. 47.

that young hero to come and answer to this and some other accusations before him and the sanhedrin.

HYRCAN, who had a great friendship for him, betrayed at this juncture an extreme partiality in excusing him of several crimes they alledged against him. They in vain represented to him how dangerous it was for him to suffer the son of a proselyte, who had already ingrossed all the power and honour, and left him only the bare title of sovereign, to arrogate to himself such an unlimited authority, as to put a number of men to death without trial, or even without asking his or the sanhedrin's consent. At length, since they could not work upon his fears, they tried to rouse his pity, by the daily clamours of the mothers of those whom Herod had put to death, and who ceased not to come daily to the temple to demand justice of him, for so daring and unwarranted an affront on his dignity. Hyrcan was at length prevailed upon to send his summons to him to come and answer to the charge before him and the sanhedrin. Herod appeared accordingly, but in such a guise, and with such a numerous retinue, as gave them to understand, that he did not come as a private person, much less as a criminal to be judged by them. He was cloathed in purple, and, by his father's advice, had brought such a number of servants, as should be sufficient to defend him in case he was condemned, and yet not so numerous, as to raise any jealousy in the friendly high-priest. He also brought letters to him from Sextus Cæsar, with express orders to acquit him, and threatening him with his highest resentment in case of non-compliance.

Herod summoned before the sanhedrin. Year of the flood 2952. Before Christ 47.

THESE letters seem indeed to have been calculated to intimidate the sanhedrin, rather than to recommend Herod's cause to the high-priest, who was already sufficiently in his interest. Accordingly, when he appeared before that high court, he struck such an awe upon them, that none of his accusers dared to open their mouths against him. At length Sameas, a man in high esteem for his wisdom and integrity, had the courage to stand up and arraign him, not only for his former crime, but much more now for his unjustifiable boldness in appearing, contrary to the laws of all nations, not in the guise of an accused person, but in that of an arrogant and threatening commander, who came rather to frighten his judges, than to clear himself of his accusation. I do not at the same time, continued he, so much blame him for the insolent means he takes to secure his forfeited life. What surprizes me is, to see both the high-priest and his judges thus tamely to permit it; but take notice of what I am now going

Sameas's noble speech,

ing to tell you, ſaid he, turning to them; God is a righteous and powerful judge, and this very man, whom you now ſtrive to acquit, in compliance to Hyrcan, ſhall prove the ruin of both king and judges. How true a prophet he proveed, the ſequel will ſhew; for Herod was no ſooner got into the poſſeſſion of the government, than he put both the high-prieſt and all his cowardly judges to death, except Sameas and Pollio, for whom he retained a ſingular eſteem ever after (I). Here Hyrcan, obſerving that his ſpeech had made ſuch an impreſſion on the court, that the majority were like to be againſt Herod, adjourned the court till next day, whilſt he ſent private advice to him to flee for his life; which he accordingly did, and went to Damaſcus, where having gained the protection of the Syrian governor, he ſent the ſanhedrin word, that if they ſhould take it into their heads to ſummon him afreſh, he would diſclaim their juriſdiction. This contemptuous meſſage put the judges into a freſh fit of rage; they vented their reſentments againſt the pontiff, and ſtrove in vain to awaken him into a ſenſe of his danger; but he remained deaf and inſenſible to the laſt [c].

In

[c] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 17.

(I) Sameas, or as the Rabbins call him, Shammai, was, according to Joſephus (15), the diſciple of Pollio, another learned Jewiſh doctor in great eſteem with Herod, not unlikely the ſame which the Rabbies call Hillel; for this latter having been a famous diſciple of Sameas or Shammai, and having in proceſs of time proved the antogoniſt of his maſter, and the founder of that famed ſchool, which retained his name, it is a wonder Joſephus, ſhould never mention him, whereas he ſpeaks very honourably of Pollio in ſeveral places of his hiſtory.

St. Jerom (16) has imagined, that the phariſees had their origin from the diviſion of thoſe two ſchools; but we have already ſeen how powerful that ſect was long before Hillel or Shammai. Concerning this laſt the Rabbies tell us wonders, and if we may believe the father above quoted, they attribute the compiling of the Miſhnah to him and his diſciple Hillel, or, as he elſewhere calls them, Simeon and Helles (17).

We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak to that point, as well as the rupture of thoſe two famed ſchools, in a properer place. All we ſhall add concerning them here is, a Rabbinic proverb much in vogue among the Jews: Be courteous as Hillel, and intrepid as Shammai.

(15) Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. (16) In Iſai. cap. viii. (17) Epiſt. ad Algaſ. & quæſt. x. & in Eccleſ. vii.

In the mean time Herod, having with a large sum of money purchased the government of Cœle-Syria, of his friend Sextus Cæsar, raised an army with an intent to march against Jerusalem, and be revenged of Hyrcan and the sanhedrin for the affront they had put upon him; but he was happily diverted from it by Antipater and Phasaelus, who reminded him of his great obligations to that pontiff, to whom both he and they were beholden for all the power and grandeur they enjoyed. Herod acquiesced for the present, and was satisfied with having given them such token of what he could do whenever occasion offered, and remained quiet in his province.

About three years after this, Hyrcan having sent an embassy to Cæsar, who was by this time entered into his fifth consulship, to renew his alliance with him, obtained a fresh decree for the fortifying of Jerusalem, which Antipater immediately put into execution; and that metropolis was soon after raised to its pristine splendor and strength. Cæsar did moreover grant some further privileges to the Jews, in consideration, as he expressed it, of the signal services they had done to him in Syria and Egypt. The reader may see them more fully in Josephus. As for Hyrcan, he gave him leave to govern in Jerusalem according to his pleasure, and confirmed to him the grant of all the towns and villages which had been possessed by his ancestors; that the lands and other privileges which the Romans had bestowed on the kings of Syria and Phœnice, on account of the alliance that had been between them, should likewise be bestowed on him and his successors; that he, they, and their embassadors, should have the liberty of sitting down with the Roman senators in all publick shews and games; and lastly, that when they had any petition to prefer to the senate, they should be introduced by the dictator, or by the master of the horse, and that they should have an answer within ten days [d]. In a word, such was the emperor's gratitude and friendship to the Jews, so many and considerable the immunities and privileges which he heaped upon their prince and nation, that they could hardly be said to feel the weight of the Roman yoke. His kindness extended even to those who lived out of Judæa; witness the edict which the magistrates of the island of Paros had made against their exercise of their religion, living according to their laws, and sending their yearly tribute to Jerusalem, to

Year of the flood 2955. Before Christ 44.

New privileges granted to the Jews.

[d] Id. ibid. & bell. Jud. ubi supra.

to maintain the ſervice of the temple (K); and which that monarch obliged them to revoke, as a piece of rigour and injuſtice, which he ſaid was not to be ſuffered againſt the friends and allies of Rome, where all thoſe privileges were indulged to them.

Sextus and Jullus Cæſar murdered.

BUT this happy ſtate was ſoon at an end. Two remarkable accidents happened, one on the heels of the other, the one in Judæa, and the other at Rome, which brought on a ſeries of diſtractions and feuds in both. In the former Sextus Cæſar was treacherouſly murdered by Baſſus, and Cæſar himſelf at Rome by Brutus and Caſſius, and their aſſociates, as ſhall be better ſeen in the Roman hiſtory. Marc Antony and Dolabella, who were then conſuls, aſſembled the ſenate; and the embaſſadors from Judæa, among others, were admitted to renew their alliance with them. Purſuant to which (ſome of the Aſiatic Jews having been forced to inroll themſelves in the Roman army), Hyrcan ſent a complaint to Dolabella, reminding him, that the Jews were wont to be exempted from the war by reaſon of their being obliged to obſerve the ſabbath; and obtained a letter from the conſul to the governor of Epheſus, enjoining him to ſee that the Jews were ſet free, and reſtored to the exerciſe of their religion and laws [c]. By this time Baſſus had ſeized upon the government of Syria, but was ſoon after driven out of it by Caſſius, who immediately came thither after Cæſar's death, and took the command of the Roman troops upon him, who were then beſieging the aſſaſſin of Sextus, in the city of Apamea. Caſſius, having drawn him and Marcus into his party, raiſed the ſiege of the place, and got all Syria into his poſſeſſion. He was, however, forced to levy new troops to reinforce his army; and hearing that Alienus, one of Dolabella's lieutenants, nants, was marching through Judæa with four legions sent to that consul by Cleopatra; he posted himself so advantageously, that he surrounded and intercepted him with a double number of his own forces, and took them all into his service. Having by this time got an army of twelve legions, which could not be subsisted without great expence, he was forced to levy very large tributes on that province, particularly on Judæa, which he taxed at seven hundred talents. Antipater, who knew the necessity that general was in of some immediate supply, and the consequence of gaining his favour by sending him a speedy one, committed the levying of one half of that sum to his sons Phasaelus and Herod, and ordered the rest to be raised by one Malichus and some associates. Herod failed not to take this opportunity of ingratiating himself to Cassius, by bringing him the hundred talents which were assigned to his government; and as he was the first that complied with his orders, that general conceived a great esteem for him. His brother came soon after; but the rest of the governors not having followed their examples, particularly those of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and some other cities of Judæa, Cassius ordered all their inhabitants to be sold by auction, and would have put Malichus to death, had not the high-priest redeemed him at the expence of a hundred talents, which he sent him out of his own coffers [f].

Caſſius ſeizes upon Syria.

[c] Id. ibid.

(K) We have often mentioned this yearly tribute which every Jew, both of Judæa and of the diſperſion, was obliged to ſend. Beſides this, we muſt further obſerve, that as they were allowed to offer ſacrifices no-where but in that holy place, it was uſual for them to remit the money thither for ſuch victims, as either their religion or extraordinary devotions directed, to be offered up there for them; and theſe were generally ſent thither with the annual tribute of the temple; and in ſome wealthy places they ſometimes mounted to ſuch vaſt ſums, as raiſed the envy and jealouſy of thoſe among whom they lived, and have been often ſeized by covetous princes and governors, who have converted them to their own uſes.

Levies seven hundred talents on Judæa.

Cassius, being soon after forced to march against Dolabella, left the government of Cœle-Syria to Herod, as an earnest of his future friendship; but Malichus in the mean time, who bore a mortal hatred against Antipater (L), and [f] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 18. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 9.

(L) Malichus was a Jew; he and Antipater had been the main supporters of Hyrcan's interest; so that he could not behold his rival, who was of Idumæan race, as we have hinted before, preferred before him without the deepest envy and regret; and this was the motive which made him conspire against him, not doubting, but, if he was once removed, himself would be at the head of the Jewish affairs.

The fourth book of the Maccabees says indeed (18), that they were the heads of the Jewish nation who conspired against Antipater; and very likely Malichus had drawn a great number into the same black design; it being as great a mortification to them as to himself, to see their prince held in a kind of servitude by a stranger, who had ingrossed all the power into his hand.

(18) Ch. xlvi.

ſaw him with an envious eye holding alone the reins of government, reſolved to rid himſelf and the nation of him. Antipater, having had timely notice of his treacherous deſign, preſently retired to the other ſide of the Jordan, and there raiſed ſome forces, and put himſelf in a poſture of defence. Whereupon Malichus, finding his plot was diſcovered, came to him in a ſeeming friendly manner, and by oaths, proteſtations, and other crafty inſinuations, ſuch as the folly of ſuch an attempt againſt his life, whilſt his ſon Phaſaelus held the government of Jeruſalem, and the warlike Herod that of Cœle-Syria; eaſily perſuaded him of his innocency, and a reconciliation was made between them. Antipater was even forced to make uſe of all his intereſt with Marcus, now governor of Syria, and who was well acquainted with all his private plots, to prevent his putting him to death. But Malichus was not to be wrought on by ſuch an unparallelled generoſity, whilſt he beheld his rival's intereſt raiſed ſtill higher by it. For about this time Caſſius and Marcus, who had beſtowed the government of Cœle-Syria on his ſon Herod, had engaged his fidelity to them by a promiſe to make him king of Judæa, as ſoon as the war now begun againſt Marc Antony and the young Octavianus, ſince named Auguſtus, was ended. This made him dread the exceſſive power of Antipater to ſuch a degree, that upon the firſt opportunity, which was ſoon after offered, when he was to dine with the high-prieſt, he bribed that pontiff's butler to poiſon him in a glaſs of wine, whilſt himſelf with an armed force ſeized upon the government of Jeruſalem. Phaſaelus and Herod eaſily perceived that Malichus was at the bottom of this villainy, notwithſtanding his vows and proteſtations to the contrary; and Herod, who was of a fierce temper, was for immediately revenging the fact with open force; but his brother, who rightly judged that it would be much ſafer to diſſemble for the preſent, and to puniſh the aſſaſſin by ſome private ſtratagem, without involving the nation into a civil war, eaſily brought him over to his opinion [g].

Antipater poiſoned by Malichus.

Malichus outwitted by Herod.

ACCORDINGLY, theſe two brothers feigning to believe Malichus innocent of their father's death, the eldeſt went and buſied himſelf with rearing a ſtately monument to him, whilſt Herod went into Samaria, under pretence of ſuppreſſing ſome turbulent ſpirits there. He came ſome time after to Jeruſalem, attended with a number of his men of war, to aſſiſt at the feaſt of pentecoſt; and Malichus, who was afraid of ſomething worſe, prevailed on Hyrcan to forbi bid him to enter that metropolis with ſuch an eſcort, as would profane that ſolemnity. Herod, deſpiſing his orders, entered the city by night, but forbore attempting any thing againſt his enemy, though he had received full power from Caſſius to revenge his father's death on that aſſaſſin. But a much better opportunity offered ſoon after, in which Malichus was caught in his own craftineſs. Caſſius had taken Laodicea, and all the chief lords of Syria and Paleſtine haſtened thither with their preſents and congratulations; and Malichus, having left his ſon hoſtage with that governor, deſigned to have taken that opportunity of getting him off, and to have gone back and excited a revolt in Judæa, whilſt the Romans were taken up with their civil wars, and then to have made a bold puſh for the Jewiſh crown. Whether Herod knew his whole deſign or no, he rightly gueſſed that he would not fail to pay his compliments to the conqueror, and ſo he did accordingly, he accompanying the Jewiſh pontiff thither. Herod fell in with them in the way, and having firſt obtained from Caſſius an order to the Tyrians to aſſiſt him in the puniſhment of Malichus, he invited Hyrcan and him to a ſupper he had prepared for them in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and ſent his ſervants into that city under pretence of getting all things ready, but in reality to acquaint the officers and garriſon of that city with Caſſius's orders. Theſe ſallied out accordingly, and having overtaken him, as many as could come at him at once ſheathed their daggers into his body (M). Hyrcan, upon hearing the news of his death, remained thunderſtruck

[g] Joſeph. ibid.

Aſſaſſinated.

(M) The fourth book of Maccabees relates this puniſhment of Malichus ſomewhat differently (19), and ſays, that Caſſius, being informed of Antipater's murder, exhorted Herod to revenge it as ſoon as himſelf was come to Tyre, and Hyrcan and Malichus were come to pay their reſpects to him there. Theſe being come accordingly to Tyre, as well as Phaſaelus and Herod, Caſſius commanded his men to do whatever theſe two laſt ſhould direct them.

Having therefore invited them all four to a feaſt, as ſoon as they had taken their afternoon's nap, as was uſual in thoſe countries, Hyrcan being ſeated near Malichus, and the two ſons of Antipater, Herod made a ſign, upon which ſome of Caſſius's officers fell upon Malichus, and murdered him. Hyrcan, at ſight of it, fell into a ſwoon, from which being recovered, he aſked, why they had killed the man? Herod pleaded ignorance, and Hyrcan was glad to hold his peace.

(19) Ch. xlvii,

for some time. At length, having recovered himself, he asked, by whose orders he had been killed? and Herod having calmly answered, by Cassius's, he replied, that he could not but highly applaud the deed, since it had rid him of a very dangerous enemy [h].

New troubles in Judæa. Year of the flood 2952, Before Christ 47.

But Malichus had left a brother behind him as turbulent as himself, who, under the pretence of revenging his death, put Judæa again into a flame, whilst Cassius was gone to join Brutus in Asia. Felix, who at that time was left at the head of some Roman forces at Jerusalem, seems also to have been gained on that side. As for Hyrcan, he had not courage enough to oppose them, but acquiesced in what they did; so that Felix attacked Phasaelus on the one hand, whilst Malichus's brother went and took Massada, and some other fortresses of Judæa. Herod was then laid up with sickness at Damascus, and unable for a while to give his brother any assistance: but Phasaelus, who had still a considerable number of forces, found means to drive Felix and all his party out of Jerusalem, and from thence into some fortress, out of which he did not suffer him to come, but by capitulation.

Quelled.

By this time Herod being recovered, came to his assistance, and drove the remaining part of Malichus's faction out of their fortresses, and forced the brother to surrender Massada to him, and to capitulate for his life [i]. The two brothers returned to Jerusalem, where they reproved Hyrcan's baseness in the severest terms; but were soon after reconciled to him, by the marriage of Herod with Mariamne, the beautiful grand-daughter of that pontiff.

Antigonus invades Judæa.

In the interim another enemy started up on the sudden, namely Antigonus, the younger son of Aristobulus, Hyrcan's brother. He was upheld by Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, to whom he was related, and on that account had been adopted by him (N). He had likewise gained Marion [h] Bell. Jud. ubi supra. Antiq. ubi supra. cap. 20. [i] Id. ibid.

(N) The reader may remember, that after Pompey had caused his father and brother to be put to death, Mennæus invited Alexandra into Chalcis, where he afterwards married her beauteous daughter, and for her sake took both the mother and her children into his protection (20).

As for that Marion, who joined with young Antigonus, he had been lately made prince of Tyre by Cassius; for that general, being in great want of money for the carrying on the war against the triumvirs, rion prince of Tyre, and bribed Fabius governor of Damaſcus into his intereſt; ſo that having gained a ſufficient army, he put himſelf at the head of it, with an intent of reviving his father's pretenſions to the kingdom; but he had ſcarce entered the frontiers of it, before Herod met him with a powerful army, and totally defeated him. This prince acted with his uſual generoſity towards the Tyrians, who had aſſiſted his enemy, not only ſparing their lives, but ſending ſome of them home with rich preſents, by which he gained the affections of that city; after which he returned triumphant to Jeruſalem, where the people, and among the reſt Hyrcan, who now looked upon him as one of his family, came and offered him the uſual compliments of crowns and congratulations. His nuptials with Mariamne were not, however, celebrated till ſome years after, when he had by her three ſons and two daughters, beſides his eldeſt ſon Antipater, whom he had by a former wife of his own country, named Dores [k].

(20) Conf. Joseph Antiq. l. xiv. c. 13. & 21.

Marc Antony's edict in favour of the Jews.

BRUTUS and Caſſius having been defeated in the following year by Marc Antony and Octavius, the latter marched into Gaul, and the former came into Syria to ſettle the affairs of that province. Upon his arrival into Bithynia, where he was complimented by vaſt crouds of embaſſadors from all the neighbouring ſtates, the Jews came and preferred a ſevere accuſation againſt Phaſaelus and Herod, as having ingroſſed all the power and adminiſtration of Judæa, and left Hyrcan only the bare name of a prince. But Herod, who was there alſo, found in that general a ſtedfaſt friend, not only on account of former kindneſſes which he had received from Antipater, whilſt he ſerved under Gabinius in Judæa, but much more on that of a large ſum of money, with which he had taken care to bribe him, ſo that he would not ſo much as hear their accuſers. Upon his coming to Epheſus, an embaſſy came to him from Hyrcan, deſiring that the Jewiſh priſoners, whom Caſſius had formerly ſold by auction, contrary to their alliance with Rome, might be reſtored to their liberty and lands. Antony readily granted their requeſt, and ſent an triumvirs, had divided the country of Syria into ſmall diſtricts, and ſold them to the higheſt bidders, one of whom was this Marion, who had bought the principality of Tyre of him (21). Theſe petty tyrants, however, were afterwards turned out by Marc Antony, upon his coming into that province.

[k] Ibid. cap. 21.

(21) Id. ibid. & bell. Jud. c. 10.

obliging letter to Hyrcan, which was soon followed with an edict to the Tyrians, and other neighbouring states, enjoining them to restore all those captives, according to Hyrcan's desire and the purport of the edict which the reader may see in the margin [1] (O).

New complaints against Herod rejected.

But all these favours of the triumvir, though chiefly owing to his friendship to the sons of Antipater, were not able to reconcile them to the generality of the Jews. For as soon as Antony was come so near them as Daphne, a city near Antioch †, he was accosted by a fresh embassy from Jerusalem, who preferred the old complaint to him against them. Messala undertook their defence, and was backed by Hyrcan, who, looking upon them now as part of his family, was come

[1] Ibid. c. 22. † De hac vid. vol. viii. book 2. Chap. 2. sect. 9. note (E) near the beginging. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 25. Bell Jud. l. 1. c. 11.

(O) Marc Antony, emperor and triumvir, &c. to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, greeting:

Forasmuch as the gods have deciared themselves the dire revengers of the late Cæsar's death, by the total defeat of his most detestable assassins Brutus and Cassius, and by granting the triumvirate such a signal victory, as promised nothing less than a solid and lasting peace to the Roman empire; and forasmuch as the Jewish nation, notwithstanding their known and constant attachment to the Roman interest, has been greatly oppressed by Cassius, and great multitudes of them sold for slaves by him; we order the said Jews to be restored to their liberties, lands, and to all the privileges and immunities which had been granted to that allied nation by Dolabella, and charge all those cities, in which any such Jews are detained, whether bond or free, forthwith to discharge and restore them, pursuant to the strict tenor of this edict.

In another he writes to the Tyrians, that Hyrcan having complained to him, that they had in the late Cassius's time invaded some of his territories, he expected that they should be restored to him. Nevertheless, that if they had any reasons to offer against such a restitution, they should do it upon his coming into that province, when having heard the allegations of both parties, he should decree in favour of that which had right on their side.

These edicts he ordered to be copied out in Greek and Latin, and the original to be preserved in their archives, and the copies to be affixed in some public place, where they might be publicly read. He likewise sent some others to the same purport to the Sidonians, and to the cities of Antioch and Arad (22).

(22) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 23.

come thither to ſecond their defence. After a full hearing, Antony asked the pontiff, which of the two parties he thought beſt qualified for the government, and being anſwered in favour of the two brothers, he likewiſe declared for them; and, as a further mark of his friendſhip, made them both tetrarchs, put Judæa under their care, and wrote a letter to the ſanhedrin in their favour. Fifteen of the moſt turbulent of their accuſers were put into priſon, and would have been put to death, had not Herod interceded for them. All this did only exaſperate the faction the more, and produced a third embaſſy, which came to meet the triumvir at Tyre, and conſiſted of a thouſand perſons. But Antony, whom freſh preſents, and large ſums of money, had faſtened ſtill more to Herod's intereſt, ſent orders to the magiſtracy of that place to aſſiſt him in the puniſhment of thoſe factious mutineers, as he termed them; whereupon Herod met them out of the city, and adviſed them in a friendly manner not to puſh the matter further. Hyrcan likewiſe tried in vain to forewarn them of their danger, in caſe they perſiſted in their deſign. They refuſed all advice, till the Tyrians, ruſhing in upon them, made them repent of their raſhneſs, when it was too late. A great number were killed and wounded, and others taken priſoners, and the reſt diſperſed. This put an end indeed to the controverſy, but not to the faction, which vented their reſentment againſt Herod in ſuch open manner, that Antony, in a fit of anger, cauſed all the priſoners to be put to death [m].

A third embaſſy ſent, and ſeverely puniſhed.

Herod had no ſooner weathered this ſtorm, but another was raiſed againſt him by Antigonus. Ptolemy, the ſon of Mennæus, had been ſucceeded by his ſon Lyſanias, and this laſt had prevailed upon Pacorus, the ſon of the Parthian king, and his general Barzanes, who by this time had made themſelves maſters of Sidon and Ptolemais, to invade Judæa, depoſe Hyrcan, and ſet Antigonus on his throne; in conſideration of which, the latter was to pay him a hundred talents, and five hundred women (P). Pacorus, purſuant to this agreement, ſent his cup-bearer, named alſo Pacorus, with part of his cavalry, to invade Judæa. Antigonus, who had got together by that time a great number of diſcontent-

Antigonus invades Judæa.

ed

[m] Id. ibid.

(P) The fourth book of the Maccabees (23) ſays, eight hundred women the faireſt and beſt bred in all the country.

(23) Cap. xlix.

ed Jews, who joined him from mount Carmel, had made himself master of the canton of Dryma (Q), where a great number of other Jews coming still to him, persuaded him to march on to Jerusalem, and attack Phasaelus and his brother in the royal palace. He marched accordingly thitherward, attended with the Parthian cup-bearer; and these two, being met by the two tetrarchs, were so warmly repulsed by them, that they were forced to retire into the temple. Herod, for the better security of that place, clapped a guard of soldiers in all the adjacent houses; but these were soon set on fire, and the soldiers burnt in them before any help could be brought. Herod did not let this loss go long unrevenged, but gave them a sharp defeat, in which he made a great slaughter of their party. Thus they continued skirmishing with one another till the feast of pentecost, which was impatiently wished for by Antigonus, in hopes that the great concourse of the Jews to that solemnity would join forces with him against the sons of Antipater. He judged rightly enough, for great numbers of them resorted unto him; but as the greater part of them had neither arms nor experience, Herod, who with his brother had retired into the royal palace, and defended it, the former from within, and the other from without; made a vigorous sally upon those of the enemy, who had posted themselves in the suburbs, and drove several thousands of them before him, some into the city, and others into the temple.

And Jerusalem.

THE two parties, being at length tired with shedding so much blood, came to an agreement, that Pacorus, who was by that time encamped without the walls of the city, should be admitted to mediate a peace between them. This project, though set on foot by Antigonus, who wholly relied on the friendship of the Parthian general, was yet agreed to by Phasaelus, who went out to meet him, and courteously lodged him in the royal palace. Here Pacorus taking the advantage of the confidence his kind host put in him, persuaded him to go on an embassy to Barzapharnes, who was then

(Q) It is not easy to guess what canton this was, unless it be the same with the daroma of Eusebius and St. Jerom, by which they mean the southern part of the tribe of Judah, extending about twenty miles from east to west, from Beersheba to the dead sea, and is called in Hebrew Darom, which signifies south (24).

(24) Vid. Reland. Palæst. illustrat. l. i. c. 32.

then governor of Syria under the Parthian king, aſſuring him, that it was the only means to ſettle his affair on a firm footing. Herod, who juſtly ſuſpected the treachery of the Parthians, was entirely averſe to the propoſal; but Phaſaelus, more credulous than he, conſented to it; and, taking Hyrcan with him, ſet on the journey, attended with an eſcort of two hundred Parthian horſe, and with Pacorus, who accompanied him all the way. Upon their arrival in Galilee (R), they were met with a guard of armed men, who were ſent to conduct them to Barzapharnes, and Pacorus returned to Jeruſalem. Their reception in all appearance was very courteous, and Barzapharnes lodged them in a houſe near the ſea-ſide, where Phaſaelus was ſoon after informed by ſome friends of the contract which had paſſed between the Parthian king and Antigonus; 'twas then that he firſt became ſenſible of their treachery and of his danger. However, though he was earneſtly entreated to make his eſcape, and was offered tranſport ſhips to convey him away, yet he could not be prevailed upon to forſake either Hyrcan's or his brother's intereſt; for here he was likewiſe told, that Pacorus was ſent back to Jeruſalem to ſurprize Herod alſo. The beſt expedient therefore he could think on was, to go to Barzapharnes, and to expoſtulate the matter with him; which he did in the ſevereſt terms, telling him at the ſame time, that if money was the motive of his treachery to him, he was able to bribe him higher to be honeſt and come over to his intereſt. The Parthian had no other way to come off, but by forſwearing the charge, and aſſuring him, that nothing was falſer than ſuch a ſurmiſe; but as ſoon as he thought that Pacorus had made ſure of Herod, he marched directly towards him, and ordered Hyrcan and Phaſaelus to be ſeized, and clapt in priſon.

Phaſaelus betrayed.

PACORUS, however, had miſſed his aim, and Herod, having had timely notice of the treachery, had found means to convey himſelf out of Jeruſalem, together with his mother, his beloved Mariamne, her mother Alexandra, his brother Pheroras, with all his ſervants, friends, and valuable things

Herod's eſcape.

(R) Joſephus doth not tell us the place where Barzapharnes then was, but only that he was in Galilee, near the ſea ſide; but in his wars of the Jews, he ſays (25), they met him at Ecdipon, which place was near the ſea-ſhore, and at a ſmall diſtance north of Ptolemais; but the fourth book of Maccabees ſays, it was at Damaſcus, the capital of Syria (26).

(25) Ch. 11. (26) Ch. xlix.

things and a numerous escort of his own men of war, and made the best of his way towards Idumæa. He met with several stops in his journey (S), being forced to fight his way through the Parthians and Antigonians, who pursued him; but his valour and that of his guards got him clear of all, and in memory of a signal defeat, which he gave them at a place about fifty stades, or seven miles, from Jerusalem, he afterwards built a stately palace, and called it Herodion [n].

When he was come to Thressa, or, as Josephus calls it elsewhere, Ressa, a small town in Idumæa, his brother Joseph met him at the head of a considerable reinforcement; but when they arrived at Massada, the place where he designed to retire, it being a very strong and almost impregnable fortress, he found it too small to contain all his men, so that he was forced to dismiss nine thousand of them. Here he left his family and treasure, under the care of his brother Joseph, and of a garrison of eight hundred men; and, having furnished it with all necessaries, he set out for Petra, the metropolis of Arabia, where Malchus had succeeded his father Aretas, a prince who had formerly been highly obliged to him. His design was to borrow as much money of him as would buy his brother Phasaelus's freedom; and to that end he had brought his son with him, who was but seven years old, to leave him there as a pledge to the Arabian king. But that ungrateful prince sent him express orders to depart out of his territories, pretending, that he had been forbid by the Parthians to receive him; so that he was forced to dismiss some of his attendants, and to make the best of his way into Egypt.

Goes into Arabia.

And Egypt.

In the mean while, his flight out of Jerusalem having been discovered by the very next morning, the first thing the Parthians did was, to plunder his palace, city, and all the [n] Antiq. ubi supra, cap. 25. the reader may see that palace described by Joseph. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 16.

(S) One of them was the overturning of the chariot in which his mother sat, by which she was so terribly bruised, that her life was despaired of; which sad accident went so near his heart, that he drew his sword with full intent to kill himself, but was happily prevented by some of his retinue.

The fourth book of the Maccabees (27) says, that Herod sent all his family and riches before him, but that himself stayed behind with his guards to prevent their being pursued.

(27) Ibid.

the country about it. They ſpared, however, Hyrcan's treaſure, which amounted to three hundred talents, and ſome of Herod's riches that were left behind; but they made themſelves amends by the plunder of Mariſſa, an opulent city, which they totally deſtroyed. Antigónus was next inſtalled on the Jewiſh throne, according to their agreement, and Phaſaelus and Hyrcan were ſoon after brought to him in chains. The new king, however, did not think proper to put the high-prieſt to death, but contented himſelf with incapacitating him for the pontifical function, by cauſing his ears to be cut off (T). As for Phaſaelus, he eaſily foreſaw that he could not eſcape ſome cruel death; but being bound with chains, and unable to kill himſelf by any other way, he knocked his brains out againſt a ſtone. Our hiſtorian adds, that there was a report that his wounds not being mortal, Antigonus ſent ſome phyſicians to him, under pretence of trying to cure, but in reality to poiſon them, and make ſure of him. However, he had the pleaſure before his death to hear that his brother was eſcaped, and got to Rhinocorura, and there it was that Herod heard of his death. The Parthians, having thus far performed their contract with Antigonus, began their march homeward and took the unfortunate high-prieſt with them, to prevent any freſh tumults being raiſed upon his account °.

His palace plundered.

Hyrcan's ears cut off.

Phaſaelus's death.

By that time Herod was got from Rhinocorura to Peluſium, he received a meſſage from the Arabian king, who was now aſhamed of his baſeneſs, with an apology and new offers of his ſervice; but he rejected them, and would have embarqued for Rome, but the ſailors obſtinately refuſed to take him in; whereupon he applied himſelf to the magiſtrates of the city, who received him with great honour, and provided him another ſhip. During his ſtay in Egypt, he was courted by Cleopatra to continue there longer; the Maccabitiſh

Herod's ſucceſs at Rome.

° Antiq. l. xiv. c. 25. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 11.

(T) The Moſaic law (28) required, that the high-prieſt ſhould be perfect in all his limbs, &c. ſo that upon the loſs of any of them, he was to be immediately deveſted of that office, and another was to be choſen in his room.

Joſephus adds, that Antigonus was not able to pay the Parthian king the five hundred women, becauſe Herod had ſeized upon them, and carried them off into his place of retreat.

(28) Vid. Levit. xxi. 16. & ſeq. & vol. iii. p. 255. & ſeq.

bitiſh book often quoted adds, that ſhe offered to make him her prime miniſter, and general of all her forces; but he was fully bent upon going to Rome with all ſpeed, and getting on board a veſſel, which was bound to Pamphylia; a violent ſtorm forced them to land at Rhodes, where he met with ſome friends and aſſiſtance, and paſſed thence to Brunduſium, and came at length to Rome. Here he addreſſed himſelf firſt to Antony, and then to Octavianus, to whom he related all that had happened in Judæa, and the deſperate condition his affairs were in; and partly by his entreaties and reminding them of his father's friendſhip to Julius Cæſar, and partly by the promiſe of a large ſum of money, did ſo work upon them, that they reſolved to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. Antony, on the ſcore of the old kindneſſes of Antipater, did even perform more than Herod expected or even deſired of them. The utmoſt of his aim was, to have had Ariſtobulus, the brother of his beloved Mariamne, ſettled on the throne (U), and himſelf to have been at the head of the Jewiſh affairs under him, as his father had been under Hyrcan; whereas the triumvirs did actually reſolve to procure him the crown, though this was contrary to the Roman method, who, in caſes of the like nature, did always pay ſuch a due regard to the royal line of their dependent kings, as not to ſet up a ſtranger over them; but our triumvir's intereſt eaſily over-ruled that good maxim.

Created king of Judæa.

THE ſenate was accordingly convened, and Herod introduced to them by Meſſala and Atratinus, two noble ſenators, who there ſet forth the merits of Antipater's family to the Roman nation, and repreſented Antigonus as a turbulent and ſeditious perſon and a known enemy to their nation, who had not ſcrupled to accept of the Jewiſh crown from the hands of the Parthians. To this Antony added, how advantageous it would be to his expedition againſt Parthia, to have ſuch a ſtedfaſt friend as Herod to be king of Judæa; upon which he was unanimouſly choſen by the ſenate, and Antigonus voted an enemy to them. As ſoon as the decree was paſſed, Herod was conducted with great ceremony into the capitol, Octavianus and Antony marching on on each side of him (W), accompanied by the consuls and senators; where, after the usual sacrifices, the decree was deposited among the archives, after which Antony gave them a magnificent entertainment. Thus Herod became king of Judæa, by the friendship and interest of Antony and Augustus, in the consulship of Caius Domitius Calvinus and Caius Asinius Pollio. The condition he had left his affairs in in Judæa, and his family in Idumea, not permitting to stay longer than seven days after his inauguration, he set out again for Brundusium, and sailed from thence to Ptolemais, where he landed about the latter end of the summer, so that he spent but three months in this expedition both by sea and land [P]. Year of the flood 2959, Before Christ 40,

(U) This prince had certainly the beſt title to the crown, being the ſon of Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcan, by Alexander the ſon of Ariſtobulus, the brother of that pontiff; ſo that the rights of thoſe two brothers were united in him.

WHILE he was successful at Rome, Antigonus had so closely besieged the fortress of Massada, that, though it was well provided with all other necessaries, yet they were much distressed for want of water, insomuch that Joseph, who commanded there, was contriving means to make a desperate sally, and to break through the besiegers, in order to escape into Arabia and get some fresh succour from Malchus, who, as we hinted before, was highly ashamed of his late treatment of Herod. But, happily for him, the very night he intended to sally out, there fell such a heavy rain, as filled all their cisterns again; so that he thought on nothing now but how to make a brave defence, till his brother came and relieved him, whilst he still made some bold sallies, and killed not a few of the besiegers. In the mean time, Ventidius the Roman general in Syria, having driven the Parthians out of that province, came and encamped in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, under the pretence of relieving Massada, but in reality to extort money from Antigonus: for as soon as this last had satisfied his greediness with a good round sum, he marched Massada besieged by Antigonus.

[P] Antiq. ibid. c. 26, 27. Bell. Jud. ubi supra, c. 12.

(W) The fourth book of the Maccabees adds (29), that the senate ordered him a golden crown, and to be conducted to and from the capitol on horseback, whilst a herald marched before him, crying, "Long live Herod, king of the Jews, and of the "holy city."

Antony having afterwards given the company a sumptuous feast, he and Herod embarqued with a numerous army, and being arrived at Antioch, he ordered one half to go with him into Judæa, and with the other he marched into Parthia.

(29) Cap. 1.

marched away, leaving, for formality's sake, some part of his men with Silo, a pensioner whom Antigonus had been forced to make by dint of money, till he could get himself strengthened by the Parthians, whose assistance he was still in hopes of.

Mariamne's character.

HEROD on the other hand was not idle, his thoughts were wholly bent upon relieving his distressed family; but especially his beloved Mariamne, a princess, who was indeed very well worth all his care and concern, whether we consider her as descended from a long series of illustrious kings and high-priests, or a person of exalted virtue and merit, and adorned with the most endearing charms of body and mind. As soon therefore as he was arrived at Ptolemais, he got an army together of Jewish and other troops, which his generosity still encreased as fast as he went, insomuch, that a very little time had brought almost the whole province of Galilee into his interest. At the same time his friend Antony sent orders by Dellius to Ventidius to assist him with all his forces; so that he was now strong enough to march against Antigonus and to relieve Massada. He stopped, however, to lay siege to Joppa, a place of too great importance to be left behind in the hands of the enemy. Silo took this opportunity to withdraw his forces from him, and was like to have paid dear for his desertion. For Antigonus fell upon him, and had infallibly defeated him, had not Herod come to his rescue. Joppa being soon after surrendered, he marched directly to relieve his besieged friends, and, in spight of the many ambushes which Antigonus did lay in his way, and the treachery of Silo, who extorted money from both sides, and did all he could to obstruct instead of assisting him; he reached Massada, forced the enemy to raise the siege (X), and was joyfully received by all his family [q].

Joppa taken by Herod.

By

[q] Id. ibid.

(X) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (30), that Herod surprized Antigonus before the place, and made a vigorous attack on one side of him, whilst Joseph sallied out against him on the other; so that he was totally defeated, and forced to flee into Jerusalem, whither Herod pursued him, and laid close siege to him.

It will not be amiss to close this note with a hint on a more remarkable occurrence out of our learned Usher (31), namely the (30) Ibid. (31) Annal. sub. A. M. 3964.

By this time Herod's army was greatly encreaſed, not only by the garriſon of Maſſada, but by other reinforcements, which came voluntarily from other parts, and enabled him to go and form the ſiege of Jeruſalem. He took Rheſſa in his way, and being come before the metropolis, he cauſed a general amneſty to be proclaimed, extending to all, none excepted, that had joined with Antigonus, and came over to him within a limited time. To this Antigonus anſwered, addreſſing himſelf to Silo and the reſt of the Roman ſoldiers, who were come to aſſiſt Herod in the ſiege; "that it was "ſhameful injuſtice in the ſenate to ſet a private perſon on "the throne, who was an Idumæan, or half Jew, con-"trary to the Jewiſh laws and right of ſucceſſion; that if "they reſented his receiving the crown from the Parthians, "there were ſtill enough left of the royal and ſacerdotal "race, who had deſerved, to the full, as well of the Ro-"mans as Herod, and on whom they might more juſtly be-"ſtow it." The conteſt between the two rivals roſe at length to ſuch a height, that Antigonus cauſed ſome volleys of arrows to be ſhot upon the enemy, and forced them to retire. Here aroſe a freſh mutiny, ſuppoſed to have been underhand encouraged by Silo; his ſoldiers complaining aloud

Herod marches againſt Jeruſalem.

of

the birth of Saloninus, (ſo called by his father Aſinius Pollio, the then Roman conſul, in memory of his taking Salonæ, a city in Dalmatia) and which gave occaſion to the fourth eclogue of Virgil, in which that poet has given ſuch a noble deſcription of the golden age, which this child was to reſtore to the world, that he is juſtly ſuppoſed to have ſtolen it, not ſo much out of the pretended ſibylline oracles, as from the prophecies concerning the reign of the Meſſiah, the true prince of peace. For, as they were tranſlated by that time into Greek, they may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been read by him, and perhaps further explained to him by the Jews, who, if we may believe Cicero (32), were very numerous at that time at Rome.

That Virgil proved a falſe prophet with reſpect to his wonderful child, the event has ſhewn, ſince he lived but nine days. But that the more miraculous child Jeſus, who was born forty years after (33), has left us ſuch a divine ſet of laws, as fully anſwer the glorious deſcription which the prophets have given us of his reign; and which, duly and univerſally obſerved, would eaſily eclipſe all that the poets have ſung concerning their fabulous golden age, cannot be denied, our enemies themſelves being judges.

(32) Orat. pro Flacc. (33) Prid. Connect. ſub. an. A. C. 40. Vid & Arch. Chandler's defence of chriſtianity.

of the want of money, proviſions, and better winter quarters; Herod was forced to ſend out for freſh ſupplies for them, which came afterwards in ſuch plenty, that there was not the leaſt pretence left for a revolt. The city of Jericho did, however, fall a ſacrifice to the Roman greedineſs; they plundered it of all its riches, which amounted to an immenſe value; after which Herod was forced to ſend them into winter quarters in Samaria, Idumea, and Galilee, whilſt Antigonus, to curry favour with Antony, obtained of Silo, as a great favour, that part of the Roman army might be ſent into Lydda, which ſtill held out for him.

THE ſeaſon by this time being too far advanced to begin the ſiege of Jeruſalem, Herod, having well glutted and quartered his Roman auxiliaries, ſent his brother Joſeph into Idumea, with a thouſand foot and four hundred horſe, whilſt he went and ſecured his family in the city of Samaria; from thence he went and took ſome fortreſſes in Galilee from Antigonus, and among others that of Sephoris, which had been abandoned by the garriſon, and where he found great ſtore of proviſions. From thence he ſent a detachment into the territories of Arbela, which was ſadly infeſted with gangs of banditti; but as they could not ferret them out of their lurking-places, he marched againſt them with his whole army, and was as boldly encountered by their whole force. An obſtinate fight enſued, in which his left wing began to give way; but he came ſo timely to their aid, that he gained a complete victory; by which he became maſter of all Galilee, except thoſe rocky parts into which the defeated banditti retired. He rewarded his troops with a noble donative of a hundred and fifty drachms to each private man, and ſo proportionably to thoſe of a higher rank, and then ſent them into winter quarters. Silo left him ſoon after to follow Ventidius into Parthia, and Herod, who could hardly ſtay for the return of the ſpring to put himſelf into action, reſolved, if poſſible, to rid himſelf and the country of the remaining gangs of banditti. The inacceſſibleneſs of their lurking-holes made it almoſt impracticable; but Herod having cauſed a number of iron cheſts to be made and filled with ſoldiers, which were let down with iron chains, theſe made great execution amongſt them, till night obliged them to withdraw, when he cauſed a general pardon to be proclaimed to all who ſhould come and ſurrender themſelves. But this having reduced but a few of them, his ſoldiers by next morning went and ſet ſome combuſtible matter on fire at the mouth of their caverns, which put all within in a flame, and ſmothered thoſe it could not burn; and yet ſuch was their obſtinacy, that they choſe rather to periſh than accept of a pardon. A notable inſtance of which the reader may ſee in the margin (Y).

Deſtroys the gangs of banditte.

HEROD, thinking by this time that he had pretty near reduced their gang, left the country under the command of Ptolemy, at the head of as many forces as he thought would ſuffice to keep it in awe; and took the road to Samaria, where he had left his family, with a deſign to go, and either begin the ſiege of Jeruſalem, or bring Antigonus to a battle. He was no ſooner gone, but thoſe whom he had lately drove over Jordan, returned again, ſlew Ptolemy, and ravaged the country afreſh; ſo that he was forced to come back with freſh forces, with which he ſo effectually deſtroyed them and their lurking-places, and fined thoſe towns ſo ſeverely, which had given them either ſhelter or relief, that he quite rid the province of that deſtructive vermine [r].

THE Parthians having been defeated ſoon after by Ventidius, as ſhall be ſeen in the next chapter, that general, by order of Antony, ſent Machæras with two legions and a thouſand horſe to aſſiſt Herod in his war againſt Antigonus; but this laſt having gained him over by a large ſum, Machæras would needs march towards him under pretence of examining the ſtrength of the place. Herod, having tried in vain to diſſuade him from it, began to ſuſpect him of ſome treachery; but held his peace for the preſent. Not ſo did Antigonus, who ſeeing the Romans draw near the walls of Jeruſalem, conceived ſuch jealouſy of them, that he cauſed his men to let fly ſome vollies of arrows and ſtones againſt them, which ſo exaſperated him, that he returned to Emmaus, and turned his arms againſt the Jews there, ſlaying indiſcriminately all that came in his way, and among them a number of Herod's friends. Herod, who was then on the Antigonus's ill treatment of Machæras.

[r] Id. ibid.

(Y) Our hiſtorian tells us (34), that an old man being hid in one of theſe caverns, his wife and ſeven ſons, who were with him, did earneſtly beſeech him to ſuffer them to ſurrender themſelves; but he, placing himſelf at the mouth of the cave, ſtabbed them one after another, as they attempted to paſs by him, and caſt them down the precipice, and himſelf next, after having vented ſome ſcandalous reflections on the meanneſs of Herod's extraction, who was at the ſame time making him all the ſigns of pardon and clemency.

(34) Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 28. ſub. fin. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13.

point of going to pay his respects to Antony at the siege of Samosata, threatened to complain of it to him; but Machæras, hastening after, prevailed upon him to be reconciled, and to leave his brother Joseph, and a number of forces with him, to carry on the war during his absence; on this condition, however, that they should undertake nothing that was hazardous till his return. In his march to Antony's camp, he was forced to fight his way through some bands of free-booters, or, as the fourth of the Maccabees calls them [s], wild Arabs, who had attacked him in the rear, which would have been all cut off if he had not come back to their assistance and defeated the thievish gang. At his arrival before Samosata, he was received with all the marks of honour and esteem by the Roman triumvir, and did him many gallant services at that siege. In requital of which, when the city was taken, Antony left Sosius governor of Syria with the command of the Roman forces, and orders to assist Herod with them whenever he required it.

HEROD on his return found his affairs strangely altered for the worse; his brother Joseph, having forgot his orders, had made an incursion against Jericho, with his own troops and five legions, which he received from Machæras; but the Roman horse being unfit for such rocky ground as he was then encamped upon, the enemy surprised and defeated him, after a noble defence, in which himself was killed by Pappus the Roman general. Antigonus caused his head to be cut off, and carried in triumph with him; but his brother Pheroras redeemed it soon after, at the price of fifty talents. The consequence of this defeat was the total revolt of Galilee, where the wealthiest of Herod's party were barbarously slung in great numbers into the lake of Tiberias. Idumæa was also on the point of revolting, when Herod appeared at the head of a fresh army, and in a little time reduced those two provinces again. At Jericho, where he gave an entertainment to his friends, he was twice in danger of his life, the first time by the fall of the banquetting house, which the guests had but just quitted; and on the next day by a party of six thousand Antigonians, who came and assaulted his van-guard, and where he received a wound. His army still encreasing, and Machæras stoutly defending himself against Antigonus, a battle was soon fought between the two antagonists, wherein Herod gained a complete victory, and made a horrid slaughter of the enemy: Pappus being found among the

Joseph defeated and killed.

[s] Cap. lii.

the dead, he ordered his head to be cut off, and ſent to Pheroras. His eagerneſs to revenge his brother's death, made him purſue his flying enemy with ſuch uncommon ſwiftneſs and cruelty, that, had he not been prevented by a violent ſtorm, he might have gone ſtrait to Jeruſalem, and have taken it with eaſe, Antigonus being by that time ſo reduced, that he was upon the point of abandoning it; but by that time winter coming on, and the ſoldiers not being able to bear the fatigues of a ſiege, Herod put them into winter-quarters, and ſet about getting ready all things neceſſary for beginning it early the following ſpring [t].

WHILST theſe preparations were making, Herod went to Samaria, and there conſummated his marriage with Mariamne, whom he had betrothed four years before; but had been hindered from marrying through the many troubles he was entangled in, though he had an extreme deſire to ſee this union once happily accompliſhed (Z). By this time he had got a reinforcement of thirty thouſand men, and Soſius, who had been ſent to his aſſiſtance at the head of eleven legions and ſix thouſand horſe, beſides ſome auxiliary troops hired from Syria, was marching through Phænice to join him, and with this numerous army they went and beſieged Jeruſalem (A). The beſieged on the other hand were no leſs numerous and reſolute for a vigorous defence, the city being filled with Jews, who flocked thither from all parts of the kingdom. But theſe wanted military experience, and truſted either to their ſtrength and courage, or to the ſacredneſs of the temple, which they ſeemed confident would be defended by ſome miraculous providence, againſt an Idumæan uſurper and Jeruſalem beſieged by Herod.

[t] Antiq. & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

(Z) We have already given the character and deſcent of this excellent princeſs, and Herod had great reaſon to hope that this marriage would effectually reconcile him to the Jewiſh nation, whom he knew to retain an affectionate zeal for the Aſmonean family, of which ſhe was deſcended, by the two brothers Hyrcan and Ariſtobulus, as we hinted in a former note. This he thought would likewiſe facilitate the ſurrender of Jeruſalem, by withdrawing numbers of the beſieged Jews from the faction of Antigonus.

(A) Joſephus tells us, that the Roman legions did not conſiſt of a certain number, but amounted, ſome to four thouſand, ſome to five thouſand, and ſome to ſix thouſand; but, however, if we take them at the loweſt, and join to them the Jewiſh and Syrian forces, this army muſt have amounted to above ſixty thouſand men.

and an army of idolatrous Romans. They did likewise annoy the beſiegers by frequent private ſallies, in which they ſpoiled great quantities of their proviſions and forage. But on the fortieth day of the ſiege, the Romans, in ſpight of the ſtout reſiſtance from within, found means to ſcale the outward wall, and to make themſelves maſters of it; and on the fiftieth they got within the ſecond, when ſome of the galleries about the temple being ſet on fire, Herod threw all the odium of it on Antigonus. The lower city being taken, the beſieged betook themſelves to the higher and to the temple, where they ſuffered very much through famine, it being the ſabbatic year*. However, they built a new wall inſtead of that which was beaten down, countermined the enemy, and fought ſometimes above and ſometimes under ground, and with more deſpair than true courage. At length, after a five months cloſe ſiege by ſo numerous an army (B), Herod, finding them as obſtinate as ever, ordered a general aſſault to be made, which both his and the Roman troops performed with ſuch vigour, that they forced them at length to ſurrender. Antigonus himſelf came down from a tower, where he had defended himſelf as long as he could, threw himſelf at Soſius's feet, and in the moſt abject and ſubmiſſive guiſe implored his mercy. But the elated Roman, inſtead of expreſſing the leaſt concern for that unfortunate prince, upbraided him with cowardice and effeminacy, calling him in the feminine gender Antigona, and ordered him to be put under a ſtrong guard. The Romans at the ſame time, having diſperſed themſelves through all the quarters of the upper city, made a terrible ſlaughter of the Jews, and plundered and ravaged every place they came near, to be revenged, as they expreſſed it, for the length and fatigue of the ſiege. The very ſanctuary was in danger of undergoing the ſame fate, had not Herod prevented it, partly by fair, partly by threatening words, and even by mere force. He ſent at the ſame time a ſevere meſſage to Soſius, complaining, that if this plunder and butchery were not ſtopped, the Romans would leave him

Taken by ſtorm.

Saved from deſtruction by Herod.

* De hoc vid. vol. iii. p. 206. & ſeq.

(B) All this while Herod ſtill behaved with great moderation towards the Antigonians, not only promiſing them his pardon and kind reception, but, at their deſire, ſupplying them with all neceſſary victims for their daily and other ſacrifices, not doubting but that he might in time mollify them into a ſurrender, but all proved in vain (34).

(34) Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 28. ſub fin. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13.

him king only of a bare wilderneſs; and that as for himſelf, he ſhould look upon his ſucceſs as the moſt unhappy thing that could befall him, if it muſt be attended with the profanation of that ſacred place, the acceſs of which was permitted to none but to the Jewiſh prieſts. To all this Soſius anſwered, that he did not well know how to forbid his troops the plundering of a place that had been taken by aſſault; ſo that Herod ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of ſaving both temple and city, from all further devaſtation, by a large donative out of his own coffers.

THUS was this city taken after a ſiege of near ſix months (C), and with its ſurrender ended the reign of the Aſmoneans, after it had continued a hundred and twenty-nine years from Judas Maccabeus taking the Jewiſh government upon him (D). Antigonus, the laſt male of that race that bore the regal title, was clapped in irons by Soſius, who, having preſented a crown of gold to the temple, left Jeruſalem, and took the unhappy prince with him, and delivered him to Antony; by whom he was, at the earneſt ſolicitations of Herod, put to a ſhameful death (E), in the third year of his reign[u]. Antigonus put to death. Year of the flood 2962. Before Chriſt 37.

T 4 SECT.

[u] Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13. Vid. & Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3967.

(C) Reckoning from Herod's firſt ſetting down before it; for it was not till ſome time after that Soſius joined him with his troops, and carried on the ſiege jointly with him.

(D) Joſephus reckons but a hundred and twenty-ſix years (35); but he muſt be underſtood only from the time that Judas was eſtabliſhed in his government by his peace with Antiochus, three years after he had taken it into his hands.

It is true, however, his ſucceſſors did not take the title of kings, as we have ſeen in the courſe of this ſection, till Ariſtobulus, or rather till Alexander Jannæus; but that family ſtill enjoyed the peculiar privilege of joining the pontifical with the regal or ſupreme dignity.

(E) The Jewiſh hiſtorian obſerves, that Antony would willingly have reſerved Antigonus for his future triumph, but that Herod, who feared every thing from his rival, if he ſhould ever have an opportunity to plead his own cauſe before the ſenate, ceaſed not to importune that general to put him to death, and obtained it at laſt by a large ſum of money. But he cauſed that unhappy prince to be executed in ſo ſhameful a manner, as has given juſt occaſion to ſeveral antient authors to condemn it, as a

(35) Ibid.

SECT. IV.

The history of the Jews from Herod to the birth of CHRIST.

Herod's cruel beginning.

THE taking of Jerusalem and the death of Antigonus having now fixed Herod upon the Jewish throne, he was soon obliged to bend his thoughts on two important concerns; the one to replenish his coffers exhausted, partly by the large sums with which he had been forced to buy the friendship of the Roman generals, and even Antony himself; and partly by the profuseness with which he rewarded his own and the Roman troops for their past services, and especially for saving the city and temple from plunder and ruin: the other was to suppress the opposite Jewish faction, which, in spite of his rival's ignominious death, retained an invincible attachment to the Asmonean family, and an irreconcileable hatred to his own. These two points, which could not be gained, the one without a great deal of oppression, and the other without much cruelty and blood-shed, we must look upon as the two main springs of all his actions and the causes of his uneasy reign. Accordingly, upon his having got possession of that metropolis, he caused all the gold, silver, and other valuable things he found in it, to be carried into his own palace, by which he amassed immediately an immense treasure; but as a great part of it had been already promised to the Romans, and was actually given to them, he reimbursed himself by the forfeiture of the estates of the Antigonion faction, causing the wealthiest of them to be seized, and forty-a piece of injustice and cruelty, never till then allowed of by the Romans (36).

For having caused him to be condemned as a private criminal, and without regard to his illustrious descent, the sentence was executed accordingly at Antioch; where having been first tied and whipped at a stake, his head was cut off, after having been all along flattered with promises of life. This punishment, Strabo in the place above-quoted observes, had never been inflicted on any crowned head; but Antony thought it necessary by such an ignominious death to render him contemptible to the Jews, to prevent their raising any new tumults against his generous friend Herod (37).

(36) Vid. int. al. Plutarch. in Anton. Dion. lib. xlix Strab. ap. Joseph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. (37) Ibid.

forty-five of the principal of them to be put to death (A). And such was his jealousy in this respect, that he caused guards to

(A) We took notice in the last section, that Herod spared that very Sameas, who had appeared the most intrepid against him, at his tryal before the sanhedrin; as well as Pollio, another learned and valuable Jew, who had been a great stickler for Hyrcan against him; and these were not the only two instances of Herod's clemency. We have elsewhere seen other marks of his generous forgiveness; and it is likely, that if he could have supported his new regal dignity without those violent means, which the obstinacy of the Jews and the emptiness of his coffers forced him to, it would have been much more agreeable to his temper, which was really generous enough to profuseness.

However, we must own, that these two great men, whom he not only spared above all the rest, but took into his special favour and confidence, had, notwithstanding all the incense which the rabbies give them for their courage and intrepidity, taken care to make their peace with him during the siege, by exhorting the besieged to open their gates to him.

For whilst the Antigonian faction were encouraging the superstitious Jews with crying "the temple of the Lord," and making them expect some miraculous deliverance, these two politicians, foreseeing that the city could not hold out much longer against such a vigorous siege, and under the excessive want of all provisions, did with a kind of prophetic confidence assure them, that all resistance was vain, since the thing was from the Lord, who for their sins was now bringing them in subjection to this foreigner (38). So that had Herod been of a more vindictive temper than he really was, yet this piece of service could not have failed of reconciling them to his favour.

There was indeed some ground for what they affirmed in favour of Herod, if what Josephus (39) says be true, that one Menahem, a cotemporary of theirs and an Essenian, endowed with the spirit of prophecy, had long before foretold his rise to the crown; the story runs thus:

Herod being met one day by this Menahem, then a boy, whilst himself was amongst his school-fellows, was accosted by him in a serious manner, with a "Hail, king of the Jews"; and was assured by him, that providence had determined to raise him from his plebeian extraction to that supreme dignity. The young prophet at the same time bid him remember, when he was come to it, that it was his duty to govern with justice and equity, though, added he in the conclusion, I foresee, that you will take quite different methods, and thereby bring a miserable end upon your head. Herod, to be planted at their gates, to examine, as they were carrying them to their graves, whether they were really dead, and whether any riches were conveyed off with their bodies; in which case they were seized upon and sent into his treasury. Upon the whole, his necessities and profuseness were so great, that he spared no extortion to supply them; insomuch, that this being the sabbatic year, in which there was neither planting nor sowing, and all the country round about having been so terribly plundered and ravaged, both before and during the siege, nothing less than a grievous famine was expected to have filled the whole land [a].

(38) Id. ibid. Vid. & l. xiv. c. 17. (39) Antiq. l. xv. c. 13.

Herod had still another rival left, who, though at a great distance from him, and kept, as it were, a prisoner in Parthia, did not suffer his mind to be at ease, till he had quite rid himself of him. This was Hyrcan, the deposed king and high-priest, whom Pacorus had carried thither with him in chains. But when Phraartes came to be informed of his high birth and dignity, he generously took off his chains, and permitted him to live in Babylon, where he was highly respected, not only by the great numbers of Jews who dwelt in that city, but likewise by all those that lived beyond the Euphrates, who all looked upon him as their rightful prince and high-priest. Their veneration for him was raised still higher, when they understood that Herod had filled the pontifical

[a] Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13.

Herod, however, did not think any more of it till he had got the crown; but then calling to mind his prediction, he sent for him, to enquire how long he should reign, not doubting but that he, who had foretold him the one, might as easily tell him the other. Menahem, not answering directly to the question, was asked again, whether he thought that he should reign ten years; Yes, yes, answered the Essene, twenty or thirty, and there stopped; and Herod, being satisfied with that number, urged him no further.

Menahem was then, it seems (40), vice-president of the sanhedrin, under Hillel, the same, as is supposed, whom Josephus calls Pollio; but Herod, having drawn him into his service, appointed Sameas to succeed him in that office. From that time, not only Menahem, but his whole sect, grew in great favour with that monarch. We shall find a proper place to speak more fully of the Essenes, when we come to describe the different sects which reigned in our Saviour's time among the Jews.

(40) Vid. Prid. Connect. part 2. lib. viii. sub A. ant. Christ 37.

tifical chair with an old acquaintance of his own, named Ananel, a descendant of one of those priestly families that settled at Babylon after the captivity, and whom that politic prince caused to be fetched from thence, merely on the score of his meanness and obscurity; that being without friends or interest in Judæa, he might be contented with his sacerdotal function, without interfering with the regal prerogative.

Hyrcanus's happiness in Parthia.

HYRCAN might then have thought himself happy in his exile, being thus respected by the Parthian king, and by all the Jews of the dispersion: yet such was his love for his country, or rather his fatal confidence in the new Jewish monarch, that, as soon as he heard of his being on the throne, he conceived a great desire of spending the remainder of his life with him. His friends, to whom he communicated his thoughts, tried in vain to dissuade him from it, by representing to him the folly and hazard of putting himself in that monarch's power, especially since he could hardly expect either greater honour or happiness at Jerusalem, than he enjoyed at Babylon. But could arguments have prevailed with him, Herod would have left no means untried to have frustrated them, and made sure of him. He began, however, with sending him a kind invitation to come and bear a partnership with him of his power and grandeur, and reap the fruits of his gratitude for his former kindness. But lest this invitation should fail, he backed it with an embassy to Phraartes, in which he begged of him to give the pontiff leave to return to Judæa. Santacalla, who was charged with this embassy, was ordered to make some considerable presents to the Parthian king and court, and succeeded so well in his negotiation, that Hyrcan, in spite of all the remonstrances of his friends to the contrary, left his safe asylum for Jerusalem, where Herod at first received him with great friendship and magnificence, and forgot nothing that could possibly conceal the treacherous design he was hatching against his life [b].

Persuaded to return into Judæa.

WHILST this was doing, Herod was not a little disturbed with domestic jars. Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcan and mother of Aristobulus and Mariamne, a woman of a haughty spirit, could not bear, with any patience, to see an obscure Babylonish priest preferred before her son to the pontifical dignity, from which Hyrcan was now disabled by the loss of his ears. She was ever expostulating with him the injury done to her son, and insisting, that the pontifical dignity belonging in right of succession to him alone, as being descended deſcended by father and mother from Alexander Jannæus (B), none but he ought in juſtice to be inveſted with it. But Herod, who was conſcious that the young prince had an equal right likewiſe to the regal dignity, which he now uſurped from him, was afraid to grant her the one, leſt ſhe ſhould find ſome means in time of ſeizing upon the other. This obliged her to write to Cleopatra, not doubting but her intereſt with Antony might greatly influence that general in favour of her ſon. It was impoſſible for her to carry on that correſpondence ſo cloſely, but Herod had ſome intimation of it; and fearing the worſt from thoſe two intrigueing princeſſes, he was forced for the preſent to conſent to have Ananel depoſed, and Ariſtobulus inveſted with that dignity, pretending, that he had only given it to the former, till the latter was come to be of an age fit for it (C).

[b] Antiq. ubi supra, cap. 2.

THIS

(B) Ariſtobulus, as the ſon of Alexander, and grandſon of Hyrcan and of Ariſtobulus, the ſons of Alexander Jannæus, had the right both to the regal and pontifical dignity united in him. For he was grandſon to the former by his mother Alexandra, who was his only child; and by his father Alexander, he was grandſon to Ariſtobulus. By his deſcent from the latter, he had a right to the high-prieſthood, which was fixed to the male line; and by his deſcent from both, he would have had the only title to the crown alſo, had not the Romans transferred it to Herod (41).

(C) This is the third perſon that had hitherto been depoſed from the pontifical dignity ſince the Jews return from the Babyloniſh captivity, and Herod was ſo ſenſible of the illegality of it, that when Antony ſent to deſire him to put Ariſtobulus into Ananel's room, he excuſed himſelf from it at firſt, by remonſtrating to him, that ſuch depoſitions were contrary to the Moſaic law; according to which, it is certain, that dignity could not end but with the death of its poſſeſſor, unleſs ſome illegal defect happened to diſqualify him †.

The firſt inſtance we read of this irregular proceeding is, that of Jaſon's or Jeſus's ſupplanting his brother Onias, and by a larger ſum of money buying that dignity of Antiochus, in prejudice of the incumbent (42). The other was that of Hyrcan by his nephew Ariſtobulus, who wreſted that dignity from him by main force. But theſe depoſitions became afterwards ſo frequent, that there was hardly any other way of coming into that office, but by the expulſion of the incumbent.

The fourth book of Maccabees ſays, that Antony having ſent a preſſing command to Herod to ſend Ariſtobulus to him, Herod, not (41) Antiq. l. xv. cap. 2, & 3. † De hoc vid. ſup. vol iii. p. 252, & ſeq. (42) See before, p. 104.

THIS condeſcenſion of Herod, backed with ſo plauſible an excuſe, wrought a kind of reconciliation between them, but which was nothing leſs than ſincere on either ſide, eſpecially on Herod's, who ſtill ſuſpected the intrigues of the mother, and the merit of the ſon, whoſe high birth and blooming virtues, joined to a graceful perſon, attracted the eyes and hearts of the Jewiſh nation. Upon ſome pretence therefore or other, he quarrelled with Alexandra, forbad her to meddle with any public affairs, and at laſt cauſed her to be confined to her palace and to be cloſely watched. In the mean time, Cleopatra having ſent her and her ſon an invitation to come to her, ſhe was eaſily perſuaded to accept it, ſince ſhe could now only look upon herſelf as Herod's priſoner, from whoſe jealouſy ſhe had every thing to fear. The difficulty was how to conceal their flight from his watchful ſpies: ſhe intruſted her deſign only to two faithful ſervants, one of whom was to procure her a ſhip to carry them off, and the other to provide two coffins, one for her ſon, and the other for herſelf, to convey them in that manner to the ſhip. But unfortunately one of the two ſervants inadvertently mentioned the matter to a third, whom he thought to have been in the ſecret, who immediately took hold of this opportunity to ingratiate himſelf to Herod, and made a full diſcovery of the deſign. Herod ſtayed only till the mother and ſon were conveyed ſome part of the way in their coffins, and then cauſed them to be arreſted, and brought back. His fear, however, of Cleopatra's reſentment, prevented his expreſſing his own againſt not daring to venture that young prince out of his ſight, haſted to make him high-prieſt before he read that general's orders; and then ſent him word, that, he being now inveſted with the pontifical dignity, it was unlawful for him to ſtir out of the Jewiſh dominions (43).

Herod plagued with domeſtic jars.

Joſephus agrees in part with that author (44), but adds, that Antony having received the pictures of Mariamne and Ariſtobulus, which their mother, by the advice of Cleopatra, had ſent to him, that their extreme beauty might make a favourable impreſſion on that effeminate general; Antony, not daring to ſend for Mariamne, deſired only Ariſtobulus to be ſent to him. But Herod, not daring to truſt ſo beautiful a young perſon, who was then but ſixteen years old, with one ſo infamous for his incontinency, was forced to excuſe his refuſal, with pretending, that the young prince was ſo great a darling of the Jewiſh nation, that it would infallibly involve it in a civil war, ſhould he comply with his requeſt.

(43) Cap lv. (44) ubi ſupra, cap. 2.

againſt them; and ſince he found it unſafe to puniſh them, he put on the maſk of clemency, and was outwardly reconciled to them, but from that moment reſolved to get rid of the young prince.

An accident happened ſoon after, which determined him to haſten his death. The feaſt of tabernacles, one of the three grand feſtivals, was come, which was uſually ſolemnized with the greateſt magnificence †; when the new high-prieſt, who was then about ſeventeen years of age, appeared at the altar in his pontifical ornaments, and officiated with ſuch majeſty and grace, that the people thought they beheld all the merit and grandeur of his anceſtors revived in him. They could not forbear filling the temple and city with their praiſes, which raiſed the tyrant's jealouſy to ſuch a height, as made him reſolve to put his murdering deſign in execution with the utmoſt ſpeed. Accordingly, as ſoon as the ſolemnity was over, he went with him to Jericho, where Alexandra had invited them to a ſumptuous entertainment. The weather being hot Ariſtobulus was invited to bathe in a fine fiſh-pond in that neighbourhood, where ſome of Herod's hired creatures were ſwimming; and where, as ſoon as they had him in their hands, they kept him ſtill under water, till he was dead. This bloody deed was gloſſed over with the ſpecious pretence of its being done in ſport, by accident, and without any deſign on the pontiff's life; and Herod not only ſeemed to believe it, but took all the pains he could to have it thought ſo by the reſt, by putting himſelf into the deepeſt mourning for him, ordering a ſtately monument to be erected to his memory, and his funeral obſequies to be performed with the utmoſt magnificence. This was the end of young Ariſtobulus, which filled the city and kingdom with inexpreſſible grief; he died in the eighteenth year of his age, having ſcarce enjoyed his dignity one whole year, which upon his death returned to Ananel [c].

All theſe grimaces of Herod to diſculpate himſelf of the murder were eaſily ſeen through by the people, and only rendered him more odious to them, and much more ſo to his own family. Alexandra, at the firſt news of her ſon's death, could ſcarcely be kept from laying violent hands on herſelf; but, upon cooler thoughts, ſhe prevailed on herſelf to conceal her reſentment againſt the tyrant, that ſhe might the more eaſily compaſs his ruin. She wrote to acquaint Cleopatra with his treachery, and that princeſs, moved rather by her her ambition and avarice, than by a ſenſe of pity or of horror for the crime, ceaſed not to ſolicit Antony to puniſh the murderer, in hopes that after his death ſhe might eaſily obtain his kingdom for herſelf. Antony, being at length prevailed upon, ſent orders to Herod to come and clear himſelf before him at Laodicea, whither he was then coming, and Cleopatra along with him. Herod was obliged to obey, though much againſt his will; but took care to bribe his judge ſo high, that, upon his appearing before him, he was moſt baſely abſolved, and Cleopatra's avarice compenſated with the province of Cœle-Syria, inſtead of that of Judæa.

Alexandra plots againſt him.

† De hac vid. ſup. vol. iii. p. 193, & ſeq. [c] Antiq. ubi ſupra. c. 3.

Summoned to appear before Antony.

Acquitted.

HEROD, however, not knowing how it would go with him in Syria, had before his departure given expreſs orders to his uncle Joſeph, whom he left governor during his abſence, that in caſe he was caſt for his life, he ſhould put his beloved Mariamne to death. The violence of his paſſion for that princeſs extorted this inhuman command from him. He knew that the fame of her beauty had long ſince captivated the Roman triumvir, and the thoughts of leaving her in the poſſeſſion of ſuch a rival, even after his death, were more dreadful to him, than any death he could inflict on him; and his uncle was forced to rid him of that anguiſh by the promiſe of a punctual obedience. When he was gone, Joſeph, who waited daily on her, either on affairs of ſtate, or to pay his reſpects to her, took all opportunities of extolling Herod's extreme paſſion for her, and at length was indiſcreet enough to diſcloſe the fatal orders he had left with him, as an irrefragable proof of the greatneſs and ſincerity of it. But the queen, looking upon it rather as an argument of his jealouſy and inhumanity, conceived from it a more invincible hatred againſt him. In the mean time, there was a rumour ſpread through the city, whether by Herod's enemies, or by ſome of his ſubtile agents, that Antony had put him to a cruel death; which caſt the whole court, but eſpecially Alexandra and Mariamne, into a great conſternation. Alexandra had by this time been informed with the bloody orders left with Joſeph; to prevent the execution of which, ſhe went to him, and ſtrove with all her eloquence to perſuade him to leave Jeruſalem, and to go and put themſelves under the protection of the Roman eagles, that were planted in the neighbourhood of the city (D). Their deliberations were quickly

(D) The eagles were the principal ſtandards of the Roman legions; they uſed to be ſet up in ſome eminent place of their camp quickly broken off by letters from Herod, which informed her, that he had not only gained his cauſe, but that Antony was daily heaping freſh marks of his affection upon him, and that he ſhould ſoon return to Jeruſalem, more ſtrengthened than ever in his kingdom. This news made them lay aſide their deſign; but as they had not carried it on ſo cloſely, but Salome had received ſome intimation of it, ſhe failed not to inform her brother of it upon his arrival. Some injurious reflections, which Mariamne had caſt on the meanneſs of her birth, had exaſperated her ſo far, that ſhe had vowed a moſt dreadful revenge; and ſhe took this opportunity of completing it, by accuſing her of having held too great a familiarity with Joſeph during his abſence, though he was both her own uncle and husband (E).

Mariamne falſely accuſed.

MARIAMNE did eaſily clear her innocence upon her firſt interview with the king; but whilſt he was entertaining her with the proteſtations of his love to her, ſhe could not forbear at length mentioning the orders he had left with his uncle, as rather a token of his barbarity to her. Theſe words, which ſtabbed that jealous monarch to the heart, made him conclude, that nothing leſs than the criminal converſation, with which Salome had accuſed her, could have induced his uncle to diſcloſe the fatal ſecret. In the firſt ſally of his fury, he was on the point of ſacrificing her with his own hand, had not his love prevailed over his reſentment. But Joſeph and Alexandra fell the unhappy victims of his rage; the firſt of whom he cauſed to be put to immediate death, refuſing even to ſee him, or hear what could be urged in his defence; the latter he cauſed to be put in Joſeph put to death.

camp to receive the adoration of the army, and to protect thoſe who took ſanctuary under them, they being allowed an inviolable aſylum to ſuch.

The Romans had left a legion in the neighbourhood of that metropolis, under the command of one Julius, and it was under his ſtandards that Alexandra propoſed to take refuge, when the news of her ſon-in-law's death came to her ears.

(E) We have had occaſion to ſhew in a former volume†, how far it was lawful, according to the law of Moſes, for an uncle to marry his niece, tho' not for an aunt to marry her nephew. We refer the reader to what has been further ſaid upon that head by a late learned writer (45).

† Vol. iii. p 351. Vid. & Levit. xviii. 12, & ſeq. xx. 19.

(45) Prid. Connect. ſub. A. ant. Chriſt. 187.

in chains, and confined to a close prison under a strong guard, as the main cause of all this mischief.

His fury was soon after diverted by the coming of Cleopatra into Judæa, in her return from the Euphrates, whither she had accompanied Antony. That princess, whose avarice was as insatiable as her lust, had disobliged him sensibly by both these passions. On the one hand, she had obtained from her paramour all the fertile territories of Jericho, which were by far the richest and pleasantest of all Judæa, especially upon the score of the balm (F) and the great quantity of palm-trees which grew in it, and brought Herod a considerable

Cleopatra comes to Jerusalem.

(F) This precious plant, so famous for its balsam, the most valuable of all ointments, is affirmed by Pliny (46) to have grown only in two gardens belonging to the Jewish monarchs, one of them containing only twenty acres, and the other still somewhat less. But Cleopatra caused a number of them to be carried into Egypt, where it is said to grow in great quantity at this very day (47).

But it is plain beyond all controversy, that this plant is the natural growth of Arabia, especially in the neighbourhoods of Mecca and Medina, where it grows wild even in sandy grounds, though that which is cultivated in gardens is reckoned the finest (48). We have taken notice in a former volume of some that grew near the lake Asphaltites, and which brought a considerable revenue to the owners †.

The balm was gathered from the shrub in the months of July and August, and in some warmer grounds even in June. It either drops of it self, or is made to do so by incision, with a sharp knife, made not of iron or steel, which they say is death to the plant, but either of glass, flint or ivory. The Liquor that distils from the plant is whitish at the first, then by degrees turns greenish, yellowish, and when very old, almost of the colour of honey. It is at first thin, and by degrees contracts a density like our terebinth, and is of so light a body, that it swims on the surface of water, and when beaten with it, will turn white. There is so little that is brought genuine into England, that it is rarely used, though its virtues have been cried up by many antient and modern authors; but even that which is least adulterated has a very ill quality amongst its excellent ones, namely, that the frequent use of it will in time dissolve the solid parts of the blood.

Besides what comes from the countries abovementioned, there are some sorts of it brought from America, the most esteemed of which are those of Peru and Tholu.

(46) Nat. Hist. l. xii. c. 15. (47) Vid Dapper. descr. of Egypt. (48) Id. ibid. † Vol. viii. Book II. Sect. vi. near the end.

able revenue [d]. On the other, she was soliciting that monarch to an amour all the time she stayed with him. Herod, who had conceived a great aversion to her, was consulting, all the time he entertained her with the utmost magnificence, of some means of putting her to death, whilst he had her in his power; but his friends, dreading the consequences of such a fact, did not onely dissuade him from it, but prevailed on him to glut at least her avarice with costly presents, which he did with surprising profuseness. However, as he had refused to gratify her other predominant passion, he feared lest her resentment on that score, joining with the invincible hatred which the Jews had conceived against him, should one day prove fatal to him. To prevent which, after he had accompanied her as far as Pelusium, he went and fortified the castle of Massada, and furnished it with arms and provisions for ten thousand men, that at all events he might have a sure place of refuge to flee to. At the same time he took constant care to send that princess the revenues of those territories which Antony had given from him to her, that she might have no pretence to fall out with him upon that score [e].

But this was not sufficient to prevent the effects of that base princess's resentment; and she soon after laid such a plot against him, that all his strength and courage were hardly sufficient to save him from ruin. We have elsewhere taken notice, that she had obtained a great many provinces from Antony, in Syria, Phœnice, and Arabia. The latter of these had paid tribute to her constantly enough, whilst Antony was in power; but after his defeat, at the battle of Actium, of which we shall speak in a more proper place, Malchus, then king of that country, refused all further payment to her. Herod, who had got a complete army, with which he designed to assist his friend Antony against Octavianus, received orders from him to turn his forces against the Arabians. This was Cleopatra's plot; who, by bringing these two kings to a battle, proposed to get the territories of the conquered, let the victory fall on which side it would. But as her spight against Herod was most prevailing, she sent one of her generals, named Athenion, who equally hated him, at the head of an army, under pretence of assisting him but in reality to betray and ruin him, because she foresaw that he was like to have the better of his enemy. For Herod upon the first encounter had given them a great overthrow, and Cleopatra's plot against Herod.

[d] Ibid. c. 4. Bell. Jud. lib. i. c. 15 & vii. c. 28. [e] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 5. Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. 28.

and obliged them to get a fresh army together, which Malchus brought into Cæle-Syria. Here a second battle was fought near Cana (G), in which Herod was on the point of getting a new victory; when Athenion, who had stood neuter all the time of the engagement, fell upon his troops, and, in spight of Herod's speedy assistance and bravery, cut the greatest part of the Jews in pieces, and plundered their camp; Herod himself escaping with great difficulty, with a small number of his men [f]. The Maccabitish book adds, that Athenion was ordered to surround that monarch with his troops, as soon as he had engaged those of the Arabians [g]. However that be, Herod from that time forbore coming to an engagement with them, and contented himself with making frequent incursions against them, encamping always on the mountains; by which he got this double advantage, that he harrassed the enemy, and inured his own troops to the trade of war.

He is betrayed by Athenion.

HEROD was by this time got into the seventh year of his reign [h], when Judæa was shaken with such an earthquake, as had never been felt before, and which destroyed great numbers of cattle and many thousand persons, who perished under the ruins of their houses (H). His troops indeed escaped the common ruin, because he kept them encamped in the open field; nevertheless, the great loss, which the kingdom sustained by this calamity, obliged him to send an embassy to sue to the Arabians for peace. But by this time the account of his loss, having been greatly magnified to them, they not onely rejected his offers, but slew the embassadors that brought them, and invaded Judæa with utmost speed, expecting to have found it destitute of defence. It was with the greatest difficulty that Herod kept his men Judæa greatly damaged by an earthquake. Year of the flood 2968. before Christ 31.

[f] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 6. [g] Cap. lvi. [h] Vid. Usser. Annal. sub. A. M. 3973.

(G) Probably Canna in Syria, on the other side of the Libanus, or Cannath on the other side of Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Bostra in Arabia (49).

(H) Our historian in one place mentions but ten thousand slain (50), but in another he makes them to amount to three myriads, or thirty thousand men (1); which last is the more likely of the two, and agrees much better with the description he gives of that calamity.

(49) Euseb. Loc. Hebr. Vid. & Steph. Byz. sub. voc, Cannath.
(50) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 7. (1) Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 14.

from abandoning him; but having at length diſpelled their fears, and offered the uſual ſacrifices, he went to meet the enemy on the other ſide of the Jordan, and there gave them two ſuch ſignal defeats, that he forced them in their turn to ſue for peace, and to accept it on his own conditions; after which he returned in triumph to Jeruſalem [i] (I).

Antony's defeat at Actium. Year of the flood 2969 Before Chriſt 30.

But his happineſs was ſoon after troubled by the defeat of Antony by Auguſtus at the battle of Actium, by which he ſaw himſelf deprived of a moſt powerful, as well as ſteady, friend, and on the brink of falling a ſacrifice to the conqueror's reſentment. The beſt expedient he could think on, under this conſternation was to ſend advice to Antony to put Cleopatra to death, and to ſeize on her kingdom and treaſures; by which he might be enabled to raiſe new forces, and either make a freſh puſh for the empire, or, at the worſt, obtain eaſier conditions of peace. He promiſed him on thoſe terms to ſtick faſt to his intereſt, and to furniſh him with money, troops, and ſtrong-holds, and all other aſſiſtance to carry on the war againſt his rival [k]. But Antony was ſtill too great a ſlave to that princeſs, to conſent to ſuch an expedient; which when Herod perceived, he thought no more but how to make his peace with the conqueror, on the beſt terms he could. He had ſtill another dread upon him, as great as the diſpleaſure of Cæſar. Hyrcan, the only ſurviving male of the Aſmonean race, had been formerly acknowledged king of Judæa, and, as ſuch, had entered into alliances with the Roman ſenate. Herod, on the other hand, had been chiefly upheld in his throne by the intereſt of Antony; and Alexandra, ever watchful for all opportunities of being

[i] Antiq ubi ſupra, c. 8, & 9. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 14. [k] See his ſpeech to Auguſtus, Bell Jud. ubi ſupra. c. 15.

(I) The firſt of theſe battles was fought near Philadelphia, in which five thouſand Arabians were either killed on the ſpot, or trod to death in their flight. Herod having afterwards cloſely beſieged them in their camp, where they were ready to periſh for want of water, they offered him at firſt fifty talents for their freedom, which being rejected, they in great numbers came to ſurrender themſelves till the fifth day, on which the reſt in deſpair, and without hopes or proſpect of ſucceſs, attacked him, and had ſeven thouſand killed. Upon which they ſubmitted to his conditions, one of which was, that he was declared by them governor or protector of their nation (z).

(z) Ibid. ad fin. Antiq. ubi ſupra, ad fin.

being revenged on the uſurper, had begun to try to gain ſome advantage from the late change of affairs againſt him. Herod therefore, who had his ſpies about him, thought it unſafe to go to Auguſtus, till he had drawn the father and the daughter into a ſnare, which might afford him a pretence for putting the former to death, which he did, by cauſing him to be beheaded in the eighteenth year of his age (K).

THIS was the diſmal end of that unfortunate prince, after a long ſeries of unhappy viciſſitudes. He was at firſt raiſed to the pontifical dignity by his mother Alexandra, and ſucceeded her ſoon after in the kingdom alſo; three months after which, he was deprived of both by his brother Ariſtobulus. He was reſtored to both by Pompey, and enjoyed them near forty years, till depoſed again and diſqualified by Antigonus, who cut off his ears, and ſent him priſoner into Parthia, from whence he unfortunately returned at the preſſing invitation of Herod, who owed his life, crown, and all his greatneſs to him, and who repaid all his kindneſſes with a violent death [1].

HEROD'S next care, before he departed, was, to ſecure his family the beſt he could, in caſe he ſhould miſcarry in his addreſs to Auguſtus. To that end, he committed his mother Cyprus and his ſiſter Salome to the care of his brother Herod goes to Auguſtus.

[1] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 9.

(K) So ſays the fourth book of the Maccabees (3). The trap into which he was drawn was a maſter-piece of his politic rival, who corrupted ſome of his and his daughter's confidents, to ſet on foot a kind of treaſonable correſpondence, whether real or counterfeited, with Malchus king of Arabia, wherein Hyrcan deſired to put himſelf again under his protection, and begged of him to ſend him ſome horſemen to conduct him from a private place near Jeruſalem, to the lake Aſphaltites, which was about ninety miles diſtant from that metropolis.

Doſitheus, the agent of this correſpondence, betrayed to Herod both this letter and the anſwer, in which the Arabian king promiſed him a ſafe eſcort to convey him away; Herod ſummoned the pontiff before his council, and having taxed him with it, and, upon his denial, ſhewed him the very letter, cauſed him to be condemned to die.

This laſt article Joſephus tells us (4), he took as he found it in the commentary which Herod left behind him; but at the ſame time he relates the matter ſomewhat differently from other hands. We refer the reader for it to the place laſt quoted.

(3) cap. 54. (4) Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 9.

Pheroras, whom he ſent into the caſtle of Alexandrion, with orders to this laſt to ſeize on the Jewiſh crown, and defend it to the laſt, in caſe he heard that it went ill with him. As for his wife Mariamne and her mother Alexandra, he ſent them into the ſtrong fortreſs of Maſſada, and put them under the care of his treaſurer, named Joſeph, and of Soheמus, one of his chief confidents, with expreſs orders to put thoſe two princeſſes to death, as ſoon as he received the news of his ill ſucceſs at the emperor's court; and then to go and aſſiſt his brother with all his power. He embarqued ſoon after for Rhodes, where Auguſtus then was; and, having obtained an audience from him, appeared before that prince in all his royal ornaments, except his diadem, and ſpoke to him with ſuch a ſeeming confidence, as if he was ſure beforehand to obtain what he came for. He made no difficulty to own his former attachment to Antony's intereſt, his aſſiſting him with men, arms, money, and other neceſſaries for the war; and even the counſel he had given him, after his defeat, of killing Cleopatra and ſeizing on her kingdom and immenſe treaſure, in order to obtain a more advantageous peace. All this, ſaid he, concluding his ſpeech, I thought myſelf bound in honour, gratitude, and friendſhip, to do for Antony; but ſince he has rejected my laſt advice, and left me at liberty to make you a tender of my future ſervices, if you think them worth your acceptance, and can but forget what is paſt, you ſhall find me henceforth as ſincere and ſtedfaſt a friend to you, as I have been hitherto to your rival. An earneſt of which he had already given to the emperor in the timely ſuccour he had ſent to Q. Didius, his governor in Syria, againſt Antony's gladiators (L). Auguſtus was very much taken both with his ſpeech and gallant behaviour: he had likewiſe been acquainted with the ſuccour he had ſent to Didius, and thanked him for it, aſſuring him, that he readily accepted

His ſpeech to him.

Is well received by him.

(L) Theſe were an abject race, whom Antony had brought up at Cyzicum to exhibit triumphant ſports; and theſe, when they heard of his defeat, determined to go into Egypt to his aſſiſtance. They had fought their way through ſeveral provinces in their march thither, Didius was the firſt who put a ſtop to their progreſs, being privately aſſiſted by Herod with ſome troops; and at length prevailed upon them to quit their gladiatorical employment, after they had waited a long time in vain for Antony's joining them (5).

(5) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 10.

accepted of his friendship, and confirmed the kingdom to him, in token of which, he ordered him to take up his diadem, and wear it before him. Herod, pleased with his good success, made some presents to Augustus and his favourites, according to his usual profuseness, and was from that time in greater esteem with him than any other tributary prince; so that he returned to Jerusalem highly satisfied with these additions of honour and power; but all this was soon soured by the ill reception he met with from his favourite Mariamne and her exasperated mother [m].

Troubled with domestic jars.

For these two princesses, looking upon their confinement at Massada only as a more honourable imprisonment, and remembering with horror the bloody orders he had formerly left with his uncle Joseph concerning them, did not doubt, but he had given the same to their two new guardians. To be satisfied of it, they spared neither presents nor caresses, till they had got the fatal secret from Sohemus, so that when Herod came to Massada, and was going to embrace the queen with his usual tenderness, and to acquaint her with his success, he was surprized to find all his caresses answered with sighs, and tears, and all other marks of grief and disdain. His resentment rose to such a height, that it extorted from him the bittereſt reproaches, accompanied with such threatenings, as would have alarmed any woman but her. But his love, which was no less violent, seldom suffered those sallies of anger to be long-lived; till his mother and sister, tired and affrighted to see him still floating between those opposite passions, found out a way to work her effectual ruin, by raising the vilest surmises and calumnies against her unspotted character.

His magnificent reception of Augustus.

In the mean time, Augustus passing through Syria in his way to Egypt, Herod, who went to meet him as far as Ptolemais, entertained him and his army with incredible magnificence; and, besides a present that he made to him of eight hundred talents, took care to furnish his army with bread, wine, and other provisions, as they marched through some barren deserts, where they might have been otherwise in danger of wanting even bread and water. He accompanied him as far as Pelusium, and that emperor was so charmed with his politeness and generosity, that he made him ride by his side, whenever he went to review his troops, or upon any diversion. He gave him the same magnificent reception, upon his return from Egypt, as he passed through Syria; in return of which, Auguſtus made him a preſent of the four thouſand Gauls, which had ſerved as life-guards to Cleopatra, and reſtored to him the territories and revenues of Jericho, Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, in the inlands, and thoſe of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton on the ſea-ſide, which made a conſiderable inlargment both to his kingdom and revenues. But, upon his return to Jeruſalem, he relapſed into his former diſcontent and jealouſies, on account of his beloved queen, whoſe averſion to him did daily encreaſe, inſomuch, that ſhe came at laſt to treat him with ſuch contempt, and accompanied it with ſuch bitter reflections, as eaſily convinced him, that ſhe had conceived an irreconcileable hatred againſt him. She gave him a mortifying inſtance of it ſoon after, and ſuch a one as haſtened her death, by giving her enemies an opportunity of taking the blackeſt means for puſhing his fury againſt her to the higheſt pitch.

[m] Ibid. c. 10.

Mariamne's averſion to him.

HEROD, who had by this time floated near a year between the moſt violent affection and reſentment, had withdrawn himſelf into his chamber to reſt himſelf during the heat of the day; he ſent for her, and in the kindeſt manner invited her to lie down by him; but ſhe, inſtead of complying with this laſt requeſt, returned his careſſes with invincible ſcorn, upbraided him with all the other wrongs he had done to her and her family, and particularly the death of her father and brother, which ſo exaſperated that fierce monarch, that he was on the point of killing her with his own hands. Salome did not let this opportunity ſlip of putting her helliſh engines at work againſt that unfortunate princeſs: ſhe had corrupted the king's cup-bearer before-hand to be ready on the firſt call with one of the blackeſt accuſations againſt her; and now ſhe ſent him to Herod, with a poiſoned cup in one hand, and a ſum of money in the other, to acquaint him, that Mariamne had bribed him with the one to adminiſter the other to him. The rage this new accuſation threw him in, made him order one of her favourite eunuchs and confidents to be put to the rack; but all the confeſſion he could extort from him was, that he believed the cruel orders, he had lately left with Sohemus, had exaſperated that princeſs againſt him (M). Herod, enraged that a perſon, in whom he repoſed ſo great confidence, ſhould dare, in ſpight of his expreſs commands to the contrary, to diſcloſe ſo important a ſecret

She is falſely accuſed.

(M) The fourth book of the Maccabees (6) ſays, it was Joſeph, and nor Sohemus, that betrayed the ſecret, and that it was not

(6) ubi ſupra.

ſecret, was eaſily perſuaded that there muſt have been ſome criminal converſation between them, and therefore ordered that favourite to be put to immediate death. As for Mariamne, he reſolved to have her publicly tried, and having packed up a ſet of judges of his own creatures, he himſelf carried on the proſecution with ſuch violence, that they eaſily underſtood they muſt condemn her to death, though they all hoped and begged that he would not precipitate their ſentence, but confine her to ſome caſtle, till he had more maturely conſulted with his own heart. But Salome, who knew how apt her brother was to relapſe, and fearing ſome diſcovery might come out of her treachery to her, if her death ſhould be delayed, did at length obtain an order from him for her execution, under pretence, that the nation would riſe up in arms for her, if he ſuffered her to live any longer.

Tried and condemned to die.

MARIAMNE received the fatal ſummons with an heroic courage, becoming her exalted virtue and quality, and marched to the place of execution with incredible ſerenity, till an accident befel her, which put her conſtancy to the ſevereſt trial. Her mother, the turbulent intriguing Alexandra, who expected nothing but to follow her in a ſhort time, could think on no better expedient to avert the impending ſtorm, than by trying to ingratiate herſelf to Herod, by inſulting her unfortunate daughter all the way ſhe was led to the fatal place; and not contented to load her with the bittereſt of reproaches, for her ingratitude and faithleſſneſs to the beſt of huſbands, ſhe made ſeveral offers to ſtrike her and pull her by her hair. Mariamne bore all her pretended reſentment without betraying any other change in her countenance, than an inward ſhame at ſo baſe an artifice, which proved, however, far enough from ſucceeding, as the ſequel will preſently ſhew. Mariamne ſubmitted to her death with the ſame conſtancy and intrepidity as ſhe had lived [n], and with her ended all the happineſs of her tyrannic huſband.

Her death.

HEROD's rage being ſoon quenched with the blood of that amiable princeſs, his love broke out the more fiercely, and filled

Herod's remorſe.

[n] Ibid. c. 11.

not the eunuch, but Mariamne herſelf, who in a fit of reſentment upbraided the brutal king with it. But it is hardly probable, conſidering the puniſhment that ſhe had ſeen inflicted on Herod's uncle for the like diſcovery, that Mariamne would have expoſed either of theſe to the effects of his fury.

Beſides, we cannot ſuppoſe, that either Joſeph or Sohemus would have ventured to diſcloſe the matter to her, without ſome previous promiſe of ſecrecy, and Mariamne was a princeſs of too ſtrict virtue and honour to have broke it upon any account.

filled him with such pungent remorse, that his life became a burthen to him. He tried in vain to divert his grief with feastings and other diversions; Mariamne was still uppermost in his thoughts, he called aloud after her, and sometimes would order those of his attendance to fetch her to him. A grievous plague. Year of the flood 2971. Before Christ 28. grievous pestilence, which happened soon after and swept away multitudes of people of all ranks, added a fresh load to his misery, because it was universally looked upon as a just judgment on him for all the blood he had shed, and especially that of his injured queen. At first he withdrew himself into some of the neighbouring deserts, under pretence of hunting, but really to avoid the sight of men. At length being seized with a violent distemper in his bowels, he returned to Samaria, where his physicians tried in vain to give him some ease; their medicines did but encrease his pain, through his wilfulness and irregular living. His constitution did, however, get the better of his disease, but never could of his sour and brutish humour, to which he abandoned himself more and more, as he recovered his health and strength. He grew up at length to such a height of cruelty, that he spared neither friend nor foe in his fits of rage, and went on sacrificing numbers of his relations and best friends to his passion, even to the day of his death.

ALEXANDRA, the base and unnatural mother of the late virtuous Mariamne, was one of the very first that fell a victim to his rage after her injured daughter. The hopes of Herod's death, while he lay sick at Samaria, had made her set her wits to work to corrupt the governors of the two principal fortresses of Judæa, the one called Antonia near the temple, and the other in the city of Jerusalem, to deliver them up into her hands (N), together with Herod's children, pretending thereby to secure the kingdom for his sons by Mariamne in case of their father's death. But her restless and intriguing genius was so well known to those governors, that, instead of complying with her request, they informed the king

(N) These two fortresses were justly looked upon as as the two main keys of the kingdom, the one commanding the temple, and the other the city; so that it was of the utmost consequence to the candidates for the crown to be masters of them, or at least of the first of them; for the Jews had such an invincible attachment to the worship of the temple, that there was scarce any thing, even life itself, which they would not sacrifice to the liberty of coming to that sacred place, at all proper times and solemnities.

king with it, who ſent orders back to have her immediately put to death, which was accordingly done without further trial. The next was his brother-in-law Coſtobares, who was an Idumæan and had married Salome, after Herod had put her firſt huſband to death, as we have related above. This man, whom Herod had raiſed from an inferior rank (O) to the government of Idumæa, had juſtly incurred his diſpleaſure, by endeavouring to make himſelf and that province independent from him, and applying to Cleopatra for aſſiſtance. Herod would have put him to immediate death, had not Salome interpoſed; but ſhe, afterwards falling out with, and willing to get rid of, him, firſt ſent him a bill of divorce; and to juſtify that unlawful action to her brother (P), told him, that ſhe had diſcovered a treaſonable deſign, which was carried on by her huſband in conjunction with Lyſimachus, Doſitheus, and Antipater; and, as a proof of it, told him, that he privately kept the ſons of Babas (Q) under his protection, contrary to his expreſs commands; all which Herod having found true, he ordered them all to be put to death.

Alexandra put to death.

Salome divorces her huſband. Year of the flood 2973. Before Chriſt 26.

HEROD, having by this time rid himſelf of the Aſmonean race and of their moſt conſiderable partiſans, began now to ſhew

(O) He was deſcended from the antient prieſts of Choſe, a deity of the Idumæans, before they were forced by Hyrcan I. to embrace the Jewiſh religion.

This deiety is not unrightly ſuppoſed to be חוזה or ſeer, prophet or law-giver of the Hebrews (7); for if we may believe Epiphanius (8), both the Idumæans and Arabs of Arabia Petrea did worſhip Moſes, and paid divine honours to his ſtatue.

(P) According to the Moſaic law, the husbands alone were permitted to divorce their wives, but not the wife the Husband (9). However, Salome, relying on her brother's friendſhip and her own politic head, aſſumed that prerogative, which no Jewiſh woman, that we know of, had ever done before.

(Q) Theſe had been great ſticklers for the Aſmonean race, and at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the opening of the gates to Herod, for which that prince, upon his taking of the city, had given charge to Coſtobares to ſecure them; but he had let them eſcape, and had excuſed the matter to him; but Herod finding now that he had ſent them into an aſylum and maintained them there, he put their protector, and as many of them as he could find, to death.

(7) Calmet. Hiſt. vet. teſt. ſub A. M. 3976. (8) Hæreſ. 55. (9) Vid. Deuter. xxiv. 1, & ſeq. Matt. xix. 3, & ſeq. Mark x. 2, & ſeq. Maimon. de repud.

ſhew a greater diſregard to the Jewiſh religion than he had hitherto ventured to do, by aboliſhing ſeveral of its ceremonies, and introducing ſome foreign cuſtoms, which were forbidden by it. He began with building a ſtately theatre in the city, and a ſpacious amphitheatre in its ſuburbs, and ordered public games to be celebrated in them, every fifth year, in honour of Auguſtus; and, to draw the greater concourſe to them, he cauſed them to be proclaimed, not only in the neighbouring provinces, but in the moſt diſtant kingdoms, and promiſed magnificent prizes to thoſe that ſhould gain the victory. Beſides great numbers of the moſt expert muſicians, players, courſers, gladiators, &c. which he had ſent for thither, he cauſed alſo ſome of the fierceſt wild beaſts to be brought and fought upon the ſtage; all which did not a little diſpleaſe the zealous Jews, who thought it unlawful and inhuman to expoſe men to the fury of wild beaſts. But what exaſperated them moſt were, the trophies, with which he had cauſed thoſe ſumptuous places to be adorned, and which they, miſtaking for ſtatues, thought contrary to their law, which forbids all kinds of imagery, whether carved, or even painted. They therefore cried out againſt him, that he had profaned their city, and that they would never tamely bare ſuch idolatrous monuments to be ſet up in it. Herod tried in vain to undeceive them by fair ſpeeches; he was forced at length to lead ſome of the principal of them to the place, and to order the armour of the trophies to be taken down, and thereby to convince them, that there was nothing under them but bare poſts. This demonſtration did indeed ſatisfy them as to this one point, and turned their outcries into laughter; but the generality of the nation retained ſuch an averſion againſt him, upon the account of his other heatheniſh novelties, that they looked no longer upon him as a Jewiſh king, but as a heathen and a tyrant.

TEN of the boldeſt of them took it at laſt into their heads to enter the theatre with daggers hid under their cloaths, and either to ſtab the king or ſome of his retinue, not doubting but even their periſhing in the attempt would render the tyrant ſtill more odious. They were not miſtaken; for Herod being informed of their deſign by one of his ſpies, and cauſing the aſſaſſins to be put to a moſt excruciating death, the people were ſo exaſperated againſt the informer, that they cut and tore him to pieces, and caſt his fleſh to the dogs. Herod tried in vain to diſcover the authors of this affront; he was at laſt forced to order ſome women to be put to the rack, and to extort from them the names of the principal of them, whom

whom he caused likewise to be hurried to death, together with their innocent families. This last act of cruelty drove the Jews into such desperate hatred against him, that he expected nothing less than a general revolt; to prevent which he set about fortifying Jerusalem, rebuilding Samaria (R), and garrisoning several other fortresses in Judæa, whose situation was most likely to keep the country in awe [n], and whose names the reader may find at the end of the last note.

Samaria rebuilt. Year of the flood 2976, Before Christ 23.

About the same time, which was the thirteenth year of his reign, Judæa was visited with a grievous drought, which brought on a famine, and ended in a raging pestilence, of which great multitudes died daily for want of proper help and sustenance. Herod, whose treasury was exhausted, by building so many cities and fortresses, and whose finances were reduced to the lowest ebb, through the famine and death of his subjects, was forced to melt down all his plate, and to send it down into Egypt, to procure a fresh supply of provisions, in order to stop the mouths of the people, who, as is usual in Judæa visited with famine and pestilence.

[n] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 11.

(R) We took notice in a former section, that this city, which had been destroyed by Hyrcan, had been in part rebuilt by Gabinius governor of Syria, and called from him Gabiniana; but, he being soon after turned out, it advanced no higher than a good large village. Herod therefore chose to finish that work, and to restore that place to its pristine splendor; because, being but one day's journey, or thirty-five miles, distant from Jerusalem, he could easily make it a place of retreat, in case of necessity.

He adorned it with magnificent buildings, fortified it with walls and towers, and invited six thousand foreigners to come and settle there, who, finding the soil very fertile, became very rich in a short time. He gave it the name of Sebaste, which signifies the same in Greek as doth Augusta in Latin.

The other places which he fortified and garrisoned were, the tower of Straton, which he called Cæsarea, in honour of the emperor, and made it so strong, that it seemed to command the whole country. He built likewise another strong fortress in the midst of a plain, and put in it a garrison of horse. A third he built in Galilee, named Gabala, and a fourth in Esthmonitis in Perea; all which, being also well stored with arms and provisions, were a great check to the whole kingdom (11).

But he bestowed the most cost on his new Sebaste, to which he allowed a circuit of twenty stades, or two miles and a half. In the centre of it was a spacious square of about a stade and a half, and in the middle a stately temple. In a word, he spared no cost to render it one of the richest and most beautiful cities of his realm, and looked upon it as his favourite master-piece (12).

(11) Idem. ibid. (12) Antiq. l. xv. c. 13.

in such calamities, threw all the odium of them upon him. The drought having likewise killed such numbers of their cattle, that they had not wooll sufficient left to cloath themselves against the approaching winter, he took care also to procure a sufficient supply of it betimes; and Petronius, the Roman prefect then in Egypt, notwithstanding the multitudes of people who applied to him from other provinces for the same things, did so far befriend him, as to send him a sufficient quantity of them; which Herod caused to be immediately distributed among his subjects, but to the Jews preferably to any of the rest. This generosity did, for the present, change their hatred into admiration, and his praises were for a while the main subject of their discourse; but as he soon relapsed into his cruel and savage humour, so their love was soon turned into hatred again, which continued to his death. However, his prudent liberality having stored the country with plenty of corn, and the long drought being succeeded by more refreshing seasons, they began to cultivate their lands again, and found them, to their great comfort, restored to their former fecundity [o].

Relieved by Herod's generosity.

As soon as the land had recovered itself from the late calamity, Herod went on with his building (S), particularly his stately palace near the temple of Jerusalem, in which the gold, marble, cedar, and other precious materials, seemed to outvie one another. There were in it, among other apartments, two magnificent ones, to the one of which he gave the name of Augustus, and to the other that of Agrippa. At the same time he was not unmindful to ingratiate himself to the emperor, by more substantial services than building of places to his honour; for Gellius having been sent with [o] Ibid. c. 12.

(S) Amongst them, that of Cæsarea, mentioned in the last note, was the most magnificent next to Sebaste. He bestowed twelve years in the finishing and adorning of it. It stood on the coast of Phœnice, and was very convenient for trade, but had till then a very dangerous harbour, so that no ships could be safe in it when the wind was at south-west. Herod remedied this inconveniency at an immense labour and charge, and made it one of the most convenient havens on that coast. He beautified also the place with stately buildings. The reader may see in Josephus (13) a full account of this immense work, and of many others, in other places, erected by that prince; which, joined to his profuse munificence, justly gained him the surname of Great.

(13) Idem ibid.

with an army to attempt the conquest of Arabia, Herod failed not to send him very considerable succours, and among the rest five hundred of the stoutest of his guards; and though that enterprise proved unsuccessful to the Romans in a country where the air, water, and aliments, were as contrary to them as the temper of the people *, yet Herod's assistance proved so useful and seasonable to them, that Cæsar could not chuse being highly pleased with it [p].

This very year also he married another Mariamne, who was the daughter of a Jewish priest of Alexandria, named Simon the son of Boethus, and a woman of extraordinary beauty. To raise her father up to a condition fit for such an alliance, he placed him upon the pontifical chair, after having dispossessed Jesus, the son of Phabœus, of that dignity. Soon after these nuptials, he went and built the magnificent palace of Herodion, on the place where he had formerly defeated the Antigonians. The situation of it was so inviting (T), that the Jews and other people gladly came and built round it; so that from a palace it soon became a considerable city [q]. In a word, he spared no cost to leave every-where some monuments of his unmeasured magnificence, as well in Judæa as out of it; but with this difference, that those in Judæa were not adorned, as the rest were, with temples and other buildings, with statues and other carvings, which he knew the Jews would never have borne with any patience; but as for those which he built out of it, he gave himself all the scope which either his pride, or desire of pleasing the Romans, could inspire him with; for all which he had a salvo ready, namely, that he did in all this only obey, and even much against his will, the orders of the emperor, who had a right to command him.

By this time Herod seemed to be at the height of all his wishes; his being in such high esteem with Augustus made him either loved or feared by his subjects and neighbours; and therefore, that he might cultivate that prince's favour still Herod sends his two sons to Rome.

* De hoc. bell. vide Strabo l. xvi. [p] Ant. ubi supra, & bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 16. [q] Antiq. ubi supra, & l. xviii. c. 7. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 11, & 16. Vide & Plin. hist. l. v. c. 14.

(T) This stately building stood on a pleasant hill, about seven miles from Jerusalem, and had the prospect as well as command of all the country round about. The gradual declivity of it was no less beautiful. The reader may see it described, as well as the city, by the authors quoted above.

ſtill more, he ſent his two favourite ſons, whom he had by Mariamne, and who were grown up by this time, to be educated under his eye. Pollio, his intimate friend, was ordered to provide a ſtately houſe at Rome; but the emperor took that care off his hands, and aſſigned them apartments in his own palace; and ſo well pleaſed was he with the confidence which their father put in him, that he gave him full power to name which of them he pleaſed to be his ſucceſſor. He likewiſe added ſeveral provinces to his kingdom, whoſe names, as well as the occaſion of the gift, the reader will find in the margin (V). Zenodorus, from whom they had been Accuſed by Zenodorus.

(V) Theſe were the three diſtricts of Trachonitis, Auranitis or Iturea, and Batanea, which were ſituate between Libanus and Perea, on the other ſide of Jordan (14).

They were given to him on this occaſion; Zenodorus, tetrarch of a ſmall toparchy, had farmed theſe from Varro the then preſident of Syria, and ſuffered the inhabitants of it, who lived chiefly in rocks and caves, to make excurſions into all the neighbouring countries impunely. A complaint of this had been ſent by Varro to Auguſtus; upon which orders were brought back to him at any rate to extirpate thoſe robbers; and, for the more effectual doing of it, the emperor commanded him to take thoſe three toparchies from Zenodorus, and to put them under Herod, who, with his uſual ſucceſs, ſoon ferretted them out, and cleared the country of them.

Zenodorus, however, went to Rome to complain of the injuſtice done him in taking thoſe diſtricts from him; but the emperor, who had reaſon to ſuſpect that he had made a gain by protecting a vermin which he ought to have ſuppreſſed, would not ſo much as hear him.

Agrippa being ſoon after ſent into Syria, Herod went to meet him at Mitylene; and, ſoon after his return, Zenodorus, in hopes of meeting with better ſucceſs with him, ſtirred up the Gadarens to come and proffer ſundry grievous complaints againſt him. But he found the new governor too well rooted in Herod's intereſt to hear any accuſation againſt him; on the contrary, he ſent them bound to Jeruſalem, where Herod, hoping to gain them by fair uſage, ordered them to be ſet at liberty.

Zenodorus, thus diſappointed again, went and ſold the territories of Auranitis to the Arabs for fifty talents; ſo that a war was like to have enſued between Herod and them, they being deaf been taken, having tried in vain ſeveral ways to regain them from him, took the opportunity of the emperor's coming into Syria, to bring a deputation from the Gadarenes with him to Antioch, there to renew their complaints againſt Herod, and to accuſe him of oppreſſion, tyranny, and other ſuch crimes; and Auguſtus did ſeem to comply ſo far with their requeſt, that he ſet a day for Herod, who was there alſo, to make his defence before them; but, when he came to do it, the emperor betrayed ſuch viſible favour and partiality towards him, that his accuſers, fearing to be delivered up to his reſentment, choſe to diſpatch themſelves out of the world that very night; which they did, ſome by drowning, ſome by hanging themſelves, and other ſuch deſperate ways. Zenodorus in particular was ſo terrified by it, that he took a ſtrong doſe of poiſon, which quite corroded his bowels, and ended his life by the next morning [r].

(14) De his conf. Luc. iii. 1. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xvii. c. 7. St. Jerom. & Euſeb. loc. Hebr. & al.

And acquitted. Year of the Flood 2978. Before Chriſt 21.

AUGUSTUS, however ſtopped not his kindneſs here, but, looking upon the deſperate exit of Herod's accuſers as a proof of his innocence and merit, appointed him his procurator in Syria, and forbid his governor there to undertake any thing without his knowledge and advice. At the ſame time Herod took this favourable opportunity to obtain a tetrarchy for his brother Pheroras, that he might live according to his birth, and without depending on his ſucceſſor's favour after his death (W). In acknowledgment for all theſe gifts, Herod, having accompanied the emperor to the ſea-port, built a ſumptuous temple in honour of him, all of fine white marble, near the Panium, or place whence the Jordan has its origin †. The vaſt number of edifices he built, and adorned with carvings and other imagery, which the Jews looked upon as deſtructive of religion and good manners, did ſo exaſperate them againſt him, that he was forced to remit them a third deaf to all his offers for ending the diſpute in an amicable way (15), when Auguſtus's coming in a lucky time decided the controverſy in his favour, as has been ſeen above.

(W) Joſephus does not tell us where this tetrarchy was ſituate; but, by what we find in another place (16), it ſeems to have been beyond Jordan, and at ſome diſtance from Jeruſalem.

[r] Antiq. l. xv. c. 13.

† De hoc vide ſupra, vol. iii. p. 125, (S), & p. 126.

(15) Vide Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 13.

(16) Ibid. l. xvii. c. 5.

a third part of their yearly tribute. His pretence indeed was, that the laſt grievous dearth, which had greatly impoveriſhed the land, required this largeſs from him; but, at the bottom, it was the murmurs and private meetings of the people, which were now more frequent than ever, that extorted it from him, in hopes that it would in ſome meaſure allay the fourneſs of their ſpirits. However, to let them ſee, that he was neither inſenſible of their mutinous cabals, nor afraid to put a ſtop to them, he iſſued out an edict, expreſly forbidding all public and private aſſemblies, whether on account of feaſts, or any other pretence, under the ſevereſt penalties. But as he not only had his ſpies every-where, but did ſometimes mix himſelf among them in diſguiſe, he quickly found all theſe precautions were like to prove to little purpoſe to keep the people in obedience. This made him bethink himſelf of exacting an oath of fidelity from them; but this new impoſition was ſo ſtrenuouſly refuſed by Pollio, or Hillel, and Shamai, at the head of the whole ſect of Eſſenians, and by all the chiefs of the Phariſees, that he was forced to ſet it aſide, without venturing to ſhew any reſentment againſt thoſe that had oppoſed him in it, for fear of exaſperating the whole nation againſt him [s].

Propoſes the rebuilding of the temple.

He fell ſoon after upon a much better expedient to quiet them, and at the ſame time to ſatiefy his invincible itch of eterniſing his memory, by the number and magnificence of his buildings. The great attachment which they had for their temple made him conceive the hopes, that his rebuilding of it, in a more ſtately manner, would not fail to recommend him, not only to the preſent Jews, but alſo to poſterity. The difficulty was, to convince them of his being both willing and able to rear ſuch a coſtly edifice, after he had pulled down the old one; and this he did in a ſet ſpeech, which he made to their aſſembly, wherein, with his uſual eloquence, he failed not to diſplay his zeal for the glory of God and for the promoting of his religion. Among other things he reminded them how vaſtly inferior that ſacred place now was to that which had been formerly built by Solomon (X); but this, he told them, was rather to be imputed

[s] Antiq. ubi ſupra.

(X) Joſephus makes him ſay here (17), that the preſent temple was lower by fifty cubits than that of Solomon; which cannot be underſtood of the holy place, which we are

(17) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 14.

puted to the want of ability in thoſe that returned from Babylon, than to their want of zeal; but now that God was pleaſed not only to raiſe him to the Jewiſh throne, but to bleſs him with peace, plenty, affluence, and with the friendſhip of the Romans, he thought himſelf bound to make ſome ſignal acknowledgment to him for all theſe bleſſings, and hoped, that the rebuilding of his temple in the manner he propoſed, could not but be acceptable both to him and them; but as he found them very much heſitating at the difficulty, length, and expenſiveneſs of ſuch a work, he was forced to engage not to move a ſtone from the old edifice, till he had prepared all the materials for the new. As ſoon as he had gained their conſent (Y), he ſet immediately ten thouſand workmen to work, under the direction of a thouſand prieſts the beſt ſkilled in carving, maſonry, &c. all whom he kept are told (18), was but thirty cubits high; whereas that built after the captivity, was, by Cyrus's own grant, ſixty cubits high (19). If therefore there be no miſtake crept into the text, both Herod and the Jewiſh hiſtorians muſt probably ſpeak of ſome of the galleries, which might be ſo much higher in the firſt than in the ſecond temple. The reader may recur to what we have ſaid on the ſubject at the beginning of this †, and in the appendix in the fourth volume.

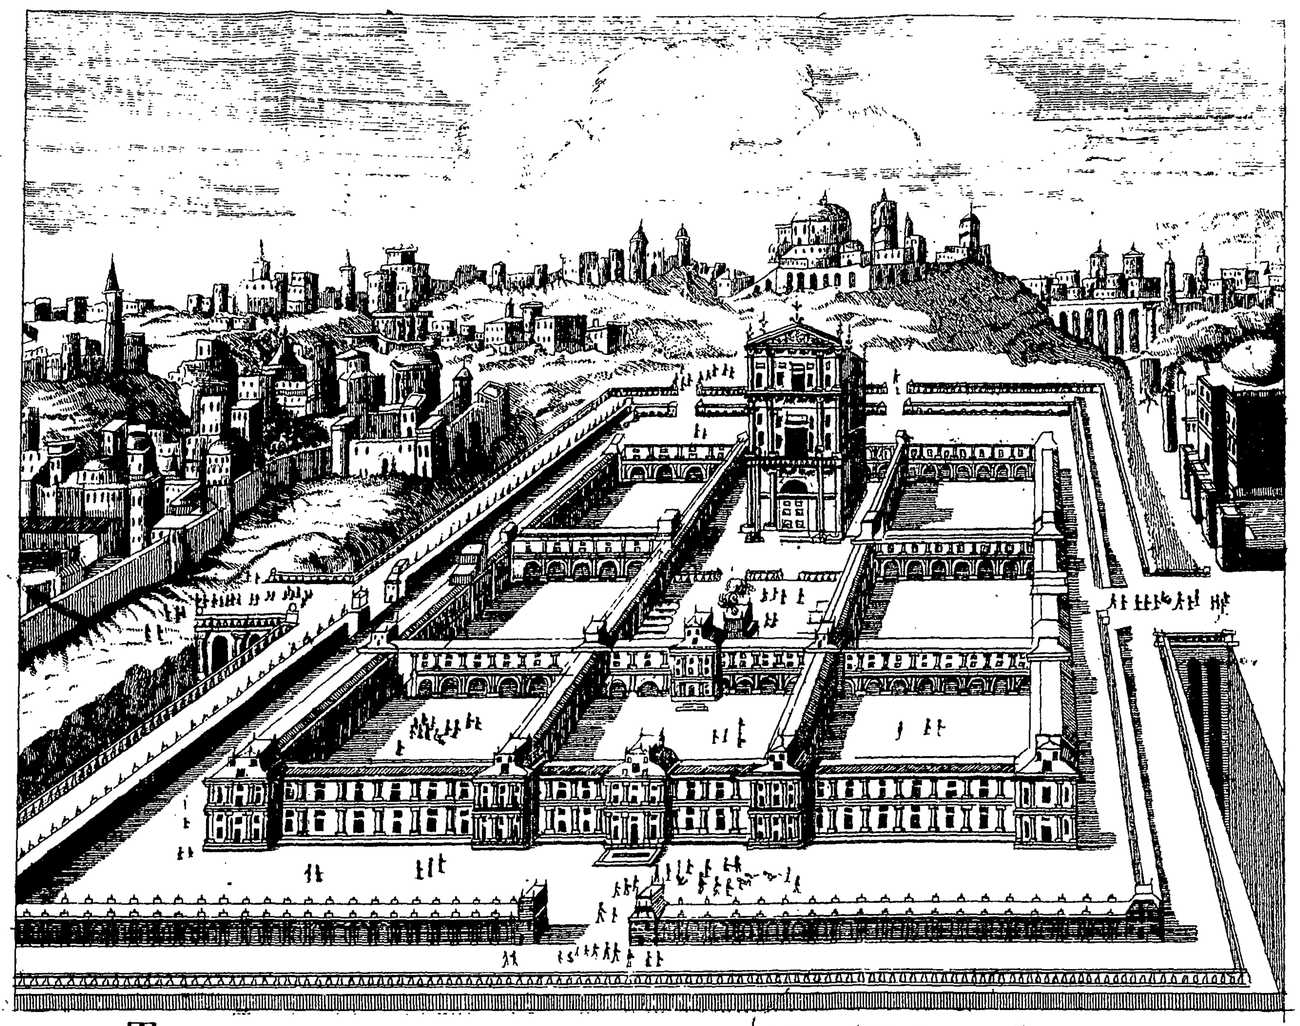
(Y) This aſſembly ſeems to have been held about the time of the Eaſter ſolemnity, when there was the greateſt concourſe of Jews at Jeruſalem; for Joſephus ſays it was in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign; that is, as the learned Uſher obſerves, reckoning from the death of Antigonus (20), which hapened not till about the midſummer after his impriſonment; according to which reckoning the nineteenth year of Herod not beginning till the nineteenth year before Chriſt, the ſix firſt months muſt have belonged to the eighteenth year of his reign, which brings it to the paſſover feaſt above-mentioned (21). We muſt not, however, look upon this building as a new temple, as diſtinct from that of Zerubbabel, as that was from that of Solomon, but rather as the ſame rebuilt, enlarged, and adorned, upon the old foundation and with the ſame materials, as far as they could go. The very Jews themſelves ſtill looked upon it as the ſecond temple, and that which was to exceed that of Solomon in glory, by the preſence of the Meſſiah, according to the prophecy of Haggai; but, as we cannot enlarge on this ſubject, we ſhall refer the curious reader to the elaborate preface of Conſtantine l' Empereur, prefixed to his comment on the book of Middoth, where he will find that point diſcuſſed to his ſatisfaction.

(18) 1 Kings vi. 2. (19) Ezra vi. 3. † See p. 13. (K). (20) Annal. ſub. A. M. 3987. (21) Vid. Prid. connect. ſub. A. C. 19.

under his pay. One thouſand carts were likewiſe employed in fetching all the materials; and, in a word, ſuch a number of hands was employed and ſuch expedition uſed, that he got every thing ready within the ſpace of two years, after which they ſet about pulling down the old building, and with the ſame diſpatch rearing the new one; ſo that the holy place, or temple properly ſo called, was finiſhed in a year and a half's time; during which, we are told [t], it never rained in the day-time, but only in the night. The remainder took up a little above eight years, by which time it was, if not wholly finiſhed (Z), yet made fit for divine ſervice, according to the king's firſt deſign. The temple, properly ſo called, or holy place, was but ſixty cubits high, and as many in breadth; but in the front he added two wings or ſhoulders, which projected twenty cubits more on each ſide; which made a front of one hundred and twenty cubits in length, and as many in heighth, with a gate ſeventy cubits high and twenty in breadth, but open and without any doors [u]. The ſtones were white marble, twenty-five cubits in length, twelve in heighth, and nine in breadth, all wrought and poliſhed with exquiſite beauty, the whole reſembling a ſtately palace, whoſe middle being conſiderably raiſed above the extremities of each face, made

The building finiſhed with wonderous ſpeed and magnificence.

[t] Ibid. c. ult. [u] Bell. Judaic. l. vi. c. 6.



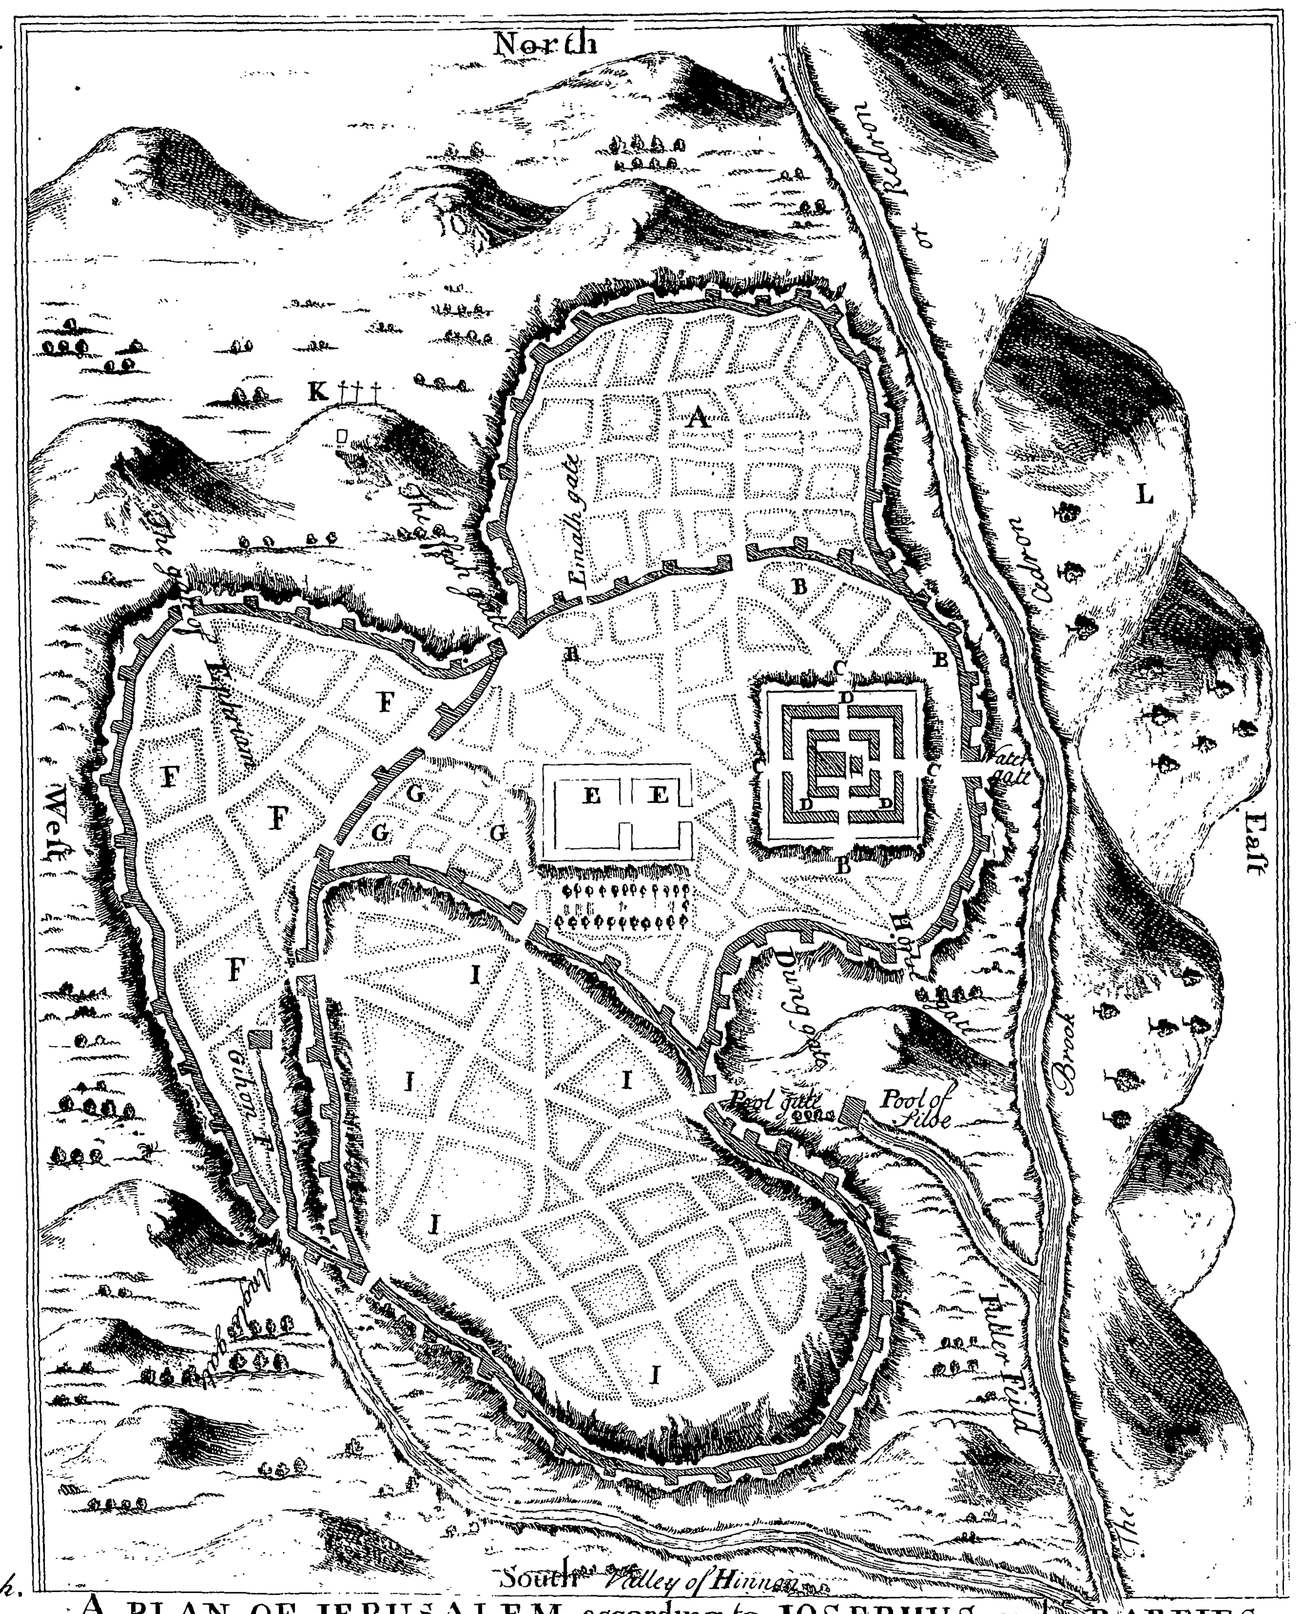
(Z) Joſephus ſhews us in another place (22), that the whole was ſtill continued till the beginning of the Jewiſh war under Gellius Florus, when eighteen thouſand workmen being diſmiſſed and like to be idle, the Jews, unwilling their treaſure ſhould be laid up to become a prey to the Romans, petitioned the king (Agrippa) to build the eaſtern porch, which incloſed the moſt outward parts of the temple; but the king having refuſed their ſuit, thoſe men, for want of work, began to raiſe thoſe ſeditions which haſtened the deſtruction both of the city and temple; ſo that it is plain, ſome part of that building had been ſtill carried on till this time.

And hence that ſaying of the Jews to Chriſt, Forty and ſix years hath this temple been hitherto building; for ſo the text ought to be read, according to the import of the aoriſt there uſed by the evangeliſt (23); and indeed ſo long a time had elapſed, from the beginning of the building to the firſt paſſover after Chriſt had entered into his miniſtry, at which time the Jews were objecting this to him (24).

(22) Vide Antiq. l. xx. c. 8. (23) John ii. 20. (24) Vide Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3987.

THE JEWISH PRIEST ON THE DAY OF EXPIATION.

THE ELEVATION OF THE TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM.



THE JEWISH HIGH PRIEST IN HIS PONTIFICAL HABIT.

THE GOLDEN CANDLESTIC.

A. The new City built by the Maccabees.
B. The City of David.
CC. Mount Moriah.
DD. The Temple.
EE. The royal Palace.
FF. A new part of ye City built since Manasseh.

A PLAN OF JERUSALEM according to JOSEPHUS and y RABBIES.

THE BRASEN LAVER.

GG. The Fortress Millo.
II. The old City anciently called Jebus.
K. Mount Calvary.
L. The Mount of Olives.

P. Simms Sculpt

A VIEW OF THE INNER PORCH, ALTER &c. ON THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES. de quo vid pag 09

The old City anciently called Jebus.
Mount Calvary.
The Mount of olives.

quo vid pag 99

made it afford a beautiful viſto at a great diſtance to thoſe that came to that metropolis (A). Inſtead of doors, the gates cloſed with very coſtly veils, enriched with variety of flowering of gold, ſilver, purple, and every thing that was rich and curious; and on each ſide of the gates were planted two ſtately columns, from whoſe corniſhes did hang gold feſtoons, and vines, with their cluſters of grapes, leaves, &c. curiouſly wrought. As for the galleries that ſurrounded this ſacred place, the porticoes, towers, courts, and other embelliſhments of it, we do not deſign to ſwell this ſection with them, but give a ſhort ſketch of them in the margin (B), and refer

 our

(A) This ſuperſtructure, which was probably reared on the old foundation, without ſufficient additions to it, proved as Joſephus tells us (25), too heavy for it, and ſunk down about twenty cubits; ſo that it was reduced to the heighth of one hundred. A project was ſet on foot for raiſing it a gain to its former heighth in Nero's time; but, upon ſome account or other, it was ſet aſide.

(B) We have already ſpoken in a former volume † of the fonndations of this ſtupendous work, ſome of whoſe walls were raiſed from the deep valley beneath, to the heighth of three hundred cubits and upwards, and ſome of the ſtones of it forty cubits long, all faſtened to each other with lead and iron, to be proof againſt time, wind, and weather. The platform was a regular ſquare of a ſtade or furlong on each ſide; and in that deſcription we gave of the ſuperſtructure*; we confined ourſelves to what the ſacred writers had ſaid of it, without introducing the vaſt additions that had been made ſince by Herod and his ſucceſſors.

Since then we have two accounts of Herod's temple, the one written by Joſephus (26), who had been a curious viewer of it; the other by Jehudah Hakkodeſh (27), the compiler of the Talmud, above one hundred and twenty years after its deſtuction by the Romans. From theſe the authors quoted in the margin (28) have reared each their ſeparate edifices, diſpoſed, beautified, and adorned them more by the ſtrength of their imagination, than by any ſuperior knowledge they had of the authors they copied from; though with reſpect to even theſe, whoever conſiders their ſwollen ſtyle, will be apt to look upon their accounts of that building, rather as panegyrics, than hiſtorical deſcrip-

ons

(25) Antiq. ubi ſupra. † Vol. iv. p. 60, (I). * Appen. in Vol iv. p. 184, & ſeq. (26) Ibid. & bell. Judaic. l. vi. c. 6. & alib. paſſ. (27) Miſhna Jeph Middoth. (28) Villalpand. Capell. L'empereur, Grot. Le Clerc, Lamy, Prideaux, Whiſton, Calmet, & al. mult.

our readers for a fuller account to Josephus, the Talmud, and to such other writers, as have been at the pains of compiling their several descriptions from them.

WHILST

tions of it. However, if either is to be preferred to the other, Josephus, who had both seen it and described it soon after, if not before, its destruction, when he might have been contradicted, by numbers, who had viewed it as well as he, is certainly more to be credited than the Talmudists, who wrote so long after, and when they were sure there was none left to gain-say them. From him therefore we shall endeavour to give the best and shortest sketch and plan of that stately work, which is as follows:

Each front of this square, which, as we hinted above, was a furlong long, had a spacious gate or entrance, enriched with suitable ornaments; but that on the west had four gates, the one of which led to the palace, the next to the city, and the two others to the suburbs and fields. This inclosure was surrounded on the outside with a strong and high wall of large stones, well cemented; and on the inside had, on each front, a stately piazza or gallery, supported by columns of such bigness, that three men could but just embrace them, their circumference being about twenty-seven feet. There were in all, one hundred and sixty-two of them, which supported a cedar ceiling of exquisite workmanship, and formed three galleries, the middlemost of which was the largest and highest, it being forty-five feet in breadth and one hundred in heighth; whereas those on each side were but thirty feet wide and fifty in heighth.

The piazzas and court were paved with marble of various colours; and at a small distance from the galleries was a second inclosure, surrounded with a flight of beautiful marble rails, with stately columns at proper distances, on which were engraven certain admonitions in Greek and Latin, to forbid strangers, and those Jews that were not purified, to proceed further under pain of death. This inclosure had but one gate on the east-side, none on the west, but on the north and south it had three, placed at equal distances from each other.

A third inclosure surrounded the temple, properly so called, and the altar of burnt-offerings, and made what they called the court of the Hebrews or Israelites. It was square like the rest; but the wall on the outside was surrounded by a flight of fourteen steps, which hid a considerable part of it; and on the top was a terrace of about twelve cubits in breadth, which went quite round the whole cincture. The east side had but one gate, the west none, and the north and south four, at equal distances. Each gate was ascended to by five steps more, before one could reach the level of the inward court; so that the wall which inclosed it appeared within to be but twenty-five cubits high, tho' considerably

Herod goes to Rome.

WHILST the work of the temple was carrying on with ſuch ſurpriſing expedition, as raiſed the admiration of the Jews, Herod made a voyage to Rome, to pay his compliments to the emperor, and a paternal viſit to his two ſons. Perhaps alſo he did chuſe this time to be out of the hearing of ſome of the murmurings, which the zealous Jews raiſed againſt a law which he had lately made, to ſuppreſs the frequent incurſions and robberies which were committed in Judæa. By this law, it ſeems, he condemned every man that was found breaking through the walls of any houſe, to be ſold for a ſlave into foreign countries; and this had greatly diſpleaſed the nation, becauſe, contrary to that of Moſes, it made their ſlavery perpetual; whereas, had they been only ſold among their brethren, the ſabbatic or the jubilee year would have put an end to it. Another objection raiſed againſt that law was, that thoſe ſlaves would, in all likelihood, be tempted to forſake the Jewiſh religion and turn idolaters; upon which account it was ſtill more univerſally exclaimed rably higher on the outſide. On the inſide of each of thoſe gates were raiſed a couple of ſpacious ſquare chambers, in form of a pavilion, thirty cubits wide and forty in heighth, each ſupported by columns of twelve cubits circumference.

Makes a ſevere law againſt robbers.

This incloſure had likewiſe a double flight of galleries on the inſide, ſupported by a double row of columns; but the weſtern ſide was only one continued wall, without gates or galleries. The women had likewiſe their particular courts ſeparate from that of the men, and one of the gates on the north and ſouth leading to it.

The altar of burnt-offerings was likewiſe high and ſpacious, being forty cubits in breadth and fifteen in heighth. The aſcent to it was, according to the Moſaic law †, ſmooth and without ſteps, and the altar of unhewn ſtones. It was ſurrounded at a convenient diſtance round about with a low wall or rail, not above a cubit in heighth, which divided the court of the prieſts from that of the lay Iſraelites; ſo that theſe laſt were allowed to come thus far to bring their offerings and ſacrifices; but none but the prieſts were allowed to come within that incloſure. The reader will more eaſily underſtand this deſcription by the plan here ſubjoined, to which we have referred all the particulars under each paragraph by proper references.

All that needs be added here is, that Herod cauſed a new dedication of the whole to be performed with the utmoſt magnificence, and preſented to it many rich trophies of his former victories, after the cuſtom of the Jewiſh monarchs (29).

† Exod. xx. 25, 26. (29) Antiq. l. xv. c. ult. Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 16. l. vi. c. 6. & alib. paſſ.

againſt [x]. It is therefore likely, that Herod, who reſolved at any rate to ſuppreſs thoſe robbers, got out of the way, that he might not be importuned to repeal it. On his arrival at Rome (C), Auguſtus received him with all the marks of friendſhip, entertained him in the moſt ſumptuous manner, and delivered his ſons to him. Herod, could not but be highly pleaſed to behold them ſo greatly improved under the care of that emperor. He acknowledged the favour in terms, and by preſents, anſwerable to the high ſenſe he had of the obligation, and, after a ſhort ſtay, took the two young princes with him back into Judæa. Here they were received with the loudeſt acclamations of the people, who could not forbear admiring their majeſtic port and behaviour, which, joined to the excellent education they had received in Italy, had rendered them in all reſpects truly accompliſhed princes. He married them ſoon after to ſuitable matches; Alexander to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and Ariſtobulus to Berenice, the daughter of his ſiſter Salome [y].

Marries his two ſons.

But the admiration and love which the people expreſſed for thoſe two excellent princes, failed not to raiſe the envy and jealouſy of the reſtleſs Salome, and of thoſe of her accomplices, who had forwarded the death of Mariamne, as they had reaſon more than enough to fear their avenging that princeſs's death. To prevent ſo juſt and ſad a cataſtrophe, they had recourſe to their vile artifices, which had ſucceeded ſo well againſt that innocent princeſs. They began with ſpreading reports abroad, that the two young princes could not endure their father, whom they looked upon as ſtill reeking with the blood of their mother; not doubting, but when the rumour reached that jealous monarch's ears, it would inevitably render them obnoxious to him, and haſten their

[x] Antiq. l xvi. c. 1. [y] Ibid. c. 2.

(C) Joſephus adds, that, in his way to Rome, he had the curioſity to ſtop at Elias to ſee the ſolemnity of the CXCIſt olympiad; and that the poverty of the Elians having ſunk the pomp and ſplendor of thoſe games, he ſettled a conſtant revenue on them, in order to reſtore them to their antient luſtre (30).

The like piece of generoſity he ſhewed to the Chians, for whom he paid a large ſum, which they were indebted to Cæſar's receivers; after which he gave them another ſum to rebuild their porticoes, which had been demoliſhed in the wars (31).

(30) Antiq. l. xvi. c. 9. Bell. Judaic. l. 1. c. 16. (31) Antiq l. xvi. c. 3.

their ruin. In the mean time Agrippa being come to Aſia Proper, Herod went to invite him into Judæa, where having ſhewed him his new-built cities of Sebaſte, Alexandrion, Cæſarea, &c. he thence led him to Jeruſalem. There the people met them at ſome diſtance from that metropolis, in their feſtival dreſs, and conducted them with loud acclamations into the city, where his reception was ſuitable to the magnificence of his hoſt. Agrippa, having ſacrificed a whole hecatomb at the temple, was forced to depart ſooner than he would otherwiſe have done, by reaſon of the approaching winter, and Herod failed not to load him and his retinue with ſuitable preſents, whilſt the people accompanied him with loud huzzas, and ſtrewed the way with flowers and odoriferous herbs where-ever he paſſed; inſomuch, that that prince did ever after take a particular delight in expreſſing the pleaſure of that journey, and extolling the magnificence of the temple and royal palace, and of the preſtly ornaments, the ſtately buildings, and generoſity of Herod. Philo adds, that he made the Jews ſome conſiderable preſents, and did every thing he could to oblige them, without hurting the intereſt of their king. On the ſpring following, Agrippa ſailing with his fleet to the Boſphorus, was agreeably ſurprized with Herod's coming to meet him with another at Leſbos, wherein he had brought him ſome conſiderable reinforcements of men, arms, and proviſions; all which did ſo endear him to that prince, that he never undertook any thing without his knowledge and advice, nor ſcarce any party of pleaſure without his company [z].

Agrippa's ſplendid reception in Judæa. Year of the flood 2984. Before Chriſt 15.

On his return to Jeruſalem, he aſſembled the Jews, and acquainted them with the ſucceſs of his arms and thoſe of Agrippa againſt the Boſphorans. He added, in order to leſſen their diſcontent, that he remitted the nation a fourth part of their tribute; which made them ſome ſatisfaction for the late murmurings, which his law againſt robbers had occaſioned [a]. But whilſt things went thus ſmoothly on in his kingdom, his family was plagued with inteſtine jars, occaſioned by the hatred which Salome bore to his two worthy ſons. The truth is, they ſpake both of her and of her brother Pheroras in ſuch reſenting terms, as made them dread ſomething worſe from them. They even ventured to complain ſometimes of the injuſtice done to their mother, and in their behaviour ſhewed ſo little tenderneſs towards their father, that Salome found found it an easy matter to alienate his affection from them. To suppress in some measure the presumption of the two brothers, Herod caused Antipater, another of his sons (D), whom he had till then educated in a private manner, to be brought to court, where he heaped such caresses on him, as only rendered him more obnoxious to them, and them more indiscreet in their speeches against their father, all which were still carried back to him, and very often aggravated; whilst Antipater, wholly employed to cultivate a good understanding with him, was careful never to let a word slip even against his two brothers, tho' he had taken care to place such about him as should do it more effectually.

[z] Ibid & c. 3. Vide & Philo. legat. ad Cai. p. 1033. [a] Antiq. ibid. c. 5.

AMONG many other marks of Herod's affection to this new favourite son (E), he obtained of Agrippa the favour of his accompanying him to Rome, and of his being presented by him to the emperor; so that by this time every one began to look upon him as his father's successor. Antipater set out accordingly; but, to prevent his two rivals regaining their fathers favour during his absence, he ceased not, both by his letters and by his agents, to turn his heart against them, till at length he began to look upon them as his enemies, and resolved to take them with him to Rome, and there to try them at Cæsar's tribunal [b]. Cæsar being gone by that time to Aquileia, Herod came to him, and there accused his two sons of high treason, and required justice against them in such strong terms, as extorted a flood of tears from them; after which Alexander pleaded his own and his brother's cause with such becoming modesty, as easily convinced both the emperor and the audience of their innocence. Augustus did, in a genteel manner, reprove Herod for his too rash belief, and reconciled them together; but it was not likely this peace should be long-lived. Herod was too jealous, his sons too indiscreet, and their enemies too cunning and indefatigable, not to give cause for fresh dissensions. Herod himself laid the foundation for a new and dangerous one, by a speech which he Herod accuses his two sons of high treason before Augustus.

Returns to Jerusalem.

[b] Ibid. c. 6, & 7.

(D) This last son he had by another wife, whom Josephus calls Doris (32), and the fourth book of the Maccabees (33) Dosithea.

(E) One of which was, that he recalled his mother, whom he had repudiated to marry Mariamne, the high-priest's daughter.

(32) Ibid. c. 4. (33) Cap. ult.

he made to the Jewiſh aſſembly upon his being returned with his ſons to Jeruſalem; for there having acquainted them with his ſucceſs at Rome, he declared to them, that it was indeed his intention that his ſons ſhould reign after his death, and not till then, Antipater firſt, and then Alexander, and laſtly Ariſtobulus (F); but that, whilſt he lived, he did not think fit to part with the reins of government. This was indeed caſting a bone of diſcord among his ſons, and ſo it proved in the ſequel [c].

Cæſarea finiſhed. Year of the flood 2989. Before Chriſt 10.

By this time the city of Cæſarea, which had been twelve years in building, being finiſhed, Herod cauſed the dedication of it to be performed with the greateſt pomp and ſplendor, and appointed games to be performed in it with the utmoſt ſolemnity every fifth year. Julia, the emperor's wife, or, as the Jewiſh hiſtorian always calls her, Livia, contributed towards the ſplendidneſs of thoſe ſports five hundred talents out of her own coffers; and Herod entertained his gueſts there, who were very conſiderable both in quality and number, with ſurpriſing magnificence; inſomuch, that Auguſtus ſaid of him, That his ſoul was too great for his kingdom; and that he deſerved to have been king of all Syria and Egypt. Beſides the city of Cæſarea, which, by reaſon of its beauty, pleaſant ſituation, and commodious harbour, became in time the reſidence of the Roman procurators, he built alſo thoſe of Antipatris, in honour of his father; of Cypron, in honour of his mother, and Phaſaelis, in honour of his brother: beſides ſeveral other towers and caſtles of prodigious ſize and ſtrength [d]. On the next year the Jews of Aſia and Cyrene, having been greatly oppreſſed by the Greeks, eſpecially on account of their religion and cuſtoms, ſent a deputation to Auguſtus, and obtained an effectual redreſs from that emperor. The purport of [c] Ibid. c. 8. [d] Antiq. ibid. c. 9, & ſeq.

(F) During his ſtay at Rome, Auguſtus had, it ſeems, not only renewed his former grant to him of appointing any of his ſons to be his ſucceſſor, but had likewiſe given him the further liberty of dividing the kingdom amongſt them in what proportion he ſhould think fit.

He had likewiſe granted him one half of the revenue of the mines of Cyprus, and had appointed him his overſeer of the other half. Several other rich preſents were alſo interchanged between thoſe two monarchs, which ſhewed their great intimacy to each other (34).

(34) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 8.

of his decree in their favour the reader may see in the margin (G).

HEROD might have viewed, with no small pleasure, both himself and the whole Jewish nation respected and protected by the emperor and senate on the one hand, and by his friend Agrippa on the other; but his domestick jars, which daily encreased by the hellish machinations of his brother and sister, and the emptiness of his coffers, which he had exhausted by his profuseness in buildings and feasts, made him too wretched to taste any pleasure in other things. To remove these two corroding sores, he betook himself to remedies more desperate than the disease. To supply his present necessities, he cast his eyes on the tombs of David and Solomon, out of which he had heard, or pretended to have heard, that Hyrcan had formerly drawn some large sums; and those places, he thought, would prove a lasting fund for his extravagant expences. We shall not repeat what we have observed heretofore concerning this pretended theft of the Maccabitish pontiff †. All we shall add with respect to Herod is, that he executed his design with the utmost privacy, and went to the place in the night, accompanied only with some few confidents, where, instead of the coined gold and silver he expected, he found only some quantity of rich vessels, curiously Herod plunders David's sepulchre.

† Vide supra, p. 196, (M).

(G) That they should be allowed to live according to their laws, and with the same privileges as they had enjoyed under the late Cæsar and Hyrcan; that their temple at Jerusalem should still receive their yearly tribute towards the repairs and worship of it; that the Jews should not be obliged to appear at the courts of judicature on the eve of the sabbath after the ninth hour, (answering to three after noon) nor on the sabbath; lastly, that whosoever should lay hands either on the temple tribute, or on any of the sacred books of the Jews, should be punished as for a sacrilege, and all his goods should be confiscated to the Roman commonwealth.

This decree was ordered to be set up in a public place at Ancyra, which had been dedicated by the whole people of Asia to the honour of that monarch (35).

King Agrippa made much such another decree in their favour, and ordered, that whoever stole any of the sacred treasure, or Jewish books, and took sanctuary in any temple or asylum, should be torn thence, and delivered up to the Jews, to be punished by them (36).

(35) Ibid. c. 10. (36) Idem ibid.

riously wrought, which he caused to be carried off. Not content with these, he ventured farther, to search into the very coffins of the dead monarchs; but some sudden damp, or, as Josephus calls it, a miraculous flame, which consumed two of his guards, having scared him and his retinue, put a stop to his further search. Herod, to make some satisfaction for his sacrilege, caused a stately monument of white marble to be erected at the entrance of the sepulchre [c]; but this was looked upon by the Jews rather as a monument of his crime, than an expiation of it.

His cruelty to his sons.

But his cruelty to his sons and their friends rendered him still more abhorred. His vile sister (H) had raised his jealousy against them to such a height, that he acted more like a furious tyrant, than a father or king, filling the city with blood, and turning his own palace into a slaughter-house. Alexander had been accused to him of having corrupted, by dint of presents and promises, two of his favourite confidents, namely, his high-steward and cup-bearer. Herod ordered them immediately to be put to the rack; whereon they confessed their having indeed received some presents from that prince; but denied his having betrayed to them any ill design against the king. This confession not satisfying his jealousy, they were tortured afresh, and again, till he had extorted enough from them to justify his sending his son to prison and loading him with irons. Here the young prince being grown desperate,

[c] Antiq. ibid. c. 11.

(H) One of her hellish projects, and which cost her dear, was, to get Pheroras to tell young Alexander, that the king was become so desperately in love with his wife Glaphyra, that nothing but his forcing her from him could satisfy his unruly passion. Alexander taking it for granted, went to his father, and, in the humblest manner, mixed with a flood of tears, expostulated the matter with him. Herod, surprised at such a black accusation, of which he was wholly innocent, sent for his brother, and asked him, How he could lay such a black perfidy to his charge?

Pheroras threw all the blame on his sister, and pretended she was the person who had whispered the thing to him. Salome, being sent for, denied the whole with her usual assurance; but the king reading her guilt in her looks, in spite of her protestations to the contrary, caused her and her brother to be banished the court, and highly commended his son's moderation; but all this good understanding was soon after dashed by a more hellish accusation, which they brought against that young prince, and which we are going to relate.

Alexander's desperate confession.

rate, sent his father four different confessions, in which he owned all, and more, than the torture had extorted from the other two; and at the same time accused Salome and Pheroras, with two of the king's prime ministers and favourites, of being all alike concerned in the plot; and particularly that Salome had even ventured to come to him in the dead of night, and, lying down by him, had used many cogent arguments to convince him, that they must expect neither peace nor happiness, till they had rid themselves of the tyrant [f].

This accusation, which was only calculated to set all on fire, had the desired effect; and the jealous king, not knowing whom to trust to, flew into the greatest excesses of cruelty. There was to be nothing now heard of but racks, imprisonments, and dreadful executions abroad, whilst the tyrant was so tormented with fears at home, that he often started out of his bed, as if pursued sword in hand by his sons and their accomplices. Thus it was hourly expected, when these fits of rage and dread would have run him mad, or hastened his son's execution, when Archelaus king of Cappadocia came in a lucky minute, (I), and, by his interposition, settled a calm again, at least for a time. This discreet prince, who knew the violence of Herod's temper, began at first with pitying his sad condition, and condemning the unnatural perfidy of his son, threatening to take his daughter from him, and to leave him to his father's just resentment; but, in the end, he had the address, by degrees, to explode all these malicious accusations and extorted confessions, and not only to persuade him that his son was innocent of any design upon his life or kingdom, but even to make him turn intercessor in his behalf. Pheroras, hearing of this reconciliation, found no better expedient to obtain Herod's pardon, than by coming in a mourning dress, and, at his feet, confessing himself the [f] Ibid c. 12.

(I) We have already taken notice, that he was the father of Glaphyra. whom Alexander had married. This prince, who was of a prudent and cool temper, had received Herod and his sons in their return from Rome, where they had been acquitted by the emperor, and, by his wise counsels, had finished that reconciliation which Augustus had begun.

But being now informed to what height of cruelty things were carried at Jerusalem, he thought himself obliged to come thither, and to use his best endeavours to settle peace in that monarch's family.

the author of all the ſlanders raiſed againſt the two princes. Herod, thus reconciled to his ſons, ſet out with them for Rome, to acquaint the emperor with the whole affair, after having accompanied Archelaus as far as Antioch in his way homewards [g]. He was indeed under an obligation to go and clear his ſon at the Roman court, becauſe he had, after their ſecond falling out, exhibited ſeveral grievous complaints againſt him to the emperor.

Reconciled to Herod. Year of the flood 2991. before Chriſt 8.

DURING this and his laſt journey to Rome, the bands of robbers, whom he had driven out of Trachonitis, having taken ſhelter in Arabia Petrea, under the protection of Obodas the king of it(K),had made ſuch terrible inroads into Judæa, that Herod, on his return, not being able to come at them there, put all their relations and friends to death which he could lay his hands on; which made them more cruel and deſperate than ever. By this time the temple being finiſhed, as was hinted above, Herod cauſed the dedication of it to be performed with his uſual magnificence, and, on the following ſpring, ſet about the ſuppreſſing of the Trachonitiſh robbers. He began with a law-ſuit againſt Syllæus for ſixty talents which he had lent him; and having gained his cauſe before the prefects of Syria, Saturnius and Volumnius, Syllæus, inſtead of paying the money, ſlipped away to Rome; whereupon Herod, having got leave of thoſe two governors to right himſelf by arms, marched into Arabia, and there defeated the robbers, demoliſhed their caſtle, and returned to Jeruſalem, without taking any further revenge. But this expedition was like to have coſt him dear, through the treachery of Syllæus, who, upon the firſt hearing of it, went and complained to the emperor, and aggravated the wrongs done to the Arabians to ſuch a degree, that Auguſtus ſent him Herod out of favour with Auguſtus.

[g] Ibid. c. 13.

(K) This prince had a favourite miniſter named Syllæus, who had formerly made his addreſſes to Salome; but Herod refuſing to give her to him, unleſs he turned Jew, and Syllæus not daring to conſent to it, ſhe had been given to Alexas, one of Herod's confidents. Hence aroſe a mutual hatred between them, which Syllæus improved, by perſuading Obodas to protect thoſe banditti, who did accordingly aſſign them the fortreſs of Repta for a place of retreat, from which they ſallied out, and committed innumerable outrages and cruelties, both in Paleſtine and in Cœle-Syria (37).

(37) Antiq. ibid. c. 11, & 13.

him a very sharp reproof, and would have wholly cast him off, had not he been better informed soon after. Herod had sent two embassies to that prince, and neither of them had been able to get an audience. At length he sent Nicholas Damascen thither, who, finding how prejudiced the emperor was against his master, bethought himself of an happy expedient to explode all the accusations of Syllæus, by means of the embassadors of the Nabathean Arabs, without discovering his errand, till they had cleared the way for him (L). Augustus, being now satisfied of Herod's innocence and of his own too great credulity, was thinking to have taken the Nabathean kingdom from Aretas, and to have made him a present of it; but whilst he was deliberating about it, fresh complaints came to him from that unhappy monarch against his sons, which diverted the emperor from pursuing his design.

Reconciled to him.

For whilst these things had been agitating, Salome and Pheroras had again filled Herod's head with new plots and assassinations intended against him by his sons; and tho', upon enquiry, nothing could be proved against them, but a design of retiring into some other country, where they might peaceably outlive their father's tyranny; yet the jealous king took all the rest for granted upon this single evidence, and sent two of his minister's to Rome, with orders, that, if they found the emperor reconciled to him, they should deliver his letters to him, and obtain justice against the two young princes. Augustus having read the letter, and finding Herod desperately bent upon the ruin of his unfortunate sons, sent immediately orders to have them tried at Berytus, before the governors of Syria, and other neighbouring provinces,

Prefers new complaints against his sons.

(L) These were come to demand justice against Syllæus, who had by that time caused Obodas to be poisoned, and was there soliciting the emperor for that kingdom; but the Nabatheans, having set up a king of their own, sent this embassy to Rome, to have him confirmed there, and to have the assassin punished.

Damascen therefore having privately gained them, directed them how to manage their audience in such a manner, as to clear Herod of all that was laid to his charge, without betraying any other design than that of accusing Syllæus. The thing succeeded to his wish, and Damascen putting himself at the head of their embassy, managed his accusation with such address, backing it with the suffrages of his Nabathean collegues, that Syllæus, who was then present, could not disprove one single point; but was condemned to pay Herod's debt, and then to lose his head (38)

(38) Conf Antiq. ubi supra, c. 13. & l. xvii. c. 4. Strab. c. 16

vinces, and in particular before Archelaus; and, if they were found guilty, he gave their father leave to punish them as he should think fit. Herod convened them all accordingly, except the Cappadocian king, whom he suspected of too great partiality to his sons; and having left those two unfortunate princes under a strong guard at Platone, a small town of the Sidonians, under pretence that they might be easily brought thence, if the judges did think it necessary, he pleaded his own cause before an assembly of above five hundred persons; but with such violence and brutish resentment, as rather raised their indignation against, than pity for, him. He spared for neither evidence nor arguments to have them condemned to die, and concluded with telling them, that being a king, he might have done it by his own authority, according to the laws of Judæa; but that he rather chose to have them tried before such an assembly, to avoid the imputation of injustice or cruelty. After a full hearing, Saturnius, who had been formerly consul, voted, that they should be punished indeed, but not with death, and was seconded by his three sons, who were then his lieutenants; but they were over ruled by Volumnius, who condemned them to death and drew the rest of the judges after him. Only they left it to Herod to execute the sentence, when and how he thought fit. Gets them condemned.

Damascen, on his return from Rome, did try in vain to dissuade him from too rashly depriving himself of two such sons, and leaving himself in his old age to the mercy of the ambitious Antipater. Tyro, another old experienced soldier, came likewise to beg of him, that he might be admitted to speak to him on the same subject; and, upon his permission, freely told him the danger he was in from that young prince, who, he assured him, entertained some treasonable designs against him, whilst the chiefs of the Jewish nation, to whom he was grown odious on that account, did highly pity his two condemned sons, as less guilty than that brother. Herod stopped him short there, to make him name those chiefs; and, upon his so doing, caused them to be imprisoned. Tyro himself was, by the subtlety of Salome, accused by Herod's barber, of having hired him to cut his throat. Herod had recourse to the rack, which he caused to be given to the accuser, and to Tyro and his son, a youth of about the age of Alexander; and the latter, to save his father from the torture, confessed, that himself alone, without his father's privity, had resolved to kill him, and to save Alexander. Scarce any body believed his confession but Herod, who thereupon caused his two sons to be conveyed to Sebaste, and there strangled, or, as the fourth book of the Maccabees has it, hanged on a post or gallows. Their bodies were afterwards buried at Alexandrion, among their Asmonean ancestors [h].

Puts them to death.

ANTIPATER having now no rival left, but his father, and Pheroras, tho' highly obliged to his brother, having lately fallen out with him (M), these two entered into a plot to take him off as soon as possible. Herod had about this time sent Glaphyra, Alexander's widow, back into Cappadocia, and returned her dowry out of his own coffers. There were still two sons left of hers, and two which Aristobulus had had by Berenice, all whom the king had caused to be carefully educated. He had likewise expressed an uncommon concern for them, as well as a remorse for the untimely death of their fathers; and as he found himself upon the decline, he was contriving how to have those young princes so advantageously matched, that he might see them safely and happily settled before he died. But Antipater, who looked upon them in another view, found means to break all his measures, and to persuade him to change the disposition of his family, contrary to his first design [i]. It will not be amiss here to give an account of that monarch's wives and of their issue, in order to understand the sequel of this history. The reader will find both in the margin (N).

Year of the flood 2994, Before Christ 5,

[h] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 17. & 4 Maccab. c. ult. [i] Antiq. l. xvii. c. 2 & 3.

(M) The occasion of this rupture, Josephus tells us (39), was, that Herod had formerly offered his brother his daughter in marriage, whom he had refused for the sake of a favourite servant, with whom he was deeply in love, and did soon after marry. Herod hereupon insisted upon his divorcing her, and marrying another of his daughters. Pheroras bound himself in the most solemn manner to perform it within a month; but when the time came, he absolutely refused; and Antipater, taking the advantage of this breach, easily drew him into his treasonable design.

(N) Herod had nine wives, the first of whom, named Doris, was the mother of Antipater. The second was Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest, by whom he had a son named Herod, called also Philip, who had married Herodias, on whose account the baptist was afterwards beheaded. The third was his brother's daughter. The fourth his first cousin. He had no children by these two last.

The

(39) Antiq. l. xvi. c. 11. & l. xvii. c. 3.

In the mean time another thing happened, which rendered Herod more odious to the Jews, and more irreconcileable to his brother. An edict lately issued out, commanding the Jewish nation to swear allegiance to Augustus and to the king, had been strenuously opposed by the Pharisees to the number of seven thousand, as contrary to the Mosaic law [k]; or which contumacy Herod had condemned them to a severe fine, which had been paid by Pheroras's new wife. This generous deed of hers had therefore so ingratiated her to that sect, [k] Vid. Deut. xvii. 15.

The fifth was called Martac, a Samaritan, by whom he had Archelaus and Antipas, the former of whom succeeded him in the half of the kingdom under the name of Tetrarch, and the latter, called also Philip, married Salome, the dancing daughter of Herodias above-mentioned.

The sixth, named Cleopatra, was a native of Jerusalem, by whom he had two sons, Herod, called also Antipas, and Philip. Herod having married Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, during his life, was reproved for it by John the baptist, and caused him to be put to death.

Pallas was his seventh wife, by whom he had a son named Phasaelus. The eighth was Phædra, by whom he had only one daughter, named Roxana; and by the last, called Elpis, he had another daughter called Salome (40).

As to his grandsons, by his beloved Mariamne, mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, lately put to death, they make likewise a considerable figure in history, and especially those of the latter in the gospel, and deserve here a particular mention.

Aristobulus left two sons and a daughter, whom he had by Berenice his wife, as we have seen a little higher, namely Agrippa, Herod, and Herodias; Agrippa, at first clapt into prison by Tiberius, and afterwards made king of Judæa by Caligula (41), was he who put James the brother of John to death, imprisoned Peter, and was smitten with death at Cæsarea (42). Herod was made king of Chalcis, and is only known in St. Luke for his marriage with the dancing daughter of Herodias, as we hinted above.

As for Agrippa, he left a son of the same name, before whom and his sister Berenice St. Paul was admitted to plead his cause at Cæsarea (43), and another daughter, named Drusilla, married to Felix, governor of Judæa (44).

(40) De his vide bell. Jud. l. i. c. 18. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. Vid. & Matth. xiv. 1. & seq. Mark vi. 14, & seq. Luke ix. 7, & seq. (41) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8. (42) Acts xii. 1, & seq. ad fin. (43) Acts xxv. in fin xxvi. Ptol. (44) Ibid. xxiv. 24.

that they scrupled not to persuade the people, from a pretended prophetic spirit, that God was going to transfer the crown from the line of Herod to the posterity of his brother's wife. Salome failed not to acquaint Herod with it, who, having put several of the ring-leaders to death, commanded his brother to put his wife away, as the cause of this new sedition. Pheroras, upon his obstinate refusal to comply with his command, was forbid the court, and the rest of Herod's family to have any further conversation with him. Pheroras was glad to take this opportunity of retiring into his tetrarchy, and took an oath never to return to court again whilst Herod lived. His being at that distance from the metropolis was indeed a likely expedient to prevent his being suspected of having a hand in what he was then hatching against the king's life; and for the same reason Antipater procured himself to be sent for to Rome to attend upon Augustus. Thus had these two politic persons contrived to screen themselves from discovery, whilst their instruments were on work to bring about their treacherous design; but an accident soon after happened, which brought their whole treason to light.

New troubles in Judæa.

Herod falls sick.

HEROD, who was fallen sick and still retained a great love for his brother, had sent for him to communicate some private orders to him, and Pheroras had refused it, on pretence that he dared not violate his oath. He fell sick soon after, and Herod recovered, and was so far from resenting his late refusal, that he paid him an affectionate visit, without staying for an invitation from him. Pheroras dying two days after his arrival, he caused him to be magnificently buried at Jerusalem. But his death proved the beginning of Antipater's disgrace: for two of the deceased's freedmen came and demanded justice against his wife, whom they accused of having dispatched him with some poison, which she had given him on that very evening, on which he was taken ill. Herod had recourse to his old way of extorting the truth by the rack; in particular, the women of Pheroras's family suffered it at first with a surprising constancy; but one of them was at length forced by the excess of the torture to cry out, that she prayed to God, that Doris, Antipater's mother, might bear her share of the torments, which she had been the cause of. At these words Herod having caused them to be more cruelly tortured, as well as one Antipater, an officer under his treacherous son, the whole plot was unravelled; and upon comparing their several depositions, and the intelligence which Salome had already given to the king, it was found, that the poison, of which Pheroras died had had been procured from Alexandria by a friend of Antipater, from whom it was conveyed by Antipater's mother to Pheroras, in order to be given to the king upon the firſt opportunity. All which was, upon further examination, acknowledged by Pheroras's wife, who added that ſhe would go and fetch it to him; and, inſtead of doing ſo, flung herſelf down from a high gallery; but her fall not proving mortal, ſhe, upon Herod's promiſe of a general pardon, depoſed further, that her huſband, being ſtung with remorſe at his receiving this laſt viſit from him, had ordered her to fetch the poiſon, and to burn it before his face, which ſhe had accordingly done, except a ſmall doſe that ſhe had reſerved for herſelf in caſe of neceſſity. The box, and reſt of the poiſon, being produced and acknowledged by other witneſſes, convinced Herod of his ſon's perfidy, not only to himſelf, but to the two ſons of his favourite Mariamne. His other wife of that name was likewiſe accuſed of being in the ſame plot, and though nothing was proved againſt her, yet was ſhe baniſhed, her ſon Herod diſinherited, and her father depoſed from the high-prieſthood (O). Doris was likewiſe ſtript of all her coſtly ornaments, which amounted to a large ſum, and baniſhed the court [l].

Antipater's plot against him discovered.

John the baptiſt born.

But it is now time to leave for a while Herod in his ſad diſtracted condition, and the nation in their feuds and reſentments againſt him, and turn our eyes on more important matters; thoſe great and ineſtimable bleſſings which heaven was then ready to ſhower down, not only on the Jews, had they not rendered themſelves unworthy of them, but on the whole world, who, we are told, were then in an univerſal expectation of them under the promiſed Meſſiah. For about this time the angel Gabriel, who had been formerly ſent to manifeſt

[l] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 4, 5, & 6.

(O) Simon was ſucceeded in that dignity by one Matthias the ſon of Theophilus, a native of Jeruſalem. But this pontiff having on the following expiation eve contracted ſome pollution †, which incapacitated him from officiating on that grand ſolemnity, a near relation of his, named Joſeph, the ſon of Ellemus, was ſubſtituted in his room. Matthias enjoyed his dignity but one year, after which he was depoſed for being privy to an inſurrection raiſed at Jeruſalem, and ſucceeded by Joazar his brother-in-law (45).

† Antiq. l. xvii. c. 6. Vid & Vol. iii. p. 220, 253, & ſeq.
(45) Antiq. ubi ſupra. c. 8.

feſt to Daniel the preciſe time of his coming, by a determinate number of weeks [m] (P), was again ſent to Zachary, a pious

[m] Dan. ix. 24, & ſeq.

(P) This is juſtly allowed one of the nobleſt prophecies in the whole Old Teſtament, and one of the ſtrongeſt proofs of chriſtianity againſt the Jews, ſince it determines the very time on which Chriſt was to come into the world, enter into his miniſtry, and be cut off for the ſins of the people; ſoon after which was to follow the deſtruction of the Jews, or, as the prophet words it, their ceaſing to be a nation or people, and the promulgation of the goſpel, or of the new covenant, in and by that Meſſiah.

The whole prophecy runs as follows (46): Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city to finiſh (or reſtrain) the tranſgreſſion, and make an end of ſins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs, and to ſeal up the viſion and prophecy, and to anoint the moſt holy one. Know therefore, and underſtand, that from the going forth of the commandment to reſtore and to build Jeruſalem unto the Meſſiah, the prince, ſhall be ſeven weeks; and threeſcore and two weeks the ſtreets ſhall be built again, and the wall, and even in anxious or (perilous) time; and after threeſcore and two weeks ſhall Meſſiah be cut off, but not for himſelf; and the people of the prince that ſhall come, ſhall deſtroy the city and the ſanctuary, and the end of it ſhall be with (or like) an inundation, and unto the end of the war deſolation is determined; and he ſhall confirm the covenant with many during one week, and in the midſt of the week he ſhall cauſe the ſacrifice and the oblation to ceaſe; and he ſhall make it deſolate on account of the over-ſpreading of abominations, until the determined extermination be poured on the land, or people, that is become liable to that deſolation.

It will not be expected, that we ſhould here enter into a comment on this prophecy, much leſs into a diſſertation on the various ways of computing the ſeventy weeks here mentioned, and the various times which interpreters, both Jewiſh and chriſtians, have aſſigned for the beginning and ending of that prophetic epocha. And yet, as the ſubject is of no ſmall moment, the reader will doubtleſs be glad to hear at leaſt, how it is beſt calculated and made out by the latter, and by what ſubterfuges the former endeavour to evade the force of it.

The generality of the Jews do agree with us, that thoſe prophetic weeks are weeks of years, or of a day for a year, according to the prophetic ſtyle. Though ſome of them, in order to puzzle the cauſe, have pretended to underſtand them of weeks of jubilees, or of ſeven ſabbatic *, that is, forty-nine weeks each, amounting pious and upright prieſt of the courſe of Abiah, whilſt he ſtood offering the ſacred incenſe in the temple, according to amounting in all to 3430 years (47). A good long epocha, and very proper to keep up the drooping hopes of the Jews about the Meſſiah's coming. Others ſtretch it ſtill farther, to ſeven thouſand years, that is, by allowing a hundred years to every week; but the generality underſtand thoſe weeks of ſeven lunar or Jewiſh years, as we do, according to which ſeventy weeks will make four hundred and ninety years. But here they, finding themſelves cloſely pinched by that computation, have had recourſe to various pitiful ſhifts to explode it. We ſhall give our readers a ſketch of ſome of the beſt of them, by which he may gueſs at the reſt.

(46) Dan. ix. 24, & ſeq. * Concerning thoſe jubilees and ſabbatic years, ſee before, Vol. iii. p. 211. & ſeq. & (L), p. 207.

Some of them pretend, that the words of the prophet, from the going forth of the command to reſtore and to build, are not to be underſtood from the iſſuing out of Cyrus or Darius's decree; but from the time of thoſe words being prophetically pronounced by Jeremiah to Zedekiah king of Judah (48) ſome years before the captivity (49); and to ſhew their wretched ſkill in chronology, conclude the epocha with us at the deſtruction of the temple. Others, St. Jerom tells us (50), began it at Darius the Mede, and ended it with thoſe above-mentioned at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; only they allowed the eight remaining weeks for the total diſperſion of the Jewiſh nation completed under the emperor Adrian.

A third ſort begin the ſeventy weeks at the deſtruction of the firſt temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and end it at the deſtruction of the ſecond by Titus Veſpaſian (1). Shrinking thereby an epoch of ſix hundred and ſixty years into this of four hundred and ninety, to make it agree with the ſeventy weeks, and thereby betraying ſtill more their ignorance of chronology. This devaſtation of the city and temple, and the diſperſion of the Jews, is according to this latter ſyſtem to the laſt till the overthrow of Gog and Magog by the Meſſiah; but when that will happen, they do not pretend to gueſs. For theſe reaſons they are altogether at a loſs how to explain this prophecy, ſo as to evade the conſequences drawn from it by the chriſtians againſt them, and have fallen into various hypotheſes, equally abſurd and ridiculous about the Meſſiah. Some think, that the ſins of the nation have retarded his coming; others, that he came at the appointed time, but did not appear publicly; others, that he is ſtill hid in ſome obſcure part of the world, waiting till they are fit to receive him;

others

(47) Vid. N. De Lyra in Daniel. ix. (48) Jerem. xxiv. 8, & ſeq. xxxiv. 1, & ſeq. & alib paſſ. (49) Vid. Munſter. in Dan. ix. Note g. (50) In Daniel ix. (1) Rabbin. plurim. Vid. int. al. Abarbanel, Solom. Jarchi, & De Lyra in loc. ſup. citat.

the prieſtly office[n], to foretel him the birth of a ſon, the miraculous child of old age and barrenneſs; a ſon whom he ſhould ſhortly others have imagined two Meſſiahs, one humble, obſcure, and rejected; and another as yet to come, glorious, warlike, victorious, and univerſally acknowledged. Laſtly, and to name no more, from a ſenſe of the manifeſt deficiency of all theſe evaſory ſhifts, they have agreed to leave the diſpute about the Meſſiah in ſuſpendio till better times, and have prohibited all further enquiries and calculations about it under a ſevere anathema (2).

[n] Vid. Exod. xxx. 7, 8, & ſup. Vol, iii. p. 243, & ſeq.

The chriſtians are not exactly agreed either in the placing the beginning and end of theſe weeks, or in the calculations of thoſe lunar or Jewiſh years. Both differences, however, are inconſiderable, if duly attended to; the former is entirely owing to our imperfect knowledge of the chronology of thoſe times. Had we a ſure guide in it, the point would not be long unſettled. But whilſt in this uncertainty one author will place the beginning at the decree of Cyrus, another at that of Darius, a third at that of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and each of them endeavours to ſtretch or ſhorten the chronology of each interval, as beſt ſuits with his hypotheſis; it is no wonder there is ſo little agreement among them, and ſo little certainty to be gathered from the whole diſpute.

The difference ariſing from the various computations of the Jewiſh years is ſtill more inconſiderable, ſince it can amount at moſt but to nine or ten years between thoſe who make it longeſt, and thoſe who make it ſhorteſt; and who can wonder at it, or urge it as an objection againſt this prophecy, that conſiders the variety of computations, of either the Jews, of which we have formerly ſpoken more fully *, or of other nations, from which this epoch, is to be calculated and rectified? Upon the whole then, theſe difficulties duly conſidered, an impartial reader will doubtleſs reſt ſatisfied with that ſyſtem, which beſt adjuſts the ſeventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, of the prophecy to the chronology of that epoch, according to the beſt light that can be had of it from the ſacred and profane hiſtorians.

Waving therefore ſome minute differences between the authors that have written on that ſubject, the ſyſtem moſt univerſally received by proteſtants, as well as Roman catholicks, is that of Julius Africanus (3), as it has been amended by ſome late eminent

(2) Vid. int al. Baſnag. Diſſert. de 70 hebdomad. * See Vol. I. p. 332, (N), & ſeq. (3) Apud Hieron. in Daniel, ubi ſupra.

ſhortly have by his virtuous wife Elizabeth, and who ſhould be a Nazarite, and the fore-runner and great harbinger of the nent chronologers (4), who place the beginning of it, expreſſed in the words of the prophecy, From the going forth of the commandment to rebuild, &c. at the beginning of its execution, which was not done till Nehemiah's coming to Jeruſalem to ſee it punctually performed, and the end of it at the death of the Meſſiah; which interval makes up the four hundred and ninetieth year here foretold. For as to the firſt, it is plain, that Nehemiah found the work quite obſtructed and ſet aſide, at his firſt arrival there, and that he ſat immediately about and finiſhed it (5). This command, which was given in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (6), is not, however, to be underſtood, according to them, of the twentieth year of his reigning alone, which would make the whole period too long by ten years; but of the twentieth of his reigning in partnerſhip with his father (on a ſuppoſition that he was admitted into it by him ten years before his death) which will be the tenth of his reigning alone.

This ſyſtem, which ſeems clearly to remove all difficulties, is attended with only one, viz. the ſilence of hiſtorians, and the unlikelihood of Artaxerxes being admitted ſo early into partnerſhip with his father; and this objection, ſmall as it is, has been, however, thought weighty enough to oblige the learned Prideaux (7) to ſteer a new courſe, which our readers will perhaps better approve than the former. But as he has treated the ſubject in ſuch a full and prolix manner, as would ſwell this note beyond due bounds, and the book itſelf is in every body's hands, and in our own language, we ſhall refer the readers to it for the further clearing of this noble prophecy.

In the concluſion the prophet is told, that after the cutting off of the Meſſiah the temple and city ſhould be deſtroyed by a ſtrange nation, that ſhall come like an inundation againſt it, and that the deſolation of the land ſhall be preceded by an overflowing of abominations; all which ſufficiently prefigures the Roman eagles ſet up in the temple, prophetically alſo alluded to by Chriſt himſelf (8), followed by the profanation, plundering, and firing of that holy place. In the middle of the week, the ſacrifices, oblations, &c. were to ceaſe, not actually, for they did not do ſo till the deſtruction of the city, about forty years after; but they loſt their efficacy, and became uſeleſs and inſignificant after the grand ſacrifice of the Saviour of the world, which they

(4) Petav. de Doctr. Temp. lib. xii. cap. 32, & ſeq. Ration. Tempor. part. 2. l. iii c. 10. Uſſer ſub. A. M. 3550. (5) Conf. Nehem. i, ii, & iii. paſſ. See alſo before, p. 48, & ſeq. (6) Nehem. i. 1. (7) Connect. part 1 Book 5. ſub. an. 458. (8) Matth. xxiv. 15. & alib.

the world's redeemer °. Here the good old prieſt, ſurprized at the viſion and conſcious of his and his ſpouſe's extreme old age, could not forbear deſiring to have his faith confirmed by ſome further miraculous token; and the angel granted his requeſt, and in ſuch a manner, as might at once be a reproof to his diffidence

° Luke i. 5, & ſeq.

they were to prefigure, and from which alone they received their efficacy. Laſtly, thoſe who had thus rejected and put to death the Meſſiah, were to ceaſe to be a people, be diſperſed, deſolate, &c. all which the Jews have ſufficiently felt to their coſt.

The deſtruction and laſting deſolation of the city, but more particularly of the temple, was indeed to be the finiſhing ſtroke of the chriſtian evidence againſt the Jews. We have ſhewn in a former volume †. how theſe evade the pregnant prophecies of Jacob, that the ſcepter ſhould not depart from Judah, &c. (9) and the reader has now ſeen what wretched ſhifts they made to elude this of Daniel's week, at the expence of ſenſe and chronology. There ſeemed therefore ſtill wanting a more irrefragable proof, if not to convince, at leaſt to ſilence, that infatuated nation, with reſpect to this important article of the Meſſiah's being come at the appointed time, and of the vanity of thoſe that ſtill expect him; and this was the prophecy of his coming during the ſtanding of the ſecond temple, and rendering it more glorious by his preſence than that of Solomon, notwithſtanding its great diſparity in other reſpects, concerning which the reader may look back to what has been ſaid at the beginning of this chapter *. When therefore this temple was deſtroyed, it ought to have convinced them that he was really come, as his apoſtles and diſciples affirmed, though there had been a new one immediately built; how much more when all attempts for the rebuilding it have been hitherto fruſtrated? But of this we ſhall have a proper occaſion to ſpeak more fully in the ſequel.

We beg leave here only to obſerve further, that if the total deſtruction of the city and temple, and the diſperſion of the Jews, did not immediately follow the crucifixion of the Meſſiah, they became obnoxious to it from that time; and God ſeems only to have protracted the ſentence during thoſe forty years, to give them time to repent of that atrocious fact, which, as St. Peter obſerves (10), they had committed through ignorance. Accordingly we find, that vaſt numbers of them prevented it by a timely converſion (11), whilſt the more obdurate ſort, refuſing to acknowledge that crime (12) and embrace the proffered mercy, were thereupon diſperſed throughout the world, to be, againſt their will, a ſtanding evidence of the truth of the ſcriptures and prophecies, and of their own judicial blindneſs and puniſhment.

† Vol. ii. p. 486, (G), (9) Geneſis xlix. 10. * See before, p. 13, (K). (10) Acts iii. 17. (11) Ibid. ii. 36, & ſeq. iii. paſſ. (12) Ibid. v. 28.

diffidence and a confirmation of the meſſage he had delivered to him. Zacharias was accordingly ſtruck dumb on that inſtant, and continued ſo, till the promiſed child was actually born.

Six months after this viſion, the ſame heavenly meſſenger was ſent to an obſcure young virgin, named Mary, who dwelt then at Nazareth, with, and under the guardianſhip of, her eſpouſed huſband Joſeph, both of them of the houſe and lineage of David [p] (Q), with the glad tidings, that ſhe was [p] Matth. i. 18. Luke i. 26. & ſeq. iii. 23, & ſeq.

(Q) We have taken notice in a former volume that the Jews had a law which expreſsly forbad heireſſes to marry out of their own tribes (13). It is true, the virgin Mary ſeems to have been far enough from being one of that ſort, at leaſt in poſſeſſion, whatever ſhe might be in reverſion, or by virtue of the jubilee laws, according to which all lands and inheritances were to revolve to the original owner, or to his next heir or heireſs †. But there was ſtill a much greater tie, which kept the virgins of the tribe of Judah, but eſpecially thoſe of the houſe of David, from marrying into another tribe or family, namely the ſure expectation they had, that the Meſſiah was to be of that lineage, and to be born in Bethlehem, the city and patrimony of that monarch; and how careful every family was to preſerve their genealogy, needs not to be repeated.

It is therefore in vain, that the Jews exclaim againſt the uncertainty of Chriſt's being of the ſeed of David, becauſe Joſeph's and not Mary's genealogy is deduced from him by the two evangeliſts, who is yet affirmed by them to have had no ſhare in his conception. The certainty of the virgin's deſcent from that houſe is rendered evident enough by what we obſerved above, eſpecially if we add the teſtimony of the evangeliſts themſelves, who call her miraculous child the ſon or deſcendant of David. If it be asked, why they choſe rather to give us that of her huſband? it may be anſwered, that they conformed in it to the cuſtom of the Hebrews, and even of the ſacred writers, who deduce their genealogies from the male rather than the female line; for if Chriſt the ſon of Mary was the ſon or deſcendant of David, it muſt follow that his mother muſt be ſo too.

But the greater difficulty is, to reconcile the variations of the two genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and we much queſtion whether the greater part of our readers would care to have all repeated that has been ſaid on that ſubject, though in ever ſo ſuccinct an epitome, eſpecially conſidering that the point has not been ſo ſufficiently cleared hitherto, as to leave no room for was chosen, by the special favour of heaven to be the happy mother of the promised saviour of the world, to whom she should for fresh cavils and objections. Yet that our silence might not be interpreted for a giving up of the cause, we shall subjoin a few observations we have been able to make, some of which, though entirely new, may yet furnish the curious enquirers into these abstruse matters, with a better key to reconcile those two genealogies, if not to clear and confirm the one by the help of the other, than they have as yet met with; and as we design the following remarks chiefly for such of our studious readers, we shall content ourselves with giving them as hints for them to exert their talents upon, without confining ourselves so much to method, as we do in other notes.

(13) De hac. vid. Num. xxxvi. paſſ. & Vol. iii. p. 32. † Of this ſee Vol. iii. p. 212—217.

First, then, we beg leave to observe, that the titles of father and son, as well as the terms to beget and be begotten, in the language of scripture, do not always imply an immediate, but frequently a remote succession. Hence the phrase often used by Moses, when thou shalt hereafter beget children and childrens children (14), and the name of father or son given to a predecessor or successor at the distance of two, three, or more generations, as will more fully appear by the sequel. This being premised will serve as the basis to the following remarks on the subject of those two gospel genealogies.

1st, St. Matthew gives one genealogy, and St. Luke another, and both in some names vary from the Old Testament.

2dly, St. Matthew, who begins his from Abraham, divides it into forty-two successions, called by him generations; that is, fourteen before fourteen under } the regal government.

fourteen after

3dly, The first fourteen are the same with those in the Old Testament, and in St. Luke.

4thly, The next fourteen in St. Matthew contain the legal succession of the line of Solomon, until its extinction in Jechoniah, al. Coniah and Jehoiachim (15), when the line of Nathan, the son of David and brother of Solomon, took place.

5thly, The inheritance in the Jewish polity being unalienable farther than the jubilee, as was before hinted, and then revolving to the next surviving heir, the latter, though at some distance from the former, was called the son, that is, properly the successor of the former. Thus Salathiel, who by St. Luke's genealogy appears to have been the descendant of Nathan the son of David, is by St. Matthew said to be begotten by Jechoniah (16), the should therefore give the significant name of Jesus, or Saviour, according to the prophecies long since written of him. Those the last of the Solomonic line, because he was the next surviving heir of the house of David after Jechoniah's death. Had not therefore Solomon's line been set down and the end thereof noted, it could not have appeared from St. Luke, how Salathiel came by his title of succession; for the line of Nathan could not have any claim to it, whilst that of Solomon subsisted, unless in an uncertain reversion; and this will account for the difference between St. Luke and St. Matthew, in these middle fourteen generations.

(14) Deut. pass. (15) Conf. Jerem, xxii. 24. ad fin. 2 Kings xxiv. 8, & seq. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, & seq. (16) Conf. Luc. iii. 27, ad 31. & Matth. i. 19.

6thly, But there is likewise in this latter succession a manifest variation as to the number from the books of the Old Testament. It has indeed been solved by saying that the evangelist aiming only at the three round numbers of fourteen generations above-mentioned, had overlooked or purposely past by some of the redundant ones; and this answer hath hitherto past for current.

But the difference seems to arise from something more material, than the bare aim at an equality of numbers. The historical books set down all the kings in general that had reigned from David to Jechoniah; but St. Matthew, as a genealogist, seems to take notice only of those who had a legal title, and to omit the others. Of this latter sort we take Ahaziah the son of Jehoram by Athaliah to have been, who is said to have been made king by the inhabitants of Jerusalem upon his father's death, because his eldest brother had been killed by the Philistines (17), which seems to intimate that they had chosen him in lieu of some infant son of his deceased brother. For had not this been the case, he would have succeeded of course, without the people's choice. In the same class we may put Joash, who succeeded his father Ahaziah, and Amaziah the son of Joash, all who might succeed each other in prejudice to the elder branch, till this being extinct, made way for the younger in Usiah or Osias, the son of Amaziah, who is therefore called by the evangelist the son (18), that is, as we have hinted above, the successor of Jehoram, though at the distance of three generations above-mentioned.

Thus again Zedekiah, who was set up by the king of Babylon in prejudice of his elder brother Jechoniah, is likewise omitted by the evangelist. Now when these irregular successions are taken away, there will remain but the same fourteen which are mentioned in his genealogy.

7thly, The next variation between the two evangelists is in the last fourteen generations, and rises from the one's constant care of

(17) Vid. 1 Chron. xxii. 1. & 2 Kings viii. 24, & seq. (18) Matth. ubi supra. vers. 8.

Thoſe that relate to his particular head, are as follow: Behold a virgin ſhall conceive, and bear a ſon, and ſhall call his name of pointing out the paſſing of the inheritance as far as it goes in the elder branch. They both agree as far as Zerubbabel, after which St. Matthew goes on with Abiud and his heirs, down to Eleazar, where the line of Abiud ends; and then he ſets down as his ſon and ſucceſſor Matthan (19), who is by St. Luke mentioned under the name of Matthat, and was of the line of Rheſa (20) the ſon of Zerubbabel. So that he entered into the regular ſucceſſion after the extinction of that of Abiud.

Thus again, Matthat or Matthan dying childleſs, Eli was obliged, according to the Moſaic law, to take his wife and raiſe up ſeed to him, and by him begot Joſeph the husband of Mary, who, according to the ſame law, was ſtill reputed as the ſon of the dead elder brother. For this reaſon St. Matthew rightly calls him the ſon of Jacob; whereas St. Luke, who did not proceed on the ſame method, calls him the ſon of Eli. The firſt gives us the name of his legal, the other of his natural, father.

St. Matthew might in all probability have fetched his genealogy from the records of Bethlehem, the patrimony of David, and wherein therefore none were entered, but ſuch as by a regular lineal deſcent were in actual poſſeſſion of it, and where the younger branch, though in actual poſſeſſion of the crown, could not be regularly inrolled, as long as there was any heir of the elder left alive, or till ſuch a time as this latter failed. St. Luke, on the other hand, who, as he tells us in the preface to his goſpel, propoſed to ſupply ſuch defects as he found in thoſe who had writ the hiſtory of Jeſus Chriſt before him, fearing leſt theſe omiſſions ſhould cauſe ſome confuſion, for want of pointing out when the younger ſucceeded the elder branch, has recourſe to the book of chronicles, where the ſeries of the ſucceſſions, both regular and irregular, legal and illegal, are exhibited. So that both had their genealogies from the moſt authentic, though different, records, and ſcrupulouſly adhered each to his own, according to the ſcheme they had in view, and conſequently, inſtead of claſhing, do more probably clear and confirm each other.

There is ſtill one difficulty left with reſpect to St. Luke's genealogy, viz. his introducing of Cainan in the line of Shem, adding thereto one generation, contrary to the Hebrew text in Geneſis and the Chronicles and all the verſions of it, except the ſeptuagint, contrary to the concurring teſtimony of Joſephus, Philo, and other Jewiſh doctors, as well as to that of the antient fathers;

(19) ubi ſupra, verſ. 15. (20) ubi ſupra, v, 27.

name Emanuel, &c. [q] (R), ------ Unto us a child is born; unto us a ſon is given; and the government ſhall be upon his ſhoulder;

[q] Iſaiah vii. 14.

thers; all who not only omit Cainan's name, but reckon only ten generations from Noah to Abraham, whereas with this there would be eleven.

This difference has given commentators more pains to reconcile, than we think it deſerved, conſidering the likelihood there is of its having been jumbled into St. Luke's text by the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers, there being another Cainan mentioned in the verſe immediately following, which might be alſo, according to the old cloſe way of writing, in the very next line. But allowing it to have been originally in St. Luke, it is plain, he muſt have had it out of the ſeptuagint, which verſion both he and the other ſacred writers his cotemporaries uſed, and the copy which he then had might have been corrupted after the ſame careleſs manner; for it doth not appear that all the copies of that verſion had this name, elſe it would be found in all the Latin verſions of it, as well as in Joſephus, Philo, and the fathers; and then they muſt have reckoned eleven inſtead of ten generations.

The ſame may be ſaid even on the ſuppoſition, that it was originally put in by the ſeventy interpreters; for as neither they, nor the tranſcribers of the Hebrew copy, which they took with them into Egypt, were infallible (at leaſt we think we have made it appear they were not, when we ſpoke of their verſion) how eaſily might that word have crept into the text by their inadvertency.

But if all this will not ſatisfy the ſcrupulous, what we have obſerved above of the diſtinction of natural and legal parents, will eaſily remove the difficulty; ſo that Arphaxad might be the natural father of Sala, and the legal one of Cainan, or vice verſâ. There is therefore no need of having recourſe, as ſome have done, to injurious ſuppoſitions againſt the Jews, as if they had purpoſely ſcratched out the name of Cainan in their Hebrew copies, that they might take occaſion to cry down the ſeptuagint verſion; much leſs to other more violent means, to account for ſo ſmall a variation, which, for aught appears to the contrary, was occaſioned by the mere overſight of a tranſcriber, and the more probably, of St. Luke's own copy, than of either original or Greek verſion.

(R) This prophecy has been very much canvaſſed of late by our modern ſceptics, and as learnedly anſwered by ſeveral eminent hands. Thoſe diſputes are ſo recent, that we need not refer our readers to the authors who have wrote on either ſide. As for the difficulty that is raiſed, how the prophecy of a child thus miraculouſly born, could be a ſatisfaction to Ahaz, to whom it was addreſſed, shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace,[r] (S); with some others of the same nature, which are not quite addressed, unless it was fulfilled in his time, we have answered it in a former volume, to which the reader may, if he pleases, have recourse †.

[r] Ibid. ix. 6.

(S) Our readers may perhaps be willing to know what answer or evasion the Jews make use of against such pregnant prophecies; and it will not be amiss here to give them a specimen of them out of one of their subtilest and boldest champions (21), by which he may guess at the rest.

First then, to the former of these prophecies, where the miraculous child is called Jesus or Saviour, because he was to save his people from their sins, they in general, and this in particular, answer to this effect: Who has told you that the sin of Adam has intailed any guilt on his posterity? Was not that of his son Cain, who murdered his brother, a thousand times greater than the biting of an apple? and yet no such thing is said of his posterity being tainted with it. Besides, where is there any mention made, that the Messiah was to save his people from their sins? and if there was, how did Jesus save us from them, when you own he made us commit one infinitely heavier in crucifying him? In vain do you tell us of a redeemer of souls, we expect none but a redeemer of bodies, a Messiah that shall deliver us from slavery, and make us again a flourishing victorious nation and kingdom.

To the second prophecy, the sarcastic author above quoted gives the following answer in a kind of triumphing tone. We will join issue with you, tho', according to your interpretation, it should have been written his names (instead of his name shall be called) but waving that, how can his (Jesus's) name be called wonderful, counsellor? Did not Judas rather defeat his counsel, when he betrayed him unknown to him? He could not be the gibbor, or mighty one, seeing he was put to death: He could not be the Abbi, the everlasting father, or father of eternity, because he was cut off in the midst of his days. Lastly, he could not be called the prince of peace, because he enjoyed none himself, neither have wars ever ceased since his time; yea, himself says, that he did not come to bring peace, but war upon earth.

Others endeavour to elude the force of the prophecy, by pretending that the impersonal וַיִּקְרָא vajicra, he shall call, refers to God; and consequently that all those titles there mentioned refer to him, and not to the child there spoken of. But this evasion quite ſo manifeſt, nor ſo univerſally agreed on (T). But the ſurprized virgin was ſo far from calling to mind thoſe prophecies, that ſhe looked on her virginity, which it is moſt likely ſhe had reſolved to preſerve under the guardianſhip of an aged religious husband, as an obſtacle to the accompliſhment of the angel's word, till, aſſured at length by him of the miraculous conception of that divine child, with an humble confidence ſhe wholly ſubmitted herſelf to the will of heaven. The angel having at the ſame time acquainted her with the pregnancy of her couſin Elizabeth in her old age, ſhe went up into the mountainous country to congratulate her and her husband upon it. At the firſt embracing of theſe three holy perſons, whoſe ecſtatic joy can only be gueſſed from the pathetic account which the evangeliſt has left us of ſion is ſo ungrammatical and contrary to the plain import, in a vaſt number of parallel places, that others of them have diſowned it.

† Vol. iv. p. 138, & Note (K). (21) Auctor. libr. Nitzahon. vid. Munster in loc. & not. in vers. Hebr. Evang. S. Matth. c. 1.

(T) Of this kind is that of Jeremiah (22): The Lord will create a new thing upon the earth, a female (or woman) ſhall incompaſs a man; which the context plainly ſhews to allude to the days of the Meſſiah, and moſt probably, from the natural ſenſe of the words, to the miraculous pregnancy of this virgin. However, the Jews not only take them in a very different ſenſe, but exclaim againſt us for urging this text to them.

Eſpecially the Jewiſh author above-quoted, who here, as every-where elſe, rather expoſes his inveterate rancour againſt the Chriſtians, than his ſkill in the prophetic writings. It would doubtleſs offend our reader's ears, to tell him what a filthy word this vile wretch has found for the bleſſed mother of Chriſt, by the alteration of the firſt letter of her name, or the blaſphemies which moſt of their other writers vent againſt him and his religion. It ſhall ſuffice to have given this hint of it once for all. We ſhall ſpare them for the future, ſince their diſtorting the obvious ſenſe of the ſacred writings, whilſt they acknowledge the divine authority of them, doth but the more evince the truth of the one, and the invincible obſtinacy of the other.

Another text hitherto miſunderſtood and worſe tranſlated, and which we think to be prophetical of the birth of Chriſt of a virgin, is that of the Proverbs, chap. xxxi. verſe 19. The way of the man, not with the maid, as our verſion renders it, but in the virgin; but this we have had occaſion to explain in a former volume, to which we refer the reader *.

(22) Cap. xxxi. 22.

* Vol. iii. p. 674, (P).

of it [s]; Elizabeth, who was far advanced in her pregnancy, felt her child give a leap in her womb, from which ſhe began to conceive a higher notion of her viſitor, and which ſhe expreſſed in terms of the deepeſt reſpect and gratitude. Mary, on her part, being filled with rapturous joy at what ſhe had heard, teſtified her humble ſenſe for all the divine favours ſhe ſaw herſelf bleſt with, in that moſt heavenly canticle, which the ſame evangeliſt has preſerved to us; and, after three months abode, returned to her homely habitation at Nazareth. During her ſtay there, Elizabeth being delivered of the promiſed ſon, gave him the name of John (U), as his father had been commanded by the angel; and Zacharias, having teſtified his conſent to it in writing, found his tongue immediately looſed, and his heart filled with the Holy Ghoſt; and broke out into an euchariſtic and prophetic hymn, which inſpired the wondering by-ſtanders with ſingular hopes concerning this new-born child [t].

The Trachonitiſh robbers ſuppreſſed.

DURING this time, that part of Judæa, which is called Trachonitis (W), and which was very rocky and mountainous, had been the receptacle of a great number of banditti and free-booters, who, as we have already hinted, lived chiefly upon the plunder which they got by their conſtant excurſions, ſometimes towards Judæa, ſometimes towards Arabia. What was ſtill worſe, they infeſted the roads that led from the Babyloniſh territories to Jeruſalem, and hindered the concourſe of the Jews of thoſe quarters to the annual feaſts. Herod, who had already been at a vaſt deal of pains to ferret them out of their dens and lurking-holes, bethought

[s] Luke i. 40, & ſeq. [t] Ibid. v. 27. ad fin.

(U) In the Hebrew יוחנן jochannan, a name very expreſſive of that gracious diſpenſation, which heaven was going to diſplay by the goſpel, of which this child was appointed the harbinger.

(W) This region, which had Arabia Deſerta on the eaſt, Batanea on the weſt, the land of Damaſcus on the north, and Iturea on the ſouth, ſeems to have had its name from two famous mountains, which an antient geographer calls Trachones (23). The greateſt part indeed of it, according to Joſephus, who places it between Paleſtine and Cœle-Syria, had ſuch ridges of rocks and mountains, eſpecially on the ſides of Arabia and Iturea, that ſome of them had caverns large enough to lodge a thouſand men (24).

(23) Strab. Geogr. l. xvi. (24) Vid. Joſeph. ubi ſupra, l. i. c. 7. Euſeb. in loc. ſub voc. Kanath. Hieron. loc. Hebr.

bethought himſelf at length of a way of ſuppreſſing them effectually. He began with inlarging and fortifying a village, which was conveniently ſituated in the heart of the country, and became in time a conſiderable town. Hither he invited a certain Jewiſh captain, named Zamaris, who was gone at the head of five hundred well-armed men to ſettle in a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Antioch; and gave him and his men ſo many encouragements and immunities, that they came and fixed their abode there, and ſoon cleared all that country of that plundering vermin [u]. Zamaris, who was both valiant and religious, did not only ſignalize himſelf in this province, but left a noble offspring like himſelf, whoſe very names were ſufficient to deter the reſt of that gang from ſettling there any more.

Chriſt the Saviour of the world born.

THE virgin Mary, who was returned, from her viſit to Zacharias, to Nazareth the place of her abode, began now to give ſuch ſigns of her pregnancy, as made her aged ſpouſe, who had wholly abſtained from matrimonial converſe with her, to conceive ſome ſtrong ſuſpicion of her incontinency. He was thereupon contriving ſome means to give her a private divorce, without expoſing her to the rigour of the law; when he was appriſed by an angel, that her conception was altogether miraculous, and that he ought not to heſitate one moment to take her and her child under his patronage, ſince that miraculous ſon was appointed by heaven to be the ſaviour of his people. Joſeph immediately obeyed, and took her to his home, but lived in perfect continence with her till the time of her delivery [w], if not of his death (X). In the mean [u] Antiq. l. xvii. c. 2. [w] Matt. i. 18, & ſeq.

(X) This laſt is the moſt received opinion, and it is certain that the particle till, eſpecially according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, doth not always imply the duration of a thing to ſuch a time, but often carries a continuation unto the end; otherwiſe Chriſt would have his ſeſſion at the right hand of God no longer than till his enemies were made his foot-ſtool (25). Timothy would have been obliged, according to St. Paul's exhortation (26), to have vacated to the ſcriptures and other epiſcopal duties, no longer than till the coming of that apoſtle to him; and Jacob would have been no longer intitled to the divine protection, than till God had performed the promiſe of bringing time, Bethlehem, the city of David, and not the obſcure city of Nazareth, being the place pointed at by the prophet for the birth of the Meſſiah [x], the divine wiſdom ſo ordered it, that the decree of Auguſtus for taking a freſh ſurvey of the Roman empire, and the number and eſtimate of all perſons, eſtates, riches, &c. (Y) ſhould reach Judæa about this time, Auguſtus's decree.

(25) Pſalm cx. 1. (26) 1 Timoth. iv. 13.

[x] Mic. v. 2.

bringing him ſafe to his own home again (27). The reader may ſee many more inſtances of the like nature in the famous concordance of indeclinables printed by Froben (28).

If it be objected, why Joſeph, who is by St. Matthew called a righteous man, ſhould ſcruple to expoſe his wife to the rigour of the Moſaic law, which condemns all ſuch to death; it is anſwered, that the word righteous is here uſed by the evangeliſt in oppoſition to one of a ſevere and rigorous diſpoſition, and rather means a charitable perſon, who though he abhors the crime, yet thinks there is a debt of mercy and compaſſion due to the offender; and who could have a greater claim to it, than a young and unexperienced virgin?

(Y) When this way of ſurveying came in vogue in the Roman empire, how, and by whom, it was performed, ſhall be ſhewn in the Roman hiſtory. We need only take notice, that Auguſtus cauſed three of theſe to be made in his time, of which this was the ſecond; it had been began ſomewhat above ſeven years before the vulgar or chriſtian æra, that is, above three years before the birth of Chriſt; and it might be well all that time going through the provinces of Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, and part of Judæa, before it came to Bethlehem (29), ſince that which had been made by David, of the ſingle province of Judæa, (though it doth not appear that the commiſſioners were to take an eſtimate of the eſtates, but only the number of fighting men) had taken up three whole years, though they were recalled before they had gone through with it (30).

It may not be amiſs to obſerve further concerning this decree of Auguſtus, that there is a kind of diſſonance between St. Luke and Joſephus, the former calling it a decree for taxing the empire, and the other affirming that no tax was paid in Judæa during Herod and his ſon Archelaus's reign, and that it did not begin till the depoſition of the latter, when that province was put under a Roman governor or preſident. This was not till twelve years after, when Cyrenius, as he is called by the Greeks and the evangeliſts, (27) Geneſ. xxviii. 15. (28) Sub voc. Donec. (29) Conf. Sueton. in Octavio. & Luc. ii. 1, & ſeq. (30) 2 Sam. xxiv, 1, & ſeq. See alſo Vol. iv. p 45, & not.

time, which obliged the pregnant virgin and her husband to repair thither, to be inrolled with all thoſe that were of the houſe and lineage of David. The great concourſe of people coming to that place, put this poor little family under two inconveniencies, viz. a long ſtay, and the want of a lodging and proper entertainment; yet was this alſo conducted by a ſpecial providence, that he, who was to be the pattern of humility, ſhould begin and end his race in the ſame low and dejected path. Accordingly, when the pregnant virgin found herſelf near the time of her delivery, ſhe was forced to take up the mean accommodation of a ſtable, where, having brought forth her god-like ſon, ſhe wrapped him up in ſwaddling-cloaths, and for want of a better, made the poor manger ſerve him for a cradle.

Christ's birth proclaimed by angels.

But this humble riſing of the ſun of righteouſneſs did ſoon break out into its peculiar luſtre, when an angel, at the head of an heavenly hoſt, proclaimed his wonderous birth to the watching ſhepherds, and celebrated it with that noble hymn, Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men; and here began the firſt part of the character of that divine child, hinted above out of the prophet, to be diſplayed, And he ſhall be called Wonderful; wonderfully conceived, wonderfully born, and as wonderfully manifeſted. Accordingly, the angel, having declared to the ſhepherds, that on that day was born in the city of David a Saviour, which is Chriſt the Lord, gives them theſe wonderful ſigns to diſcover him by: Ye ſhall find the babe wrapped up in ſwaddling cloaths, and lying in a manger [y]; and the ſhepherds going to the place, and finding all things as they had been evangeliſts, or in the Roman ſtyle Pub. Sulp. Quirinius, was ſent preſident of Syria (31).

[y] Luke ii. 8. ad 12.

The difference is eaſily reconciled; the decree iſſued out by Auguſtus was in order to have the empire taxed according to the eſtimate made by this ſurvey. Judæa, though then ſubject to Rome, was excepted by the favour of the emperor, till the depoſition of Archelaus, when it began to take place there under that new preſident. This ſenſe, which ſeems the obvious one of the evangeliſt, doth in no way really claſh with the Jewiſh hiſtorian (32).

(31) Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1. (32) De hoc vid. Uſſer. Prid. Calmet, & al.

been told to them, became themselves the publishers of the joyful news, and began to fill the neighbourhood with hopes of their long-expected and now assured deliverance. The child's parents, according to the Mosaic law, circumcised him on the eighth day, and gave him the name of Jesus, as they had been directed by the angel [z] (Z).

ANOTHER

[z] Ibid. vers. 21. Matt. i. 21.

(Z) This wonderful advent of the Saviour of the world happened, according to the best computation we have, that of our most excellent Usher, in the four thousandth year of the world; and falls in exactly with an old tradition of the Jews mentioned in a former volume, that the world should last two thousand years before the law, two thousand under the law, and two thousand under the Messiah, according to the six days of the Mosaic creation; after which was to follow the seventh, or millennium †.

Accordingly, we find, that there was about this time an universal expectation of him among all the Jews, and even among the Heathens, who might have it probably from them; the sacred books having by this time been a considerable while translated into Greek, as we have seen in a former section. Neither is it improbable, they might still retain a kind of traditionary notion of him from the prophecy of Balaam, concerning the wonderful star that was to arise out of Jacob (33); and this may be the reason why these so readily embraced christianity, whilst the Jews, blinded with prejudice, and soothed into the hopes of a conquering deliverer, rejected both him and his doctrine. But of this hereafter.

We have seen a little higher, how the Jews evade those prophecies, which fixed the coming of Christ to this time by several manifest indices; and need we wonder they should do the same thing by this tradition? Their common salvo, that the sins of the nation have retarded his coming, is a plain acknowledgment, that they look upon the time as long since expired, though they will hardly own it in so many words. But here they go from a received notion of their doctors, that though God may protract or even remit the evils he denounces against men, as he did in the case of the Ninivites, yet he never doth so with his promises, but punctually performs them in due time. According to which notion they used to try a true from a false prophet; that is, they did not condemn him, if his threatening did not come to pass, but only when his promises failed.

This notion of the Messiah's coming being retarded on account of the sins of the nation, is indeed the natural offspring of a much greater error; their expecting him to have appeared in the pomp and grandeur of a conquering and victorious monarch, who † Vol. iii. p. 209, 210. (33) Numb. xxiv. 17.

The temple of Janus shut.

ANOTHER remarkable occurrence, and very proper to usher in both this character of Wonderful, as well as the other of Prince of Peace, was, that the temple of Janus was then shut, which was never done, but when the empire enjoyed a profound peace [a], as it did at this time, and continued to do twelve whole years (A). But the most signal manifestation of this new-born Saviour, and which put the whole city of Jerusalem into an uproar, was the arrival of the Magi, or Wise-men from the east (B), to that metropolis,

[a] See the authors quoted under the following note.

who was to free them from the Roman yoke, and bring this and all other nations under that of the Jews; for this is the sense they put on all those prophecies which set forth the glories of his kingdom; and these being the chief blessings they expected from him, and on which they set the highest value, what more likely cause could be assigned for his delay, than that of their sins?

But could they have opened their eyes to the opposite part of his character, which is there as plainly and expressly foretold, and in the very same chapter of the same prophet (34), namely, that of his humiliation and sufferings, of his being rejected, reproached, blasphemed, and persecuted, even to death; they must have concluded, that nothing less than their sins could be the cause of his coming being so long suspended. On the contrary, they would have seen, that since a person of his glorious, beneficent, and irreproachable character was to be so cruelly treated, so unjustly and so inhumanly butchered by his own people, no time could be fitter for his coming, than when their nation was come up to the height of ingratitude and injustice, of infatuation and inhumanity, as it really was, when those prophecies were fulfilled in him.

(A) This was the fifth time of its being shut since the foundation of Rome; the first time was under Numa; the second at the end of the Punic war; the third under Cæsar Augustus, after the defeat of Marc Antony and death of Cleopatra, twenty-nine years before the birth of Christ; the fourth four years after, or twenty-five years before Christ, on the reduction of the Cantiberians or Cantabrians in Spain; and the fifth at this time of our Saviour's birth and under the same emperor (35).

(B) It would doubtless prove an enquiry worth making, could we come at any tolerable certainty concerning these wise men, who they were? what part of the world they came from? what time of

(34) Isaiah liii. pass. vid. & Ps. xxii. pass. & alib. plur. (35) De his vid. Plutarch. in Numa. Liv. lib. i. Flor. lib. ii. Dio. Cass. l. ii. & al. Oros. l. vi. c. 20, & seq

of the year they arrived at Jerusalem? how many they were? and many more such questions, which have been started to little purpose, and to which no satisfactory light can be given. However, to spare our curious readers the trouble of consulting the various accounts that have been given of them, we shall here subjoin the most that can be found concerning them.

1st, It is generally agreed, that they were of the sect of the Mages, of whom we have given an account in a former volume †, persons wholly addicted to the study of philosophy, astronomy, and divination; and are supposed by some to have been the disciples or descendants of Balaam, whom we have mentioned a little higher, on account of his notable prophecy of the Messiah. This will not appear improbable, if we consider, that both they and their supposed master are said to have come from the east (36). Now the latter is said to have been sent for from the city of Pethor (37), which is there affirmed to have been situate on the banks of the river of the land of the children of his people, or, as the targum of Onkelos renders the place, on the river Euphrates, and elsewhere is said by Moses to have been a city of Mesopotamia (38). So that the country of Arabia Deserta seems most probably to be the place they came from; for they generally bear the name of eastern in the sacred writings. Another antient author, whom we shall have occasion to mention under the next note, tells us, that they were Chaldeans by birth, and by profession great astronomers; and that it was by the help of this art that they understood what this new-risen star pre-signified, which made them take their journey into Judæa, where the new Jewish king was born. Now Chaldea, properly so called, being situate along the river Euphrates, was still nearer Judæa than the other two above-mentioned.

This will also give us some light into another question concerning them, viz. How long they were in coming from their country to Jerusalem? for if they came from the latter, they might easily reach it on their camels or dromedaries, the usual, but expeditious, carriage of those parts, in and about a fourteenth-night; and if from the former, through the latter, one week or ten days more might suffice. For upon the supposition above-mentioned, of their coming from Mesopotamia and the banks of the Euphrates, the greatest distance from that river to Jerusalem will not much exceed six hundred miles. What further seems to confirm this conjecture is, the prophecy of the kings of Sheba and Saba, or Arabia, bringing their gifts to the king Messiah. For of him is this psalm (29) allowed by Jews and Christians to have been writ.

Some antient authors indeed, who have fetched them from the remotest parts of Persia, have allowed them a two years travel, and found their supposition on the enquiry which Herod made of the

† Vol. v. p. 35, & seq. 307, & not. (36) Conf. Numb. xxiii. 7. & Matth. ii. 1. (37) Numb. xxii 5. (38) Deut. xxiii. 4. (29) Psalm lxxii. 10.

the exact time of the ſtar's appearing to them, and his deſtroying all the male infants from two years and under (30); but what quite overturns this conjecture, and proves that they muſt have been at Bethlehem within leſs than forty days after his birth, is, that this was the place where they found him; whereas after his parents had preſented him to the Lord at Jeruſalem, which was to be done at the end of forty days, they are ſaid to have gone and dwelt at Nazareth, their uſual habitation (31).

Beſides, if they had been two years in coming, the ſtar muſt be alſo ſuppoſed to have appeared to them ſo long before, and to have directed them all that time, which is abſurd, as we ſhall further ſhew under the next note. Herod therefore, by ſlaying all the males under two years, might only do it for his greater ſecurity, and from ſome doubt, either that the Magi might not have obſerved the firſt appearance of the ſtar, or that they had purpoſely concealed it from him, out of a forecaſt they had of his bloody deſign againſt the child. We have ſeen already through his hiſtory, that he was never ſparing of the lives of his ſubjects, whenever his jealouſy or reſentment rendered them obnoxious to him.

Neither ſacred nor antient eccleſiaſtical writers tell us, how many in number, or of what quality, they were; but this has not hindered thoſe more recent fixing theſe and many more minute circumſtances, even as far as their names, age, complexion, dreſs, retinue, and ſuch-like. As for their number, the moſt received opinion is, that they were but three, and this notion ſeems founded on the three kinds of preſents they brought with them, as if each of them had preſented a different one. But this is ſaid without foundation. An old apocryphal book has multiplied them to twelve; and adds, that they were choſen from their whole nation, and went every night on the high mountains to watch the appearance of the ſtar (32).

Thoſe that gave them the title of kings, found their opinion partly on the text above-quoted out of the pſalmiſt, and partly on a notion which Tertullian had taken (33), on what ground is hard to gueſs, that all thoſe eaſtern nations were governed by kings choſen out of the ſect of the Mages. To the royal crown the Armenians (34) have added to them that of martyrdom, which they pretend they ſuffered in that country. The great conſtable of Armenia, in his letter to the king of France, (St. Lewis) adds, that they came thither from the province of Tangut (35). All this is ſaid on the authority of a tradition they have among them, and not from any authentic records; ſo that we may oppoſe to it it that of the city of Cologne, which pretends that they died there in their way home, and ſhews not only their tomb, but their three heads, in the cathedral of that city. Their epitaph, which is in Latin verſe, gives them the names of Gaſpar, Melchior, and Balthazar.

(30) De his vid Calmet. Comment. in Matth. (31) Luke ii. 39. (32) Auth. ap. imperf. in Matth. homil. 2. (33) Cont. Marcion l iii. & lib. cont. Judæos. (34) Vid. Chardin's travels into Perſia, tom. 3. (35) Spicileg. ap. Calmet. ubi ſupra.

We ſhall add one tradition more concerning them, which is, it ſeems, as ſtifly believed in ſome parts of the Indies, as the two laſt are in Armenia and Germany. We have it on the credit of Jerom Oſorius, biſhop of Algarba in Portugal, who aſſures us he had it from perſons of undoubted credit, well verſed in the antient monuments of thoſe countries, and is to this effect:

Chiperimal, king of Cranganor, in the kingdom of Calecut, having undertaken ſome long voyage by way of expiation for an inceſt he had committed, came into Carmania, where he met with two Mages, going into Judæa to pay their homage to a miraculous child newly born of a virgin. The king begged leave to accompany them, and on his return cauſed a ſtately church to be built in honour of the virgin and her ſon, and in which he cauſed her image to be ſet up, holding the child in her arms. We ſhall ſtop here, ſeeing there is no going further in ſearch of them, without danger of being ſtill more bewildered.

However, before we diſmiſs this note, it will be very proper to take notice, once for all, that from the very earlieſt times of chriſtianity, there ſtarted up a number of heretics, who, the better to colour their impious tenets, trumped up divers falſe goſpels and writings, under the names of ſome of the apoſtles or moſt famous diſciples of Chriſt, and ſtuffed them with ſuch variety of miraculous circumſtances and ſtories, as obliged the heads of the church to condemn and explode them, as they juſtly deſerved. But though the books vaniſhed, except their names and ſome few fragments of them, yet the memory of thoſe addititious ſtories and miracles was not ſo eaſily extinguiſhed among the vulgar, who were ignorant of their foul origin; but was propagated by a kind of popular tradition, which was afterwards too indiſcriminatively received by the writers of the fourth, fifth, &c. centuries, eſpecially where they thought it ſerved to clear a text, or ſupplied thoſe circumſtances of men and things, which had been omitted by the ſacred writers.

Thus the various notions about the wiſe-men, mentioned above, of the miraculous ſtar, we ſhall ſpeak of in the next note, and many more of the like kind, too groſs to deſerve a place here, ſeem to have flowed from the pſeudo-goſpels of Joſeph the carpenter, of Joſeph of Arimathea, of the infancy of Jeſus, and ſome others, falſely attributed to one or other of the apoſtles; but in time their origin being forgot, they were received as common traditions, and quoted as ſuch by ſome of the latter fathers. So that it would be unjuſt to charge thoſe great and good men, with either forgery, or even with a fondneſs for what we call pious frauds, ſeeing the perſecuted ſtate of the church during ſo many centuries

polis, under the guidance of a miraculous ſtar (C), which ceaſed not to go before them, till it had brought them to the place centuries made their miſtakes almoſt unavoidable, which were in better times happily diſcovered and rectified.

(C) We have likewiſe a great variety of conjectures concerning this wonderful ſtar, according as men are inclined, either to leſſen or multiply miracles. Of this ſecond ſort are thoſe who think it to have been a mere comet, only with ſome peculiar luſtre, or ſome other index, well underſtood by the wiſe-men (36); and others, who make no more of it than a meteor, vaſtly below the orb of the moon †; though either of theſe can hardly be admitted without the interpoſition o fa miracle, ſince the ſuppoſition of an extraordinary luſtre in the former, and the long and regular motion of the latter, contrary to all that we underſtand of meteors, ſeems to have required a ſupernatural hand. Since therefore a miracle muſt be admitted, and it is plain God was never leſs ſparing of them, than upon this glorious juncture, others have with greater probability believed it to have been a luminous body created on purpoſe; others, that it was the very light which had appeared to the ſhepherds, which having been ſeen at a diſtance to the wiſe-men like a ſtar, came laſtly to appear to thoſe in a more refulgent manner (37). Some think it was an angel in that figure (38); others have run ſtill greater lengths, making it to have been the Holy Ghoſt, appearing in that viſible ſhape, and have attributed ſuch an unuſual brightneſs to it, as even eclipſed the ſun; if ſo, 'tis a wonder no cotemporary authors, either ſacred or profane, ſhould have ſaid ſomething of it.

And this will in a great meaſure explode the notion of thoſe we mentioned in the laſt note, who make the wiſe-men to have been two years in coming to Jeruſalem, and the ſtar to have gone all that time before them; ſince its long continuance and irregular motion, with reſpect to other heavenly bodies, could not but awaken the attention and wonder of all thoſe countries, in which it muſt have been ſeen. But this difficulty has been removed, by pretending that it appeared either to none but the Magi, or only two or three times, enough for thoſe who were watchful obſervers of it, but overlooked by all the reſt. But this is ſaid without foundation, or even ſhadow of probability; and the queſtion of the Magi at Jeruſalem ſeems much rather to imply, that it had been ſeen at leaſt in all the countries between Judæa and their own.

We

(36) Orig. Maldon. Grot. Le Clerc in Matt. ii. Whiſton & al. † Calmet. ubi ſupra. (37) Leo Mag. in Matt. Lightfoot, & al. (38) Chryſoſt. Theophylact. & al.

Wise men come from the east to Bethlehem.

place and person they were in search of. However, as they looked upon him as the king of the Jews, they first repaired to the metropolis, where he was most likely to be either born, or heard of. Upon their first enquiry after him, Herod and the whole city was moved, and the grand sanhedrin, being consulted about the place of his birth, directed them to Bethlehem, the place mentioned by the prophet above quoted. Whatever hopes the rest of the Jews might conceive from this wonderful phenomenon and the tidings of the new-born Messiah, Herod, who dreamt of nothing but of an earthly kingdom, began to look upon that wonderful child as a dangerous rival, and resolved from that instant to nip him in the bud. To this end, he caused the Magi to be privately brought to him, and, having carefully sifted them concerning the time of the star's appearance, and other circumstances which might serve his bloody design, he dismissed them with these words; Go and search diligently for the child; and when you have found him, bring me word, that I may go likewise and pay my homage to him. They set out accordingly, and were not a little over-joyed, when upon their leaving Jerusalem, they beheld the same star still going before them, till it stood and shot its rays perpendicular upon the house where the child and his parents were. Here they approached the divine babe with suitable reverence, and having laid open their treasures, they offered him the presents of gold, frankincence,

We will not take upon us to say which of all these hypotheses is the most probable, since the sacred historian has left us in the dark, and the rest of the antient historians are quite silent about it. We shall only subjoin here what the Platonic philosopher Chalcidius says of it (39): It is not easy indeed to guess at the time in which he lived; but that he was a christian, the very passage it self plainly shews: "Let us now turn our thoughts, says he, to "another, and more holy, history, and such a one as is more wor- "thy of our admiration I mean that which mentions the ap- "pearance of a star, not of the nature of those which portend "either a sickness or mortality, but which manifest the descent "of God upon earth, to dwell among men, and to bless them "with his choicest favours. Some of the Magi, or wise-men of "Chaldæa, having observed this star in the night, and being "thoroughly versed in astronomy, went immediately in search "of this new-born God, and having found him, presented him "with gifts suitable to his divine character." The reader will find in the next note, what may have been probably the meaning of this last expression.

(39) Comm. in Timæum Platon. p. 19.

frankincenſe, and myrrh (D); and being warned not to go back to Jeruſalem, they returned home by another way [b]. As ſoon as the child was forty days old, the time preſcribed for the purification of women after the birth of a ſon [c], his parents brought him to Jeruſalem to be preſented to the Lord in the temple, and to be redeemed, according to the law concerning the firſt-born [d], with the price of five ſhekels,

or

[b] Matth. ii. 1, & ſeq. [c] Levit. xii. 2, & 6. [d] Exod. xiii. 2. Numb. xviii. 15. See alſo before, vol. iii. p. 237, & (F).

(D) The piety of ſome antient times, when allegory was in greateſt vogue, and myſteries were diligently looked for in every part of holy writ, hath led men into ſuch lengths, as it would be dangerous to follow in theſe days. Particularly in theſe preſents, which the wiſe-men offered to the holy Jeſus, they have pretended to find out, either his three diſtinct offices of king, prieſt, and prophet, or his divinity, royalty, and manhood (40); or, laſtly, the divine virtues he was endowed with, and was to communicate to his true followers, viz. purity by the myrrh, which is an excellent ingredient to preſerve from corruption; incenſe, the ſmoke or perfume of which is ſaid to be the prayers of the faithful (41); and charity or beneficence, the moſt acceptable perfume that can be offered to the deity, and implied in the gold.

Others, grieving to ſee their fellow-chriſtians feed their piety with ſuch far-fetched notions, have ſought a nearer meaning by running into another extreme, and concluded, that nothing elſe ſeems intended by thoſe gifts, than the ſupplying the preſent and future indigencies of the child and his parents, who were ſhortly to be forced to take a long journey into Egypt. So that the gold was to defray their expences, the myrrh to preſerve the babe's tender limbs in his travels, and the incenſe to diſpel the common damps and ill-ſmell, either of his ſtable, or of thoſe caravanzeras or inns, in which they would be obliged to lodge.

But there is a middle way between thoſe extremes, which is, that the Magi offered theſe preſents to this new-born monarch, as they looked on him merely as the future king of the Jews, and without any regard to his divinity, of which it doth not ſufficiently appear that they were appriſed. Only they ſuppoſed, by the wonderful phænomena that preceded and accompanied his birth, that he was likely to prove ſuch a glorious monarch, as that his reign would eclipſe thoſe of all his anceſtors; but whether on account of his greater power, conqueſts, or for what other reaſon, it is not likely they could know without a particular revelation.

(40) Ambroſ. in Luke ii. 6. Leo Serm de Epiphan. Theoph. in Matth. 2 Bern. & al. mult. (41) De his Vid Baron. ſub. A. C. 1. ſect. 40. & Calmet. ſub Simeon IV.

or of a lamb, or a pair of doves, or young pidgeons; which laſt was the price appointed for the meaner ſort. And into ſuch low condition was the family of David reduced (by this time), and ſo poor were the parents of the world's ineſtimable redeemer, that they were fain to redeem him at the loweſt price. Here they were met by a venerable old man, named Simeon (E), a perſon of conſummate piety, and endowed with the ſpirit of prophecy; to whom it had been revealed, that he ſhould not ſee death before he had beheld the promiſed Meſſiah. Being therefore directed by the Holy Ghoſt to the temple at the ſame time, he took the babe

(E) The ſhortneſs of the evangeliſt's account concerning this venerable perſon, has been abundantly ſupplied by the pious and fruitful fancies of later writers, who have each contributed their mite towards the raiſing of his character. He has been by many (42) affirmed to have been a prieſt, and to have been then performing his function in receiving the child in his arms, according to the cuſtom of redeeming the firſt-born. There is indeed nothing can make this incredible or improbable, if we except the ſilence of St. Luke, who, it is not likely, would have over-looked his being a prieſt, if he had been really ſuch.

Some have affirmed him to have been the ſame with Simon, ſurnamed The Juſt, diſciple of the famous Hillel, often mentioned in this hiſtory, who was alſo the maſter of that Gamaliel, at whoſe feet St. Paul had been brought up (43), and that whilſt he was endeavouring after an expoſition of the prophecy, quoted a little higher, A virgin ſhall conceive, and bear a ſon, this revelation was made to him, that he ſhould not die before he had ſeen it fulfilled. So that when he came to ſee the miraculous mother and child, he broke out into that divine and prophetic ecſtaſy mentioned by the evangeliſt, and died ſoon after. Epiphanius adds (44), that the noble teſtimony he gave to this new-born Saviour did ſo exaſperate the ſtubborn Jews, that they denied him common burial.

Another ſet, which makes him one of the ſeventy interpreters of the Greek verſion mentioned in a former ſection †, tell us, that when he came to tranſlate the prophecy juſt now mentioned, he found his faith ſtagger; but that his doubts were happily diſpelled by this revelation, that he ſhould ſee the accompliſhment of it before he died (45). So that at that rate he muſt have lived to a good old age, ſince at the loweſt that verſion was made above two hundred years before Chriſt, and thoſe interpreters were ſcarcely choſen out of the youngeſt tribe.

(42) Allat. Differt. de Script. Simeon ſub. init. (43) Acts xxii. 3. (44) De vit. & mort. prophet. † Vid p. 85, & note. (45) De his vid. Allat. ubi ſupra.

babe in his arms, and having foretold to his mother the ſorrows with which her pious ſoul would in time be pierced, on account of the many blaſphemies and perſecutions which this divine ſon was to be expoſed to; and being now aſſured that nothing could add to his happineſs but the joys of a future life, ſung his own requiem in a ſhort ecſtatic hymn, and reſtored the babe to his parents. His teſtimony was accompanied with that of a venerable old propheteſs, named Anna, who had dedicated the remainder of her life from her widowhood to the ſervice of God and of his temple; and coming at that inſtant to the place, began likewiſe from thenceforth to publiſh this new-born Saviour to all the faithful Iſraelites.[e]

WHAT bloody expedient the jealous Herod pitched upon to fruſtrate all theſe predictions by ridding himſelf of this ſo dreaded child, and how he was diſappointed in it by a peculiar providence, will be ſeen in the next ſection; and we ſhall cloſe this, according to our promiſe, with a ſhort view of the ſects at this time reigning in Judæa, that the reader may ſee how it came to paſs, that a Meſſiah, ſo plainly and frequently foretold from the beginning, ſo miraculouſly conceived and born, proclaimed by angels, atteſted by prophets, and confirmed by innumerable miracles, the infallible ſeals of heaven, came yet to be rejected and perſecuted even to death and beyond, by thoſe who were the keepers and expounders of thoſe oracles which foretold and typified him, and eye-witneſſes of all his ſtupendous works. For though we are writing the hiſtory of the Jews, and not of the chriſtians, yet, for as much as the deſtruction of their temple, city, and commonwealth, was owing to their refuſing to acknowledge the Meſſiah, after he had fulfilled in his own perſon all that the prophets had written of him[f]; it will be neceſſary to examine by what prejudices and infatuation they brought this total and laſting deſolation upon their country and nation; and, upon a review of the doctrines peculiar to each ſect, it will be found, that their invincible attachment, each to their own tenets, were the main cauſes and haſteners of it. For, on the one hand, that erroneous and pernicious opinion, which every one of them obſtinately held of a temporal Meſſiah and conquering deliverer, was attended with two very fatal conſequences, namely the rejecting of the Meſſiah, whom they ſaw appear in a quite oppoſite character; and their ſeeking him in thoſe impoſtors, who flattered them in their deluſion and ripened them into an open rebellion. Such was Cauſes of the Jews incredulity.

[e] Luke ii, 22. ad 38.

[f] Ibid. c. ult. ver 25, & ſeq. Acts iii. 12 ad 22, & alib. plur.

was Judas Galileus, the head of the Gaulonitish sect or faction, which proved the mother of infinite mischiefs to that infatuated nation, and hastened their total ruin; to say nothing of several other pretenders to the character, either of the Messiah, or of his fore-runner, which drew still vast multitudes after them. On the other hand, the irreconcileable hatred which every sect bore, either to each other on account of their different tenets, or against christianity, which was still more opposite to their own, did so weaken and distract the whole body, that, instead of joining their united counsel and strength against their oppressors, they did as much strengthen them by their mutual feuds and persecutions, as they did exasperate them by their seditious and hostile behaviour, and made their own ruin so much the easier to complete. All which will be better seen by the sequel, especially by a short view of each of those sects.

JOSEPHUS reckons four principal ones among the Jews; 1. The Pharisees; 2. Sadducees; 3. Essenians; and, 4. the Galileans, or the faction of Judas Galileus [a]. The evangelists add that of the Herodians to the two former, and mention nothing of the two last, probably, because they did not oppose the gospel with that inveteracy which the others did. How powerful and numerous the Pharisaic sect was among the meaner, and what sway that of the Sadducees did bear among the opulent, and what perpetual wars each waged against the other, has been already frequently hinted, and will now be better understood by a short review of their different tenets.

Pharisees. I. THE rise of the Pharisees is very much unknown; they claim indeed their famous doctor Hillel, often mentioned in this chapter, for their father, as he is supposed by some to have lived during the pontificate of Jonathan, about a hundred and fifty years before the birth of Christ, but by others later; and more justly too, since, if he be the Pollio mentioned by Josephus along with the famous Samæas, he must have lived about the time of Herod, long before whom the Pharisaic sect was in high repute. It is therefore likely, they claim him rather as an ornamental author, of their sect. The reader may see [illegible]dy hinted concerning those two great men [illegible]f. As to the Pharisees, it is probable, they [illegible] distinguish themselves, till the opposite [illegible]es [illegible]ed ſtarted up, and made them by degrees run into the other extreme. This ſeems evident from the etymon of their name, whether we derive it with the generality of critics from the Hebrew פרס, to divide or ſeparate, or with others [b], from another ſenſe of that word, ſignifying recompenſe, or retribution, in oppoſition to their antagoniſts, who denied and derided it, at leaſt as to a future life.

[a] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1. & seq. Bell. Jud. [illegible] pass.

† Page 256.

We have formerly had occaſion to mention one of their favourite tenets, namely that of an oral tradition conveyed down from Moſes, and to which they attributed the ſame divine authority as to the ſacred books *. This being ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the Sadducees, as well as the Samaritans, and the Caraites (a ſect of which we ſhall give ſome account at the cloſe of this ſection) made them equally deteſted by them. But none more incurred their hatred and reſentment than our Saviour, who took all proper occaſions of reproving them for the unjuſtifiable preference which they gave to this pretended tradition to the written word of God, and for condemning thoſe as apoſtates worthy of death, who paid not the ſame, or even a greater, regard to the former, than to the latter.

Another tenet of theirs in oppoſition to the Sadducees was, that of the being of angels, the immortality of the ſoul, reſurrection, and future rewards. But as to this laſt, they firſt excuded all that were notoriouſly wicked from having any ſhare in it, and ſent them immediately after their death into everlaſting puniſhment. Joſephus, who was himſelf a ſtrict as well as learned Phariſee, affirms, that thoſe ſpirits, which they called devils, were no other than the ſouls of ſuch wicked men, who ſtill retaining their miſchievous propenſity, were ever ſeeking to annoy thoſe of the living by obſeſſions, &c. In the next place, this reſurrection, in thoſe that were admitted to it, was no more than a tranſmigration from one body to another, more or leſs happy, according to their behaviour in their former ſtate. Thus the diſciples aſked our Saviour, who had ſinned, the blind man before them, or his parents, that he ſhould be puniſhed with blindneſs [c]; and thus Herod and the multiude ſuppoſed Chriſt to be either John the baptiſt, Elias, or ſome other prophet riſen from the dead [d]. When therefore that divine maſter came to preach to [b] Vid Baſnage hiſt. des Juifs, tom. 2. l. ii. ch. 18. ſect. 2.

* See before, Vol. x. p. 31, (Z) & alib. [c] John ix. 2. [d] Matt. xiv. 2 xvi. 14. & alib.

to them a more glorious resurrection, this proud sect could not but look upon it as a derogation to what they thought their superior authority and judgment, which was therefore the more offensive to them, as coming from so mean, illiterate, and contemptible a person.

A THIRD tenet was, that all things were subject to fate, or, as some expresst it, to the heavens, except the fear of God. It is not easy to guess what they meant by it: Josephus [e] indeed will have it, that they designed to reconcile, by this unaccountable jumble, the fatality or predestination of the Essenes with the free-will of the Sadducees. If so, this is not the only absurdity, or even contradiction, which they held; but our learned bishop Bull seems to have proved, that they attributed all to fate, or to that chain of causes, to which the creator had subjected all things from the beginning [f]; among which the influence of the heavenly bodies was looked upon to be one of the principal. This seems hinted at by St. James in the beginning of his epistle to his new converts, where he explodes that Pharisaical leaven by the most beautiful opposition of the immutability of God, the giver of all good, to the mutability of the planets, which, according to that notion, must necessarily vary their aspects from a benign to a malevolent one, and, vice versâ, even by the natural change of their courses [g].

HERE was then a new source of dislike to Christ's doctrine, which affirms men to be the authors of their own unbelief, disobedience and obstinacy; and so answerable for that and all the train of evils which it brings after it [h]. It must be owned, however, that some critics have given a different sense to Josephus's words, and whilst one makes the Jews from it to fall into the worship of angels, as having the government of those heavenly bodies [i], others have endeavoured to disculpate them even from their known attachment to astrology, by pretending, that by the heavens is meant no more than the eternal decrees of God, which yet are supposed very consistent with the notion of a freedom of will [k]. Both sides had an end to serve, and seem to argue according to their different notions, which it is not our business to enter futher into, much less to reconcile the notion of the Pharisees, if it was really theirs, of a freedom of will, with the absolute and eternal decree of the the supreme being. Sure, it seems, from the address of the proud Pharisee with, God I thank thee [l], that he looked upon him as the original source of all those fansied virtues he there boasts of, whatever channel he might suppose they flowed to him from; and doth not this at least intimate that he looked upon the want of those virtues in the despised Publican to be owing to his being deprived, by the same arbitrary divine will or decree, of that superior grace which produced them in him? All which is contrary likewise to the doctrine of Christ, which teaches us, that God distributes to every man a sufficient share of it to profit withal, and encreases it according to the improvement they make of it.

[e] Joseph. ubi supra. Vid. & Antiq. l. xiii. c 9 & xviii. c. 1, 2 [f] Harmon. Apost dissert. poster c. 15. [g] James c. 1. v. 13, 16, 17. Vid & Black. vindication of the sacred classics. [h] Vid. int. al. Matt. xxiii. 37. [i] Baronius ap. Basnag. ubi supra, sect. 7. [k] Basnag ibid. & seq.

But their most distinguishing character, and that which rendered them most obnoxious to the just censures of Christ, was, their superogatory attachment to the ceremonial law, their frequent washings, fastings, and prayers, their public alms-deeds, hunting after proselytes, scrupulous tithings, affected gravity of dress, gesture, and mortified looks; their building the tombs of the prophets, to tell the world that they were more righteous than their ancestors who murdered them, though themselves were then plotting the death of the best and greatest of all the prophets; their over-scrupulous observance of the sabbath to the exclusion of works of the greatest charity, and many more of the like nature; whilst they were wholly negligent of the moral and eternal law of mercy and justice, of charity, humility, and the like indispensible virtues. The best of them, contenting themselves with abstaining from the finishing act of any sin, indulged themselves in all the thoughts, desires, and complacencies which came short of it; whilst others, more hardened in their vices, made no scruple, not only to covet, but to devour, poor widows houses, to commit the vilest of oppressions, injustices, and cruelties, and to encourage it in their own disciples, under the specious cloak of religion and sanctity. Well might Christ then compare them to whited sepulchres, beautiful indeed without, but within full of rottenness and corruption [m].

Hence that fatal and judicial infatuation, which made them overlook all the miracles which he wrought before their eyes, because he chose to do some of them on the sabbath; as if healing the sick, giving ears to the deaf, eyes to the blind, life to the dead, &c. was a violation, instead of a hallowing, of that day, and must denominate him a profane per-ſon, a ſabbath-breaker, a falſe prophet and ſeducer, or any other odious name, rather than what thoſe miraculous works, long before foretold by the prophets, demonſtrated him to be, the Meſſiah and redeemer of mankind.

[l] Luke xviii. 11. [m] Matt xxiii. 27, & alib.

THE laſt erroneous notion we ſhall mention of theirs, which was indeed common to the other ſects, but did more exactly tally with the haughty, rapacious, and cruel temper of the Phariſee, was their expectation of a glorious conquering Meſſiah, who was to bring the whole world under the Jewiſh yoke. Inſomuch, that there was ſcarce a kennel-raker among them, that did not expect to be made preſident of ſome opulent province under him. How unlikely then was it, that a meek and humble Jeſus, whoſe doctrine breathed nothing but humility, peace, diſintereſtedneſs, ſincerity, contempt of the world and worldly things, and univerſal love and beneficence, ſhould ever be reliſhed by that proud, covetous, and hypocritical ſect; or even by the reſt of the populace, as long as theſe their demagogues ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it! But we ſhall inlarge no further upon them; thoſe who are deſirous to know more may conſult the authors quoted in the margin [n].

Sadducees, II. THE Sadducean ſect was no leſs oppoſite to the doctrine of Chriſt. We have already given ſome account in a former ſection † of their riſe, and of their favourite tenet, that there was neither reſurrection, reward, or puniſhment, nor even life after this. They added, that God was the only immaterial being, in conſequence of which, they admitted neither angels, nor any ſpiritual ſubſtances, but him. Whether this was the original doctrine of Saddoc their founder, as the Talmudiſts and Joſephus affirm, or whether theſe and ſome of their other epicurean principles were afterwards gradually introduced by his looſe diſciples, in order to rid themſelves of the dread of a ſad hereafter, as ſome moderns think; 'tis plain, this tenet was very rife with them in our Saviour's time, which made them take ſeveral opportunities of oppoſing and ridiculing his doctrine of the reſurrection [o].

ANOTHER of their tenets, equally oppoſite to the Phariſees and to the doctrine of Chriſt, was, that man was made abſolute maſter of all his actions, and ſtood in no need of any aſſiſtance to chuſe or act [p]. For this reaſon they were alway mo

[n] Lightfoot, Druſius, Serrarius, Calmet, Pref. in comm. in Mar & Prid Connect. ſub. A. C. 107

† Page 205, 206, (W

[o] Matt. xxii. 23, & ſeq. & alib. plur.

[p] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9.

moſt ſevere in their ſentences, whenever they ſat as judges. Joſephus adds in another place [q], that they looked upon the deity as above intermeddling with human affairs, which is in effect denying a providence and conſequently all religion. But this ſavours too much of the Phariſaic ſcandal, and it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that men of ſuch principles ſhould not only continue uncenſured and uncondemned by the ſanhedrin, but be permitted to have acceſs to the temple, to propoſe their queſtions and objections, and perform their devotions there as freely as any Phariſee; and, which is ſtill more ſurprizing, ſhould be ſuffered to fill the higheſt dignities in church and ſtate. Beſides, ſuch principles ſeem altogether incompatible with their allowed belief of the Moſaic books, though they had rejected all the reſt, as they are by ſome ſuppoſed to have done [r]; but Scaliger, we think, has ſufficiently cleared them of even this laſt imputation [s], which has no other foundation, than that of our Saviour's chuſing to confute them only from the pentateuch.

It is true, they rejected all the pretended oral traditions of the Phariſees, and ſtuck cloſe to the text of the ſacred books; perhaps they might alſo give the preference to thoſe of Moſes above all the reſt. All the other Jews did ſo, and do to this day; but had they abſolutely denied the authority of the latter, it is not likely they could have eſcaped being ſeverely reproved for it, either by our Saviour and his apoſtles, or even by Joſephus, who gives them ſuch a foul character in other points; and yet he owns [t], that they received τα γεγραμμενα, the written books; which expreſſion is too general, and too much in their favour to have flowed from his pen, could he have charged them with rejecting any of them [u]. Thoſe who will have them to receive only the pentateuch, add another argument to that above-mentioned, and equally inconcluſive, viz. that the other ſacred books did too plainly impugn their particular doctrines; but muſt not they for the ſame reaſon have rejected thoſe of Moſes? Are there not numberleſs inſtances of angels and ſpirits? and are there not likewiſe ſeveral pregnant proofs in them, if not of a reſurrection, at leaſt of the rewards and puniſhments of a future life [w]? The very Phariſees themſelves laid down as a fundamental principle, that it was not enough to believe the resurrection, unless one believed also that it was contained in the law; so they call the pentateuch.

[q] Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 7, & alib. [r] Hieron, in Matth. Orig. cont. Celſ, l. i. Serrar. trihæreſ. l. ii. Prid. ubi ſupra [s] Elench. trihæreſ. cont. Serrar. c. 16. [t] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. [u] Vid. Le Clerc hiſtor. eccleſ. proleg. ſect. 1. ſect. 3. [w] Vid. Scaliger, ubi ſupra.

ADD to all this, that the reading of all the other books in the temple and synagogues having been introduced long before, as we have elsewhere observed †, it is not likely they would have assisted at it; and yet we do not find, that they absented themselves from it, either upon that or any other account. What therefore the learned rabbi last-quoted says of them, seems most probably to have been their case, namely, that they did not reject them, but only expounded them in a different sense from the other Jews.

SOME other pretended erroneous tenets they are charged, by Josephus and the Talmudists, to have held, particularly that of condemning polygamy, as forbid by the Mosaic law; but as they were not opposite to the christian doctrine, nor an obstacle to their receiving it, we shall pass them by. Those we have already mentioned were more than sufficient to frighten them from it. The notion of a future life, universal judgment, eternal rewards and punishments to men, whom a contrary doctrine had long soothed into luxury, and an overgrown fondness for all earthly happiness, which they looked upon as the only reward they were to expect for their obedience, must of necessity appear strange and frightful; and, as such, could not chuse but meet with the strongest opposition from them; especially if we add what Josephus observes, that they were, for the generality, men of the greatest quality and opulence, and consequently too apt to prefer the pleasures and grandeur of this life to those of another. The Jewish historian concludes their character, in opposition to those of his own sect, with telling us, that they were a set of men, churlish and morose towards each other, and cruel and savage to all besides [y].

SOME have looked upon this sect to have been quite cut off at the total destruction of Jerusalem [z]. It is true, indeed, that they were very much weakened and thinned by the Romans on account of their riches and credit; but their doctrines, so pleasing to flesh and blood, were not likely to continue long without fresh advocates. Accordingly, we find them so well revived and numerous in Egypt, even from the middle of the third, or beginning of the fourth, century, that Ammonius, Origen's master, thought it high time to write against againſt them, or rather againſt the Jews, for ſuffering them to propagate their irreligious principles. Some, we are told, are ſtill to be met with in Afric, and elſewhere, who ſtill deny a future life, and hold all the other tenets of that ſect [a]. Perhaps were they leſs odious to the ſober part of mankind, we ſhould find them more numerous than they appear. However, bad as they are, we are told by a Jewiſh chronologer [b] of a learned Spaniſh rabbi, named Alphorag, who in the twelfth century wrote a book in defence of that ſect, wherein he affirmed, that the purity of the Jewiſh religion was only to be found among them; whilſt the Phariſees clogged it with an infinity of needleſs and intolerable ceremonies.

† p. 32. (Z) [x] Glossar. in Sanhedr. Vid. & Menass. Ben Israel, lib. i. de resurrect. mort. c. 6. [y] Bell. Jud. l. ii c. 7 in fin. [z] Vid. Simon. hist. crit. V. T. Prid. connect. ubi supra.

III. The Herodians are ſo little known, that we need not wonder at the vaſt variety of opinions, which both the antient fathers and the moderns have entertained concerning them, and of which the bare mention would ſwell us beyond our bounds. Joſephus, as we hinted above, makes no mention of them; and if the moſt general notion be right, that they were a ſet of men who cried up Herod as the Meſſiah, we need not be ſurpriſed, that this flattering hiſtorian ſhould paſs by a ſect which applied thoſe prophecies to that Jewiſh monarch, with which himſelf was complimenting his favourite emperor Titus Veſpaſian, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. How Philo comes likewiſe to be ſilent of them, is paſt our finding out. Herodians.

FOR it is plain from the evangeliſts, that they made a conſiderable ſect or party in our Saviour's time; that they differed from thoſe of the Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenians; and that they held ſome particular tenets of a dangerous nature, ſince Chriſt thought fit to forewarn his diſciples againſt their leaven [c]. It is true, ſome have confounded them with the Sadducees [d], becauſe St. Matthew, in a parallel place [e], mentions them inſtead of the Herodians. But as they are often mentioned elſewhere, in contradiſtinction to them [f], it is likely, that one evangeliſt only ſupplies what the other has omitted. Hence it follows likewiſe, that they were not a kind of Jewiſh confraternity inſtituted in honour of Herod, and like unto the Roman ſodales, auguſtales, &c. (which were not instituted in that empire till a long time after Herod's death) as some have imagined [g], but a real sect, distinct from the rest in their principles and interests.

[a] Vid. Baſnag. ubi ſupra li. ii. c. 15. paſſ. Calmet differt. de ſect Jud. in. prol in evang. Marc. & al. ſup citat. [b] Gantz Tzemach David. [c] Marc. viii. 15. [d] Hamm Le Clerc & al. in loc, ſup. citat. Harduin. num. [e] Matt. xvi. 6. [f] Conf. loc ſup. citat. cum Matt. xxii. 16. & alib.

THERE is likewise a different opinion concerning them, among those who affirm them to have believed Herod to be the Messiah, namely, which of the kings of that name they gave that title to [h]. Some [i] thought it was to Herod I. surnamed the great, on account of his superior prowess, riches, magnificence, and of his kingdom's extending even beyond Palestine, which was more than any of his successors could boast of. They add, that he caused all the genealogies and records concerning the family of David to be destroyed, to prevent their being urged in opposition to his own lineage. But all this is easily confuted by the single consideration, that if he had been the person whom they took for the Messiah, his dreadful death, which was looked upon as a judgment from heaven, to say nothing of his wicked and hateful reign, would long before have convinced them of their error. Whereas we find them still very numerous, famed, and zealous for their sect in our Saviour's time, above thirty years after that monarch's death. Those therefore, who think that his son Herod, surnamed Antipas, the same who took the infamous Herodias, from his brother Philip, and caused John the Baptist to be beheaded on her account, to have been the Messiah cried up by this sect, seem to judge with more probability. It is true, his dominion was confined within much narrower bounds than his father's; but then it is plain, notwithstanding all Josephus's panegyrics on him, that his ambition was as unlimited; witness his joining in the conspiracy with Sejanus, and the vast magazines he had filled with arms, and of which we shall speak in its proper place. It is not therefore improbable, that this prince, no less politic than ambitious, who is on that account called a Fox by a more impartial judge, might take the advantage of the universal expectation which the Jews were then in of the Messiah, to form a party or sect of parasites, who should give it out that he was the glorious person they looked for; and that nation did not want for men at this time, base enough to flatter his ambition with that sacred title.

HOWEVER

[g] Scalig. anim. in chron. Euseb. 1882. Casaubon. proleg. in exercit. Baronian. [h] Vid. Prid. connect. in fin. part. ii. l, v. Calmet. dissert. de sect. Judæor. & al. [i] Vid. Basnag. hist. des Juifs, tom. 2 part. 2. ch. xxiv.

HOWEVER, other critics have with greater probability reduced that sect into a kind of Herodian faction, set up in opposition to the Pharisees and zealots; and that the Herodians maintained the lawfulness of acknowledging and paying tribute to the kings that were set over them by the Romans, which was absolutely denied by the latter. The former likewise excused several unlawful innovations, which had been made by Herod the Great and his successors, as the effects of necessity rather than choice; whereas the latter cried them down as heathenish, idolatrous, and the effects of a base complaisance for the Roman emperors. Another critic, often quoted in this chapter [k] for his new genealogies of the Herodian family, pretends, that they were a sect of platonic philosophers, whom Antipater had brought from Athens; and adds, that they held pretty much the same doctrines with the Sadducees, or rather that those in Judæa were the same with them. The reader may see that sanguine author sufficiently confuted by Basnage in the place above-quoted. Beza on the contrary infers, that they agreed with the Pharisees in denying the lawfulness of the tribute, from the insnaring question they came to put to our Saviour [l]. But it is rather plain, that their design, and more especially that of the Pharisees, who sent them to him, was of another nature. These had been just before determining at any rate to intangle him in his answers, that they might find some matter to accuse him, because he had been setting forth a parable that touched them to the quick. They therefore sent their own disciples in company with the Herodians to intrap him with the question in dispute between them, Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar [m]? If he answered in the affirmative, they could object against him that he was an impostor, and not what he pretended, the Messiah, who was to free them from all foreign yoke and impost; and upon this they could indent a criminal process against him, which would make them amends for his having given the preference to their antagonists. And if he answered in the negative, they gained a victory over them, and at the same time exposed him to their resentment, or rather to that of the civil power, which, they knew, would not fail to crush both the doctrine and its divine preacher, especially at such a juncture, when there was another new faction started up into a sect, which began to appear somewhat dangerous.

IV. THIS

[k] Hieron. cont. Lucifer. Tertul. de præscript. Epiphan. hæres. Herodian. [l] In Matth. xxii. 16. [m] Vid. Matth. ubi supra, a ver. 2. ad 17.

Gaulonites. IV. This was that of the Gaulonites, so named from Judas the Gaulonite[n], or Galilean, as he is called by St. Luke [o]. It began to appear soon after the banishment of Archelaus, when his teritories were made a Roman province, and the government given to Caponius. For the Jews looking upon this as an open attempt to reduce them into slavery, Judas took the advantage of their discontent to put himself at their head, and to ripen them for an insurrection. Augustus furnished him with a plausible pretence for it, by issuing out his edict to have the whole province of Syria new surveyed and taxed about this time. Judas therefore, who was a man of uncommon ambition, took occasion from it to display all his eloquence, to convince the Jews, that such a submission was no less than base idolatry, and setting up men upon the level with God, who was the only Lord and Sovereign that could challenge their obedience and subjection. The party which he drew after him became in a little time so considerable, that they put every thing into confusion, and laid the foundation for those great mischiefs which ensued, and which will be seen in the sequel.

This sect, as well as that of the Herodians, lasted no longer than till the destruction of Jerusalem; a learned author lately quoted thinks them to have been the same sect, only called by different names, by Josephus and the evangelists †; but what has been said above concerning that of the Herodians, we think, sufficiently shews the contrary. Had their sect been the same, they ought to have been more properly called Anti-herodians, since that monarch's authority was equally exclaimed against by their chief, as that of the Romans; and if their doctrine, against which our Saviour forewarns his disciples, had been the same with that of the Gaulonites, would it not have been equally absurd to have called it the leaven of Herod? Josephus tells us, that it differed in no point but this from that of the Pharisees; and the evangelists introduce the Pharisees and Herodians as coming by one consent to enquire of Christ concerning the lawfulness of the tribute; from all which it seems at least very probable, that they were only two different parties, who split themselves into two extremes from the Pharisaic sect; whilst these last kept, as it were, in a medium between the base complaisance of the Herodians, and the seditious spirit of the Gaulonites, not perhaps so much out of a conscientious principle, principle, much leſs out of any love, either to Herod, or to the Romans, as from a fear of their power and reſentment.

[n] Vid. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1, 2. [o] Acts v. 37. † Vid. Prid. & Basnag. ubi supra.

Eſſenians. V. THE Eſſenians, though not taken notice of by the writers of the New Teſtament, did yet make a conſiderable ſect among the Jews, and are very much celebrated by Joſephus [p], Philo [q], Pliny [r], and ſome of the fathers and other chriſtian writers, both antient and modern [s]; and if they were the ſame with the Haſſidim or Haſdanim, as ſome have thought, we may add alſo, by the books of the Maccabees and other Jewiſh writers. But this laſt is a mere conjecture, founded only on a fancied conformity between ſome of their principles, and auſtere way of living. The far greateſt part of the Eſſenian ſect was chiefly in Egypt; there was but a ſmall number of them in Judæa, probably by reaſon of the grievous perſecutions and inteſtine broils, that raged almoſt perpetually in it. And this may be one reaſon, why the evangeliſts make no mention of it; to which we may add another, namely, that their eremitic life, which ſecluded them from places of great reſort, and their overweening pretence to a ſuperior ſanctity, which inſpired them with a contempt for the reſt of the world, might make them leſs curious about Chriſt's perſon and doctrine. They might think, that if he was really the Meſſiah, he would not fail to come to ſeek them; and if he was not, he had already enemies enough to oppoſe him; and it was beneath them to leave their beloved ſolitude and contemplative life, merely to declare themſelves againſt him. What wonder then, that the ſacred writers ſhould overlook a proud, recluſe, and remote ſect, which neither embraced nor oppoſed the goſpel, and whoſe affectation to a greater and ſupererogatory degree of holineſs ſtood condemned by the frequent cenſures which Chriſt pronounced againſt that of the Phariſees?

IT would be next to impoſſible to trace out their origin, or even the etymology of their name, with any certainty (A). Pliny, [p] Antiq. l. iii. c. 9, 18, 12. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 7. & alib. paſſ. [q] Tract. quod omnis probus liber. [r] Hiſt. lib. v. c. 17. [s] Epiph. hæreſ. 29 de Nazar. c. 4. Suid. ſub. voc. προγονοι Serrar. tri-hæreſ. l. iii. c. 1. & al. inf. citat.

(A) Joſephus has evaded giving us the etymology of that name, moſt probably, becauſe he knew not well where to fetch it from; and Philo, who derives it from the Greek οσιος, holy, owns it to be ungrammatical; but this has not hindered other critics

Pliny, in the place above-quoted, tells us, from what authority is not easy to guess, that they were of several thousand years standing; and, what encreased his wonder, that they had subsisted so long without procreation. But he was in part mistaken, because, though one branch of them condemned all intercourse with the women, as apt to extinguish devotion; there was another sort who declared as much against celibacy, as tending to extinguish the race of mankind, as we shall see in the sequel. But to come to more authentic evidence, the first Essenians we read of are in the fourth book of Maccabees, under the name of Hasdanim [t], and in Josephus [u], where both agree that they werealready settled in Judæa in the time of Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas Maccabæus, about a hundred and fifty years before Christ. We have had occasion to mention, out of these two authors, one Judas, a prophet of that sect, who foretold the death of Antigonus, brother to Aristobulus, then king of the Jews, and which came to pass accordingly, though to the great surprize of even the prophet himself *. And it is not improbable, that this anchoretic sect took its rise a little while before the time of the Maccabees, when the faithful Jews were forced to live in deserts and caves to avoid persecution. As for those who suppose them to have been a branch of the Rechabites, who flourished so long before the Babylonish captivity [w], and of whom we have spoken largely in our fourth volume †; we can only say they guess very much in the dark.

We have already hinted their different opinions concerning marriage and celibacy. Those who allowed the former, were critics from aiming at it. Epiphanius (1) has gone the farthest for it of any, when he derives it from Jesse the father of David, or, as it is to be read, according to the Hebrew, יִשַׁי, jisai or jishai. Salmasius derives it from the city of Essa, mentioned by Josephus, as the place where Zeno had reposited his treasure (2).

[t] cap. 6. [u] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9. & 19. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3, & 7. * See before, sect. 3. p. 210, (C). [w] Vid. Suid. ubi supra. † p. 114, & seq. & (T).

If the reader be curious about such things, he need but read Serrarius (3), where he will find at least a dozen different opinions concerning the derivation of that word, enough, we think, to give him a disgust to etymological conjectures.

(1) Hæres. 29. de Nazar. c. 4. (2) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 23. (3) Trihæres. l. iii. c. 1. Vid. & Calmet. dissert. de sect. Jud.

were yet very ſparing of matrimonial intercourſe, and wholly abſtained from it on the night before the ſabbath and other feſtivals, on faſt-days, and the like; and, at other times, they were no leſs careful to waſh, and uſe other purifications after it. The other branch, who condemned it, did likewiſe diſallow all ſervitude, and thought the diſtinction of maſter and ſervant to be againſt the law of nature, for which reaſon they never indulged themſelves the uſe of the latter; and when any of them was, either through old age, ſickneſs, or other accident, rendered incapable of helping himſelf, he received all proper aſſiſtance from the younger, who all expreſſed an uncommon readineſs, or even emulation, to perform the duty to him. But the other ſort allowed themſelves ſervants for all inferior offices.

THEY likewiſe diſtinguiſhed themſelves, in their rules and manner of life, into laborious and contemplative, otherwiſe called Therapeutes, the firſt ſort of them divided their time between prayer and labour, ſuch as the exerciſe of ſome handicraft, or the cultivation of ſome ſpot of ground, where they ſowed and planted ſuch roots, herbs, corn, &c. as ſerved for their food; and the latter between prayer and contemplation, or ſtudy, In this laſt, they confined themſelves to that of the ſacred books and morality, without troubling themſelves with any other branch of philoſophy. A late learned author has indeed ranked them among the Pyrrhonian or Sceptic philoſophers [x]; and it is true, they were very modeſt in their affirmations in point of divinity, and condemned the dogmatic aſſurance of the other ſects; but that they ever deigned to dive into the writings of the academy or other philoſophers, ſeems improbable, from the ſingular contempt they ſhewed of all the other Jewiſh ſects; how much more, of thoſe of the heathens.

FOR with reſpect even to the former, they refuſed to converſe with them, for fear of contracting ſome pollution; and this notion they carried ſo far, as even to abſent themſelves from going to the temple, and contented themſelves with ſending their offerings to it by other hands.

BOTH the contemplative and laborious had their ſynagogues, their ſtated hours for prayer, for reading, and expounding the ſacred books. This latter province was always performed by the elder ſort, who were ſeated at the upper end, according to their ſeniority, whilſt the younger, who were admitted to read the proper paraſhas or leſſons, were placed placed at the lower end. Their expositions were generally of the allegorical kind, in which they seemed to have outvied all their Jewish brethren. But they paid the greatest regard to the five books of Moses, and looked upon that law-giver as the head of all the inspired penmen; insomuch, that they condemned to immediate death whosoever spoke disrespectfully either of him or of his writings. Upon this account they studied, read, and expounded him more than all the rest, and seem to have chiefly drawn all their divinity from the pentateuch. The doctrines and expositions of the elders were received with implicit faith, and in their practice they conformed with an entire submission to all the rules of their sect. To give a full account of them, were to copy out Josephus and Philo, who have writ more copiously about them, and to whom we chuse rather to refer our readers, who want a fuller detail. As for us, we shall content ourselves with giving them a short sketch, out of those two authors (B), of their faith and practice, as far as they differed from the other Jewish sects.

[x] Huet. foibleſſe de l' entendement, & l. i. c. 14. ſect. 61.

With respect to their faith, they believed the being of angels, the immortality of the soul, a future state of rewards and punishments, like the Pharisees, but seem to have had no notion of the resurrection. They looked upon the souls of men as composed of a most subtile æther, which immediately after their separation from the body, or from their cage or prison, as they affected to call it, were adjudged to a place of endless happiness or misery: that those of the good took their flight over the ocean into some warm and delightful regions prepared for them, whilst those of the wicked were conveyed into some cold and intemperate climates, where they were left to groan under an inexpressible endless weight of misery. Some other Pythagorean notions are likewise attributed to them [y], neither with certainty, nor of great great moment. One thing, however, is remarkable, that among their offerings, which they made to the temple, they never ſent any living creatures to be ſacrificed there. But whether they did it with any regard to the Pythagorean doctrine of tranſmigration, or from any other motive, we will not determine; much leſs pretend to reconcile this abſtinence from bloody ſacrifices with their pretended regard to the Moſaic law and writings, where they are abſolutely injoined.

[y] Vid. Antiq. ubi supra, & l. xv. c. 13. ad. fin.

(B) It will not be amiss to observe to our readers, that their accounts of this sect differ in some particulars, which may be probably owing to the difference there was between those of Judæa and those of Egypt. Josephus, we may reasonably suppose, was better acquainted with the former, and Philo, who was of Alexandria, with the latter; and both may have described them according to the particular informations they had received concerning each.

However, Philo agrees with Josephus, that those of Judæa amounted to but about four thousand, but he makes those of Egypt to have been vastly more numerous.

THEY are likewiſe entirely oppoſed to the Sadducean doctrine of free-will, and attributed all to an eternal fatality or chain of cauſes, little ſhort of that of Spinoſa; ſo that they ſeem to have run into the other extreme, whilſt the Phariſees appear to have a kind of medium between them. The Eſſenians were averſe to all kinds of oaths, and affirmed, that a good man's life ought to be ſuch, as that he may be credited in every thing without them (C), The Therapeutic ſort placed the excellency of their contemplative life in raiſing their minds ſo far above the earth, as to be able to ſee from thence what was done in heaven (D). When they had attained to this degree, they could dive into the nature of

(C) And yet they ſeem to have injoined ſomething like them on their novices, before they were admitted profeſſed numbers of their ſociety; from which ſome conclude, that they did not wholly condemn them, but only ſuch as were tendered or taken without manifeſt and abſolute neceſſity (4).

(D) We need not remind our readers, that every nation and religion, not to ſay every age, has produced men of this ſublime mould, who have trampled all ſublunary things under foot, to raiſe themſelves up to a more intimate acquaintance with the deity. We read among the heathen of Plotinus, a Platonic philoſopher, who pretended to be aſhamed to have a ſoul ſo refined as his, confined into a lump of matter, and of a Porphyry, who boaſted of a viſion and divine intercourſe, even before he was got into his dotage (5).

The Perſes, Mohammedans, and almoſt all the nations of India, have had their Therapeutes and viſion-mongers; and it would be difficult to name one church or ſect of chriſtians, that has not abounded with ſuch myſtical and ſuper rigid enthuſiaſts; but, in ſpight of all their auſterities and pretences to greater degrees of ſanctity and mortification, the uncharitable contempt they have expreſſed for the reſt of the world has eaſily diſcovered what ſpirit they were of.

(4) Vid. int al. Le Clerc, eccleſ. hiſt. prolog. ſect. 5. Calmet. ubi ſupra, & al. (5) De his vid. Bayl. Dict. ſub voc.

of angels, give them proper names, or rightly interpret thoſe already given, and pry ſo far into futurity, as to acquire the character of prophets. We have had occaſion to mention ſome of them already at the beginning of this article, and in the courſe of this chapter. All we need to add is, that when they had once gained this name, they failed not to be highly reſpected, not only by their own fraternity, but by both kings and people. We have ſeen in a former ſection even a Herod ſhew a more than ordinary regard to the whole ſect, for the ſake of one of them, who had foretold his acceſſion to the Jewiſh crown; and at a time when they were ſtrenuouſly oppoſing his favourite ſcheme, of obliging the whole nation to ſwear allegiance to him.

In their practice they outdid all the other ſects in auſterity. If we may credit Philo, it was a fundamental maxim with them, upon their entrance into the Therapeutic life, to renounce the world and all their worldly properties, which they, it ſeems, generouſly divided among their friends and relations, whom they left behind them in it (E). They never eat till after ſun-ſet, and the beſt of their fare was coarſe bread, with ſome ſalt and hyſſop, or ſome ſuch ſtomachic herbs. Some of them, if we may believe Philo, would eat but every third, and others every ſixth day; and all of them very ſparingly, even of that poor chear they were allowed. Their cloathing was made of coarſe wool, plain, but white. They condemned all ſorts of unctions and perfumes as luxurious and effeminate. Their beds were hard, and their ſleep ſhort. In a word, as they looked upon all theſe auſterities as the moſt effectual means to procure the favour of heaven and the eſteem of the brotherhood, to ſay nothing of that of the world, they never thought they could carry them to exceſs. Their heads or ſuperiors were generally choſen according to ſeniority, unleſs there ſtarted up ſome of the brotherhood more conſpicuous for learning, piety, prophetic ſpirit, or any other diſtinguiſhing merit. But ſome there were ſo very contemplative, that they never ſtirred

(E) Our authors have forgot to tell us, how this ſet of men lived after their admiſſion into that ſect, if they left all their worldly ſubſtance behind; ſince they were not, like the other branch, allowed to follow any trade, or to cultivate any land, but divided their time between prayer and ſtudy, or contemplation; and had neither wives nor ſervants to provide food for them, nor any other viſible means, that we can find, to ſubſiſt (6) ſtirred out of their cell, nor even looked out at a window during the whole week. Theſe ſpent their time in reading the ſacred books and writing comments upon them.

(6) Vid. Le Clerc ubi ſupra.

On the ſabbath they repaired to their ſynagogues early in the morning, and continued the whole day there in prayers, ſinging of pſalms, reading, or in expounding the ſacred books; at which time they kept themſelves in the profoundeſt ſilence. The feaſt of pentecoſt was obſerved by them with greater ſolemnity than other feſtivals, in memory, it ſeems, of the Iſraelites paſſing the Red-Sea, and of that ſolemn euchariſtical hymn, which was alternately ſung by the choirs of men and women, with Aaron and Miriam at their head. In imitation of which, both ſexes, during this feaſt, went early to the ſynagogue in their white habit, newly waſhed; and after the uſual prayers, reading, &c. the men and the women, each in their ſeparate choir, ſet themſelves a ſinging and dancing, moving regularly backwards and forwards, to the right and left, and from each other, till at length their devotion was raiſed to ſuch a pitch, that they forgot the difference of ſexes, and both choirs intermingled, and continued dancing and ſinging the whole night. On the next morning they faced about towards the ſun riſing, their uſual poſition at prayers, paid their adoration to the Supreme Being, wiſhed each other a good day, and retired each to their reſpective cells. To all this we may add, that they had ſome other more ſecret rites or myſteries relating to their ſect, which, like the Pythagoreans, they were bound never to divulge, and which it were therefore in vain to enquire after.

Those of Judæa did live, according to Joſephus [z], in a deſart in the neighbourhood of Hebron, about twenty miles ſouth of Jeruſalem.

This city, which we have ſpoken in of a former volume †, being generally ſuppoſed the place of John the Baptiſt's birth, it is not improbable, that he was ſent thither to be brought up among them, and lived with them till the time of his manifeſting himſelf to the Jewiſh nation [a]. But as for thoſe who have imagined that Chriſt and his diſciples had alſo been of that ſect, becauſe they pretend to ſee ſome conformity between ſome of his precepts and way of ~~living~~ and thoſe of the Eſſenians, they are not worth confuting, ſince ſince there runs rather a manifeſt oppoſition almoſt through the whole. However, thoſe who will not be at the trouble to compare them, may ſee that wild notion fully confuted by the authors quoted in the margin [b], as well as another, no leſs improbable, though leſs abſurd; that the Egyptian Therapeutes were a ſociety of chriſtian hermits inſtituted by St. Mark, when he founded the church of Alexandria [c]. For Philo, who was at leaſt cotemporary with the evangeliſt, if not older, ſpeaks of them [d] as a fraternity of a much longer ſtanding, and as of Jews and zealous diſciples of Moſes, and ſtricter obſervers of the ſabbath, than any other Jewiſh ſect; having amongſt them hymns and writings compoſed in former times, by thoſe who had been the principal leaders and heads of their ſect; diſperſed not only through Egypt, but among the Greeks and Barbarians, &c. Nothing of all which could have been ſaid of ſuch a ſociety of chriſtian hermits, ſuppoſing St. Mark had really inſtituted any thing like it. But we find no traces of any ſuch inſtitution till the beginning of the ſecond century, when thoſe aſcetics, who had formerly fled from perſecution, finding the ſweets of their ſolitude, began to erect themſelves into bodies, the earlieſt of which, that we read of, was, according to the two learned authors above-quoted, in or about the year of Chriſt 113 [e].

[z] Vid. Antiq. ubi ſupra, & l. xv. c. 13 ad fin. † Vol. ii. p. 170, and p. 399, (G). [a] ubi ſupra.

Others have believed, that the Eſſenians and Therapeutes did afterwards renounce judaiſm, and convert to chriſtianity; and it is not improbable, that many of them did ſo; but that the bulk of the ſect embraced chriſtianity, and became, as it were, abſorbed into the ſocieties of the chriſtian aſcetics, is hard to affirm. If it be asked, What became of them, and of all their boaſted writings and comments, if this was not the caſe? it may be anſwered, that thoſe who perſevered in their old ſect, underwent the ſame fate with the reſt of the Jews, and in a much greater number, as being become more odious to the Romans on account of their extreme conſtancy, under thoſe grievous perſecutions, which they raiſed againſt them. This might probably be alſo the cauſe why their books were more univerſally deſtroyed than thoſe thoſe of the other Jews; though even of theſe we have nothing left but the Chaldee paraphraſe, of which we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place. We ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to ſhew, that the Eſſenians flouriſhed ſtill under the emperor Trajan, though much degenerated from their primitive purity of life and doctrine, under their new demagogue Elxai. Under Juſtinian they were ſtill known by the pompous title of angels, or angelics, and inhabitants of heaven; but, as their lives were found to fall infinitely ſhort of thoſe beings, whoſe names they aſſumed, the people ſaw through the cheat, and this was in all likelihood their laſt blaſt upon their going out, for we hear no more of them from that time.

[b] Vid. Luke i. ver. ult. [c] Baſnag. hiſt. des Juifs, tom. 4. l. ii. c. 22. & ſeq. Prid. Connect. part 2 ſub fin. l. v. [d] Euſeb. Eccl Hiſt. l. ii. c. 17. Bellarm. Baron. Vid. & Montfauc. diſſert. de Chriſt. Terapeut. ap. Baſnag. ubi ſupra. [e] lib. ſup. citat. [f] Druſ. Trigland. Baſnag. Prid. Calmet. & al, ubi ſupra.

We have now gone through all the Jewiſh ſects that made any figure in our Saviour's time, and might here put an end to this digreſſion, if it may be called ſuch; but foraſmuch as there is ſtill one in being, and very conſiderable, as we have hinted in a former volume †, who derive their origin from the famous Ezra and the great ſynagogue, and are oppoſed to the reſt in ſome of their fundamentals, it will not be amiſs to ſpeak ſomething of them, before we conclude this ſection. They are called Caraim, or Karraites (F); that is, Scripturiſts, or perſons wholly addicted to the reading of, and thoroughly verſed in, the ſacred writings.

It is not eaſy to determine when this ſect firſt began. We have hinted above what claim they lay to antiquity and authority. They boaſt even a catalogue or regiſter of all the learned who have written or taught either for or againſt their ſect from the time of Eſdras [f]. Some of thoſe that are diſperſed in Poland, pretend to carry it ſtill higher, and that they were deſcended from the ten tribes carried away by Shalmanezer. The Rabbiniſts ſeem, however, to allow them to have been a ſect at leaſt as old as the time of Alexander the Great, when they tell us, that Jaddua the then high-

† Vol. iii. p 168.

[f] Baſnag. ubi ſupra, Tom. II. prat. 2. c. 16.

(F) קראים from the verb kara, to read (7). As they rejected all the other writings but thoſe of the Jewiſh canon, and the pretended oral tradition ſo much cried up by the Phariſees; it is perhaps upon this account, that the Rabbiniſts, their bittereſt enemies, have imputed moſt of the Sadducean errors to them (8), tho' this be the only point in which they agreed with them.

(7) Vide Buxtorf. lexic. ſub voce קרא. (8) Vide Abraban. append. in Hacoſri. edit. a Buxtorf.

prieſt wrought a miracle before that prince, which the two chiefs of the Caraites could not imitate; but this may be put in the number of their fabulous miracles, of which they are never ſparing, whenever any competition between the other ſects and their own is in queſtion; witneſs thoſe which they urge againſt the Samaritans, of which we have ſpoken in a former ſection *. We ſhall give in the margin ſome of the different opinions concerning their origin (G), whilſt we ſtick

* See before, p. 70 in fin not. (E).

(G) The learned Wolf of Hamburgh has given us the origin of the Caraites, written from the memoirs of one of that ſect, named Mordecai; in which this laſt affirms, that Alexander Jannæus having put to death all the learned Jews of his time, Simeon, the ſon of Seta and brother of the queen, was privately conveyed into Egypt, where he invented the ſyſtem of the pretended Jewiſh oral tradition, and being returned to Jeruſalem, began to teach it publicly, pretending, that he was intruſted with all thoſe diſcoveries which God had made to Moſes, and were from him conveyed through a ſeries of hands and ages down to his time. This ſyſtem was embraced by ſome, and as ſtrenouſly oppoſed by others, who affirmed, that the whole will of God to their law-giver was contained in the ſacred writings. From theſe laſt came the ſect of the Caraites, as that of the Rabbiniſts or Traditioniſts did from the former. The ſame author adds, that Judas the ſon of Sabbai became eminent among the former, and Hillel famous among the latter (9).

Another author (10) thinks, that thoſe two ſects ſplit themſelves ſoon after the death of the prophets, upon a diſpute about works of ſupererogation; one ſort maintaining the neceſſity of them from tradition, and the other denying it on the authority of the ſacred writings. Theſe were the Caraites, who thereupon pretended to be deſcended from the prophets Haggai, Malachi, &c. But whatever was the occaſion of their diviſion, they conceived ſuch an irreconcileable hatred againſt each other, that they think no name or language bad enough. Among other epithets, the Rabbiniſts call their opponents mamzerim, or baſtards, a term of the greateſt reproach among the Jews †; and the Caraites, in return, give them the title of bridled aſſes, on account of their broad phyladeries and other ſuperſtitious trinkets, which theſe place a great deal of religion in, and the others deteſt. The former interpret the words of Moſes (11), Thou ſhalt bind them (the ſtick here to the moſt probable; which is, that they were the ſucceſſors of the Scribes ſo often mentioned by the evangeliſts (H), ſuch as were thoſe whom Herod the Great con-

(9) Volf. notit. Caræorum. (10) Trigland. diſſertat. de Carait. Delph. 1703. Vide Calmet ſub voce Caraite. † De his vide Vol. iii. p 321, (N). (11) Deut. vi. 8.

 fulted

(the divine precepts) for a ſign upon thine hand, and they ſhall be as frontlets between thine eyes, &c. literally; and the others only as a precept injoining them to have a conſtant regard to, and remembrance of, them. We have obſerved in a former volume, that their mutual hatred is ſuch, that no conſideration can move them to intermarry *. A modern Rabbiniſt adds, that if a Caraite had a mind to turn Traditioniſt, theſe would even refuſe to admit him (12); and it is a common ſaying among the latter, that before a Caraite be admitted among them, he ſhould have firſt turned Jew, and then chriſtian, elſe they could not believe his converſion ſincere.

(H) The ſcribes, in Hebrew סֹפְרִים ſopherim, or writers, are mentioned for the firſt time in the ſong of Deborah (13), tho' ſome have put Moſes at the head of that tribe. They are often ſpoken of in the books of Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra, as perſons in the higheſt dignities of the Jewiſh commonwealth. It is not unlikely, that David did appoint ſome ſuch order, when he regulated the claſſes of the prieſts, levites, &c. (14), ſince there muſt have been proper ſecretaries, which is the right meaning of ſopherim, in church, in ſtate, in the army. revenues, &c. And as writing was not ſo univerſally practiſed in thoſe days, thoſe who excelled in it had a fair claim for ſuch an office; but theſe being manifeſtly different from thoſe mentioned in the goſpel, we ſhall puſh our inquiry about them no further.

After the return from the captivity, when the canon of the ſcripture was reviſed by Ezra and his inſpired aſſociates, mentioned in a former ſection ‡, it is very probable, the multiplying and propogating, as well as the reviſing, the copies of it, which were then very ſcarce, was committed to thoſe ſopherim or ſcribes, who, by a conſtant converſe with thoſe writings, attained to a ſtill greater knowledge of them, and ſo came at length to ſet up for teachers and expounders of them, and to the name of ſcribe, had that likewiſe added of doctor or teacher of the law. Accordingly we find one of them called by the former name in one evangeliſt (15), and by the latter in another (16); and both they and the Phariſees are ſaid by our Saviour to ſit in Moſes's ſeat (17).

Theſe therefore cannot be ſaid to have made a ſeparate ſect, as ſome antients have imagined (18), but to have been ſome of one,

* Vol iii. p. 168. (12) Vide Leo. de modern. cerem. Jud. part 5. c. 1. (13) Judg. v. 14 (14) Vide int. al. 1 Chron. xxiv. 6. xxvii 32. ‡ Vol. x. p. 29, 30 (Y) (15) Mark xii. 28. (16) Matth. xxii. 35. (17) Ibid. xxiii. 2. (18) Epiph. hæreſ. Auth. of the recognit, &c.

ſulted about the place where the Meſſiah was to be born [g]. Theſe therefore, it is very likely, after the Phariſaic ſect came to have clogged the Jewiſh religion with ſuch a vaſt number of traditions, as rendered it wholly burdenſome, if not intolerable, became ſo out of conceit with them, that they reſolved to throw them all off, and to ſtick cloſe to the text; for which they had the name of Caraites or Scripturiſts, either given them out of contempt, or took it by way of diſtinction from the Traditioniſts. The difficulty is to find out the time when, and the perſons by whom, this breach was at firſt made, and doubtleſs the teſtimony of the Caraites themſelves, who go either as far back as Ezra, or, at the lateſt, as the times of Hyrcan or Alexander Jannæus, will appear too ſuſpicious. But that of the Talmudiſts, who allow them, ſome as antient as Saddoc, or at leaſt as Herod the Great, may be leſs liable to ſuſpicion; and where is the difficulty of ſuppoſing, that whilſt the Sadducees diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the reſt, as well by their Epicurean doctrines, as by their rejection of the Phariſaic traditions, another more moderate ſect might cloſe in with them in this laſt, without running into thoſe other extremes of the Sadducean leaven, which, they ſaw, were manifeſtly deſtructive of all religion, and ſo compoſe a new ſect, differing from them in all points but that, and from the Phariſees in that only one (I)? However, they ſeem one, ſome of another; ſince it is obvious, that every one of them muſt have had their doctors and expounders, and all juſtly enough liable to thoſe ſevere cenſures which our Saviour pronounced againſt them, for putting each their ſeveral gloſſes on the text, inferring new and detrimental doctrines from it, and impoſing them on their diſciples, with as much arrogance as if they had been all infallible or inſpired. However, ſince we find theſe ſcribes and lawyers or doctors of the law to be often mentioned with the Phariſees (19), it is likely, they were more numerous in that ſect, than in any other; or rather perhaps, if we conſider how neceſſary ſuch men were in church and ſtate, of how long a ſtanding they muſt conſequently have been, they may be looked upon as the root or trunk from which all the others ſprang and divided themſelves, according as their reſpective views, intereſt, education, pride, and ſuch like motives led them.

[g] Matth. ii. 4. Vide Baſnag. ubi ſupra.

(I) The Rabbinic writers do accordingly accuſe the Caraites for having been more favourable to Jeſus Chriſt than any other ſect;

(19) Vide Matth. ubi ſupra, & alib. paſſ. Acts xxiii 9.

ſeem to have been more moderate, than to have abſolutely rejected all traditions and writings. They, on the contrary, uſed them as helps, whenever they found them judicious and well-founded, and only denied them that blind and implicit obedience which the Phariſees inſiſted on; but whether thoſe ſects divided themſelves ſo early as the reign of Hyrcan or Alexander Jannæus, or whether in that famous rupture between Shammai and Hillel, about one hundred years before Chriſt, or about what time after (K); whether firſt in Judæa,

ſect; and the evangeliſt ſeems to confirm it, when he introduces a ſcribe (20) applauding our Saviour's anſwer concerning the firſt and chief command, and agreeing with him, that the love of God, above all things, and of our neighbour as ourſelves, was of more worth than all burnt-offerings, &c.

It is true, he ſeems to be called a Phariſee in a parallel place (21); but Baſnage has judiciouſly obſerved (22), that the pronoun "them" did not refer to the Phariſees mentioned in the foregoing verſe, who, being confuted juſt before, were then gone to take counſel together, but to the multitude in the verſe before that, who gladly heard Chriſt's nervous anſwers to thoſe enſnaring ſectaries. We may add, that the anſwer there given by the ſcribe, was more like that of a ſober Caraite, than of a ſuperſtitious, hypocritical Phariſee.

That there ſeems to have been a manifeſt difference between theſe laſt and the ſcribes and lawyers, the above-quoted author ſhews from another evangeliſt, who introduces the laſt of theſe hearing patiently the woes which Chriſt pronounced againſt the Phariſees; but when he came to join the ſcribes with them, he complained loudly of it (23). Our Saviour's anſwer to him confirms it ſtill more, when he added, Wo alſo unto you lawyers, and laid a new charge againſt them, different from that of the Phariſees.

(K) Morinus places the riſe of the Caraites about the year after Chriſt 740 or 750, about which time, and not before, he ſuppoſes the Talmud to have been completed, and to have given occaſion to their ſeparation (24). He adds, upon the authority of a good number of Rabbies, that one Ananus, vexed to ſee his brother preferred before him to the dignity of chief of the captivity, began to declare himſelf againſt the compilers and defenders of that work, as giving a divine authority to a book, which was moſtly ſtuffed with fables, and drew a party after him.

We

(20) Mark xii. 28. (21) Matth. xxii. 35, & ſeq. (22) Ubi ſupra, c. 17. Sect. 10. (23) Luke xi, 44. & ſeq. (24) Exercit. bibl. l. ii. Exercit. vi. c. 2. vii. c. 1. Vide Baſnag. ubi ſupra, Sect. 19.

dæa or Egypt, (L), is at beſt but conjecture; and we hope we have given it the beſt light we are able to get.

We

We ſhall have a more proper opportunity in the ſequel to fix the time in which it was completed, and ſhall only obſerve here, that the authority of theſe Rabbies is not only very ſuſpicious in a caſe of this nature, but is contradicted by others of older date, whom we have mentioned at the head of this article. Beſides, what we have ſaid hitherto makes it more probable, that they were of much earlier date, and that the rupture which the publication of the Talmud occaſioned, might be only a revival of their old diſpute, and the giving of a new life to the ſect. Sure it is, that ſome of the fathers, who are of much greater authority, have mentioned them long before (25), if not by the name of Caraites, at leaſt by that of Scribes, who rejected all oral traditions, and ſtuck cloſe to the letter of the ſacred books. The reader may ſee another proof of it in the next note.

(L) Euſebius tells us (26), that in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, the Jews in Egypt were divided into two parties, the one of which expounded the Moſaic law allegorically, and the other litterally; which latter was part of the Caraites character. We might further alledge, the book Hachoſri, to which the Rabbies give a very great antiquity, and which introduces the king Coſroes as a great admirer of the Caraitic ſect, becauſe they were more zealous for the law, till his Rabbinic teachers acquainted him with the vaſt variety of opinions that were among them, for want of admitting the oral tradition, which fixed the ſenſe of the ſacred writings. We have elſewhere indeed had occaſion to ſhew, that this book is far enough from being ſo antient as they make it †; but it ſhews, however, how little reaſon Morinus had to make them ſo recent as the eighth century, upon the teſtimony of ſome partial Rabbins, againſt that of a number of others of more antient date, ſome of whom own them to have appeared even in the time of the Aſmoneans, others of the Sadducees, and others of Herod (27), to ſay nothing of that of the fathers above quoted.

If it be objected, that Joſephus has ſaid nothing of them when he ſpoke of the other ſects which reigned in his time, the argument will equally hold againſt the Herodians, which yet ſeem to have been very conſiderable. That hiſtorian might have his reaſons for paſſing them by in ſilence. Had he ſpoke well of them, he would have diſobliged his own ſect, ſeeing he was a Phariſee; had he ſpoke ill of them, the Herodians might have expoſed him to the reſentment of that family, and even of the Romans, in whoſe

(25) Orig. in Matth. xiii. 52. Epiphan. hæreſ. xv. Hieron. in Iſai. viii. 14. (26) Præp. evangel. l. viii. c. 10. † Vide ſupra, Vol. iii. p 455, (27) Vide Trigland. de Carait. c. 3. Drus. trihær. Baſnag. Calmet, Prid. &c ubi ſupra.

We ſhall now give a ſhort ſummary of their particular tenets, as they are oppoſed to thoſe of the other ſects.

1. They look upon the canonical books of the old teſtament as the only rule of their faith, and reject the apocryphal as of no authority, together with the pretended oral tradition of the Phariſees, as the wicked inventions of an incroaching and deſigning ſet of men; for which reaſon they have the utmoſt abhorrence for the Talmud.

2. They expound ſcripture by ſcripture; and, where that cannot be done, they call in the aſſiſtance of reaſon, and the writings and comments of other doctors, tho' without paying too implicit a regard to the latter.

3. They commonly read the ſcriptures in their ſynagogues in the original, eſteeming it next to impoſſible to come at their true meaning from any tranſlation of them; for this reaſon they are careful to inſtruct their children betimes in that ſacred tongue; and if they ſuffer any verſion of them, it is only for the uſe of thoſe of the meaner ſort, who are not acquainted with the Hebrew.

4. Their prayers are likewiſe in that tongue, as being the moſt holy and energic, and the only one in which the incommunicable name of God can be properly pronounced; for they are not ſo ſcrupulous in this reſpect as the other Jews, who always read it Adonai, but pronounce it Jehovah as we do. Only in their writings, prayer-books, &c. they chuſe to write it only with a vau between two jods. In their prayers, wherein they expreſs a much greater fervency and devotion than the reſt, they always turn their faces towards Jeruſalem.

5. They expect, like the reſt of the Jews, the reign of the Meſſiah to be a temporal and glorious one, and attribute his long delay, partly to the ſlowneſs of Saturn's motion, which they make the ruling planet of the ſabbath † and of the Jewiſh nation, and partly to their ſins, which have provoked God to ſuſpend the ſending of him at the promiſed time, whoſe behalf we have ſeen they divided themſelves from the Phariſees and Gaulonites; and as to the Caraites, they might not be ſo guilty in his eyes as they appeared to the oppoſite ſects. Joſephus had too much ſenſe to run all the lengths, and ſwallow all the fabulous ſtories of the Traditioniſts, tho', like a thorough-paced ſtateſman, he outwardly joined with the moſt prevaling ſide.

† De hoc vide Vol. iii. p. 468, (L).

time (M); for this reaſon they forbid the calculating the time of his coming under the ſevereſt anathemas.

6. THEY entertain the higheſt and juſteſt notions of the Deity and of his perfections, and attributes. They affirm his providence to be as extenſive and unlimited as his knowledge; and at the ſame time allow, that mankind has a freedom to determine himſelf; but that God gave unto every man a portion of his univerſal grace to aſſiſt him in his right choice; and that our wills being influenced by our tempers and conſtitutions, but chiefly by the ſtars, makes that grace very neceſſary. They have a four fold diſtinction of this diſpoſition of the ſoul, the one of ſickneſs, the other of health, the third of life, the fourth of death. This diſtinction ſeems to have been alluded to by our Saviour in ſeveral places of the goſpel; as where he ſpeaks of the dead burying the dead; that not the whole, but the ſick, have need of a phyſician, and ſome others of the like nature.

7. THEIR morality was not inferior to their divinity. It kept a kind of medium between the auſtere Eſſenian and the epicurean Sadducee. Of the two they rather inclined to the former in point of abſtemiouſneſs, whether of eating, drinking, or any other lawful pleaſures.

8. THEY believe a future life of rewards and puniſhments, according to mens good or bad actions in this (N); that the ſouls come from heaven; that the future life was made for them, and that they will ſubſiſt there as the angels do.

9. WE have already hinted, that they condemned the Phylacteries of the Phariſees. They had no leſs an abhorrence for all kind of pictures, that were uſed either by heathens, or afterwards by chriſtians, for a religious uſe, or, as they term it, to be worſhipped; and condemned the other ſects for being remiſs enough in that point, to make a traffick of them for gain.

10. THEY

(M) The reader may remember, that we have lately had occaſion to confute this ridiculous pretence, and the cauſe from which it ſprung (28), which, it ſeems by this, was not ſo confined to the carnal Phariſees and Sadducees, but their more ſober and mortified ſects gave into it.

(N) Tho' they held this in oppoſition to the Sadducees, whom they therefore accuſed of maintaining the annihilation of the ſoul; yet we do not find that they believed the reſurrection with the Phariſees.

(28) Vol. x. p. 342, 343. in fin not. (Z).

10. THEY rejected the astronomical calculations as introduced after the captivity for settling the new moons and other festivals of the year; such as we have had occasion to mention more than once in the course of this chapter †. Whereas the Traditionists denied their being an innovation, and pretended, that they had been invented by Moses, and had been as much in vogue before, as since their return from Babylon.

UPON all these, and some other less material differences, there was such an irreconcileable hatred intailed between those two sects, as came little short of persecution. They not only charge each other with heresy, with perverting the scriptures, and corrupting religion; but pronounce the bittersest anathemas they can meet with in the sacred books against each other, and that publicly and solemnly; so that where either of them, especially the Pharisees, are most numerous or powerful, the others must hear themselves cursed, without daring to resist or complain (O). The late Mr. Ludolph, who had been much conversant among them, told several of his acquaintance both in England and Holland, that he saved the life of a poor Caraite at Frankfort, who, if he had not protected him, took him home, and sent him away privately, had been in danger of being either torn into pieces, or of being starved there [h]. This mutual hatred and contempt is carefully propagated both by the parents to the children, and much more by the masters to the disciples, over whom they usurp such an uncontroulable authority, that † Vide int. al. p. 155, 156, & not. (K). [h] Basnag. ubi supra, c. 7. sect. 25.

(O) This, we are told (29), is practised in Palestine, where the Rabbinists, by far the more numerous and wealthy, assemble themselves on mount Olivet on the feast of tabernacles, and there pronounce all the curses of the law against the Caraites, who are often within the hearing of them; for tho' we find their sect dispersed through many of the northern regions, such as Poland, Lithuania, Muscovy, &c. besides those that are to be met with in great numbers in Turky, where they enjoy much greater liberty; yet they prefer Judæa to all other countries, and would gladly live there rather than at Constantinople, Cairo, and other great cities, were they are permitted to live peaceably, and free from the curses and other ill-offices of their inveterate enemies.

(29) Basnag. ubi supra, sect. ult.

that it is next to blaſphemy and rebellion to contradict or diſobey them.

AMONG the Caraites, above all other ſects, the diſciples have ſuch profound reſpect for their doctors, that they neither ſit down before them till they are bid, nor go from them without their leave; and then they go backwards, keeping ſtill their faces turned towards them. They never ſpeak to or of them, without the title of lord, maſter, or ſome ſuch like term of ſubmiſſion. The doctors on the other hand, who are averſe to the Pharaſaic pride, treat them with great gentleneſs and humanity, and, for the generality, teach their ſcholars gratis; ſo that one may ſay, upon the whole, the Caraites are by far the moſt religious, rational, and, bating their carnal notion of the Meſſiah's reign, the beſt diſpoſed to embrace the goſpel of any other ſect; and we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that among the many thouſands of that ſtubborn nation, whom the appoſtles converted to chriſtianity, the far greater number of them flocked to it from that quarter; whilſt the proud Phariſees, full of their ſuperſufficient knowledge and righteouſneſs, and intoxicated with an invincible fondneſs for their own traditions, and the carnal Sadducees, contented with the enjoyments of this life, and regardleſs, if not averſe to the thoughts of a future, ſpared no pains or artifice, cruelty or injuſtice to oppoſe a doctrine ſo grating and contrary to theirs. This being therefore the ſtate of the Jews at the coming of the Meſſiah, we need not wonder at the reception which both he and his doctrine met with from them; eſpecially when, inſtead of that glorious, warlike, conqueror they had been made to expect, they ſaw him in the humble guiſe of the poor, illiterate, ſon of an obſcure carpenter.

SECT. VI.

The hiſtory of the Jews, from the birth to the death of CHRIST.

Herod's diſtracted ſtate reſumed.

THE reader may remember, that we left Herod in the moſt diſtracted ſtate that can be well imagined; his conſcience ſtung with the moſt lively grief for the murder of his beloved and virtuous Mariamne and of her two worthy ſons; his life and crown in imminent danger from the rebellious Antipater and ungrateful Pheroras; his reign ſtained with rivers of innocent blood; his latter days imbittered by the treacherous intrigues of a helliſh ſiſter; his perſon and family hated

hated by the whole Jewiſh nation; and laſt of all his crown and all his glories on the eve of being obſcured by the birth of a miraculous child, who is proclaimed by heaven and earth to be the promiſed and long expected Meſſiah and Saviour of the world. To all theſe plagues we muſt add ſome freſh intelligences which came tumbling in upon that wretched monarch; and which, by aſſuring him ſtill more, not only of the treaſonable deſigns of the unnatural Antipater, but alſo of the bitter complaints which his other two ſons, then at the Roman court, did vent againſt them both, rendered him more than ever completely miſerable. Had theſe two princes continued in their duty to him, they would have been a ſupport and comfort, tho' his favourite one had proved the traitor they had repreſented him; but whom could he truſt to, when there was not one of his family left, that did not in ſome meaſure declare himſelf an enemy to him? This was the dreadful view in which he beheld himſelf and his unnatural offspring; not that thoſe two young princes were really ſo deveſted of all filial affection, as they were repreſented to him by Antipater and his inſtruments; but it had been his and their conſtant care and ſtudy, by ſuch vile miſrepreſentations, to render them more and more ſuſpected to the jealous king. Their letters were generally filled with the pretended injurious reflections which thoſe two ſons whiſpered againſt him; ſuch as his having unjuſtly murdered thoſe of Mariamne, and their dread of being recalled into Judæa to be made to undergo the ſame fate. Antipater indeed acted under cloſer covert, and whilſt he ſeemed, as it were, unwillingly to confirm all theſe accuſations, pretended to excuſe them as the effects of raſhneſs and youth, which time and conſideration would ſoon rectify; and indeed ſo taken up was he, either in cultivating theſe diſcords, or in procuring himſelf friends at Rome and Jeruſalem by his profuſe liberality, that he ſeems to have been wholly ignorant of the diſcoveries which the rack had extorted from his agents in Judæa, eſpeeially upon the death of Pheroras, of which we gave an account in the laſt ſection.

Antipater's cabals againſt his two brothers.

It is indeed ſurpriſing, that none of his friends in Judæa ſhould have ſent him ſome private intelligence of what had paſſed at the dreadful ſcene, and warned him to ſecure himſelf betimes from his father's reſentment; but ſo intent was he on the means of ridding himſelf of him and ſeizing on his crown, that he even furniſhed him with freſh proofs againſt himſelf, by ſending a freſh ſupply of poiſon to his mother, by means of a freed man of his, in caſe the old one should in any ways have miscarried. Batillus, that was the servant's name, was no sooner arrived at Jerusalem, than Herod, who by this time had unravelled the whole plot, caused him to be apprehended and put to the rack; upon which he confessed the purport of his errand from Rome. Herod, the better to conceal his resentment against his treacherous son, sent him immediately a letter, in which he seemed to complain only of some ill treatment from his mother, and charged him at the same time to make what haste he could to Jerusalem, that his absence might no longer give his enemies a handle to obstruct his interest in the succession. He concluded with a promise, that immediately upon his arrival he would obliterate all past miscarriages, and give him all the marks of paternal affection that he should desire [a].

ſhould

Batillus's confession on the rack.

Antipater comes back to Jerusalem.

ANTIPATER, still ignorant of what had passed in Judæa, and thinking his father by this time poisoned and in his grave, was set out for Judæa, being as eager to reach Jerusalem, as his father to get him thither; but when he was come to Tarentum, he received a dispatch from some of his friends, which acquainted him with the particulars of Pheroras's death. The news gave him a terrible shock, not indeed so much out of love to the deceased, as because he found by it, that he had missed his aim of poisoning the king. He pursued, however, his journey as far as Celenderis, a city in Sicily, where being taken with a qualm at the thoughts of the affront put upon his mother, who, as we observed in the last section, had been banished the court and stripped of all her riches, which he looked upon as an ill omen; he stopped some time there, to consult with his friends, whether he had best proceed, or go back. At length some of them having flushed him with the sanguine hopes, that his appearance at court would dispel all his father's suspicions, he got on board again, and in a little while landed at Sebaste. Here he met with a more mortifying omen, than that of his mother's disgrace; and, instead of those acclamations and good wishes with which numerous crouds had followed him to the ship, he heard nothing but the bittereſt curses from the Jews against himself, as the bloody murderer of Mariamne's two brave sons [b].

WHILST Herod was impatiently waiting his arrival, he had not been negligent of what he thought perhaps a more important care, namely, the destroying of his new-born rival at Bethlehem,

[a] Antiq. l. xvii. c. 6. [b] Ibid. c. 7. sub. init.

lehem, whom he ſuppoſed to be ſtill there. Finding himſelf therefore diſappointed by the wiſe men, from whom he expected a more particular information concerning him, that he might be ſure of not miſſing his victim, he iſſued forth an order to have all the male infants maſſacred, not only in that city, but in all the coaſts round about, from two years old and under (F); and, by that horrid ſlaughter, verified the oracle long before delivered by one of the prophets, which the reader will find in the margin (G) [c]. But providence had

The children at Bethlehem maſſacred.

[c] Matth. ii. 16, & ſeq.

(F) An author of the fifth century tells us (36), that Herod had alſo a ſon there at nurſe, who was maſſacred among the reſt, and that it was upon this occaſion, that Auguſtus made that reflection upon him, that it was better be Herod's hog, than his ſon. But it is more likely, that that emperor, hearing about the ſame time of the death of Antipater, which happened about ſix weeks after this horrid ſlaughter, and recollecting that alſo of his other two ſons, might make him break out into that bitter ſarcaſm againſt ſuch an unnatural father; beſides, it is hardly probable that Herod, old, crazed, and diſtracted as he was, could have any children ſo young.

It is ſomething ſurpriſing, that Joſephus, who was in no caſe ſparing of Herod's character, ſhould yet have omitted ſuch a material occurrence. The chriſtians have taxed him, and juſtly too, with partiality, as having concealed it, to avoid giving ſuch a countenance to the evangeliſt, and ſuch an ample teſtimony to the Meſſiah, as might offend his whole nation, and more particularly the Phariſaic brother-hood, who had been his moſt inveterate enemies.

On the other hand, there have not been wanting thoſe, who, preferring the authority of the Jewiſh hiſtorian to that of St. Matthew, have made uſe of the one, among many other topics, to cry down the other. The controverſy is ſo recent in every body's memory, that we need not here repeat it; eſpecially conſidering, that it is out of our province to enter into a diſpute, which, we think, has been ſufficiently decided in favour of the latter.

As to what may be objected, that Joſephus has not ſcrupled in another place to give Jeſus Chriſt a moſt noble character; we ſhall only ſay here, that that paſſage has been ſhrewdly ſuſpected of forgery, as this in all likelihood would have been, were it to be found in that hiſtorian. However, we ſhall have a fitter opportunity of ſpeaking of that pretended interpolation in the ſequel of this ſection.

(G) The whole paſſage runs thus (37), tho' the evangeliſt has only

(36) Macrob. Saturn. l. ii. c. 4.

(37) Jerom. xxxi, 15, & ſeq.

had already taken care to convey the child far enough out of the reach of his butchers; and his parents, having been timely only quoted the first part, as enough to direct his readers to the rest, as was the custom before the bible was divided into chapters and verses.

Thus says the Lord, a voice was hard in Ramah; lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not. Thus saith the Lord, refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears: for thy labour shall be rewarded, or, as the original has it, there is a reward (laid up) for thy labour, and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. For there is hope, saith the Lord, that, in thy latter end, thy children shall come again to their own border. I have heard Ephraim complain, saying, Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, &c.

There was a necessity for taking the whole text thus far, in order to shew how this prophecy or promise of God was verified in the slaughter of these babes; and it is for want of attending to the whole, that some commentators have been forced to have recourse to a primitive or historical meaning, in the carrying away of the ten tribes, and a secondary in this more cruel bereaving of Rachel, or the Jewish state, of her beloved children; whilst others, not satisfied with the solution, have run into downright scepticism. Whereas the whole, thus connected, implies no more than this, that no affliction or suffering, either wrongfully, or for a good cause, shall miss of its sure reward at the latter end.

The words therefore of the evangelist (38) may, and, we think, justly too, be thus paraphrased and expounded: Then, or in that bitter weeping and lamentation of those doleful mothers, was fulfilled, or truly verified, that saying of the prophet Jeremiah; In Ramah, which, in the original, signifies a high place, was heard bitter lamentation, &c. the mournful mothers refusing to be comforted for their lost children, because they were now no more. But what says the Lord? Refrain your cryings and tears; for there is a recompence reserved for all your labours at your latter end; and the children you count for lost shall surely return again. And when could such a comfortable promise be more truly verified, than when he, who brought life and immortality to light, came to assure us of it by so many irrefragable arguments, as well as by his own infallible word?

The Jews themselves, especially those who believed the resurrection, might easily have understood this to have been the meaning both of the prophet and evangelist, since they tell us (39), that the reason why God did not double the number of Job's timely forewarned of his bloody deſign, had withdrawn themſelves into Egypt, whence he was not recalled till after the death of the tyrant; when, upon their return, fearing ſtill ſome further attempt from his ſucceſſor Archelaus, they were directed by the ſame heavenly monitor to turn off into Galilee, and to betake themſelves to their old habitation at Nazareth. Here was likewiſe another prophecy fulfilled in the name of Nazarite or Nazaren, which was given him from his long abode in that obſcure place [d]. (H)

(38) Matth. ii. 17, & seq. (39) Rabb. Plur. comm. in Job, c. ult. Dieg. de Stunica, & al ibid.

Soon

[d] Ibid. ver. 19. ad fin.

of Job's children, as he did that of his cattle, &c. when he reſtored him to his proſperous ſtate, was, becauſe thoſe children, tho' dead, were not loſt, as his other poſſeſſions were, but lived ſtill with God, and would be raiſed up at the latter end.

(H) This prophecy has likewiſe been very much canvaſſed, and hitherto in vain ſought after, tho', by the evangeliſt's words, it ſhould be in more places than one, ſince he doth not there quote any one in particular, but the prophets in general. The queſtion therefore is, whether it is ſaid any-where, that the Meſſiah ſhould be called Nazarite? The anſwer is not in any verſion, (except perhaps the Chaldee and the Syriac) but in the original Hebrew, where we ſhall find him called נוֹצְרִי Notzer; not indeed on account of his having received that appellation from any particular city, but by reaſon of his high character, office, and deſcent. We ſhall content ourſelves with giving two inſtances of it, which will, however, ſuffice as a clue to the reſt.

The firſt is in Exodus (40), where the Lord is ſaid to deſcend in the cloud, and to proclaim the name or attributes of the Lord, in the following words: The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-ſuffering, and abundant in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thouſands, forgiving iniquity, &c. Where it is obſervable, that the firſt letter in the word נוֹצֵר notzer, keeping, is one of thoſe which the Jews call majuſculæ, or large letters, ſuch as occur only about thirty times in the whole old teſtament †, and are, according to them, never uſed by the ſacred writers, but to imply ſome great myſtery to be contained in the Word.

We ſhall not here diſpute, whether the words in the paſſage above-quoted are thoſe of God there appearing, as our, and moſt, verſions underſtand it, or of Moſes calling upon him there, tho' the latter ſeems to us moſt probable, from thoſe that go immediately

(40) c. xxxiv. 5, & ſeq. (Z).

† Vid. int. al. Vol. iii. p. 452,

Antipater's arrival.

SOON after this maſſacre at Bethlehem, arrived Antipater at Sebaſte, and from thence went directly to Jeruſalem, where Herod ately before, Vajicra beſhem Jehovah, And he called on the name of the Lord. It is ſufficient, that the name of Notzer is given to the divine perſon there appearing, which could not be that of God the Father, whom no man hath ſeen at any time; but of the Son, in that human appearance he often took both before and under the Moſaic diſpenſation; and for further proof of which, we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid in a former volume *, and all we ſhall add is, that none could have a better claim to this title of Notzar cheſſed, keeping or preſerving mercy, than he that came to obtain it for us at no leſs a price than his own ineſtimable life.

The other place we ſhall mention, is in Iſaiah (41), where the ſame Meſſiah is called a Netzer, or, a branch out of the old ſtem of Jeſſe, &c. where the word נוץ or מנוץ which we tranſlate ſtem, ſignifies the old ſtump of a tree, after the main body has been cut off; and the netzer the ſpontaneous ſhoot which ſprings from it; and ſuch was indeed the houſe of David at the time of Chriſt's birth, reduced to the loweſt degree of poverty and obſcurity, tho' at but fourteen generations diſtance from Zerubbabel; but we muſt remember, that the prieſts, the Aſmoneans, and afterwards Herod, had held the kingdom and government of Judæa; whoſe intereſt therefore it was to ſuppreſs that family, leſt ſome of them ſhould in time wrench it out of their hands. Neither was this done without the particular conduct of providence, and in purſuance of thoſe prophecies in which the low and humble ſtate of the world's redeemer is ſo lively deſcribed; and accordingly we find that when his parents came to Bethlehem, they were ſo poor, that his mother could not purchaſe a room in that city, where ſhe might be decently delivered of him, but was forced to make uſe of a ſtable for herſelf, and of a manger for her child; or, which is indeed more likely from a cloſer examination of the text, was delivered in the open fields, and laid the divine babe, εν τη φατνη, in a crib; for in that ſenſe the ſeptuagint commonly uſe that word.

If then the Meſſiah is in Geneſis and Iſaiah emphatically called Notzer or Netzer, and that name is given him by the Jews, in their doing ſo, tho' by way of contempt, they did but fulfil thoſe prophecies of him, tho' unwittingly, unwillingly, and in deriſion; and it is ſtill more to his glory, that it was completed in him in that ſublime ſenſe in which he is called by that name in the law and the prophets. The Jews had two falſe notions concerning Chriſt, the one, that he was born at Nazareth, and conſequently that he was a Galilean; and the ſecond that out of Galilee

* De his Vide Vol. ii. p. 412, (T) & 535, (S). (41) c. xi. 1.

Herod had ſo cloſely concealed his deſigns concerning him, that he made no heſitation to go and offer himſelf at the gates of the palace. They were immediately opened to him; but, upon his being entered, they were ſhut up again to all his retinue. Upon his being introduced to the king, he went to throw himſelf at his feet, and to embrace his knees; but met with a ſtern repulſe, and was immediately arreſted; and when he aſked the reaſon of it, he was upbraided with the death of his brothers, and referred over to Varus, by whom he ſhould be judged on the very next day. Quintillius Varus, had ſucceeded Sextus Saturnius in the government of Syria, and, being arrived at that province, was juſt then come to Jeruſalem, to pay a viſit to Herod, and was thereupon deſired by that monarch, that he would preſide as judge at the trial of his rebellious and unnatural ſon. Antipater was accordingly brought the next morning before him, and a numerous aſſembly, whom Herod had convened for that purpoſe. Upon his firſt appearing, he threw himſelf upon his knees, and begged that they would have pity on him, and not condemn him unheard. Herod, who was alſo preſent, only bid him ſtand up, that he might the better level his reſentments at him. He upbraided him with his ſecret

His trial for treaſon.

Galilee there never aroſe any prophet (42). Since then he ſet up both for a prophet and for the Meſſiah, they thought that the name of Nazarene was ſufficient to confute both thoſe claims, and therefore gave it both to him and to his followers; and theſe gladly embraced it, on account of its true and genuine ſignification, as he is called in Moſes's writings the notzer, or keeper or depoſitory of mercy, and by Iſaiah the ſprout out of the old withered ſtock of the houſe of David.

Some interpreters have imagined, that the evangeliſts alluded to the Nazarites among the Jews, of whom we have ſpoken more fully in our third volume *, or to Joſeph, who is emphatically called by his father Nazir Achauf (43), ſeparate from his brethren; or, as we have formerly explained that place †, crowned above his brethren, and whom they look upon as a type of the Meſſiah. But all this is ſuppoſed, for want of attending to the different ſpelling of theſe two words, viz. the firſt with a ץ. and ſignifies to keep, and the other with ז, and ſignifies to crown, ſeparate, &c. Now the former can be the only right one here, it being given him on account of his living at Nazareth; which word is written with the tzade, and not the zain.

(42) Vide John i. 46. vii. 41 & 52. * vol. iii. p. 249, & ſeq.
(43) Gen. xlix. 26. † Vol. ii p. 493, (R).

designs of poisoning him, and unravelled the whole conspiracy lately discovered, appealing for the truth of it to his relations and friends, and other evidences, whom he had also posted there to prove all his accusations; the last of which, and that which he vented with greatest vehemence, was the death of his two brave sons. Of whom, said he, addressing himself to Antipater, thou hast been but the too unnatural follower, if they were guilty, and the base murderer, if they were innocent. His excessive grief, followed with a flood of tears, which he could not refrain at the naming of those two unhappy princes, obliged him to stop short, and to beckon to Nicholas Damascen to go on and open the rest of the accusation, and then proceed to the proofs of it.

ANTIPATER, who knew but too well his own guilt and the undoubted evidence which was there ready to prove it against him, prevented Damascen's going on, and began to
His defence. plead his own cause; the sum of which was, the unlikelihood of his ever entertaining any thoughts of such a horrid parricide, especially after the dreadful punishment of his two brothers for the like attempt. He loudly complained against the baseness of his accusers; but Damascen, being at length permitted to speak, gave such satisfactory evidence to the court, that there could be no room left to doubt of his being really guilty. Varus, however, told him for the last time, that if he had any thing to reply to invalidate the proofs alledged against him, he might now freely do it, seeing it was Herod's and his own earnest desire, that he might prove himself innocent. Antipater, for want of better evidence, had recourse to oaths and bitter curses, which he plentifully wished on himself, if he was guilty; but this being the usual refuge of the blackest criminals, the president, to stop his mouth at once and bring the trial to a fair issue, ordered some of the poison, which had been mentioned in the evidence, to be brought, and given to a condemned person before the court; which being done accordingly, the man died almost
He is cast. as soon as he had taken it. Varus immediately left the court at Judæa to return to Antioch, without declaring his opinion to any but to Herod, who ordered his son to be shut up in a prison, and sent letters to Augustus to acquaint him with the whole trial, charging at the same time the messenger to give that emperor all the further particulars of it by word of mouth [e].

PRESENTLY

[e] Antiq. ubi supra.

PRESENTLY after, there was another discovery made by an intercepted letter from Antiphilus, who was then in Egypt, and directed to Antipater; the purport of which was as follows: "I have sent you Achme's letter, (I): you know "what risque I run by so doing, since I should lay myself at "the mercy of two most potent families and my inveterate "enemies. It concerns you therefore to look to it, that nothing "miscarry." The business was to find this letter of Achme, and the messenger pretended to be ignorant of any other, except that above-mentioned. At length, upon closer search, another was found sewed in the lining of his waistcoat, which, upon their reading of it, was to this effect: Achme to Antipater: "I have written to your father, according to "your direction, and have inclosed in the packet the forged "letter from Salome to the queen my mistress; and I doubt "not but the king, upon his reading of it, will put her to "death as a traitress." This pretended letter of Salome was contrived by Antipater, and dressed up by Achme, who wrote to the king as follows. Achme to king Herod: "Out "of a desire I have to serve you, by acquainting you with "any thing that concerns your safety, I have herewith sent "you a letter of Salome to the empress my mistress, in "which she desires her leave to marry Syllæus (K). Pray "tear it as soon as read, since the discovery of it would cost "me my head." Herod, upon reading and comparing the whole, caused his son to be brought before him, bound as he was, and shewed him the letters, and at the same time asked him, what he had to answer for himself? Antipater, at the sight of them, was thunderstruck, and could not utter a word; and upon its being insisted on, that he should name his accomplices, he only mentioned Antiphilus. Salome, who was touched to the quick at this attempt against her, after having expressed her innocence by many antic gestures and direct imprecations, strenuously insisted to have the traitor executed out of hand. Herod, on the other side, was thinking at first to have sent him to Rome to have been tried before Cæsar; but fearing, upon second thoughts, lest he should either be rescued by the way, or acquitted by his friends there, contented himself with sending a full account to the emperor, together with the intercepted letters; and remanded his son to his prison [f].

(I) This Achme was by nation a Jewess, in the service of Julia Augustus's wife; but had been brought over by Antipater with large sums, to contrive this plot against his father and his aunt Salome (44).

(K) Syllæus was a Nabathean and Herod's sworn enemy, and was soon after beheaded at Rome for betraying Ælius Gallus into the Arabian expedition, and for some other crimes (45).

(44) Joseph. Antiq. l. xvii. c. 7. ad fin. (45) De hoc vide Strab. l. xvi.

Herod's last illness and will.

WHILST his embassadors were hastening to Rome, Herod, worn out with age, sickness, and numberless cares and inquietudes, fell into a violent disease, which, added to all his other misfortunes, made him so remorse and choleric, that he became a burden to himself, and to every one about him. Finding his end approaching, he set about making his will, by which he appointed his youngest son his heir and successor, the misrepresentations and calumnies of Antipater having rendered his other two sons, Archelaus and Philip, obnoxious to him. He bequeathed in legacies, a thousand talents to Augustus; five hundred to his empress, and left a considerable fortune to the unworthy Salome. The rest of his estate, lands, revenues, and money he ordered to be divided between his children and grandchildren.

A tumult in the city.

BUT if he was capable of receiving any real satisfaction from this disposal of his crown and wealth according to his inclination, it was soon after soured by a seditious tumult, which was raised about this time by Judas, the son of Seraphæus and Mattathias, the son of Margolothus, two Jewish doctors, equally eminent for their learning and piety. These men, at the pleasing news of his being given over, unhappily took it into their heads to stir up a good number of their disciples, at the head of the city youth, to go and pull down all the structures which that monarch had built contrary to their laws. These, with their two masters at their head, having heard a report about the middle of the day that Herod was expired, went immediately to the temple-gate, over which he had set up a golden eagle of extraordinary bigness and exquisite workmanship, and began their pious work with pulling it down, and breaking it into pieces with axes and hammers, as the greatest eye-sore of all. The king's commander in chief, expecting it to be the beginning of a seditiion, ran immediately to the place with a body of his troops, and was agreeably surprised to find it only a mob of youths, who immediately dispersed themselves at his arrival. Forty only of them, with their two chiefs, proving intrepid enough to stand their ground, were immediately seized, and brought to the dying king; and upon their being asked what what motive had induced them to ſuch an attempt on the temple? boldly anſwered him, that they had long ſince reſolved upon it; and that it was their only grief, that they had deferred it ſo long. They added, that they neither feared his anger, nor any puniſhment he could inflict on them, ſince what they had done was in obedience to their law, and from a pure zeal for the glory of God.

[f] Idem ibid. ad fin.

Herod's ſpeech to the aſſembly.

THIS affront having raiſed in ſome meaſure his drooping ſpirits, he ordered them to be ſent in chains to Jericho, whither he alſo cauſed himſelf to be conveyed in a litter, by reaſon of his extreme weakneſs. Here he aſſembled the heads of the Jews, and, in a ſet ſpeech, reminded them of the great and glorious things he had done for them, and of the ſumptuous edifices he had reared to the glory of God, during his whole reign, and for which he expected to have deſerved better returns, and to have endeared both his perſon and memory to the whole nation; but that to his great grief, he found it quite the reverſe, ſince they had dared even during his life and in the face of the ſun, to offer ſuch an affront to him; and not to him only, but much more to God, to whom that golden ornament had been dedicated; ſo that they had even turned their malice into an open ſacrilege. The aſſembly could eaſily have told him, that his pretended dedication of a figure forbidden by the ſecond commandment, was no other than a piece of idolatrous complaiſance to the Romans; but being afraid to rouſe his cruelty too far, they contented themſelves with diſclaiming the fact, and allowing it to deſerve an exemplary puniſhment. Herod, ſomewhat ſoftened by this anſwer, contented himſelf with depoſing the high-prieſt (L), whom he ſuſpected to have been a private encourager of the tumult, and giving that dignity to his brother Joazar; after which he cauſed Mattathias the ringleader and the reſt of the priſoners to be burnt alive, and forgave all the reſt [g].

The zealots burnt alive.

THIS indignity, however, gave him reaſon enough to think what mourning the Jewiſh nation was like to make for him; and as his diſeaſe became more and more loathſome

[g] Antiq. ubi ſupra c. 9.

(L) This was that Mattathias, of whom we have had occaſion to ſpeak heretofore, who having contracted ſome pollution in a dream on the eve of the expiation day, was forced to ſubſtitute another to perform the ceremonies of that ſolemnity. Joſephus adds, that the moon ſuffered an eclipſe on the night following that pontiff's depoſition (46).

(46) Antiq. ubi ſupra c. 8.

and intolerable (M), and made him ſtill more deſperate and inhuman, he bethought himſelf of ſuch a horrid expedient to prevent their rejoicing at his death, as ſcarcely entered into the heart of any tyrant. He iſſued out his ſummons for the heads of all the Jews to repair to Jericho on a ſet day, under pain of death; and, upon their arrival, ordered them all to be ſhut up in the Circus: and having ſent for his ſiſter Salome and her huſband Alexas, gave them ſtrict charge to have them all butchered as ſoon as his breath was gone. By this means, added he, I ſhall not only damp the people's joy, but ſecure a real mourning at my death. About this time came back his meſſengers from Rome, with Auguſtus's approbation of Antipater's ſentence, and the news that Achme had been there put to death for her treachery. Herod could not but feel a ſenſible joy at it, in ſpite of all his tortures; and finding himſelf at that time very hungry, called for an apple and a knife; but his pains encreaſing at that inſtant, and he eſſaying to put an end to them with the knife, made a grandſon of his, who tried to ſtop his hand, give a great ſhriek, which alarmed the court, and made every body without believe that he was dead. The report of it, ſoon reached Antipater's priſon, who expreſſed ſuch lively joys and hopes at the news, as haſtened his execution; for his goaler having acquainted the king with it, threw him into ſuch a rage, that he diſpatched one of his guards on the very inſtant to put him to death [h]. He outlived his ſon but five days, Herod's laſt legacy to the Jews.

Antipater put to death.

[h] Ibid. ad fin.

(M) This diſeaſe which Joſephus (47) doth not ſcruple to call a judicial one, was ſo complicated, and attended with ſuch nauſeous and frightful ſymptoms, that we believe our readers will gladly ſpare us the repetition of them here. However, the king, ſtill flattering himſelf with the hopes of a cure, ſent for phyſicians from all parts, who, having tried their art in vain, adviſed him at length to the hot waters of Callirhoe, on the other ſide of Jordan, which empty themſelves in the lake Aſphaltites. Upon his coming thither, he was ordered to be ſet in a veſſel of oil up to the neck, which, inſtead of relieving him, threw him into a fainting fit, out of which he was with difficulty brought by the outcries of his attendants. It was then that he firſt began to think his diſeaſe incurable; upon which he ordered a donative of fifty drachms per head to all his ſoldiers, and proportionably to his officers, and ordered himſelf to be conveyed to Jericho, where he ſoon after iſſued out that bloody edict we are going to mention in the text.

(47) Idem ibid.

days, during which he altered his will afresh, left his kingdom to Archelaus, made Antipas tetrach of Galilee and Perea; and left to Philip the regions of Trachonitis, Gaulon, Batanea, and Panias, which he erected likewise into a tetrarchy. To Salome, besides fifty thousand pieces in money, he gave the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, with some considerable legacies to his other relations. He died in the seventieth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh after his advancement to the Jewish crown, and the thirty-fourth year after the expulsion and death of Antigonus [i] (N), and to the no small joy of all the Jews. Herod's death.

For Salome and Alexas, bad as they were, and in spite of all the oaths and protestations their tyrannic brother had extorted from them at his death, were so far from executing his last inhuman orders, that they even strove to smother the shameful secret from the nation. To this end they went immediately after his being expired to the hippodrome, where the heads of the Jews were detained, caused the gates to be flung The imprisoned chiefs released by Salome.

[i] Ibid. c. 10. sub. init.

(N) Archbishop Usher dates his death on the 25th of November, the seventh month, called Cisleu (48). Another learned chronologer observes, that it gave the Jewish nation a joyful occasion for a festival, as he died hated of all wise men (49).

Our learned prelate has therein followed the Jewish book last-quoted, which places his death on the seventh day of that month, according to the Hebrew computation; but a late critic has since pretended that the old Megillah had been long since lost, and this new one foisted into the world instead of it, and is therefore of no authority (50). We shall content ourselves with referring our readers to another learned man (1), who has fully confuted this assumption, it being quite out of our province to enter further into that dispute.

The Jewish historian sums up Herod's character in these remarkable words (2); "He was a man inexorably cruel, and a "slave to his passions. His will was his law; and yet no man, in "the general, more fortunate than he. He mounted the throne "from the condition of a private man, fell into many difficulties, "but surmounted them all, and lived at last to a great age. As "to his domestic broils with his children and family, how unhappy soever he may have been in my opinion, yet was he fortu-"nate in his own; for he got still the better of his enemies."

(48) Sub. A. M. 4001. (49) Vide Megillath Tahanith sub men. Cisleu. (50) Bern. Lamy. appar. chronol. p. 1. c. 9. sect. 5. (1) Joh. Meyar, annot. in Megill. Tahan. p. 62. & seq. (2) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 10.

Year of the flood 3000. After Christ's birth 1. Before the vulgar æra 5. Archelaus proclaimed.

flung open, and declared to them, that it was the king's order they should all depart to their respective homes, he having no further occasion for their presence; which they accordingly did; soon after which, and not till then, they published the news of Herod's death (O). They then summoned the chief officers and soldiery to an amphitheatre at Jericho, and read to them a letter from the deceased king, in which he thanked them for their past services and fidelity to him, and desired them to shew it now to his son Archelaus, whom he had appointed his successor. His last will was read to them at the same time by Ptolemy, the then keeper of the royal seal, in which there was this remarkable clause, 'That it was to be of no force till ratified by Cæsar.' The audience, however, taking it for granted, that the emperor would not fail to confirm it, sent out an universal shout, Long live king Archelaus; and both officers and soldiers promised him the same allegiance and attachment which they had shewn to his father.

Herod's stately funeral.

THE new king, to shew his gratitude to him, began with preparing him a funeral answerable to his greatness and dignity. His body was laid on a sumptuous golden litter, enriched with variety of precious stones, wearing the royal crown on his head, and holding the sceptre in his hand. His sons and grandsons, of whom we have spoken in a former section, his sister and her husband, accompanied with the rest of his relations, marched by his side, and were followed by all his officers, both civil and military, according to their rank. Among the latter his guards led the van; then came the Thracians, next the Germans, and, last of all the Gauls or Galatians; all of them armed and in order of battle. The procession

(O) Whether this unexpected release of the Jewish heads was really owing to the less brutish temper of Salome and her husband, or whether it might not, as they gave it out, have been ordered by the relenting tyrant at his last agonies, and suppressed by the Jewish historian out of hatred to that monarch; sure it is, that the very design, much more the prosecuting it so far, must argue him to have been a monster of cruelty, and capable of the most horrid butcheries, to satiate either his ambition or resentment.

This will sufficiently take off the objection against the probability of his murdering so many infants in and about Bethlehem, drawn from the horridness of the act; and we have had occasion already to shew, that Josephus's silence of it can much less invalidate the authority of the evangelist, who affirms it as a fact well known to the Jewish nation.

proceſſion was cloſed with five hundred of the king's domeſtics with aromatic perfumes, and proceeded to his caſtle of Herodion mentioned in the laſt ſection, which was about eight ſtades, or a thouſand paces, diſtant from Jericho (P), and where they depoſited his remains, according to his will [k]. They returned from thence to Jeruſalem, where Archelaus, having finiſhed the ſeven days mourning for his father, according to the Jewiſh cuſtom, gave the people a magnificent feaſt. He went next to the temple cloathed in white, and in the midſt of their loud acclamations; and, being there ſeated on his golden throne, gave the people thanks for the zeal they expreſſed for him; but added, that he would not aſſume the title of king, till it had been confirmed to him by Auguſtus, tho' that, as well as the royal diadem, had been offered to him at Jericho by the ſuffrages of the whole army. He concluded with aſſuring them, that, as ſoon as he was confirmed by the emperor, his chief care and ſtudy ſhould be to deſerve that love they ſo unanimouſly teſtified for him, and to make his reign more eaſy and happy, than that of his father had proved to the Jewiſh nation. This ſpeech was followed with freſh vollies of huzzas; after which they began to try the ſincerity of it, by a number of petitions ſuitable to their different exigencies. Some begged for an alleviation of their tribute, others for the total abolition of their cuſtoms, others, again for the releaſe of priſoners; all which were readily granted at this lucky juncture, Archelaus not thinking it adviſeable to exaſperate them by a denial. The whole ceremony was concluded with ſuitable ſacrifices, and a ſumptuous entertainment, which he gave there to his friends.

Archelaus's ſpeech to the Jews.

The Jews, however, ſoon reſumed their rebellious courſe in ſpite of all theſe grants. That afternoon was ſcarcely over; before [k] Idem ibid & bell. Jud. l. i. c. ult.

(P) Or rather, as Joſephus has it in another place (3), two hundred ſtades or furlongs; for leſs than that could hardly be, conſidering that it was but ſixty from Jeruſalem. Our learned Uſher therefore ſuppoſes ſome error crept in the former, and that the hiſtorian there meant, that the cavalcade marched but eight ſtades a day (4).

Mention being alſo made of an Herodion upon one of the mountains of Arabia (5), Mr. Reland juſtly concludes, that there muſt have been two caſtles of that name built by that monarch, the former in the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem and Tekoah, viz. this where he was buried; and the other at a greater diſtance, and on the other ſide of Jordan (6).

(3) Bell. Jud. l. i. c. ult. in fin.. (4) Sub A. M. 4002. (5) Bell. Jud. ibid. c. 16. & alib. (6) Palæſt. illuſtr. ſub. Herodion.

A new tumult raised.

before a number of malecontents, who had been for some time holding secret cabals for raising new mutinies, broke loose in a body, and for want of a more plausible pretence, came beating their breasts, bewailing the deaths of Mattathias and others of his accomplices, who had been burnt for pulling down the golden eagle; and demanded justice against those friends of the deceased king, who had had a hand in their deaths; particularly they desired, that the high-priesthood might be taken from Joazar, to whom it had been given upon that occasion. This unexpected indignity failed not to exasperate the new king; but as he was on the point of departing for Rome, and was unwilling either to have his journey stopped by this tumult, or to go away before it was quelled; he sent his master of the horse to appease them by fair words, and to remind them, that their king would do nothing till he was confirmed by the emperor; but, before he could utter a word to them, they fell a pelting him with vollies of stones, so that he was forced to withdraw. He sent some fresh officers on the same errand, and they met with the same reception; insomuch, that they wanted but number to have raised themselves into open rebellion. By this time the feast of the passover was come, which brought a great concourse of people from all parts to Jerusalem; during which solemnity the malecontents never stirred from the temple, but chose to beg for subsistence of the comers, rather than leave the place, or intermit their godly work, till they were drove from it by main force [1]

The mutineers dispersed.

ARCHELAUS, who justly feared, lest these mutineers should spread the infection among the multitudes that repaired to the feast, sent an officer at the head of some troops, with express orders either to disperse them, or to seize on such as stood their ground. They were scarcely come in sight of the revolters before they found themselves briskly attacked by them, and by a great number of strangers, whom their outcries had inspired with the same rebellious spirit; a bloody encounter followed, in which most of the soldiers were killed upon the spot, and the officer terribly wounded and narrowly escaped with his life. This fresh indignity obliged at length Archelaus to send his whole army against them, with orders to his cavalry to kill all that came out of the temple, and to hinder the strangers from assisting them. After another obstinate fight, in which three thousand of the rebels were killed, the rest were soon put to flight, and betook themselves to the

[1] Antiq. ubi supra. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 1.

the mountains; upon which the king publiſhed an order for all ſtrangers to depart to their own homes, by which an end was put to the paſchal ſolemnity for that year, the rebellion ſuſpended for ſome time, and Archelaus was left at liberty to prepare for his journey to Rome [m]. He ſet out ſoon after accordingly, leaving the government of the kingdom to his brother Philip, and took with him his mother Mattace, by nation a Samaritan, Nicholas Damaſcen, an old friend and counſellor of his late father, and a great number of other friends. He was likewiſe accompanied by his aunt Salome, with her children and ſome other near relations, who pretended to aſſiſt him with their intereſt at the Auguſtan court, when their real deſign was to obſtruct his confirmation, and to accuſe him to the emperor of the maſſacre of his ſubjects lately committed in the temple.

Archelaus goes to Rome. Year of the flood 3000. Of Chriſt 1. Before the vulgar æra 5.

WHEN Archelaus was come to Cæſarea, he was met there by Sabinus, Auguſtus's intendant of Syria, who was haſtening into Judæa, to take care of the rich legacies which Herod had bequeathed to that emperor. He had, however, been diſſuaded by Varus, in his way thither, from undertaking any thing further, till the emperor's will was known, and Archelaus confirmed in his kingdom; ſo that he had been prevailed upon by that Syrian governor to ſtay in that city, till he received further orders from Rome. He ſtayed however, no longer there, than till Varus was returned to Antioch, his capital; after which he went immediately to Jeruſalem, lodged himſelf at the royal palace, and ſummoned the king's treaſurers to give him an account, and to put him in poſſeſſion of thoſe treaſures; but as theſe had orders from Archelaus not to part with them till his return, they refuſed to deliver them to Sabinus, alledging, they would preſerve them for Auguſtus, till they received further directions from him. By this time Archelaus and his retinue were arrived at Rome; and among thoſe whom the ſubtle Salome had brought with her to oppoſe his election, was Antipas another of Herod's ſons, whom that monarch had appointed his ſucceſſor by his firſt will, and whom ſhe deſigned to ſet up againſt his brother, under pretence, that that was of greater validity than his ſecond. Antipas had been perſuaded to take this ſtep, not only by Salome, but much more by one Ireneus, an eloquent orator, and one that was perfectly verſed in all the affairs of ſtate, had been admitted into the inmoſt ſecrets of Herod's court, and, being come with him to Rome, was moſt likely to repreſent Antipas oppoſes him.

[m] Antiq. ibid c. 11. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

preſent that young prince's claim to the beſt advantage. With that orator was alſo another great ſtateſman, named Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolas Damaſcen, and one of the late king's counſellors. Antipas had likewiſe brought his mother Cleopatra, born at Jeruſalem, with ſome other relations and friends; and theſe were ſcarcely come to Rome with him, before they found means to draw the greateſt part of Archelaus's relations and partiſans over to their ſide [n] (Q).

THERE was ſtill another thing which very much weakened the intereſt of Archelaus, namely, his officers at Jeruſalem refuſing to deliver up Herod's legacies to Sabinus; of which both he and Varus had taken care to inform the Roman court. Archelaus was therefore forced, in his own vindication, to preſent a memorial to the emperor, in which he exhibited his title to the crown, the particulars of Herod's laſt will, together with an inventory of the treaſure which that monarch had left behind him, to which he likewiſe added his royal ſignet with which that will was ſealed. This memorial was ſoon followed by another from Antipas, in which were diſplayed ſuch allegations as were moſt likely to invalidate Herod's laſt will and his brother's title. Auguſtus, having peruſed the writings on both ſides, ſummoned a council of his friends, to examine their reſpective claims, and made Caius, the ſon of Agrippa by his adopted daughter Julia, preſident of it. Antipater, the ſon of Salome, an eloquent ſpeaker and ſworn enemy to Archelaus, opened with a ſpeech full of the bittereſt invectives againſt him; ſuch as his having aſſumed the royal title and authority, without ſtaying for the emperor's conſent; his having cauſed three thouſand Jews to be maſſacred in the temple by his own troops at the late paſſover feſtival; his having turned out ſeveral eminent officers, and put others in their room; his having preſumed to ſit on the royal throne, heard and adjudged cauſes, and granted conſiderable immunities, releaſed all the priſoners whom Antipater's ſpeech againſt Archelaus.

[n] Idem ibid.

(Q) It ſeems by Joſephus's account, as if Archelaus's party had taken ſome diſguſt at him, either from his ſevere manner of quelling the late tumult in Judæa, or on ſome other pretence; whilſt Antipas and his friends took care to inſpire them with hopes of a milder government under him. But there was ſtill a third party, who liking neither of the brothers, nor indeed any of Herod's family, did what they could to make them both miſcarry in their pretenſions, in hopes of living ſolely and more quietly under the dominion of the Romans.

whom his father had cauſed to be ſhut up in the Circus; all this by his own aſſumed authority, and in the quality of a Jewiſh monarch. He likewiſe accuſed him of unnatural contempt to the memory of his deceaſed father, from whom he had received ſuch ſignal tokens of paternal love, and of his having ſpent the night, which followed that monarch's death, in ſuch feaſting and jollity, as was like to have raiſed a ſedition among the people, who could not behold ſuch a flagrant inſtance of ingratitude, without the utmoſt deteſtation. He concluded with telling the court, that Herod, who beſt knew the oppoſite tempers of the two brothers, had not ſo much as dreamt of appointing him his ſucceſſor, whilſt he enjoyed his health and ſenſes; but had expreſly named Antipas to that dignity; but ſuppoſing that he had conceived a better opinion of Archelaus during his laſt ſickneſs, he has ſhewn you now what a king he is like to prove; what uſe he is like to make of his power, ſince, even whilſt in the condition of a private man, he could ſend his troops into the very temple, to cut the throats of his ſubjects.

DAMASCEN ſpoke next, and anſwered the greateſt part of Antipater's accuſations, by ſhewing, firſt, that, with reſpect to the pretended maſſacre in the temple, nothing leſs than ſuch a ſeverity could quell the ſedition then kindled; that thoſe men were only a band of rebellious fellows, and the firſt aggreſſors, not only in raiſing the tumult, but in murdering thoſe officers whom the king had ſent to appeaſe them by the mildeſt means; and that he had acted nothing in this, or in any other inſtance, but by the advice of thoſe who were now turned his accuſers: that, as to the alteration which Herod made in his will about the ſucceſſion, he, being in his perfect ſenſes at that time, had doubtleſs very good reaſons for what he did, and might probably have obſerved ſomething in Antipas's behaviour or character, which obliged him to prefer his brother to him; and as a further proof that he had altered it upon cooler thoughts, he urged his ſubmitting the validity of it to the emperor, without whoſe approbation it was to be of no force. As ſoon as he had made an end of ſpeaking, Archelaus went and threw himſelf at Auguſtus's feet in ſuch humble guiſe, as moved his compaſſion towards him. Cæſar raiſed him up, pronounced him worthy of the Jewiſh crown, and promiſed to do nothing contrary to his father's will; after which he diſmiſſed the aſſembly without any farther deciſion, being deſirous to take ſome time to conſider, whether he ſhould beſtow the kingdom ſolely upon him, or divide it among Herod's rod's children, ſeeing they all applied themſelves alike to him for redreſs °.

WHILE theſe things tranſacting at Rome, the reſtleſs Jews had raiſed a new inſurrection in Jeruſalem, which was, however, ſuppreſſed by Varus's ſpeedy arrival from Antioch and the puniſhment of the ringleaders; but, upon his return to Antioch, having left Sabinus with a Roman legion to keep that metropolis in awe, this general, ſeeing himſelf ſuperior to the Jews, made a bold puſh upon the fortreſſes of the city, and the treaſures of the Herodian family, with a deſign to convert them to his own uſe. He choſe, however, a wrong time for ſuch an attempt; and the Jews, who came flocking thither to the approaching feaſt of pentecoſt, not perhaps ſo much out of devotion as to oppoſe his deſigns, did quickly divide themſelves into three bodies, one of which beſieged him and his troops in the royal palace, whilſt the other two went and poſſeſſed themſelves, the one of the Hippodrome, and the other of the temple on the eaſt and north ſides of it; ſo that he was incloſed on every ſide, and in danger of being overpowered by the Jews. Theſe were the more exaſperated againſt him, becauſe he had forced his way into the treaſury of the temple, and brought away four hundred talents out of it, beſides other rich plunder, which his ſoldiers had carried off, in ſpite of all their oppoſition. This deſperate attempt had happened as follows: the Roman general ſeeing himſelf hemmed in on all ſides, and on the brink of being aſſaulted by the reſolute Jews, ſent an expreſs to deſire Varus to come immediately to his aſſiſtance; whilſt himſelf getting up on the top of one of the towers of the caſtle, named Phaſael, from thence beckoned to his troops to make a ſally on the enemy. They did ſo, and had an obſtinate ſkirmiſh with them, in which they killed a number of Jews. The reſt, not at all diſcouraged at this loſs, got up on the outer galleries of the temple, from which they galled the Romans with ſtones and arrows, whilſt thoſe of the enemy from below had quite loſt their ſtrength before they could reach them. Tired at length, and aſhamed to ſee the advantage the Jews had over them, they brought vaſt quantities of wood and other combuſtible matter to the foot of the wall, and ſetting it on fire, plied it ſo briſkly with freſh fuel, that the flame reached at length to the corniſhes of the gallery; which, being of timber and covered with paint and wax, on which the gilding was laid, were eaſily ſet on a blaze. A great number of the Sabinus beſieged.

° Antiq. ubi ſupra c. 11. Bell. Jud. ubi. ſupra.

the Jews on the battlements periſhed in the flames, whilſt the reſt caſting themſelves down headlong, either died by the fall, or by the enemy's ſword; ſo that not one of all thoſe brave men was left alive, the Romans giving no quarter to any of them. As ſoon therefore as the flames were ſo far abated, that theſe could wade through them, they broke into the ſacred treaſury, from which they carried off the plunder above-mentioned. Some Jews burnt and killed.

THESE two actions therefore could not but highly exaſperate the Jewiſh nation, and make them double their vigour againſt him. Accordingly, whilſt one part was taken up in undermining the palace, another was endeavouring to cauſe a defection from the Roman general, by promiſing an amneſty and free leave to march off unmoleſted to as many as ſhould leave the place. They added the like promiſe to Sabinus, upon the ſame conditions, and aſſured the Roman troops, that they had no other deſign in taking up arms, but to free themſelves from the tyrannic yoke of the Herodian family. Sabinus would have gladly embraced the offer; but the injuries he had done the Jews would not permit him to rely on their promiſe, ſo that he choſe rather to wait for the reinforcement he expected from Varus. During this time new troubles were raiſed in other parts of Judæa; among others two thouſand valiant veterans of the late king, who had been diſcharged from the ſervice, aſſembled themſelves in a body, and fell upon Archelaus's forces commanded by his nephew Archiabus; but this young general not daring to face them upon equal terms, knowing them to be old experienced ſoldiers, went and ſecured himſelf as well as he could in ſome fortreſſes, and other places of difficult acceſs [P].

WE have heretofore had occaſion to mention one Ezechias, a captain of a gang of banditti, whom Herod had with much difficulty caught and put to death, with about forty of his troops. This man left a ſon named Judas, who, ſeeing now the country labouring under a kind of civil war, took this opportunity to revenge his father's death; and having got together a band of moſt deſperate fellows at Sephoris, a city in Galilee (R), after ſeveral incurſions into the king's dominions, A ſedition raiſed by Judas.

[P] Antiq. ubi ſupra. Bell. Judaic. l. ii. c. 2.

(R) This city, tho' not to be met with in Joſhua or any of the ſacred writers, at leaſt by any thing like that name, is frequently mentioned by Joſephus; and we have had occaſion to ſpeak of it in a former ſection, as one of the five places in which dominions, forced at length into the royal armory, where he equipped his men cap-a-peé, and from thence into the treasury of all the places where he came, and being thus furnished with men, arms, and money, injected terror into the whole province, and plundered all he could come at; and so successful was he for some time, that he began to aim at the supreme power; whence he is thought, not without good grounds, to have been the same which is mentioned by St. Luke under the name of Theudas [q] (S).

A second by Simeon.

He was not the only one that aimed at the crown, during these troublesome times. There started up another, named Simeon, a person of comely stature, strongly built, and well esteemed by the Jews, and sufficiently conceited to think himself worthy of it. He had been employed by Herod in affairs of great importance with credit. As soon therefore as he appeared at the head of a party, the people saluted him king of the Jews; and he, to shew his zeal against the two rival sons of his late master, led his men directly to Jericho, where they set the royal palace, a rich and stately building, in flames. He proceeded to do the like to several others, giving his men the whole plunder of them. What further mischiefs such a leader, at the head of such resolute fellows might [q] Acts v. 36.

Gabinius settled his independent tribunals. It was in the tribe of Zebulon, not far from the mountain and plains of Thabor, and was one of the first cities in Galilee on the road to Ptolemais. It became afterwards the metropolis of that province in Nero's time, when that emperor gave it to young Agrippa.

It has been since known by the name of Diocæsarea. It is placed at about twelve miles (more or less, for authors are not agreed about it) from Tiberias, and near the famed mount Ashmon, or Asamon, which was looked upon as the centre or navel of Galilee (7).

(S) This seems more than probable, not only from what each historian says of him, the one, that he aimed at the crown, and the other, that he gave himself out to be some eminent person, or great deliverer; such as the Jews were in more than ordinary expectation of at this time; but likewise from the affinity of their name תודה Thoudah in the Syriac, answering to the Hebrew יהודה Jehudah, and to the Greek Ἰούδας (8).

(7) De hac vide Joseph. Antip. l. xiv. c. 10. xvii. c. 12. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 2. & alib. pass. (8) Vide ann. Usser. sub. A. M. 4003.

might have done, if their career had not been timely ſtopped, is eaſy to gueſs; but, happily for that country, Gratus, Archelaus's general, or, according to Tacitus [r], Varus, the Syrian governor, fell ſuddenly upon them, and, whilſt they fought with more courage than ſkill, gave them a total overthrow. Simeon was caught in his flight in ſome narrow defile, and, being brought to the general, had his head immediately ſtruck off [s]. Whilſt theſe were plundering and burning the royal palaces in one part of the country, another gang was doing the ſame in another; particularly that of Amatha on the Jordan, built probably by Herod for the benefit of the hot waters, which that city was famed for [t], and took its name from (T).

A third by Athronges.

But the moſt deſperate and dangerous of all thoſe ſeditious gangs, for they raged in every place like an epidemic diſeaſe, was that of one Athronges, heretofore an obſcure ſhepherd, of no merit or worth, but what he challenged for his gigantic ſtature and brutiſh ſtoutneſs. This fellow ſet up likewiſe for the royal authority. He had four brothers of the ſame monſtrous ſize, whom he made his lieutenants over the multitudes that came flocking to him, for the honour of fighting under his banner. He took upon him the royal diadem, and tho' he often conſulted his council, yet acted according to his arbitrary will. He hated the Romans and Herodians alike; but the former felt oftener the effects of his cruelty. He gave no quarter to either ſide, when they fell into his hands; but he ſeemed rather to bend his force againſt the Romans, becauſe their late plunders and cruelties were freſher in every body's memory. He laid an ambuſh againſt one of their convoys of corn near Emmaus, and fell upon them ſo ſuddenly, that he left their commanding officer and forty of his men dead on the ſpot, and would in all likelihood have cut them all off, had not Gratus come in good time to their aſſiſtance. At length, after many ſuch exploits, the mock monarch fell into the hands of Archelaus, after his return into Judæa. One of his brothers was taken by Gratus, and another by Ptolemy. The laſt of them ſurrendered himſelf upon good conditions; and ſo the whole gang was diſperſed. But all this while the whole country was ſtill in a flame from freſh inſurrections, as well as from that of the Jews againſt Sabinus, whilſt the Herodian competitors were waiting at Rome for the emperor's deciſion.

His gang defeated.

[r] Hiſt. l. v. [s] Joſeph. ubi ſupra. [t] Euſeb. Onomaſt ſub voce.

(T) From the Hebrew, חמה or חמת Chamah, or Chamath, in the regimen, ſignifying hot. Mr. Reland thinks it to be the ſame with Ramoth-Gilead.

Varus marches againſt the beſiegers.

By this time Varus, being appriſed of the danger Sabinus and his legion were in, took the road to Judæa, at the head of his other two, which was all that he had then in Syria, and with four troops of horſe and ſome foot, which he had got from the neighbouring tetrarchs. He ordered their rendezvous at Ptolemais, where he received ſome freſh auxiliaries, beſides fifteen hundred more, which the king of Arabia ſent him to Berytus, more out of hatred to the Herodian family, than love to the Romans. With part of his army Varus marched towards Samaria, whilſt the reſt, under the command of his ſon, made an inroad into that part of Galilee which was neareſt to Ptolemais. This laſt, having put to flight all that oppoſed him, went and took Sephoris, ſold all the inhabitants by auction, ſet fire to that noble city, and reduced it into a heap of rubbiſh. His father, on the other hand, paſſed by Samaria, becauſe he heard that it had had no hand in the Jewiſh inſurrections, and marched ſtraight to Jeruſalem. In his way he ſuffered his Arabian troops to plunder and burn ſeveral villages and towns; ſuch as Arus, becauſe it belonged to Ptolemy, a friend of Herod; Sampho, and Emmaus; this laſt in revenge of the ſlaughter which Athronges had made of the Romans near that place; but the inhabitants of it, foreſeeing the ſtorm, had timely forſook it. Whilſt this was doing without the city, the beſiegers, who were juſt going to ſtorm the palace, having heard of Varus coming with ſuch a force, raiſed the ſiege and marched off in a fright; upon which the beſieged came forth, with the grandchildren of Herod, to compliment him on his arrival, and to thank him for his timely help. Sabinus was the only one who did not follow their example; but ſtole away privately towards the ſea. Varus gave a very ſevere reprimand to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, for the late hoſtilities againſt the Roman legion; but was ſoon appeaſed, when he was appriſed, that they neither had a hand in it, nor were able to hinder it, being themſelves pent up by thoſe foreign Jews, who were come to the feaſt and had begun the tumult. However, as he thought it expedient to make a ſevere example of the ringleaders of it, he ſent ſome of his troops through the whole kingdom, with orders to make a ſtrict ſearch after them, and bring them priſoners to him. Upon their return they brought a vaſt number of thoſe wretches, two thouſand of whom he cauſed to be crucified, and releaſed the reſt. This ſeverity did not hinder

Raiſes the ſiege.

hinder another body of ten thouſand from taking up arms againſt him, which prevented his diſbanding his auxiliaries, as he had deſigned, and obliged him to ſend them to quell this new revolt. They eaſily compaſſed it, becauſe the enemy, inſtead of ſtanding the brunt, ſurrendered themſelves at diſcretion. Varus forgave the common people, and contented himſelf with ſending the chiefs of them bound to Auguſtus [u].

A new inſurrection quelled.

ALL this while Archelaus was ſoliciting the emperor to ratify his father's will, and to name him king of Judæa. About this time Martace his mother died; ſoon after which there arrived a deputation from Judæa, conſiſting of fifty of the heads of that nation, who were ſent to oppoſe his election, and to beg of the emperor, that their country might be made part of the province of Syria, and ſubject to the governors of it, without kingly government. They were ſeconded by above eight thouſand Jews then ſettled at Rome, who all profeſſed an averſion to a kingly government, and a deſire of living under that of the Romans, provided they might be allowed the free exerciſe of their religion and laws. Auguſtus referred the matter to a council of his own friends, whom he convened at the temple of Apollo, which he had lately built, and where both ſides were to be heard in their turn. Here the Jewiſh embaſſadors began with inveighing againſt Herod, who, they affirmed, had governed their nation not like a monarch, but like a tyrant, violating all their laws both ſacred and civil; impoveriſhing a nation, whom, at his firſt acceſſion to the crown, he had found rich and opulent; ſacrificing an infinite number of his ſubjects either to his ambition, jealouſy, or reſentment, not ſparing even the matrons and virgins of diſtinction, either in his fury or his luſt; notwithſtanding all which, they would gladly have accepted of his ſon Archelaus for their prince, had he not given them ſo many convincing proofs of his tyrannic diſpoſition, an inſtance of which they urged in the maſſacre of the three thouſand mutineers in the temple, before he had received the imperial confirmation. They concluded with a petition to Auguſtus, that he would put their nation under the Syrian governors, and then he would ſoon be convinced, whether the Jews were really ſuch rebellious people as they had been repreſented to him; and not, on the contrary, men of the moſt ſteady loyalty to the ſuperior powers. All this was immediately anſwered by [u] Antiq. & bell Jud. ubi ſupra.

Damascen, who took upon him to vindicate the deceased, as well as the new, king, from the charge of tyranny and cruelty. And Augustus, having heard both sides thus far, dismissed the assembly, without declaring his resolution, till further consideration.

Cæsar's division of the Jewish kingdom.

He was not long, however, before he decided the controversy in such a manner, as convinced the world of his friendship both to Herod and to his offspring. He bestowed the half of the kingdom on Archelaus, under the title of Ethnarch, or governor of a nation, and backed it with a promise that he would give him that of king, as soon as he heard that he had rendered himself worthy of it. This part or ethnarcy contained Judæa Propria, Idumæa, and Samaria; but he exempted this last of one fourth part of their taxes, in consideration of their peaceable behaviour during the late troubles in Judæa and Galilee. However, this partition, as well as change of title from a king to an ethnarch, plainly shews, that he was nothing less than satisfied at his proceedings, and indeed, whatever Damascen might urge to colour his two speedy assumption of the regal power, it is plain, he had not paid that regard to the emperor which he ought to have done; all which was sufficiently aggravated by the oppolite party. And as he looked upon that young prince as too likely to follow his father's violent measures, nothing could be more prudently thought on to keep him within due bounds, than such a conditional promise. He likewise dismembered from Judæa the cities of Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, because they followed the customs of the Greeks; and joined them to the province of Syria. Josephus reckons the whole yearly revenue of this new ethnarchy to have amounted to six hundred talents. The remainder of Herod's kingdom was divided between his other two sons, Philip and Antipas; the former of whom had the regions of Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, to which Cæsar added that part of Galilee which had formerly belonged to Zenodorus, mentioned a little higher, and which alone amounted to about one hundred talents per year. The latter had the greatest part of Galilee, and the countries beyond Jordan, amounting to two hundred talents a year. Salome had for her share, beside half a million of silver, the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, to which Augustus added that of Ascalon. The rest of Herod's legacies, particularly the fifteen hundred talents which he had bequeathed to him, he generously distributed between his other relations, his grand-sons, and two virgin-daughters, whom he married to Pheroras's sons, re-servir

ſerving for himſelf only a few of his moveables, not ſo much for their value, as out of regard to the memory of his deceaſed friend [w].

A pſeudo-Alexander ſets up for the crown.

THIS new diviſion of the Jewiſh kingdom was ſcarce ſettled, before there ſtarted up a new pretender, who quickly drew a numerous party after him. He was a Jew, brought up at Sidon, and ſo like the late Alexander the ſon of Herod by Mariamne, formerly put to death, that, when he came to give himſelf out to be the ſame, and to have been preſerved alive, he eaſily deceived not only the bulk of the Jews, but even thoſe who had been acquainted with that unfortunate prince. He was aſſiſted in this impoſture by a cunning fellow, who had formerly gone through all the intrigues of Herod's court, and who finding the young man capable of carrying it on with great likelihood of ſucceſs, adviſed him to ſet about it immediately. Theſe two accordingly began with giving out, that the two young princes, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, whom the Jews ſuppoſed to have been put to death purſuant to their father's order, had been preſerved by a faithful friend, and two other perſons ſubſtituted in their ſtead. Theſe two went firſt to Crete, thence to Melos, where they raiſed conſiderable ſums of money from the Jews that were ſettled in thoſe iſlands. Having ſucceeded ſo well at their firſt ſetting out, they reſolved to ſail for Rome; and being arrived at Puteoli, were met by all the heads of the Jews, eſpecially by thoſe who were in the intereſt either of the Herodian, or of the Aſmonean, families, of both which they looked upon him as the immediate heir, and conſequently as the only rightful king of the Jews. Upon this ſuppoſition, they ſpared neither pains, coſt, nor acclamations, to render his entry into Rome as ſplendid as poſſible. The litter or chair of ſtate in which he was carried, the vaſt crouds that accompanied him, and the reception he met with at every place he came to, were all anſwerable to the high notion they had conceived of him.

Diſcovered by Auguſtus.

As ſoon as they were come to Rome, whither the reſt of the Jews flocked in crouds to pay their homage to this new-riſen offspring of the Aſmonean race, Auguſtus, who knew Herod too well to believe that he could be impoſed upon in a matter of ſuch importance, ſent one of his freedmen, named Celadus, formerly a companion of the two brothers, to bring this new Alexander to him. Celadus was as eaſily impoſed upon as the reſt; but Cæſar, who examined him with a more curious and unerring eye, ſoon diſcovered a manifeſt deficiency in the port and majeſty of this upſtart, from what he had obſerved in that young prince, beſides a certain calloſity in the hands of the former, which convinced him of the cheat. He therefore aſked him and his inſtrument, What was become of his brother? and why he did not likewiſe come and make out his claim to the Jewiſh crown? and was readily anſwered by both, that Ariſtobulus had ſtaid at Cyprus to wait the iſſue of this journey, that if one of the ſons of Marriamne miſcarried, the other might be preſerved to keep up the Aſmonean race and title. Their mutual agreement, which ſtill helped to confirm the reſt, ſerved only to make the emperor look upon the whole as a forged ſtory; and, to be further convinced of it, having taken the young man aſide, he, partly by threats, and partly by a promiſe of ſparing his life, extorted a full confeſſion of the whole impoſture, the conſequence of which was, that the young man was ſent to the gallies, and the other, who had been the contriver of it, was condemned to be hanged. As for the Jews who had aſſiſted them with money, Cæſar thought their loſs and diſappointment a ſufficient puniſhment[x].

[w] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 13. Vide & Strab. & Tacit ubi ſupra,

Punished.

Year of the flood 3001. Of Chriſt 2. Before the vulgar æra 2. Archelaus's tyranny.

But neither the diſlike which the Jews had ſhewn upon this occaſion to the Herodian family, nor the prudent caution which Cæſar had given Archelaus, proved ſufficient to keep him within due bounds. He was no ſooner returned into Judæa, than he began to betray ſome marks of his arbitrary and reſenting temper. He began with the depoſition of Joazar from the high-prieſthood, on pretence, that he had ſided with ſome of the late mutineers; and beſtowed that dignity on Eleazar the brother of the depoſed pontiff. He next repudiated his wife Mariamne, and married Glaphyra, the widow of his brother Alexander, contrary to the Moſaic law, becauſe ſhe had had ſeveral children by him, and had been married, ſince her firſt husband's death, to Juba king of Mauritania. He depoſed ſoon after the new-inſtalled pontiff upon ſome diſguſt, and raiſed Jeſus the ſon of Sias to that dignity. He beſtowed an immenſe deal of coſt in rebuilding and beautifying the royal palace at Jericho, and bringing down one half of the ſtream, which watered the village of Nerea, into the grove of palm-trees which he had planted in the neighbouring fields[y]. About this time Caius, [x] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. ult. Bell. Jud l. iii. c 5. [y] Antiq. ibid. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 6.

Caius, coming from Egypt [z] into Judæa, expreſſed his contempt of the Jewiſh religion, by refuſing to offer up ſacrifices at Jeruſalem, for which he is ſaid to have been commended by Cæſar [a].

THE firſt years of Archelaus proved peaceable enough; but the people at length, both Jews and Samaritans, being tired with his tyrannical reign, joined in a petition to Auguſtus againſt him; which had no ſooner reached him, than he ſent an agent of his into Judæa, without any other letter, to fetch the Jewiſh ethnarch to him. Archelaus, tho' warned, as well as the inceſtuous Glaphyra, by ſome portending dreams (V), had given ſo little heed to them, that Cæſar's meſſenger found him in the height of his mirth, when he came to acquaint him with his orders, and obliged him to haſten with him to Rome. Upon their arrival there, Auguſtus, with his uſual equanimity, heard both the charge and the defence; after which he condemned Archelaus to be baniſhed to the city of Vienne, in Gaul or Dauphiné, and all his goods to be confiſcated. Judæa, by this ſentence, being reduced into a province of the empire, was ordered to be taxed, and Cyrenius, the then governor of Syria, and a man of conſular dignity, was ſent thither to ſee it executed as we have lately hinted upon another occaſion); after which having ſold Archelaus's palaces, and ſeized upon all his treaſure, he returned Baniſhed. Year of the flood 3005. Of Chriſt 6.

[z] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 3. [a] Sueton. in Octav. c. 93.

(V) Theſe dreams, which, whether true or falſe, ſhew how much the Jewiſh nation was addicted to them, our author gives us the following account of:

Archelaus ſaw ten ears of corn full ripe, and ten oxen devouring them; which viſion made ſuch an impreſſion on him, that he conſulted the wiſeſt and moſt expert magicians and Chaldeans about it (9); but they differing in their opinion, one Simon an Eſſenian interpreted the ten ears of the ten years of Archelaus's reign, which, he ſaid, was to have a ſpeedy end, ſignified by their being devoured by the oxen. The event verified his interpretation, as appears by the ſequel.

That of his wife needed not, it ſeems, a conjurer to expound it. She dreamt, that her firſt huſband, the unfortunate Alexander, came to her; and, whilſt ſhe was preparing to receive him with open arms, upbraided her with faithleſs incontinency, in marrying Juba, and then his brother Archelaus, after ſhe had ſo many children by him; but, added he, I ſhall ſoon rid thee of this reproach. The conſequence was, that ſhe juſt lived long enough to tell her dream, and died within two days after it (10).

(9) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 6. (10) Ibid. & antiq. ubi ſupra.

ed to Antioch, leaving the Jews in no small ferment upon the account of this new tax [b].

ne cauſe of eir future ars and to- l deſtructi- n

COPONIUS, the Roman general of the horſe and gover-nor of Judæa under Cyrenius, had accompanied him in that expedition; and his preſence, as well as the good offi-ces of Joazar the then high-prieſt (W), had, for a while, kept the nation under ſome reſtraint, till Judas the Gaulonite, of whom we have ſpoken in the laſt ſection, and one Sadu-cus, a turbulent Phariſee, ſet it again into a flame. We hinted before, that this boutefeu took upon him to condemn this taxing as ſlaviſh, idolotrous, and inconſiſtent with their duty to God, the only ſovereign who could claim any homage or allegiance from the children of Abraham. This topic ſeldom failed to make an impreſſion on a people, who were taught to look upon themſelves as the only favourites of hea-ven, and upon the reſt of the world as deſigned to be their ſlaves; but it wrought much more effectually at this time, when the hopes of the Meſſiah or temporal deliverer in-ſpired them with a tenfold diſdain againſt the yoke, which their conquerors were then laying upon them. Judas there-fore could not have wiſhed for a more favorable juncture, to make himſelf the head of a numerous and powerful party; And therefore, added he, it is high time, that you ſhould make a ſtrenuous puſh for your country's freedom, and, without expecting new miracles to be wrought for you, do but depend on the favour of providence, and you need not doubt of coming off conquerors. There wanted but this laſt incentive to ſet them a madding after the promiſed liber-ty. Accordingly, we find that his ſpeech worked them into a kind

[b] Joſeph. Antiq. ubi ſupra. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 6.

(W) Joſephus has forgot to tell us how he was reinſtalled into this dignity, of which he had been deprived by Archelaus ſome years before, to make room for the ſon of Sias, hinted a little higher; but it is probable, that, after that prince's baniſhment, Joazar found means to recover that dignity under the Syrian go-vernor; and this might be the motive of that zeal which he ſhewed in appeaſing the diſcontented Jews.

But this laſt action, inſtead of confirming him in his pontifi-cate, proved the cauſe of his ſecond depoſition, it having render-ed him ſo obnoxious to the Jewiſh nation, that Cyrenius was forced, for quietneſs ſake, to turn him out of it, and to put Ananus in his place (11).

a kind of furious phrenſy, which quickly vented itſelf into the moſt horrid butcheries and cruelties; his party plundering, burning, deſtroying, and murdering every-where, indiſcriminately Jews as well as Gentiles; and, in a word, all that oppoſed his ſpecious pretence of religion and liberty. The war, being thus kindled within and without, brought on a grievous famine, and next a peſtilence; all which did end at length in the total ruin of that rebellious and unhappy nation [c]. All this was owing to the ambition of this new upſtart ſect or faction, of whom we have already given an account in the cloſe of the laſt ſection; to which we ſhall only add, that, after the death of their chief, they diſtinguiſhed themſelves by the godly name of zealots, and under that ſpecious title committed the moſt unheard-of cruelties, and carried their violence even into the very temple.

The temple polluted by the Samaritans.

ALL this while the Samaritans had not forgot their old grudge againſt the Jews, though they had been ſo long quiet. Cyrenius was ſcarce gone out of Judæa before they began to hatch new miſchiefs againſt them; they waited till the next approaching feaſt of the paſſover, when, on the eve of it, a number of them having by private means ſlipt into the temple, ſtrewed the galleries and other places of reſort with dead mens bones, ſo that the prieſts on the next morning, finding that ſacred place polluted, were forced to put a ſtop to the ſolemnity. How they afterwards purified it, and what other remedy they took to renew the feſtival, Joſephus doth not tell us; he only adds, that it made them more cautious for the future to guard the avenues from all ſuch inſults. However, the ceremony was ſoon reſumed, and it was on this feſtival that Chriſt, being then twelve years of age, came with his parents to that ſolemnity, according to the Jewiſh cuſtom, which obliged all the males that have attained to that age, to repair to the temple on the three grand feſtivals †.

Jeſus Chriſt ſtays after the feaſt.

Here the holy child choſe to ſtay unknown to his parents, who were departed with the reſt of the company. They did not miſs him till night, when having in vain ſought him among their relations and acquaintance, among whom they ſuppoſed him to have been, they returned immediately to Jeruſalem. Here, after a three days ſorrowful ſearch, they found him at length in the temple, ſitting among the Jewiſh doctors, and ſurpriſing them with the wiſdom of his queſtions and anſwers, ſo far beyond his mean education and tender years.

[c] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1. & ſeq. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8, & ſeq. † See vol iii. p. 183, & 184. (O), Conf. & Exod, xxiii. 15. & xxxiv. 23, Deut. xvi. 16. & Luke ii. 41, & ſeq.

years. His pious mother, though ravished at so pleasing a scene, could not forbear expressing some tender resentment at the solicitude which his absence had given her. The short answer he returned was not presently understood by them, but yet was a lecture full of excellent wisdom: Wist ye not, said he, that I must be about my father's business? and so he really was; for as he had been sent to be teacher of the world, and as he now commenced what the Jews called a son or disciple of the law, it became him, who was to be our pattern, to make his first accesses to his future office of instructor, by coming to learn of those whom God had appointed to preserve and teach the knowledge of his laws. His mother suffered none of these sayings to slip out of her memory, and she and her husband gladly returned with him to their mean habitation, where he continued in a dutiful subjection to them. In this humble privacy, his wisdom encreasing with his stature, he attracted the eyes and hearts of all that beheld him, and continued exercising the trade of a carpenter (X) till the thirtieth year of his age, when be began to make a more glorious appearance in the world.

CORONIUS was soon after this feast succeeded by Ambivius, in whose governorship Salome died, and bequeathed her three cities, mentioned a little higher, together with the fine grove of palm-trees planted by Archelaus, and all her vast treasure, not to either of her nephews, who still held their small

(X) This is the common received opinion, founded on an antient tradition, that Joseph dying soon after this feast, he being by that time very old, the child Jesus was obliged to work at that trade, to maintain himself and his mother; and is further confirmed by the Jews calling him sometimes the carpenter, and sometimes the carpenter's son (12).

We beg leave to take notice here also, that this encrease of knowledge which the evangelist attributes to him, is very inconsistent with Arius's notion of the λογος or word supplying the place of the soul in him; neither has any of his followers, either antient or modern, been as yet able to take off the difficulty. The Socinian system would indeed more effectually do it, were it not in too many cases diametrically opposite to the doctrine of the gospel. There remains therefore no other way to remove it, than by owning that Christ had a human soul as well as a human body, and that the former, notwithstanding its union with his divine nature, was as capable of improvement in wisdom, as the latter was of encrease in strength and stature; which is undoubtedly the antient doctrine of the christian church.

(12) Conf. Marc. vi. 3. & Matth. xiii. 55. John iv. 44.

ſmall toparchies, but to the empreſs Julia, or, as Joſephus affects to call her, Livia, Ambivius after a ſhort time was ſucceeded by Annius Rufus, and Auguſtus died at Nola in Campania, as ſhall be ſeen in the Roman hiſtory, and was ſucceeded by Tiberius, after this latter had been ſomewhat above two years admitted into the copartnerſhip of the empire. From this latter muſt the fifteenth year of Tiberius, mentioned by the evangeliſt [d], be taken. Tiberius, upon his coming to the empire, recalled Rufus, and ſent Valerius Gratus into Judæa, who was the fourth Roman governor or procurator of it, and continued in that government eleven years [e]. About five years after his being entered into it, he depoſed the high-prieſt Ananus or Annas in the fifteenth year of his pontificate, and raiſed Iſhmael the ſon of Fabus to that dignity. Being ſoon after diſpleaſed with his choice, he took it from Iſhmael on the next year, and gave it to Eleazar the ſon of Ananus, whom he had lately depoſed. Eleazar in a year's time was forced to reſign, and was ſucceeded by Simon the ſon of Camith, who, within the compaſs of another year, was turned out, and Joſeph, ſurnamed Caiphas, and ſon-in-law to Annas above-metioned, was put in his room [f]; ſo uncertain and venal was that dignity become by this time (Y).

Various changes of governors and high-prieſts. Year of the flood 3014. Of Chriſt 15.

GRATUS himſelf was ſoon after recalled, and ſucceeded by Pontius Pilate, a perſon who exceeded all his predeceſſors in injuſtice, extortion, and cruelty, and ſo thoroughly wedded to his own intereſt, that he was capable of the vileſt actions to promote that favourite end. Joſephus has been ſomewhat ſparing of his character; but Philo [g] has left us a lively draught of it, a ſhort sketch of which the reader may ſee in the margin (Z); by which he may judge how qualified he [d] Luke iii. 1. Vid Uſſer. ſub A. M. 4017. Prid. ſub. An. C. 12. [e] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 3. [f] Comp. Joſeph. ubi ſupra, & Luke iii. 2. John xviii. 13. Acts iv. 6. [g] Legat. ad Caium.

(Y) Theſe are the two high-prieſts that are mentioned in the goſpel to have proſecuted and condemned Jeſus Chriſt to death; and Caiphas, or, as he is there called, Caiaphas (13), was the perſon who adjudged it neceſſary that he ſhould be cut off to ſave the nation from ruin.

(Z) His whole adminiſtration, according to this author, was one continued ſcene of venal juſtice, rapine, tyranny, and every wicked action of racking and putting innocent men to death, untried, and uncondemned, and of every kind of ſavage cruelty.

(13) John xi. 49, & ſeq.

Year of the flood 3025. Of Christ 26: Herod and Philip in their toparchies.

he was for the part he was shortly to act, in passing the most unjust sentence on the most innocent of men.

We hinted a little higher, that the other sons of Herod had still kept possession of their toparchies, notwithstanding Archelaus's deposition and banishment; it will be therefore very proper here to give some further account of them, before we enter into a new and different scene. They had each of them settled themselves the best they could in their small territories. Antipas, better known by the name of Herod, who had the country of Galilee, began with rebuilding the city of Sephoris, which had but a little before been reduced into ashes by the son of Varus, and surrounded it with a strong wall and towers, so that it became the bulwark, and one of the best cities, of that canton; and as he had been successful enough to ingratiate himself with the new emperor, he built another, a fine city, on the northern banks of the lake of Genezareth, and called it Tiberias, in honour of him (A); and from thence that lake came to be called the sea of Tiberias. This city he was forced to people mostly with Galileans and strangers, because it being built on a ground which was full of sepulchres, the going over which pollutes the Jews seven whole days, he could hardly get any of that nation to settle there, though he endowed it with considerable privileges, and gave its inhabitants the greatest encouragement, viz. lands to some, houses to others, to take off their qualms of conscience about treading on dead bodies. Another city, formerly called Betaramphtha, he rebuilt, and called by the empress's name, Julias. His brother Philip followed his example, and built the village of Bethsaida, on the opposite end of the same lake, into a magnificent city, and called it likewise Julias, and gave the name of Cæsarea to Paleas, the place where the Jordan has its spring-head, after he had greatly enlarged and beautified it.

Built Sephoris and other cities;

(A) Josephus adds, that it was not far from the hot baths of Emmaus; for which reason we think it necessary to remind our reader of what we observed in a former note, that the Jews gave the name of Hamah and Hammath to all places that had any such waters; that of Emmaus is the same, only softened and grecified. We must therefore not confound this last with another in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (14), which bears the same name, and most likely upon the same account.

(14) Vid. int. al. Luc. xxiv. 13. Vid. & Reland. Palæst illustr. l. i. c. 46.

it [h]. During this time came out that edict of Tiberius, which obliged all Jews and Egyptians to depart from the city of Rome [i], or, according to another, out of the territories of Italy [k]. The cause of this edict, being some vile practices, which a few mean persons of each of those nations had been acting in the imperial city, is foreign to our present subject; we refer our readers for a further account to Josephus [l] and the two authors last quoted. All that we need to add to it is, what Philo has observed more than once [m], that this severity against the Jews, whatever pretence it might be coloured with, was hatched under-hand by Sejanus. That wicked minister, who knew how opposite his plots and designs were to the known loyalty of the Jews, could not but conceive some dreadful jealousies from them, which obliged him at length to rid himself of them (B).

Jews banished Rome: Year of the flood 3018. Of Christ 19.

HITHERTO Judæa, though in a violent ferment on account of the late tax, and some other tumults which the Romans had appeased by mean force, had not, however, broke out into such a violent and universal flame, as it did after the coming of Pilate. It was this governor, whose fierce, obstinate, and cruel temper, hastened on those seditions and revolts, which did not end but with the total extirpation of the Jewish state. His predecessors had hitherto wisely forbore to bring the Roman standards into the city, because their bearing the images of men and living creatures made them to be had in abomination by the Jews. But Pilate, who thought it beneath him to shew them the same complaisance, ordered his troops, which were to winter in that metropolis, to enter it in the night, with those standards covered, and caused them on the next morning to be displayed. This new and shocking sight put the whole city into an uproar; they went to him in a body to Cæsarea, where he then was, and begged of him that they might be removed to some other place; but were answered, that he could not comply with their request, without glancing an affront on the emperor.

Pilate causes new troubles in Judæa:

Sets up standards at Jerusalem.

[h] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 3. [i] Tacit. an. l. ii. c. 85. [k] Sueton. in Tiber. c. 36. [l] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 4. [m] Legat. ad Caium.

(B) What seems to confirm what our author says on that subject is, that, after the death of that faithless minister the emperor expressed himself more favourably with respect to the Jews, in the orders he sent to the several governors of his provinces, as shall be seen in the sequel.

emperor. As they ſtood ſtiff in their petion, and he in his denial, ſix whole days, five of which the former had continued proſtrate on the ground before his palace, night and day [n], he at length came out to them, as with deſign to give them audience; and being mounted on his tribunal, which he had reared in the circus, gave the ſignal to ſome of his troops, whom he had coveniently poſted, to fall on them, and to murder all that ſhould not immediately depart, and who inſtantly came out and ſurrounded them. The Jews, however, far from being terrified at ſo horrid a perfidy, did meekly hold out their necks to thoſe butchers, telling them and the governor, that the loſs of their lives was nothing ſo terrible to them as the violation of theirlaws: aud Pilate, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch a paſſive conſtancy in that turbulent nation, was ſo moved at it, that he at length granted their requeſt, and ordered the ſtandards to be removed out of their metropolis [o].

Shields conſecrated to Tiberius hung up in the royal palace.

But as he ſeems to have been wholly upon mortifiing and ſpighting the Jewiſh nation, he ſoon reſumed his uſual courſe. A project came next into his head to ſet up a number of ſhields in the royal palace of Jeruſalem in honour of Tiberius (C); but which the Jews failed not to reſent, as an indignity offered to them, rather than a compliment to that emperor. He had, it is true, taken care that there ſhould be no carved images upon them that might give them offence; but the very inſcription of them was, they thought, contrary to their law; otherwiſe, there was nothing more common, both before and after the Jewiſh captivity, than for the Jewiſh monarchs to cover even the front of the temple with ſuch ornaments, as the reader muſt have often obſerved through the courſe of their hiſtory. The magiſtrates therefore of that metropolis, with the ſons of Herod (D) at their head, went to repreſent to him in the moſt civil terms, that ſuch a conſecration

[n] Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8. [o] Id. ibid. & antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 4

(C) This tranſaction we have from Philo (15); Joſephu makes no mention of it.

(D) Meaning probably of the late Herod the Great; wh thoſe ſons were, our author doth not tell us; but we may reaſor ably ſuppoſe two of them to have been Herod Antipas, tetrarc of Galilee, and Philip his brother, mentioned a little highe both willing enough at that time to oblige the Jews. The oth two muſt have been probably ſome of his grand-children.

(15) Legat. p. 1033, & ſeq.

ſecration was contrary to their laws, and to beg of him that he would pay a greater regard to them. Pilate repulſed them with his uſual ſcorn and obſtinacy, till they ventured at length to adviſe him, not to puſh things ſo far as to exaſperate the nation into an open revolt. They added, that if he had received any ſuch command from Cæſar, he need but ſhew it to them, and they would immediately diſpatch a deputation to Rome to petition the emperor againſt it. Theſe laſt words threw the governor into a ſtrange dilemma: on the one hand, he dreaded nothing ſo much as ſuch a deputation, which would in all likelihood lay open all the iniquities of his adminiſtration: on the other, if he complied with their requeſt, in removing the ſhields, he not only gave an advantage to a people he hated and deſpiſed, but expoſed himſelf to the reſentment of the emperor, who might probably look upon ſuch a compliance as an affront to himſelf, and a compliment to the Jews. The magiſtrates, perceiving the trouble he was in, immediately withdrew, and ſent ſoon after a very preſſing, but ſubmiſſive, letter to Rome, which had the deſired effect. Tiberius immediately diſpatched another to Pilate, wherein he highly blamed him for what he had done, and ordered him to remove the ſhields into ſome other place; which he accordingly did, and ſent them to be hung at Cæſarea [p].

His next project to vex the Jews was, to find out ſome ſpecious pretence for drawing money out of the ſacred treaſury. This was indeed the moſt effectual way to touch them to the quick, next to the rifling of the temple; for he knew but too well their invincible attachment to thoſe two places. The plauſible pretext he choſe for it was, the bringing of an aqueduct, about two hundred furlongs off, into Jeruſalem; the expence of which he expected ſhould be ſupplied out of the ſacred depoſitory, and demanded accordingly of them, that a tax ſhould be levied upon it. However, as he knew that this would not fail to provoke the people into a mutiny, ſo he took care to provide againſt it, by cauſing a number of his ſoldiers to mix themſelves with the croud, with clubs hid under their coats, to be ready upon a ſignal to fall upon the mutineers. He was hardly ſeated on his tribunal, before it was ſurrounded accordingly by a vaſt concourſe of the Jews, who came exclaiming againſt his project, and ſome of the meaner ſort, as is uſual in ſuch mobs, accompanied their clamour with bitter invectives againſt him.

Another tumult cauſed by Pilate.

[p] Legat ad Caium.

Pilate had not heard them long, before he gave his men the ſignal, who immediately fell on the Jews pelmel with their clubs, wounded, lamed, and even killed many of them indiſcriminately, and diſperſed the reſt [q]. Joſephus doth not tell us, whether Pilate went on with his deſign, neither is it eaſy to gueſs, either from him or from Philo, at what year of his government the three laſt-mentioned tranſactions happened. All that can be gathered from the whole is, that he took all the pains he could to make it uneaſy to them, from the beginning to the end of it, and that the Jews were not behind-hand with him, either in oppoſing his deſigns, oppreſſions, and cruelties, or in giving him freſh troubles by their tumults and ſeditions, in which every ſect joined to give a helping hand, though at ever ſo great variance in other points. This was the diſmal ſtate of Judæa, when the Saviour of the world made his firſt publick appearance into his miniſtry: miſerably torn by their inteſtine broils: oppreſſed with the heavy yoke of the Roman emperors, and of their more rapacious ſubſtitutes: divided into factions and ſects, which treated each other with greater rancour and inhumanity, than their very oppreſſors: deceived, and often led to their ruin by upſtart demagogues, falſe prophets, and pretended Meſſiahs; and ſoothed and flattered to a degree of judicial infatuation, into the miſtaken notion of a ſpeedy temporal deliverer, and of a glorious and laſting ſcene of conqueſts, triumphs, and other earthly happineſs, under his auſpicious reign. All which proved ſo many invincible obſtacles to their embracing that ſalvation, which Chriſt the true Meſſiah came to offer them, and made them run into the very jaws of that deſtruction, which their rejection of him and his doctrine, joined to all their other impieties, did ſhortly bring upon them. All which will be beſt ſeen by a ſhort review of the three laſt years of his life: of the irrefragable credentials he brought with him, and the obſtinate and unreaſonable oppoſition they made againſt him: of his love and tenderneſs towards them, and of their malice and ingratitude to him: of his irreproachable innocence, and of their injuſtice in condemning him to death: and laſtly, of the innumerable evidences given to them after his reſurrection, of his being the true promiſed Meſſiah, and of their invincible hardneſs aud obſtinacy in rejecting him to the laſt. We ſhall therefore cloſe the preſent ſection with a ſhort account of thoſe three laſt ſignal years of his life and his doleful exit on the

The cauſes of the Jews infidelity and deſtruction:

[q] Antiq. ubi ſupra.

the croſs; confining ourſelves chiefly to ſuch particulars as have an immediate connection with the two main points in our view; the divinity of his miſſion, and juſtice of the Jews puniſhment in the deſtruction of their city, temple, and commonwealth, and total diſperſion of their nation, for their obſtinate rejection of him and his doctrine (E).

(E) It will be perhaps objected, that in entering thus far into thoſe two religious points, we go out of our limits as hiſtorians, and that, inſtead of writing a continuation of the hiſtory of the Jews, we are going to prove the truth of chriſtianity againſt them. But let it, we pray, be conſidered, that though this were the real caſe, the harm would not be great; and that, provided both points are kept going ſtill hand in hand, and we do not ſo fix our eye upon one, as to loſe ſight of the other, we ſtill anſwer the two main ends of hiſtory, to make men wiſer and better.

We ſhould moreover be guilty of a flagrant injuſtice to the infatuated Jews, if we ſhould neglect ſo fair an opportunity of reminding them of the ſource of all their misfortunes, and pointing out to them their only remedy. We have heretofore taken notice of a promiſe made to them by God, that though their ſins had cauſed them to be diſperſed through the four quarters of the world, yet, as ſoon as they were brought to an humble acknowledgement and confeſſion of them, he would gather them home again into their own land.

Accordingly, before their total diſperſion, the longeſt captivity they underwent was but of ſeventy years, though it was brought upon them by the horrideſt crimes, ſuch is idolatry, murders without number, ſacrileges of the blackeſt nature committed by Manaſſes and his wicked ſucceſſors; and yet they had this comfort in the midſt of their puniſhment, that the ſame prophets who had foretold their captivity had likewiſe ſet a period to it; and were ſtill encouraging them to bear their chaſtiſement patiently, ſince God would certainly put an happy end to it at the time perfixed.

What crime can they then charge themſelves with of ſo atrocious a nature, as to bring this more dreadful captivity of ſeventeen hundred years upon them, without one prophecy, or even comfortable glimpſe, when they ſhall ſee an end to it? If they know of any ſuch ſin, why do they not confeſs and acknowledge it, and thereby put a period to their miſery? for God's promiſe ſtands as ſure now, as it did three thouſand years ago.

Since then they are ignorant of this grievous crime; why ſhould we make a difficulty to point it out to them, when we have ſo fair an occaſion offered? why ſhould we not tell them, that it was their putting the Meſſiah to an unjuſt and ignominious death? and which they are ſo far from acknowledging, that they juſtify and glory in it, and by ſo doing murder him ſtill in their

Chriſt enters into his miniſtry:

It was now the thirtieth and laſt jubilee ſince its firſt celebration in the land of Canaan †, when Chriſt, in the thirtieth year of his age, came to preach a more glorious and acceptable one, not to the Jewiſh nation only, but to the whole world. The Jewiſh was uſually uſhered in by the ſound of the trumpets, the new chriſtan one by the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Prepare ye the way of the Lord their hearts, as often as they think or ſpeak of him, and ſo become partakers of their anceſtors guilt as well as puniſhment.

† See before vol. iii. p. 213 Uſſer. an. ſub. A. M. 4030.

Again, The ſcripture doth in ſeveral places, but more expreſly St. Paul (16), aſſure us, that there will be a time when they ſhall be all recalled; and their having continued ſo long unblended with other nations, notwithſtanding their diſperſion through every part of the habitable globe, is a ſtrong proof of it. For whatever ſuperficial heads may imagine, an impartial thinker will eaſily obſerve, that nothing but a particular providence could have kept them in that unmixed ſtate, as they have continued in theſe ſeventeen centuries; when he ſees even in his own land a multitude of nations, in a much leſs time, as much blended and abſorbed into one common name, as their bodies are into one common earth. Eſpecially when we conſider, by what weak ſupports, or rather poor mean evaſions, their faith and hopes have been kept up, ever ſince they have ſeen all ſcripture calculations concerning the time of the Meſſiah ſo long elapſed; to ſay nothing of the many diſcouragements they have at one time or other met with from every nation under heaven.

We are aſſured by the ſame apoſtle (17), that this recall of the Jews will not be till after the fulneſs, or total converſion, of the Gentiles. Were the former once rightly appriſed of this, it is likely their zeal in obſtructing the one would inſenſibly abate, when they ſaw that it was the fatal means of retarding the other.

We may add, that ſince the beſt hiſtorians have not thought it out of their province to plunge into the deep abyſs of obſcurity, to find out the cauſes of the decadence and fall of kingdoms and empires, but have even endeavoured to diſcover them in certain aſpects of the heavenly bodies, tranſits of comets, and ſuch-like amuſing dreams; may we not much more be allowed to venture to trace this remarkable one of the Jews under the conduct of ſuch infallible guides, as the ſcripture and hiſtory afford us? All which will be beſt ſeen, when we come to compare Chriſt's prophecies, againſt that unhappy people, and the wonderful accompliſhment of them, as we have it related by one of the beſt hiſtorians of their own nation.

(16) Rom. xi. paſſ. (17) Ibid. verſ. 25, 26.

Lord, and ſo on [r]. This was the miraculous ſon of Zacharias, a prieſt, prophet, and fore-runner of the Meſſiah, who having left the wilderneſs, where he had ſpent his younger days, came now to preach repentance and the kingdom of the Meſſiah, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, and in the high-prieſthood of Joſeph, ſurnamed Caiaphas, mentioned a little higher. The auſterity of his life (F) and the newneſs of his doctrine drew daily great numbers of Jews to be baptized by him in the Jordan, ſuppoſing him to be the Meſſiah; but he quickly diſclaimed that glorious title, aſſuring them, that

Year of the flood 3029. Of Chriſt 30.

[r] Conf. Iſaiah xl. 1, 2, 3. lx. i. & ſeq. Luc. iii. 2, & ſeq. iv. 19.

(F) His dreſs and manner of living ſeems to have been the ſame with the antient prophets, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume *. His food was wild honey and locuſts, which a modern traveller tells us are very common in thoſe parts, and good for food; from whence he concludes, that they were the creatures the Iſraelites fed ſo plentifully upon in the wilderneſs, and which all the verſions have miſrendered quails. We have had occaſion heretofore † to confute the latter part of this aſſertion. As for the locuſt, which the baptiſt fed upon, the generality of interpreters underſtand it of a real inſect ſo called, whence ſome eaſtern nations have been called Acridophagi or locuſt-eaters (18). Others underſtand it of a kind of bean or pulſe ſo called; the reader may conſult interpreters about it, if he pleaſes; but the other notion is much more probable, that inſect being common, cheap, and particularly permitted in the levitical law to be eaten by the Iſraelites (19).

Archbiſhop Uſher ſuppoſes, with great probability, that this preacher of repentance began his miniſtry on the grand faſt, or expiation day, of which frequent mention has been made in this hiſtory, it being enjoined to every Iſraelite to faſt, and to afflict themſelves on that day, under the penalty of being cut off from his people. This day fell, as we elſewhere obſerved ‡, on the tenth day of the ſeventh month, called Tiſhri, anſwering to about the nineteenth of our October; and on that ſolemnity the jubilee was to be proclaimed through all the land. (20)

Upon both which accounts no time could be more proper to begin the work of proclaiming the more ſpiritual and univerſal jubilee, which was now at hand.

* Vol iii. p. 471, Com. with Matth. iii. 4. † vol. ii. p. 592, (Q). (18) Vid. Euſtath. in Od. 9. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. xix. c. 29. Moſ. Levit. &. al. (19) Levit. xi. 21, & ſeq. ‡ See vol. iii. p. 213, and p. 205, (K). (20) Ibid. xxxv. 9. vid. Uſſer. ſub A. M. 4030.

that he was only ſent as his precurſor, and to point him out to them, as the perſon who was to baptize them with the Holy Ghoſt. Jeſus came accordingly to the place ſoon after to be baptized among the reſt, and John in an humble guiſe excuſed himſelf from that high office; but being at length prevailed upon to go into the river with him, upon their coming out of the water, the Holy Ghoſt viſibly deſcended and lighted upon him, whilſt a voice was heard from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved ſon, in whom I am well pleaſed [s].

Baptized and manifeſted by John:

Whereupon the baptiſt took that opportunity to manifeſt him to all that were there preſent, and to bear this ample teſtimony of him, that he was the very Chriſt, an the lamb of God, who was to take away the ſins of the world [t].

As John continued baptizing and preaching in the neighbourhood of Bethabara (G), a great concourſe of people flocked to him from all parts, eſpecially in their return homewards from Jeruſalem, where they had been celebrating the feaſt of tabernacles, which fell out about the beginning of November †. Among them was a great number of the Phariſaic

[s] Matt. iii. 13. & ſeq. Luc. iii. 21. & ſeq. [t] Ibid. ibid. vid. & John. i. 29, & ſeq. † Vid. vol. iii. p. 193, & (B)

(G) So called from the Hebrew בית עברה beth-habarah, the houſe of paſſing over, or ferry-houſe, ſuppoſed by ſome to have had that name from the paſſage of the Iſraelites over Jordan ‖; but whether ſo or not, its name ſhews it to have been probably ſome great ferry, and ſo very convenient, not only for baptizing, but on account of the concourſe of people at ſuch places.

But the word beth-habarah may be alſo, and perhaps more properly, tranſlated a cuſtom-houſe, as the officers of it, whom we render publicans were called בעלי העברה, bahale hahabarah, maſters or overſeers of the cuſtoms; a great many of whom came accordingly to the baptiſt, to enquire what kind of repentance was proper for men of their profeſſion; and were anſwered, that they ſhould exact no more than their due (21); to the ſoldiers, which are uſually ſet to guard ſuch avenues, he forbid uſing violence, falſe accuſations, extortion, &c. to the reſt, who on the ſame ſuppoſition, dealt in the mercantile way, he enjoined likewiſe a practice oppoſite to their common one; that is, liberality, hoſpitality, charity, &c. inſtead of covetouſneſs, fraud, &c. Thus was he fulfilling what was foretold of old (22), Every valley ſhall be filled, every mountain levelled, &c.

‖ See vol. iii. p. 69, (Y). (21) Luke iii. 13. (22) Ibid. verſ. 5. Conf. cum Iſai. xl. 4, & ſeq.

Phariſaic ſect, whom he ſeverely rebuked upon ſeveral accounts, particularly on their pretended privilege of being Abraham's poſterity; aſſuring them at the ſame time, that as long as their lives were ſo oppoſite to that of that glorious progenitor, they muſt expect to be caſt, like the chaff, into the fire, whilſt God could raiſe a poſterity to the father of the faithful out of the very ſtones they were trampling upon. On this year was born to Herod Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, a ſon named alſo Agrippa, who was the laſt king of the Jews, and before whom St. Paul was allowed to plead his cauſe; and on the next year was his ſiſter Berenice born, who was alſo preſent at the trial [u], ſhe being ſixteen, and her brother ſeventeen years of age, when their father died [x].

JOHN the Baptiſt having given ſuch an ample teſtimony to the Saviour of the world, the two firſt that became his followers were two of his own diſciples, viz. Andrew the ſon of Jonah and Simon his brother, to whom he gave the ſurname of Cephas, or Stone. On the next day, as he was returning to Nazareth, he called Philip to follow him; and this went and gave notice of him to an honeſt Iſraelite, named Nathanael, who is generally believed to be the ſame, who is by the other evangeliſts called Bartholomew, aſſuring him that they had found the promiſed Meſſiah, namely Jeſus of Nazareth. Nathanael's mean opinion of that city, and of the whole Galilean region, could ſcarcely permit him, at the firſt news, to believe that any thing ſo good as a prophet, much leſs the Meſſiah, could come from ſuch a mean quarter. He was, however, ſoon undeceived, when Jeſus told him ſome of the private diſcourſe which Philip and he had had together under a fig-tree, far enough out his of hearing. Theſe two therefore, and ſome others, followed him into Galilee, where they were all invited to a poor couple's wedding. Here the wine beginning to fail, Jeſus's mother, who was one of the gueſts, acquainted him with it (H), who a[u] Acts xxv. 13, & ſeq. [x] Vid. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. xix. c. ult. Uſſer ſub. A. M. 4030, & ſeq. See alſo a little higher, p. 323. in fin. not.

(H) The anſwer which ours and moſt other verſions make him, who was to be the pattern of all perfection, give to his mother on this occaſion, has given juſt offence to all ſerious readers; notwithſtanding the ſpecious gloſſes which commentators have put upon it, ſuch, as if he expreſſed himſelf to her in thoſe contemptuous roſe ſoon after, and, of his wonted compaſſion, miraculouſly ſupplied them with a freſh and ſufficient quantity. This wonderful change of ſuch a quantity of water into excellent wine filled the company with admiration, and further confirmed his new diſciples, that he really was what they thought him, the true Meſſiah. From Cana he went to Capernaum, a ſmall city on the weſt ſhore of the lake Genezareth, where we ſhall often find him in the ſequel; and where he made but a ſhort ſtay at this time, by reaſon of the approaching feaſt of the paſſover, to which he repaired with his diſciples, it being the firſt feſtival of that kind he celebrated ſince his entrance into his miniſtry[y].

His miracle at Cana.

Upon his coming to the temple, he found it crouded with people that ſold cattle, poultry, and other ſuch things as were uſed in the Jewiſh offerings, and had been ſet up there for the convenience of thoſe that came from far to the feaſts, and bought them on the ſpot, rather than bring them from their homes. This had likewiſe introduced a number of money-changers for the uſe of thoſe who brought foreign coin inſtead of victims, and whoſe tables and trade were equally a profanation of that ſacred place. It is likely, that the prieſts, who might and ought to have made them keep their ſtalls and compters at a greater diſtance, made a perquiſite of their indulgence, and conſequently aggravated the abuſe. Againſt them therefore Chriſt choſe to exert the firſt eſſays of his authority and zeal, by turning them all out of that ſacred building, after a ſevere reproof for their mercantile profanation Drives the traders from the temple.

[y] John ii. 13, & ſeq.

tuous terms, to prevent, if poſſible, that extraordinary worſhip, which he foreſaw his followers would in time pay to her, and the like.

Whereas a learned critic of our own (23) has lately proved beyond all contradiction, that the words, if rightly rendered, are full of the deepeſt filial reſpect; for the word γυνη, woman, is ſo far from being a term of contempt, as it ſounds in our language, that he has proved it from the beſt authors to have been given even to queens. We may ſay the ſame thing of the word אישה, iſhah, in the Hebrew, which is uſed in the ſame reſpectful ſenſe by the Jews.

As for the phraſe which is there rendered, What have I to do with thee? it is well known to be a Hebrew, idiom, which implies no more than, What is it to you or me (24)?

(23) Blackw. ſacred claſſ. vindic.

(24) See a parallel in Sam xix. 22. 1 Kings xvii. 18, & alib.

profanation of it. But whilſt his diſciples admired his zeal for the houſe of God, ſo worthy of the ſon of David, the diſſatisfied Jews were queſtioning and demanding the ſigns of his authority; and received this remarkable anſwer from him, they ſhould deſtroy this temple, meaning that of his body, and he would raiſe it up in three days. It was upon this occaſion that they, miſtaking his meaning, reminded him of the forty and ſix years it had been in building; of which we took notice a little higher. His diſciples, however, underſtood him much better after he was riſen from the dead [z]. In the mean time, he did not omit giving them many other pregnant proofs of his divine miſſion, in the many miracles which he did before them, and which ſtill encreaſed the number of his diſciples; but he, who knew their hearts, eaſily judged, that many of them would ſoon turn their backs upon him, eſpecially when the ſanhedrin and the Phariſaic ſect came to denounce their ſentence of excommunication againſt them(I). However [z] Ibid. ver. 18, & ſeq.

(I) It is doubtleſs a matter of great wonder, how the Jews could ſee ſuch a vaſt number and variety of miracles wrought by Chriſt on the ſick, halt, maimed, deaf, dumb, blind, paralytic, lunatic, demoniac, and other objects of pity, and yet believe him a falſe prophet, a deceiver, or any thing rather than a perſon ſent from God: how they could ſee him give ſight to thoſe that were born blind, life to one that had lain four days corrupting in the grave, feed ſo many thouſands with a few loaves and fiſhes, ſtill the winds and ſeas by his ſingle word; in a word to diſplay, as it were, his irreſiſtible power over the univerſal creation; and yet either condemn him as a cheat, or be ever aſking for ſome further and more convincing ſigns of his being the Meſſiah (25).

We have already accounted in part for this ſtrange proceeding in the detail we gave of their ſeveral ſects, whoſe tenets, being for the moſt part diametrically oppoſite to the doctrine and ſpirit of the goſpel, proved ſo ſtrong an obſtacle againſt it, as few were able to ſurmount. To this we may add, that Chriſt, chuſing the ſabbath day for working the major part of thoſe miracles, gave them ſtill a greater offence; their fooliſh ſuperſtitious prejudices making them look upon even ſuch works of mercy to be a violation of that holy day, notwithſtanding all he could urge to the contrary; a flagrant inſtance of which we have in the cure of the man born blind, in the chapter laſt quoted out of St. John.

But what moſt helped to confirm them in this abſurd judgment of him was, a paſſage in Deuteronomy (26), which, rightly underſtood

(25) Vid. int. al. John vi. 1. ad 30. ix. paſſ. (26) Ch. xiii. 1, & ſeq.

However, though that ſect was the moſt inveterate againſt him, we ſhall find ſome of a more upright temper, who, making derſtood, is only a prudent caution againſt their being drawn aſide by falſe prophets, and pretended wonder-workers; but which they did, and ſtill do, underſtand to this day, ſo literally and contrary to the plain deſign of the law-giver, as to infer a poſſibility of a man's working many and great miracles, either by the help of the devil, by magic, or other means, and without any other view, but that of withdrawing people from the ſervice of God.

Now, when men are once prepoſſeſſed with ſuch an abſurd notion, what miracles can any perſon work that may not be reduced under that claſs, if they have any diſlike either to his perſon or doctrine, or can find any plauſible objection againſt his manner of working them? All which concurred here againſt thoſe of our Saviour, and were upon thoſe accounts rejected by the generality of the Jews, even to this day, as we hinted above. Accordingly, they are ſo far from denying him to have done great and ſignal miracles, that they have invented the moſt ſtupid ſtories to prove, that he did them either by magic, which they ſay he learned in Egypt, or by going privately into the temple, and ſtealing thence the ineffable name of God, by virtue of which he could perform all thoſe great wonders; and many more ſuch ſhameful and childiſh evaſions, the bare mentioning of which is a ſufficient confutation of them. Thoſe that deſire to know more of this Jewiſh traſh, may conſult, among others, the book intitled Sepher Tholedoth Jeſu, or the hiſtory or book of the generations of Jeſus, and ſome others which the reader may find in the margin (27).

But to give our Engliſh readers a ſhort ſpecimen of their opinion concerning him out of thoſe books, ſome affirm him to have been the ſon of one Panther, begotten on a milliner of his debauching, and that the ſoul of Eſau, whoſe memory they have in great abhorrence, paſſed into him, which is, according to their doctrine of the ſoul's tranſmigration, mentioned at the cloſe of the laſt ſection. That he ſtole into the temple, and took from thence the name of God; and having made an inciſion into his thigh, ſtuck it into it, and let the fleſh and ſkin grow over it. That he became by it a very great conjurer and wonder-worker. That Judas was another of the ſame ſtamp and his competitor. That they had a great number of conteſts, which we ſhall forbear inſerting on account of their ridiculouſneſs as well as impiety; and that Judas was ſtill conqueror in all, and gave him at laſt a total defeat.

One would be apt to think theſe to be idle tales, invented only to amuſe their children, and breed them up in a contempt of chriſtianity; and ſome of them have even affirmed it, to wipe off making a more equitable judgment of his miracles and doctrine, came to be instructed by him, and became his disciples, though privately, and for fear of their unbelieving brethren [a].

(27) Rab. Gedaliah Shalſheleth Haccabalah Gantz. Chronol. Nitzachon, Abr. Ben Dior. Tzemach David, & al mult.

AMONG these was one Nicodemus, a venerable ruler, who rightly concluding that such stupendous works could not be Nicodemus comes to be instructed by him.

[a] Ibid. vers. 23. ad. fin.

off the just imputation they would otherwise incur; and yet they are chiefly founded on some as ridiculous stories fetched out of their Talmud, where mention is made of Christ's miracles, and of the means by which he attained to the power of performing them; and pass as current amongst them, as the book out of whichthey are taken.

But what can they say for one of their greatest rabbies (28), who affirms one Jesua, the son of Berachia, or Perachia, to have been tutor to Jesus Christ, and to have taken him into Egypt, and to have turned him off for his debaucheries; though in order to these two having been cotemporaries, the latter must have been born under Alexander Jannæus, and have died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, in the reign of Aristobulus. This anachronism another learned rabbi (29) has endeavoured to rectify by substituting a second Jesua, who lived in the time of Hillel and Shammai, and was tutor to Jesus Christ. But this, like their history of the second temple, which makes Pompey to have taken him prisoner, doth but lessen, but not clear, the anachronism (30); and only exposes their ignorance, not to call it worse, in attempting to invalidate his miracles by such poor shifts.

But, lastly, if we consider the vast superstition which then reigned among the Jews, how addicted they were to astrology; what strange power they attributed to the heavenly bodies, or rather to the angels which presided in each of them; what prodigies they thought might be done by the right evocation of them; what supernatural efficacy they ascribed to the right pronunciation of the name of God; how extensive they supposed the power of magic to be; and that it was not only lawful, but necessary, to learn it in one's own defence; and lastly, that those were not the notions of a small number, but of the whole nation, except perhaps some few more judicious and unprejudiced; such as was Nicodemus, and some others, whom we shall mention in the sequel, and who made a more impartial judgment of Christ's miracles; we need not wonder, that the rest, who neither liked his person, character, nor doctrine, should attribute those stupendous works to any other cause, than to the power and finger of God.

(28) Abr. B. Dior. ubi supra. (29) Gedaliah, ubi supra.
(30) Vid. Basnag. hist. Jud. lib. iii c. 5. sect. 5, be wrought without the divine assistance, and in confirmation of some new signal doctrine, such as the thinking part of the Jews expected the Messiah to bring with him; came privately one night to have a conference with him about it. Jesus, who took a singular delight to enourage such sincere enquirers [b], and knew him to be a doctor of the law, immediately entertained him with the main and grand point of regeneration, without which, he assured him it was impossible for a man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. He expressed himself moreover in such terms, as he might have justly expected to be well understood by him, by comparing it to a new birth, such as the Jews affirmed to be that of their new proselytes, concerning which the reader may see what we have said in a former volume †. But Nicodemus, better versed perhaps in the reigning disputes of his and the other sects, than with such fundamentals of moral divinity, as had been quite swallowed up by the present polemic contagion, seemed wholly at a loss how to understand it. Our Saviour therefore having given him a further explication of that heavenly doctrine, requested of him to embrace it upon his own authority for the present, assuring him, that that it was one main purport of his coming down from heaven, to teach it to mankind. He added, that the miracles which he had seen him work should not be the only proof he would give men of his divine mission, since they should see him shortly lay down his life in confirmation of it; and, in so doing, fulfil all the prophecies and types of the Old Testament, and the decrees of the divine love and providence, by dying a piacle for the redemption of mankind [c]. And therefore he justly concluded, that if men receive not his divine testimony, but will shut their eyes to that marvellous saving light which he has brought into the world, it is because their evil deeds, which are manifested and reproved by it, make them prefer their own darkness; and this it is which aggravates their guilt, and will hereafter their sad punishment [d] (K).

Nicodemus,

[b] Vid. int. al. Mark x. 21. † vol. iii. p. 323. [c] John iii. vers. 11, & seq. [d] Ibid. vers. 19, & seq.

(K) We have contented ourselves to give the bare substance of this divine colloquy, which contains indeed the quintessence of christianity, viz. the redemption of the world by the death of Christ, and the reformation of mankind by the help of this new light which he brought down to them. This light upon due attention, not only to this discourse to the Jewish ruler, but on Nicodemus, who felt the force of all theſe truths, became his diſciple from that very night, but without daring to make open profeſſion of it, for fear of the Jews. However, when their ſanhedrin was once plotting to put him to death, he on the tenor of the whole goſpel, will appear to conſiſt in theſe three particulars.

1ſt, That he came to teach us a more perfect rule of life, than human reaſon could, by its own unaſſiſted ſtrength, ever diſcover. For whatever ſome ſanguine men may imagine concerning the ſufficiency of that faculty, an impartial review of the world, and of the moſt polite parts of it, before the ſacred writings of Moſes and the prophets were publiſhed in other more known languages, will eaſily confute that fond conceit.

2dly, He came to communicate a ſuperior degree of ſtrength to our corrupt nature, without which the leſſons of that divine maſter would have been loſt upon the far greater part of mankind; whilſt, like perſons infected with cuticular diſeaſes, they would ſtill have preferred the pleaſure of ſcratching to the benefit of a cure; and therefore to enforce the obſervation of this new rule of life, without which man could be happy, neither here nor hereafter, and to make him accept of and ſeek for that divine aſſiſtance, which alone could enable him to live up to it.

He was, 3dly, to enforce it by the worthieſt and moſt powerful motives, the rewards and puniſhments of another life; both which he has ſet before us in the ſtrongeſt light, that thoſe who could not be allured to the virtues of his goſpel, by the beauteous proſpect of the one, might at leaſt be frighted into it, by the dreadful apprehenſion of the other. That is, in other words; that ſince our too great attachment to the things of this world was the unhappy ſource of all our diſaſters, this double proſpect of a future one might effectually wean us from them, by the aſſurance he has given us of the fatal conſequences of an inordinate purſuit after them, and of the ample rewards which a generous neglect of them will intitle us to at the end of our race. All which is ſtill more ſtrongly enforced upon us from a due conſideration, that he who beſt knew the value of that immortal life, which he came to reveal, thought not his own life too dear a price to purchaſe it for us.

On this manifeſtation of the love of God to us, is founded our love to him as our ſovereign bliſs and benefactor, and of our neighbour, as partakers with us of the ſame divine favour. Nor is the fear of his puniſhments low and baſe, as it may ſeem at firſt, or leſs conducive to it. For how can a man be rightly frighted out of the paths of ſin and puniſhment into thoſe of virtue and reward, without feeling a ſacred love and gratitude towards his gracious deliverer, inſenſibly kindled in his heart, and riſing by degrees

he had the courage to oppose it [e]; and when they had really crucified him, he and Joseph of Arimathea, another Jewish ruler degrees into most pungent remorse for his past follies, and into the most fervent desires of pleasing him for the future?

[e] Ibid. ch. vii. ver. 50.

Now the foundation of all this must be laid on such a stedfast faith as Christ speaks of to Nicodemus (31), grounded on those irrefragable credentials which he brought with him, such as the many and plain prophecies concerning him, his innumerable miracles, his resurrection, effusion of his holy spirit, and several other concomitant evidences which will further appear in the sequel. This heavenly testimony, he adds therefore, will be rejected by many, because their deeds are evil; for if his doctrine is confessedly so divine, and so excellently calculated for promoting our happiness here and hereafter, that men of unbiassed reason might embrace it without those heavenly credentials, there must sure be some evil root in the hearts of those that can oppose it, after they have seen it confirmed by so many miracles, prophecies, &c. and illustrated by his godlike example.

'Tis therefore to convince us of this, that he assures us in another place (32), that if any man will, or is sincerely disposed to, do his (God's) will, he shall soon no whether or not his doctrine be of God; if he has a real desire to be virtuous and holy here, in order to be happy hereafter, he shall receive a more feeling testimony of the divinity of my doctrine, than all those outward ones of miracles, &c. for these, through the depravity of man's nature, may in too many of them produce but a kind of historical faith, which, descending no lower than the head, seldom brings forth any other fruit than speculative systems. They were designed to convince the understanding, and silence the gainsayers; but the change of the heart and the conquest of mens inordinate passions, not being to be attained but by the assistance of the divine grace, which is now freely and more plentifully going to be offered to every believer, those only will receive and feel the efficacy of it, who seek and pray for it from a sincere desire to comply with the terms of the gospel, and from a due sense of their wanting that superior assistance to enable them to it. When these therefore come to feel the wonderful changes which this divine grace shall work in them; that it inspires them with new affections, new thoughts and desires; that it rectifies their corrupt nature, subdues their irregular appetites, enables them to live quite other lives, and to foregoe all things, even life itself, rather than lose the favour of God, and the assurance of heaven; it will prove an inexhaustible source of evidence of the truth and divinity of my ruler, were the only two of that high rank who joined to give him an honourable burial [f].

(31) John iii. 18, 19. (32) Ibid. vii 17.

JESUS left Jeruſalem ſoon after to go into the other parts of Judæa, where he ſet his diſciples on baptizing thoſe who received his doctrine. This brought on a diſpute between them and thoſe of the baptiſt, who was not yet caſt into priſon, but was ſtill baptizing a little higher on the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Salim and Ænon, more towards Galilee (L). The difference between them, being about Jeſus's making a greater number of proſelytes than John, was referr- Year of the flood 3030. Of Chriſt 31.

ed

[f] Ibid. xix. 39.

my doctrine, and of joy and comfort to them; becauſe that bleſſed Spirit, which worketh all theſe wonders in them, will bear witneſs with their ſpirit, that they are now the ſons of God (33); whilſt the careleſs and ſelf-ſufficient will ever fall ſhort of it, for want of this ſincere deſire after holineſs, or of a ſenſe of their ſtanding in need of any other aſſiſtance to attain it.

Thus much we thought neceſſary to premiſe, in order to the better underſtanding of the deſign and œconomy of the goſpel; for ſince the bare belief of it, or a faith in Chriſt, its divine author, without practice of his precepts, will never intitle a man to the rewards of it; and this practice, whatever may be pretended to the contrary, cannot be attained without the divine aſſiſtance; and this laſt is only to be obtained by prayer grounded upon a right belief in the truth and faithfulneſs of our heavenly redeemer and law-giver; but all three muſt co-operate towards that main end; the miracles and other outward teſtimonies of the chriſtian diſpenſation were highly neceſſary to attract a degenerate world to a religion ſo oppoſite to theirs, and ſo contrary to their depraved appetites; but it is this wonderful change, which the divine grace, it communicates, works in us, that gives the finiſhing ſtroke and ſtrongeſt light to its other evidence; and the man, once thus happily transformed into a new, a heavenly creature, becomes more ſure of the truth and certainty of the goſpel, than if he had ſeen its divine author giving ſight to the man born blind or raiſing Lazarus from the dead; becauſe he juſtly thinks them alike the effects of an almighty and miraculous power.

(L) Ænon was about eight miles ſouth of Scythopolis (34); Salim in the neighbourhood of it was the ſame with the Salem of the Old Teſtament, where Melchiſedech was king, and where ſome of the ruins of his palace were ſtill to be ſeen in St. Jerom's time (35). The reader may ſee what we have ſaid of it heretofore †.

(33) Rom. viii. 16. (34) Vid. Euſeb. ſub. voc. (35) Loc Hebr. † Vol. ii. 451. & (F).

ed to the latter, who quickly decided it in favour of the former, adding thereto this noble teſtimony of him, that he was from heaven, and was above all, and teſtified the truths he had ſeen and heard; ſo that thoſe who received his teſtimony, did ſet to their ſeal, that God is true, whereas thoſe who reject it make him a lyar, and are therefore obnoxious to his divine diſpleaſure, whilſt they continue in their unbelief [g] (M). Soon after this, John, whoſe extreme ſanctity had raiſed him to the eſteem, not only of all the Jews, but even of Herod Antipas, the then tetrach of Galilee, this laſt often took pleaſure in hearing and adviſing with him [h] for a time; till having ventured to take Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, into his bed, he received ſo many ſevere reproofs from that holy perſon for his inceſt, that he at laſt cauſed him to be thrown into a priſon, where he ſoon after ordered him to be beheaded, through the helliſh intrigues of that inceſtuous lady, and to all outward appearance much againſt his own will [i]. The occaſion of this unlawful marriage was as follows:

John the baptiſt beheaded by Herod.

The occaſion of it.

HEROD, whoſe firſt wife was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, was ſince fallen in love with that of his brother Philip, whom he had ſeen at his caſtle, where he had ſtopped ſome days in his journey to Rome. Herodias was the daughter of Ariſtobulus and grand-daughter of Herod the great, as has been hinted in a former note. Herod made no difficulty to diſcover his paſſion and to propoſe marrying her, to which ſhe conſented, upon condition that he divorced his firſt wife. This laſt, having received ſome information of her huſband's deſign, wiſely concealed her reſentment; and having obtained his permiſſion to retire for ſome time to the caſtle of Macheron, which was then in her father's hands, ſhe, inſtead of going thither, made all the haſte ſhe could to the [g] John. iii. 22. ad fin. Vid. & Matth. xiv, 1. & ſeq.

[h] Mark. vii. 20.

[i] Ibid.

(M) Since the bare light of reaſon aſſures us, that the nature of God is incomprehenſible, it follows, that he cannot make any revelation of himſelf to us, but what muſt include myſterious truths vaſtly above our reach; and that it muſt conſequently be a ſtrange perverſeneſs in man to reject them upon that account, when they come atteſted to us with the ſeal of heaven, for that is in fact to give the lye to eternal truth. Whereas the belief of them, being only an open acknowledgment that God is true, cannot but be the moſt reaſonable, as well as acceptable ſacrifice we can make to him of that faculty.

the Arabian court, where being at length arrived, ſhe acquainted the king with the whole intrigue. This cauſed a rupture between Herod and Aretas, which ended in a war, which laſted till the death of Tiberius, four years after their falling out. Herod, thus rid of his wife without a divorce, made no ſcruple to marry his ſiſter-in-law, though ſhe had had children by his brother Philip, which was contrary to the Moſaic law. John the Baptiſt was not the only perſon who condemned that marriage as inceſtuous; the whole nation ventured to cry out againſt it; but, as his character gave him a freer acceſs to the court, he had the courage to reprove both the king and his paramour in the ſevereſt terms. Herodias, being at length ſtung to the quick with his frequent reproaches of inceſt, and infidelity to Philip, reſolved to ruin him, and eaſily perſuaded the eaſy king to caſt him into priſon. His pretence for it, according to Joſephus *, was his drawing ſuch multitudes after him to be baptized; but the true reaſon was that given by the evangeliſts above-quoted, namely his and Herodias's reſentment.

THE place where he confined him is not mentioned by the latter, but the former tells us it was the caſtle of Macheron; though he ſhould have told us how it came ſo ſoon again into his poſſeſſion, after he had juſt hinted before that it belonged to the Arabian king. But it is not unlikely, that he regained it from him after their rupture. All this while Jeſus continued preaching in Galilee, and working ſo many ſingular miracles, that the fame of it came to the Baptiſt in his confinement. John therefore, ſuppoſing his own death to be near at hand, as he had formerly foretold it, ſent two of his followers to enquire of him whether he was the expected Meſſiah, not ſo much for his own ſatisfaction, as for that of his diſciples. They came opportunely to him, whilſt he was healing of a number of ſick, halt, maimed, and blind, ſo that he only bid them return, and acquaint their maſter with what they had ſeen, leaving it to him to explain the matter to them. All this while Herodias had not been able to prevail on the king to attempt the life of his priſoner. His fear of the people, who looked upon him as an extraordinary prophet, had hitherto outweighed his baſe complaiſance to her. But ſhe ſoon after compaſſed that by her helliſh policy, which her perſuaſions had not been able to do. Herod's birth-day being celebrated with ſuitable ſolemnity, before a number of his head officers, and other perſons of diſtinction; ſhe took the opportunity, when they were in the height of their mirth, and the king moſt probably heated with wine, to ſend her daughter Salome to dance before him; and ſhe performed her part ſo well, that he promiſed with an oath to gratify her in whatever ſhe ſhould aſk of him, even to the half of his kingdom. This was what Herodias was waiting for, and for which ſhe had given her inſtructions to her daughter; ſo that the young princeſs, taking the king at his word, deſired the head of the Baptiſt to be given her inſtantly in a charger. Herod, ſurpriſed at her demand, expreſſed no ſmall concern at it, whether out of reſpect to that holy perſon, or the fear of a tumult. But, at length, the conſideration of his oath and of his gueſts having turned the ſcale, he ordered an executioner to go and perform her bloody requeſt; which being done accordingly, his diſciples, upon hearing it, came to take away the reſt of his body, and gave it an honourable burial. Thus fell that great and good man, and more than a prophet, according to his own prediction *; of whom Joſephus, in the place above quoted, gives us the following character: That his whole crime was his exhorting the Jews to the love and practice of virtue; and, firſt of all, to piety, juſtice, and regeneration, or newneſs of life; not by the bare abſtinence of this or that particular ſin, but by an habitual purity of mind and body. Now, continues he, ſo great was the credit and authority of this holy man, as appears by the multitude of his diſciples, and the veneration they had for his doctrine, (for he could do what he would with them) that Herod, not knowing how far the reputation of a man of his ſpirit might influence the people towards a revolt, reſolved at length to take him off, before it was too late, &c. He adds, that Herod was very unſucceſsful in his war with the Arabian king, all which the Jews looked upon as a juſt judgment of God upon him for that impious murder. An antient father tells us † further, that when Herodias received the Baptiſt's head from her daughter, ſhe pierced his tongue with a bodkin, and ſhewed it ſome other indignities, ſuch as one may eaſily ſuppoſe from a perſon of her looſe character.

John confined in the caſtle of Macheron.

Herodias's helliſh policy.

* Antiq. l. xviii. c 7.

Salome dances before Herod.

Her bloody requeſt.

Joſephus's character of the baptiſt.

Jeſus goes from Judæa into Galilee.

WE return to Jeſus Chriſt, who, upon the news of John's impriſonment on account of the great number of diſciples that followed him, began, it is likely, to fear, leſt Pilate ſhould take ſome umbrage at him upon the ſame account. For there came, as we obſerved a little higher, rather a greater reſort of people to be baptized by his diſciples; for himſelf, the evangeliſt

* John, iii. 30. † Cont. Rufin.

evangeliſt aſſures, baptized none. This made him therefore leave Judæa, after a ſtay of about eight months [k], and depart for Galilee; when paſſing through Samaria, he converted the woman, and afterwards the inhabitants of Sichem, or, as the Jews by way of reproach called it, Sichar [l], which ſignifies drunk, according to the phraſe of the prophet, who calls the rebellious Jews the Shicore Ephraim, the drunkards of Ephraim [m] (N). After a few days ſtay at that place, he went on into Galilee, where he was well received by the Galileans, who had ſeen his late miracles at Jeruſalem at the late paſſover, and preached in their ſynagogues. Whilſt he was at Cana, the place where he had turned water into wine, a nobleman came about a day's journey to him, beſeeching him that he would come down and heal a ſon of his, who was at the point of death, and expreſſed himſelf in ſuch preſſing terms, as ſufficiently teſtified the ſincerity of his faith. Jeſus therefore, unto whom it was equally eaſy to heal at a diſtance, or at a greater nearneſs, diſmiſſed him with theſe words: Go thy way: thy Son liveth. He obeyed, and, upon his enquiring of his ſervants at his return, found that he had begun to recover from the very minute in which the promiſe was come out of Jeſus's mouth; ſo he and his whole family believed on him [n]. He went from thence into his old city of Nazareth, and being entered one ſabbath-day into their ſynagogue, where the leſſon out of Iſaiah [o] was given him to read, in which there is a lively deſcription of the Meſſiah's preaching the goſpel, and of his confirming it with many godlike miracles of mercy; he expounded it of himſelf, with ſuch powerful and majeſtic grace, as raiſed the admiration of the whole audience. But ſome of them being offended at his exquiſite wiſdom, whom they knew to have had ſo mean an education among them, he reminded them of ſeveral other cities in Judæa, and of many perſons in Iſrael, who had rendered

The nobleman's ſon cured.

Preacheth at Nazareth.

[k] Vid. Uſſer. ann. ſub A. M. 4035. [l] John iv. paſſ. See alſo Vol. ii. p. 453, and vol. x. p. 67. [m] Iſaiah xxvii. 1. [n] Ibid. ver. 56. ad fin. [o] Iſaiah lxi. 1. Vid. Luke iv. 16. & ſeq.

(N) Shechem or Sychar ſtood about forty miles from Jeruſalem, fifty-two from Jericho, and ten from Shiloh (36), near unto Jacob's well.

(36) Vid. Euſeb. & Hieron. loc. Hebr. & Reland. Palæſt in Shichem.

dered themselves unworthy of the divine favours by the like unseasonable partiality. This reproof was so highly resented by the Nazarites, that they rushed upon him with one consent, and hurried him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, with a design to have cast him headlong down; but he, slipping through the crowd, escaped their malice, and went to dwell at Capernaum, a city situate on the coasts of Zebulun and Nepthalim; and preached among them, according to another oracle out of the same prophet [P], importing, that those regions of Galilee should in time be called, from their native darkness, unto the marvellous light of the gospel. Being on another day preaching in one of their synagogues, there stood a demoniac before him (O), in whom the

A demoniac cured.

[P] Isaiah ix. 1. & seq. Matth. iv. 14. & seq.

(O) We have already taken notice of the opinion of the Jews concerning these demons who possessed mankind, some, with Josephus, believing them to be the souls of the wicked, and others, that they were a kind of imperfect creatures, whom God was forced to leave unfinished on the sixth day, because the evening of the sabbath came upon him before he had given them the finishing stroke (37). Upon either of these accounts, they believe them to find some pleasure and refreshment in possessing and annoying the bodies of the living. Of this kind they reckon also the satyrs, incubusses, fauns, familiar spirits †, &c. The Christians, on the other hand, believe them, with greater countenance from holy writ, to be fallen angels, who have born a constant enmity to mankind ever since the creation of Adam.

But it is here objected against either hypothesis, that if those malicious spirits had such an extensive power, as these possessions seem to attribute to them, there would be no end of their mischiefs, till they had made an end of mankind. Whereas, whatever we may read of them in former days of ignorance and superstition, we see nothing like it now even pretended among the more civilized nations, and only hear some imperfect accounts among the more remote and less cultivated ones, which yet may be either mere cheats, or at best mere delusions; and this has made a great number of our moderate sceptics believe them all to have been of this last kind (38), as being less derogatory to the honour of God, than the supposition of his giving so great a power to evil spirits.

But

(37) Vid. Bereshith. rabba, cap. 1. & lib. Zeror, Hammor sive fasciculum myrrhæ. † See Vol. I. p. 246. (note) (38) Vid. le Clerc com. in loc. Becker Monde enchant. Bayle, & al the unclean ſpirit cried with a loud voice; and, acknowledging him to be the holy one of God, expoſtulated with him, not to deſtroy him. Him Jeſus having put to ſilence by his powerful word, caſt him out, and healed the man, to the admiration of the people, who ſpread his fame throughout all that region; inſomuch, that before he had taken a little refreſhment at Peter's houſe, and healed his mother of a fever, under which ſhe had languiſhed ſome conſiderable time, they had brought from that whole neighbourhood all that were afflicted with diſeaſes, and ſet them before him; and Jeſus, according

But theſe learned critics ſeem not to obſerve, that all theſe plauſible pretences rather confute than countenance their notion; for who can believe, that Chriſt, who was ſo jealous of his Father's honour, would not only have overlooked, but both by his words and actions even countenanced and confirmed a national error ſo oppoſite to it, if he had not known, that God, for ſome ends beſt known to his infinite wiſdom, had ſuffered thoſe evil ſpirits, to afflict and puniſh mankind? If he had known, that all theſe pretended poſſeſſions were the mere effects of melancholy, hypochondria, lunacy, and ſuch-like diſorders, incident to our nature, would he not have equally diſplayed his miraculous power in curing of them under this notion? and would not his pretended interrogations of thoſe pretended devils, and their petitioning to him; his (39) diſtinguiſhing between their ſeveral kinds, and the different means of expelling them (40), have been acting a farce unworthy his divine character? how much more his promiſing to his diſciples the ſame power of caſting them out (41)?

That theſe devils are every-where repreſented in ſcripture as enemies to mankind, is beyond all diſpute; and that they are not as yet confined to the place of their puniſhment, appears not only from their frequent expoſtulations with Chriſt, Art thou come to torment us before the time? but much more from that dreadful and definitive ſentence to be pronounced againſt the wicked, Go, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil, &c. which, if only prepared for them, implies, that they are not yet ſent into it. If therefore we ſtick cloſe to the plain and obvious meaning of the inſpired writers, we muſt ſuppoſe thoſe poſſeſſions to have been ſomething very different from ſuch pretended diſorders of the body or mind; and where lies the unreaſonableneſs of the ſuppoſition of a vaſt variety of ſpiritual beings, ſome of a good and benevolent, others of a bad and maleficent, nature, but all under the government of the ſupreme being?

(39) Matth. viii. 28. Mark v. 9, & ſeq. & alib. (40) Matth. xvii. 20. & ſeq. (41) Vid. int. al. Matth. x 1. Mark xvi. 17. Luke x. 17.

cording to his wonted compaſſion, laid his hands on every one of them, and ſent them all home healed [q].

Calls Simon Peter.

BEING come to the lake of Genezareth, or ſea of Tiberias, the crouds followed him ſo thick, that he was forced to get into a boat belonging to Simon Peter, whom from a fiſherman he had called to be one of his apoſtles, and bid him launch out a little way, and taught the people from thence. As ſoon as he had done ſpeaking, he bid Peter caſt his net for a draught; and was anſwered, that though they had toiled all night in vain, yet at his word they would try afreſh. They did ſo, and caught ſuch a large draught, as was like to have ſunk the boat. Peter, ſurpriſed at it, fell at his feet, and beſought him to depart from ſuch a ſinner as he was; but Jeſus taking him up, bid him be of good courage, for he would from thenceforth make him a fiſher of men [r]. During his abode in Galilee, he continued ſtill confirming his doctrine with ſuch numbers of miracles, that his fame had reached all the neighbouring provinces of Syria, Phænice, &c. inſomuch, that many people came from thence to be healed of their infirmities by him. During his abode at Capernaum (P), a paralytic, who had heard of his fame, got himſelf tranſported thither, in his couch born on men's ſhoulders, to be preſented to him; but the houſe, in which he was, being ſo thronged within and without, that they could get no acceſs to him, they got him up to the top of the houſe, and having untiled part of it, let him down by ropes, and ſo ſet him before him. Jeſus beheld their faith with pleaſure, and addreſſing himſelf to the paralytic, bid him be of good chear, for his ſins were forgiven; which, according to the Jewiſh notion, that ſuch infirmities were the effects either of our own or of our parents ſins [s], was [q] Luke iv. 31. ad fin. [r] Luke v. 4, & ſeq. Mark. xvi. 20. & ſeq. & alib. [s] De hoc vid. John ix. 2.

(P) This city was ſituate on an eminence by the lake of Genezareth, though the exact place be not known. Our Saviour exchanged it inſtead of that of Nazareth, where the ſtubbornneſs and incredulity of the Nazarites had been an obſtruction to his doctrine and miracles. He made it his chief abode during the three laſt years of his preaching, and wrought a great number of miracles there; but as they made him no anſwerable returns for thoſe favours, he forewarns them, that though their city was then exalted up to the clouds, it ſhould ſhortly be thrown down to the loweſt abyſs (42); which came accordingly to paſs in the Jewiſh war, ſo that no footſteps remain of it.

(42) Matth. xi. 23.

was no more than telling him that he was healed of his palſy. But the ſcrupulous Jews, not underſtanding it in that ſenſe, accuſed him in their hearts of blaſphemy, in aſſuming a power peculiar to God; but Jeſus, by the immediate cure of the ſick man, ſoon convinced them of their error, and of his being equally impowered to forgive ſins and to cure infirmities [t]. It was his cuſtom, by reaſon of the great reſort of people that came to hear him, to go out of the city from time to time, and to teach them by the ſea-ſide; and, upon his often paſſing to and fro, he obſerved a publican ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom, named Levi, or Matthew, and bid him follow him (Q). Matthew did not heſitate one moment, but left his Cures a paralytic.

Matthew called.

[t] Matth. ix. 1, & ſeq. Luke v. 18 & alib.

(Q) The other evangeliſts give him only the name of Levi, which was his Jewiſh name; for he was a Jew, and the ſon of Alpheus, and native of Galilee. He is therefore thought to have called himſelf by that of Matthew, which is ſuppoſed to have been ſignificant of his profeſſion, to expreſs his grateful ſenſe of his vocation. His chief reſidence and office was at Capernaum, and there it was, that he was called, from the profeſſion of a publican, to the dignity of an apoſtle and evangeliſt.

He has been highly reflected upon by Porphyry and Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate (43), for thus lightly following a man, whom he had ſo little knowledge of; but as it is ſcarce probable that he ſhould live in the ſame city ſo long, and not have heard of his doctrine and miracles; ſo it is rather a wonder he did not become his diſciple ſooner, conſidering his great readineſs in following him as ſoon as he was called; but it is likely, he thought his profeſſion was as odious to him, as it was to the Phariſees and the reſt of the Jews, and would prove an obſtacle to his reception. But as ſoon as this gracious invitation had convinced him of the contrary, he ſufficiently ſhewed how ready and glad he was to embrace it, by his forſaking all to follow him.

His being here called the ſon of Alpheus has led ſome antients (44) into a notion, that he was the brother of James, who is alſo called the ſon of Alpheus (45); and they have, it ſeems, been followed in it by the generality of modern Greeks, but there ſeems to be no foundation for it. The goſpel gives us no further particulars concerning him, ſaving that he continued a faithful diſciple of his maſter; and therefore all we ſhall venture to add is, that he is univerſally allowed to have been the firſt that penned any ſuccinct hiſtory of the goſpel. He is ſaid to have wrote it at the deſire of (43) Vid Hieron. in Matth. ix. 33. in Matt. Theodoret. & al.

(44) Chryſoſtom. Homil.

(45) Matth. x. 3, & alib.

office and followed him; and to expreſs the ſenſe he had for this gracious call, he made him a ſumptuous feaſt at his own houſe, to which many of the ſame profeſſion were alſo invited. This gave a freſh occaſion of offence to the ſcrupulous Jews, who made ſome ſevere complaints of it to his diſciples; but Jeſus ſoon ſilenced their clamour, by aſſuring them, that he was come to call, not the righteous, but ſinners to repentance [u]

AFTER ſeveral other miraculous works done during his ſtay in this place, Jeſus departed for Jeruſalem to be preſent at the approaching feſtival of the paſſover, where there uſed to be a great concourſe of Jews, who came before-hand to purify themſelves againſt that feaſt. In this city there was a famous pool or reſervoir, adorned with five porches or piazzas, and called in the Hebrew Beth-eſdah (R), whoſe water, being of the apoſtles and Jewiſh converts of Paleſtine, before his departure from it, to go and preach in the provinces allotted to him (46), about eight or ten years after Chriſt's reſurrection. The laſt-quoted father tells us, it was written in the Chaldaic-Syriac tongue, which was then the common one, and in Hebrew characters. We refer our readers for the further particulars of it to the controverſy lately ſtarted about it. As for St. Matthew, he is moſt commonly believed, by antients and moderns, to have preached the goſpel in Perſia and Parthia, and to have ſuffered martyrdom in Caramania, a province then ſubject to the Parthians.

[u] Matt. ix. 10, & ſeq.

(R) Probably, as ſome conjecture from the words בית חסדה beth-cheſdah, the houſe of mercy, alluding to the merciful cures which were wrought there on the ſick, lame, &c. The vulgate, however, read it beth-zaida, which ſome render the Probatic pool, on a ſuppoſition that the ſheep deſigned for ſacrifice were firſt waſhed in it, which ſheep ſo waſhed, were called Probatæ. Others, who read it בית אשדה beth-eſhdah render it, the houſe of defluxion, from another ſuppoſition, that the waters, in which the entrails of the victims offered in the temple were waſhed, emptied themſelves by a ſubterranean ſewer into this pool or reſervoir, whence ſome have taken it into their heads, that the blood, dung, and other filth of thoſe creatures running along with them, gave that medicinal virtue to the pool. Perſons of ſuch witty conceits are ſeldom ſolicitous about the character of the ſacred hiſtorians, or elſe the evangeliſts, attributing thoſe cures to a miraculous motion of the water, would make them being at ſome particular ſeaſons mirraculouſly ſtirred, had the virtue of curing the firſt perſon that jumped into it of whatever diſeaſe he was troubled. Here Jeſus beheld, among the crouds of ſick folk that waited for the motion, a man who had laboured under an incurable palſy thirty-eight years, but for want of ſome charitable hand to throw him into the water, had hitherto been deprived of the benefit of that place. Jeſus, moved with compaſſion at his miſery, healed him by his powerful word, and bid him take up his bed and go to his home. This cure, being done on the ſabbath-day, gave freſh offence to the Phariſees, who, looking upon him as a ſabbath-breaker, began to think of putting him to death for it. To diſculpate himſelf, and convince them that works of mercy were ſo far from being a violation, that they were the proper buſineſs of the ſabbath, he expreſſed himſelf to them in words to this effect: As my Father worketh hitherto, ſo do I work: intimating thereby, that though God had reſted on the ſeventh day from creating, in memory of which the ſabbath had been inſtituted, yet did he not ceaſe on that day from the work of preſervation, which work himſelf was now imitating, in preſerving a number of wretched periſhing objects, whoſe miſery claimed his pity and aſſiſtance. But the Jews, ever watchful for matter of new accuſation againſt him, inſtead of admiring his godlike imitation of that ever-beneficent Being, accuſed him of blaſphemy, for having preſumed to call him his father, making himſelf thereby equal to God. Jeſus tried in vain to remonſtrate to them, by many convincing arguments, that he had arrogated nothing to himſelf, but what his miraculous works did evince his undoubted claim to; and by aſſuring them, that they ſhould ſhortly ſee greater and more ſtupendous ones than thoſe wrought by him, ſuch as had never been done ſince the creation of the world.

(46) Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. l. iii. c. 24. Chryſoſt. in Matth. 1. Iren. l. iii. c. 1. Hieron. de vir illuſtr. & al.

Cures a paralytic on the ſabbath.

H's defence of it cenſured by the Jews.

more cautious, how they ſet up a bare conjecture againſt their teſtimony.

The five porches mentioned by St. John, ſeem to argue this pool to have been built in the form of a pentagon. Euſebius and St. Jerom (47), tell us, that they ſhewed ſtill in their time a kind of double pool or reſervoir, the one of which filled itſelf every year with rain water, and the other, which retained ſtill a kind of redneſs, as if from the blood of thoſe victims above mentioned, which the temple ſewer carried into it. The reader may ſee what has been ſaid of its remains in a former volume †.

(47) Loc. Hebr. † Vol. iii. p. 160, & (Q).

world. He tried in vain to convince them from the teſtimony of the prophets and other ſacred writings, from that of John the Baptiſt, but eſpecially of his heavenly father, who had declared him his beloved Son, and had given him moreover ſuch a miraculous power over the whole creation [w]. He was at length obliged to ſilence their falſe accuſation, by reminding them, that even the ſcripture gives the title of gods to mortal men [x]. If then, added he, they be called gods, againſt whom the ſentence of mortality had been pronounced by God (S) himſelf, why ſhould you reckon me guilty of blaſphemy, whom the Father has thus ſanctified and ſent into the world, becauſe I call myſelf the Son of God?

Works other miracles on that day.

JESUS obſerving, however, how ſtrenuous the blind Jews were againſt his doing works of mercy on the ſabbath, reſolved, if poſſible, to convince them of their error, by chuſing that day to diſplay ſome of the moſt ſignal ones, and exploding their cenſures by ſuch cogent arguments as they could not gainſay. Accordingly, after his departure out of Jeruſalem, he went into one of their ſynagogues, where there ſtood a man, St. Jerom ſays he was a maſon, who had a withered hand. He began with aſking the Jewiſh doctors, whether it was lawful on the ſabbath, to do good or evil, to ſave or to deſtroy, intimating, that the omiſſion of the one, when a proper occaſion offered, was near equivalent to the commiſſion of the other. As they had nothing to anſwer to this reaſoning, they ſtood ſilent to let him do as he thought fit; but when he had reſtored the man's hand, by bidding him to ſtretch it forth, the ruler of the ſynagogue, inſtead of being [w] John v. 19, & ſeq. [x] Conf. Pſ. lxxxii. 6, &c. John x. 34, & ſeq.

(S) This is certainly the meaning of Chriſt's words here, and not as our, and other verſions render it, Thoſe unto whom the word of God came. For the place referred to in the pſalms is, I have ſaid ye are gods, but ye ſhall die like men. So that, according to the moſt literal ſenſe of our Saviour's words, they ſhould run thus: If they are called gods, againſt (not unto) whom the word of God came forth, meaning this ſentence of death. Thoſe that are acquainted with the Hebrew idiom, to which the evangeliſts were uſed, know, that the context muſt decide the meaning of thoſe particles, which are capable of ſeveral even oppoſite ſignifications, which the ſenſe alone can determine (48).

(48) Vid. Nort. Knatchbul. Le Scene, & al. in loc.

being convinced either by the miracle or argument, in a kind of indignation, fell a cenſuring thoſe objects of pity for offering themſelves to be healed on the ſabbath, and not rather on any other day of the week. This ſtrange behaviour extorted a ſevere rebuke from the meek Jeſus; he aſked him, whether they did not think it lawful to help an ox, an aſs, or a ſheep out of a ditch, or even to lead them to the water or paſture on that day? An undeniable argument, that they thought it lawful to do good to brutes on the ſabbath, and how much more was it to do ſo unto men? He urged alſo upon the like occaſion the circumciſion of children on the ſabbath, the prieſts killing and dreſſing their victims, and other ſuch-like works, which were uſually done on the ſabbath, and yet were far from being reckoned a profanation of it [y].

BUT there had one thing happened to him in the going to that place, in order as is ſuppoſed, to preach at that ſynagogue, which had already highly exaſperated them. One of the evangeliſts obſerves [z], that it was the ſecond ſabbath after the firſt *; when as they were going through ſome corn fields, his hungry diſciples ventured to pluck the ears, and rub them between their hands to eat them. The Phariſaic croud, who beheld this kind of labour with a malicious eye, began to exclaim againſt their maſter for ſuffering it, it being in their opinion a manifeſt violation of the ſabbath. Jeſus was forced to excuſe it by reminding them of the prophet's words, I will have, or, more properly, I delight in, mercy rather than in ſacrifice; intimating thereby, that neceſſity takes away the rigour of the law, and juſtifying it by the example of David, who, in the like emergency, ventured upon the ſacred ſhew-bread, which was prohibited to all but the prieſts; and not only eat of it himſelf, but diſtributed it among his retinue. Their ſtubbornneſs was proof againſt all that he could urge in their or his own defence, and his ſilencing of them, by ſuch convincing arguments, made them only the more inveterate, till they came at length to a reſolution of putting him to death. Jeſus, having timely notice of their wicked deſign, withdrew himſelf towards the ſea-coaſts, whither he was ſoon after followed by multitudes from all the maritime parts, and to whom he ſtill extended his his wonted compaſſion, both by his teaching them and healing their ſick.

His diſciples cenſured for plucking the corn.

[y] Luke vi. 10, & ſeq. Matth. xii. 9, & ſeq. & al. [z] Luke vi. 1. * De hoc Vid. vol. iii. p. 178. end of note (M). [a] Hoſ. vi. 6.

ONE night, having withdrawn himſelf both from them and from his diſciples, he went up to a mountain apart, and ſpent the whole night in prayer; and on the morrow calling them together again, he choſe twelve from among the reſt, to be the more immediate witneſſes, preachers, and recorders of his life and doctrine; and to whom he gave the title of apoſtles, which word ſignifies meſſengers or embaſſadors. The reader may ſee their names in the margin [b] (T).

Chuſes the twelve apoſtles.

All that

[b] Luke vi. 14, & ſeq. Matth. x. 2, & ſeq. Mark iii. 16, & ſeq.

(T) Theſe were, 1ſt, Simon, whom he ſurnamed Peter, and whom we have mentioned a little higher; and, 2. Andrew his brother; 3. James, ſurnamed The Greater, an inhabitant of Bethſaida, and John his brother, who were the ſons of Zebedee and Salome, often mentioned in the goſpel. Theſe, as well as Andrew, had lately been the baptiſt's diſciples, but had left him to follow Jeſus, and on the account of their reſolute conſtancy or more likely perhaps from that queſtion they asked him; Wilt thou that we command fire from heaven, to conſume, &c. (49) were ſurnamed by him Boanerges, or the ſons of thunder or tempeſt; that word being only a corruption of the Hebrew בְּנֵי-רַעַם bene-raham, or rather רַעַשׁ, rahaſh; 5. Philip mentioned before; and, 6. Bartholomew, ſuppoſed the ſame with Nathanael; 7. Levi, or Matthew, the publican and evangeliſt; and, 8. Thomas, ſurnamed Didymus, which ſignifies a twin; 9. James diſtinguiſhed by the name of The Leſs, and the ſon of Alpheus, or Cleophas, and of Mary, the firſt couſin, if not the ſiſter, of the virgin Mary, for which reaſon he is often called the brother of our Lord; 10. Simon, ſurnamed The Canite, from Cana the place of his birth, and Zelotes, probably becauſe he had belonged to that ſect; 11. Judas, otherwiſe called Jude, and brother to James the Leſs, ſurnamed alſo Lebbeus, and Thaddeus; and Judas the traitor, and ſurnamed Iſcariot.

Concerning the ſurname of this laſt, there have been various conjectures; ſome thinking that he was ſo called from Keriot, a city in the tribe of Judah (50), from which he is ſuppoſed to have come; "iſh" in the Hebrew ſignifying a man. St. Jerom and Euſebius ſpeak of a town in the tribe of Ephraim, called Iſcariot (1); others, who make him of the tribe of Iſſachar, think Iſcariot that we ſhall ſay at preſent of them is, that he did not give them this preference to all the reſt, either on account of their great ſenſe or learning, for they were ſome of the moſt rude and illiterate; nor for their credit, rank, or high birth; for they were moſtly, if not all, poor fiſhermen, and either natives or inhabitants of Galilee, the moſt obſcure and deſpiſed canton of the Jewiſh kingdom; much leſs for their courage, who proved all rank cowards in the time of danger. They had no reliſh or propenſity to his pure and exalted doctrine; for they dreamt of nothing, but of an earthly kingdom and temporal happineſs. In a word, they were in all reſpects the moſt unqualified for the great taſk to which they were appointed, the converſion of the world. But this was a work, which, as a great prophet had long ago foretold [c], and the apoſtle has ſince obſerved [d], was to confound the counſels of the wiſe, ſwallow up the underſtanding of the prudent, and defeat the power of the mightieſt. We have already ſeen it in a great meaſure fulfilled in the perſon and character of their divine maſter, and in the circumſtances that accompanied his low and humble birth and education, as well as in that vaſt ſeries of wonders, which he wrought ſince his entrance into his public miniſtry. And we ſhall ſee the ſame infinite wiſdom diſplay itſelf ſtill more ſurprizingly throughout the whole ſequel of this chapter. Their character.

(49) Luke ix. 54. (50) Vid. Joſh. xv. 25. Echard. Eccl. Hiſt. cent. 1. c. 4. Calmet. ſub. voc. & al. (1) In Iſaiah xxviii. 1.

In the mean time, the wondering crouds flocked to him from all parts of Judæa and the neighbouring provinces, attracted by that divine and efficacious virtue which flowed from riot only a corruption or abbreviation of Iſſachariotes; others fetch their etymologies of it ſtill further. The reader may ſee them in the vocabularies at the end of the vulgate and other bibles.

[c] Iſaiah xxix. 14. [d] 1 Cor. i. 19.

Were we to offer our conjecture on ſuch a dark and dry ſubject, we ſhould rather fetch it from the Hebrew אִישׁ-חֵרֶת, Iſchirret, literally the man of the bag, or the bag-bearer. We have formerly obſerved †, that the proper ſignification of the word chirret, is a bag, in ſuch a one Naaman is ſaid to have tied his preſent to Gehaſi (2); and St. John acquaints us, that Judas was a thief, and carried the bag: Why might not this nick-name then have been given him on that account by the diſciples, when they knew how fond he was of his office, and how unfaithful he was in the diſcharge of it?

† Vol. ii. p. 618. (B). (2) 2 Kings v. 23.

from him, insomuch, that the bare touch of his garments wrought the most surprizing cures, on the sick, lunatick, demoniac, and other afflicted persons. He led them therefore one day to a convenient spot of ground (U), where he preached to them that celebrated sermon, commonly known by the name of his sermon upon the mount. We shall not take upon us to repeat it here. The reader may read it in its native, but powerful, simplicity, in the places quoted in the margin [e]. All that we shall observe of it is, that he began it with a most comfortable display of the blessed state of those, whom both Jews and Gentiles accounted most miserable; that, through the whole course of it, he not only exploded the wretched glosses, by which the Jewish doctors had almost obliterated every mortal precept of the Mosaic law, but substituted such new and excellent ones of his own, as exalted them to a pitch, which the world till then had neither heard nor dreamed of. To instance in one or two of his precepts, amongst the many sublime ones there delivered, how highly had that negative precept been admired by all the wisest heathens, of not doing to others what we should not desire to be done to us! and yet how vastly short is it of that new and noble one of his, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, that do ye unto them [f]. We observed a little higher, that the Pharisees thought themselves free from guilt, provided they abstained from the very act of sin, though they indulged themselves in every thought, desire, and complacency, that came short of it; but here the ax is laid to the very root, and every sin, even in the least degree of it, condemned, even in the heart. Well might then his ravished audience cry out, that he taught with a power and authority, vastly above what they had observed in the scribes and Jewish doctors [g].

His excellent sermon on the mount.

He

[e] Matth. v, vi, & vii. pass. Luke vi. 20, & seq. [f] Matth. vii. 12. [g] Ibid. ver. ult.

(U) St. Matthew (3) tells us, that he went up into a mountain, and St. Luke (4) hints, that he stood in a plain, or champain place. The difference may probably be smaller than we are aware of. Those mountainous parts have their plains as well as vallies; so that he might only stand on a higher ground than his audience, for the conveniency of being better heard, whilst they stood or sat on the plain ground below him. For St. Luke doth not expressly say, that he preached in the plain; but that he came down to it, to heal those that waited for him.

(3) Ch. v. 1. (4) Ch. vi 17.

He concluded this excellent diſcourſe with aſſuring them, that not every one that ſhould call him Lord ſhould enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that performed the divine will, and complied with the precepts he had been delivering to them. For the latter, added he, like the wiſe man that builds his houſe on a rock, builds his hopes on a ſure foundation; whereas the former, like the fool that builds on the ſand, is liable to have them overthrown by every blaſt, by every wind of doctrine, and by every temptation.

On his deſcent from the mount to return to Capernaum, he was addreſſed by ſome of the heads of the city in the behalf of a worthy centurion, from whom their nation had received ſome ſignal favours, and whoſe ſervant was then very ill of a palſy. Jeſus offered to go to his houſe and heal him; but when the Roman officer heard of it, he ſent him an humble meſſage, in which he acknowledged himſelf equally unworthy to receive him under his roof, as he had been to come and offer his requeſt in perſon, but that he wholly depended on his efficacious word for the cure of his ſervant; For, added he, if my authority, ſmall as it is, can yet enforce obedience from thoſe under my command, how much more will your all-powerful one be obeyed, where-ever you are pleaſed to exert it! His ſingular faith and humility did not go long unrewarded; and Jeſus, highly pleaſed with him, healed his ſervant at that inſtant, and greatly commended his faith, as far ſurpaſſing all that he had beheld, even in Iſrael; upon which account he took occaſion to aſſure his audience, that many ſtrangers ſhould be admitted from the four corners of the world into his heavenly kingdom, whilſt the children of it ſhould be miſerably caſt out for their diſobedience and unbelief [h]. Heals the centurion's ſervant.

On the day following he went to Naim (W), and, upon his entering the city, he met a large croud of people accompanying the corpſe of a young man, the only ſon of a poor Raiſes a dead man at Naim.

[h] Matt. viii. 5, & ſeq. Luke vii. 12, & ſeq.

(W) This city was ſituate in the plain near mount Tabor, and within about two miles of that mountain, and was divided from it by the brook Kedron (5). The ſame author places it at a ſmall diſtance from Endor and Scythopolis (6). There was another city of that name in Idumæa, where, Joſephus tells us (7), Simon the ſon of Gobrias made his retreat, after he had ſtrongly fortified it.

(5) Euſeb ſub voce Naim. (6) Ibid. ſub. voce Endor.
(7) Bell. Jud. l. v. c. 7.

poor widow, and, in compaſſion to her touched the bier, and raiſed her ſon to life, whilſt the aſtoniſhed multitude ſpread forth his fame through all the country, and proclaimed him the prophet ſent by God to redeem his people [i], It was probably at this time, that the baptiſt ſent his two diſciples to him, of whom we have lately ſpoken, and upon which Jeſus took occaſion to cenſure the unjuſt judgment, which the unbelieving Jews paſſed upon that more than prophet and himſelf: John, ſaid he, was a very abſtemious and mortified perſon, and you cried him down as a demoniac; me, who came in a more ſociable and affable way to call ſinners to repentance, you repreſent as a drunkard and glutton; but wiſdom will, in ſpite of your ſlanders, be ſtill juſtified by her children [k]. It was upon this account that he ſo ſeverely upbraided thoſe neighbouring cities, which had been witneſſes of his ſtupendous works, aſſuring them, that their fall would be much more dreadful than that of Sodom and Gomorrah, whom ſuch miracles would have wrought into the deepeſt repentance [l]. He concluded his diſcourſe with a ſolemn thankſgiving to his heavenly Father, who, in his infinite wiſdom, had choſen the humble and infant-like to impart the myſteries of his goſpel to, whilſt the proud and conceited worldlings rendered themſelves unworthy of them; and with a gracious invitation to all, that laboured under their ſinful burdens, to come and experience how eaſy the yoke, and how light was the burden, which he laid on his followers (X).

[i] Ibid. ver. 11, & ſeq. [k] Ibid. 20, & ſeq. [l] Ibid x. 13, & ſeq. Matth. xi. 20, & ſeq.

(X) This is a truth indeed that is beſt underſtood from one's own experience; yet as there is not one poſitive or negative precept of the goſpel, that is not excellently adapted to our own exigencies, and founded upon the ſolideſt wiſdom, it highly concerns us to liſten to this, rather than to our corrupt appetites, which will always make us look upon God as a ſevere taſk-maſter, rather than a kind and skilful phyſician, whoſe ſole aim is to cure us of our diſeaſes, and to reſtore our ſouls to that perfect ſtate of health, which alone can make us happy here or hereafter.

Were we indeed commanded to purchaſe this deſireable ſtate at as dear a rate as the miſer doth his gold, the ambitious his riſe, the ſoldier his fame, or the labourer his poor livelihood; though, even here, it would be our higheſt wiſdom to comply with the conditions

THIS diſcourſe moved a Phariſee, named Simon, to invite him to take a meal at his houſe, where he had not been long, before he was accoſted by a woman, formerly of a looſe character, but now a ſincere penitent. This woman came behind him in the humbleſt guiſe, accompanied with a flood of tears, with which ſhe waſhed his feet; and, having wiped them with her hair, began to anoint his head with a coſtly perfume ſhe had brought with her. A ſight ſo ſhocking to the proud Phariſee filled his head with a ſtrange notion, that, if his gueſt were a prophet, he would of courſe have ſpurned ſuch a notorious ſinner from him; but Jeſus, whoſe peculiar character it was not to break a bruiſed reed, or quench the leaſt good ſpark [m], but rather blow it into a flame, viewed her with a more compaſſionate and unerring eye, and diſmiſſed her with an anſwer as full of comfort, as her heart was of the ſincereſt repentance and love. Neither did he let his hoſt go unanſwered or unſatisfied; but, by a fit and pathetic parable, made him pronounce her a more worthy object of his mercy and regard, than all his own pretended ſanctity and hoſpitality could intitle him to [n] (Y). His pity to a poor ſhe penitent.

UPON

[m] Iſaiah xlii. 3. Matt. xii. 20, & al. [n] Luke vii. 36, & ſeq. Mark xiv. 3. John xii. 1, & ſeq.

conditions, ſince the conſequence is of infinitely greater weight; how much more muſt it be ſo, when every duty is not only eaſier and more worthy of a rational ſoul, but abſolutely neceſſary to fit us for that happineſs for which we were created!

Let thoſe, therefore, whom a wrong biaſs has warped into a prejudice againſt chriſtian duties, but view them with an impartial eye; and the more they conſider them, the more they will be convinced of this truth, that they are ſo far from being the arbitrary impoſitions of a ſupreme Being, that there is not one poſitive one, but is as neceſſary to the ſoul, as food is to the body; nor a negative one, that is not as expedient as abſtinence from groſs food is to a man in a high fever, or from drink to one in a tympany; but with this ſure and comfortable advantage, that the divine grace and aſſiſtance here promiſed will remove all difficulties and diſcouragements, and make every part eaſy and pleaſant; ſo that our own happy experience, which it is our fault if we fall ſhort of, added to God's infallible word, will make religion yield us the trueſt happineſs we can be capable of in this life, as well as the glorious aſſurance of a better in the next.

(Y) None of the evangeliſts has told us where this laſt ſcene happened. Our Lightfoot and ſome others think it was in Bethany, Cures a demoniac.

UPON his return to Capernaum, he was followed with ſuch throngs of people, on account of his continual miracles, particularly the cure of a poor demoniac, deaf and blind, which he had juſt then wrought, that his mother and relations fearing, leſt he ſhould be ſtifled (Z) by the croud, came to diſengage him from it. As they could not get into the houſe for the throng, they ſent to deſire him to come to them; but when it was told him, that they ſtood without, deſiring to ſpeak to him, he told the audience, that none were more nearly related to him, than thoſe who came to him to hear the word of God and practiſed it. In the mean time, whilſt his miracle on the demoniac had extorted an open confeſſion from the better part of the by-ſtanders, the Phariſees, moved with their uſual indignation, cried out that he caſt out devils by Beelzebub the prince of devils †. Jeſus eaſily confuted that ſlander, by ſhewing the folly of ſuppoſing Satan ſo far divided againſt his own intereſt; and that nothing, but a ſuperior power of his, could force him to it; but, to aſſure them farther of the fatal danger of ſuch malicious and impious ſuggeſtions, he added, that tho' every ſin or blaſphemy againſt the Son of man would, upon due repentance, be forgiven, yet that thoſe againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhould find no forgiveneſs, either in this or the next world ° (A); and therefore

The ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt.

† De hoc vide ſupra, vol. i. p. 181. ° Matth. xii. 31, & ſeq. Mark iii. 28, &c.

thany, a city of Judæa; and that the Simon here mentioned, is the ſame with Simon the leper mentioned by the two other evangeliſts above-quoted, to which our bibles refer as a parallel; but it doth not appear, that this woman was the Mary mentioned by St. John; and we find our Saviour immediately after in Galilee working miracles, followed by a great multitude, particularly by ſome pious women, who attended on him, and aſſiſted him with their purſes, whilſt he was taken up with his miniſtry.

Theſe were Mary Magdalen, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel; Johanna, the wife of Chuſa, Herod's ſteward; Suſanna, and ſome others, who became part of his holy college.

(Z) So the word ought to be properly rendered, and not, as ours and moſt verſions do, that he was beſide himſelf (8).

(A) It is neither our deſign nor province to repeat here, either the various opinions of divines concerning the nature of this ſin, or

(8) Vide Le Scen. eſſ. on a new verſ Echard, & al.

fore he concluded with this warning, that men would give a or the dreadful effects which a wrong notion of it has cauſed among weak and melancholy chriſtians, eſpecially among ſome ſectaries in the predeſtinarian ſyſtem. It might indeed be of greater comfort to inſert ſome of thoſe elaborate expoſitions, which confine that ſin to thoſe Jews only, who made ſo perverſe a judgment of Chriſt's miracles, againſt the light of reaſon and conſcience; but as we cannot come into that notion, ſo neither would we lead our readers into it.

A late critic (9) has endeavoured to take away all the difficulty, by affirming, that what we render blaſphemy, or ſin againſt the Son of man, means no more than the offences which one man commits againſt another. But if none but ſuch are to be forgiven, and thoſe againſt the Holy Ghoſt, or, as he underſtands it, againſt God, are either wholly excluded, or, at beſt, will, with great difficulty, be pardoned, it is to be feared we are left in a more woeful caſe, than that out of which he endeavoured to extricate us; but who doth not ſee, that whenever Chriſt ſpeaks of the Son of man, he always means himſelf, and not man in general?

Might we preſume ſo far as to give our opinion of this ſin, it would be this, that every ſlander or blaſphemy committed againſt Chriſt whilſt upon earth, and his divine miſſion as yet wanting ſome of its moſt authentic evidence, ſhould be capable of pardon; but after theſe laſt ſeals of his miſſion were ſuperadded, viz. his reſurrection from the dead, aſcenſion, and effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt, attended, as it was, with ſuch miraculous gifts, ſuch as prophecy, gift of tongues, miracles, and the like; there remained no excuſe for unbelief, and conſequently no forgiveneſs either to the preſent or future generation of the Jews, who ſhould obſtinately perſiſt in it, nor indeed to any other perſons or nations, who ſhould reject the glorious light and evidence of his goſpel when offered unto them.

This may be thought to lean a little hard againſt our modern unbelievers; but let them conſider, whether the pretended grounds on which they reject the goſpel, bear any proportion in point of evidence with thoſe upon which we believe and embrace it: and if they do not, as all their united force never could, nor, we may ſafely add, never will, be able to prove they do, let them lay the blame at the right door. Now the goſpel plainly tells us, that nothing but faith in Chriſt, accompanied with a ſincere repentance, can obtain us the pardon of our ſins; how ſhould they then hope for it, who have neither the one nor the other to intitle them to it? Hence, we think, it plainly follows, that this is that only unpardonable ſin pointed out by our Saviour. See the next note but one.

(9) Le Scen, ubi ſupra, part 2. c. 4. ſect. 10.

ſevere account for every pernicious or hurtful (B) word at the day of judgment. Here the Phariſees, being ſtung to the heart, began, according to their uſual cuſtom, to aſk him for a more convincing ſign of his divine miſſion; but he left them with this remarkable anſwer, that ſince thoſe he had already ſhewed them were not able to convince them, there ſhould be no other or greater given them than that of Jonah; for as that prophet was three days and nights in the fiſh's belly, ſo ſhall the Son of man be as many in the bowels of the earth, or grave, and riſe again on the third [p] (C).

From

[p] Matth. xii. 38. Luke xi. 29.

(B) That this is certainly the plain import of the phraſe ῥημα αργον, which ours and other verſions render idle or unprofitable word, appears from what goes before, that they proceed from an evil heart, which is therefore no more capable of producing better, than a corrupt tree can bear other than bad fruit (10).

(C) This ſaying confirms what we lately, and elſewhere before obſerved, that the reſurrection of Chriſt was to give the finiſhing ſtroke to the evidence of his miſſion. Before that, if his other miracles had convinced them that he was the Meſſiah, they would not have put him to that ſhameful death, which yet it was decreed and foretold he ſhould undergo; and it is upon this account that St. Peter excuſes this atrocious deed, as being done through ignorance. But after his reſurrection was proved by ſo many irrefragable tokens, thoſe who rejected him became inexcuſable and made way for the Gentiles who embraced chriſtianity. All which the reader may be fully ſatisfied of, by comparing, among a great number of others, the places quoted in the margin (11).

There are two difficulties ſtarted againſt what Chriſt here ſays of himſelf and Jonah, the one, that whatever the latter might be, Chriſt was far enough from being three days and three nights in the grave; and this has made ſome affirm, that he muſt have been crucified on the Thurſday, and not on the Friday. But the objection will eaſily vaniſh, when we obſerve, that according to the Hebrew idiom, the particle ו ve, "and," is often uſed for "or," and that it may, and ought properly, be rendered three days "or" nights.

The other is from the impoſſibility of a whale's ſwallowing up a man whole, ſeeing the diameter of its ſwallow, when ſtretched at fartheſt, is little above three inches. To which it is rightly anſwered, that the word here uſed ſignifies no more a whale than any

(10) Vide Le Scen ubi ſupra, c. 6. ſect. 2. (11) Conf. Acts ii. 31, & ſeq iii. 17, & ſeq. & alib. & xiii. 46. xviii. 6.

FROM thence he went to the ſea-ſhore, ſtill followed with great multitudes, and being got into a boat, he began to teach them again, not indeed in the manner he had lately upon the mount, but by a more familiar way, and more ſuitable to their groſs underſtanding; namely, by parables, ſuch as were very well known and underſtood by all the eaſtern nations, and not (as ours and other verſions ſadly intimate) that they might be loſt upon his ignorant audience; but as we have ſpoken fully on this important point in a former volume, we ſhall deſire our readers to turn to the place *. When he had finiſhed his diſcourſe, he ordered his diſciples to get him a ſhip to croſs the ſea of Galilee, into the teritories of Philip the tetrarch, Herod's brother. Before he entered into the ſhip, there came ſome men who expreſſed a deſire to become his diſciples and follow him. One of them in paticular juſt begged, that he might go and bury his dead father; and another to go bid farewel to his relations and friends. To the firſt of theſe he anſwered, Let the dead, ſuch namely as are ſo to the hopes of a future life, perform that office [q], and come thou and preach that eternal life which I am come to bring to light; but to the ſecond he gave this ſevere rebuke, that ſuch a retroſpection, as he expreſſed after thoſe wordly conſiderations, was wholly inconſiſtent with the character of one of his diſciples, whoſe mind and heart ſhould be ſo fixed on the concerns of another life, as to be wholly indifferent to all beſides; and ſo bid him follow without delay [r].

Teaches in parables.

BEING entered into the ſhip, whether to refreſh himſelf from the fatigues of the day, or to try his diſciples faith and manifeſt his own power, he withdrew himſelf into the ſtern, and there fell a ſleep. There aroſe ſoon after ſuch a furious ſtorm of wind as was like to have overſet them, and made them run to him, and awake him, crying Maſter, ſave us, elſe we periſh. Jeſus, ſeeing them in ſuch conſternation, blamed Stills the winds and ſea.

* Vol. iii. p. 506, (L). [q] Matth. viii. 18, & ſeq. See alſo Vol. x. p. 378. [r] Luke ix. 61.

any other large fiſh that has fins; and that there is one commonly known in the Metiterranean by the name of charachias and lamia, of the bigneſs of a whale, but with ſuch a large throat and belly, as is able to ſwallow the largeſt man whole. There was one of this kind caught within theſe twenty or more years, on the coaſts of Portugal, in whoſe throat, when ſtretched out, a man could ſtand upright. We may add, that the word uſed in Jonah is דג-גדול dag-gadol, a great fiſh.

med their puſillanimity and want of faith; then, with his powerful word, rebuked the wind and ſea, which immediately obeyed. When his diſciples and the reſt of the company had beheld their danger and deliverance, they came and threw themſelves, trembling, at his feet, wondering, as well they might, what kind of man he was, who could command thoſe unruly elements to be ſo quickly calmed; ſoon after which they landed on the other ſide, in the country of the Gergaſenes (D) [s].

Cures two demoniacs.

HERE he was met by two demoniacs, ſo very fierce, one eſpecially more than the other, that no chains could confine them; but they choſe their habitation among the tombs, and made it unſafe to paſs by that way, till the ſight of Jeſus brought them trembling at his feet, where the devils began to acknowledge him to be the ſon of God, and beſought him not to torment them before their time. Our Saviour beheld the poor poſſeſſed with his wonted pity, and aſked the moſt furious of them, What was his name? and was anſwered Legion, becauſe a multitude of theſe evil ſpirits had taken poſſeſſion of him. Theſe therefore beſought him, that, if he caſt them out he would permit them to migrate into the neighbouring herd of ſwine; which being permitted, the whole herd was immediately ſeen to tumble headlong down into

[s] Matth, viii. 23, & ſeq. Mark iv. 36, & ſeq. Luke viii. 22, & ſeq.

(D) So the Greek manuſcripts of St. Matthew have it. Thoſe of the other evangeliſts call them Gadarenes. Some read Geraſenes, which makes it very difficult to know the ſituation of this canton, or of the city from which it took its name. Origen (12) thinks the name of the city to be neither Gedara nor Geraſa, ſince none of thoſe two cities were near any ſea or lake, but Gergeſa, ſituate on that of Genezareth or Tiberias, where they ſhewed ſtill in his time the rocky declivities, from which the ſwine were hurried down into the water. If ſo, that place might ſtill retain its name from the Girgaſhites, antient inhabitants of Canaan, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume *.

This canton, where-ever it was, muſt have been inhabited partly by heathens, which is the reaſon of the herd of ſwine being ſuffered to feed in that neighbourhood, which was not permitted in any place where they were all Jews, becauſe that creature is forbid by the Moſaic law (13).

(12) In Johann. vid. Calm. ſub Geraſa. * Vol. ii. p. 208, & (D). (13) Vide Levit xi. 7, & alib.

into the ſea, to the number of two thouſand, whilſt the two poor objects were reſtored to their health and ſenſes (E). The news of this ſingular miracle was preſently ſpread through that whole region, and brought vaſt multitudes to the place; where they beheld with wonder the two men cloathed and in their right minds; but whether through fear, leſt any ill conſequence ſhould attend the loſs of the ſwine, or, which is as likely, leſt they ſhould receive ſome further and more grievous puniſhment from him, they meekly beſought him to depart their coaſts which he readily complied with [t].

Raiſes the ruler's daughter.

UPON his return to Capernaum, he was addreſſed by the ſorrowful ruler of the ſynagogue, whoſe daughter, about twelve years of age, was then expiring, and followed him to the houſe, attended, as uſual, with numerous crouds, among which was a poor woman, who had laboured a long time under an unnatural hemorrhagy, and conſumed her ſubſtance in ſeeking for the vain help of the phyſicians. She had ſuch a ſtrong faith in the world's Saviour, that ſhe

[t] Matth. viii. 23, & ſeq. Mark iv. 35, & ſeq. viii. 22, & ſeq.

(E) Thoſe who pretend to cenſure this miracle, as a wrong done to the owners, would do well to conſider how they queſtion the juſtice and authority of a perſon, who had given ſuch irrefragable proofs of both. Had the evangeliſts ſuppoſed any men capable of ſuch a preſumption, it is likely they might have given us ſuch reaſons for this action, as would have ſtopped their mouths.

If the owners of the ſwine were of that kind of apoſtate Jews, of whom we had frequent occaſion to ſpeak in ſome former ſections, the puniſhment muſt be allowed to have been rather too mild than too ſevere. If they were Romans, Syrians, or of any other nation, they were ſtill guilty of a breach of faith to the Jews, who, though under a foreign yoke, were to be governed by their own laws; ſo that they might as well have introduced ſome of their idols into that country, as herds of a creature forbid by their law, and abhorred by the whole nation.

However, if the ſingularity of the miracle proved a means to convert them to chriſtianity, that was abundantly ſufficient to repay their loſs; and it is perhaps for this reaſon that Jeſus would not ſuffer the cured perſons to follow him to the other ſide, but bid them ſtay in their own country, to be ſtanding monuments of his miraculous power and goodneſs; and that the change he had wrought in them was not a tranſient action, done by ſome deluſion or faſcination, but a permanent and real, and conſequently miraculous cure.

thought the bare touch of his ſkirt would give her an immediate cure; and ſo it really did, but not without being perceived by him; for not withſtanding his being ſo thronged by the multitude, he knew, by the virtue that was gone out of him, that ſome-body had touched him, and enquired of his wondering diſciples, who it was? The woman, finding, by the queſtion, that ſhe could not go undiſcovered, fell trembling at his feet, and owned herſelf the bleſſed object of his miraculous power, and had this gracious anſwer ſuperadded to her cure, Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath made thee whole (F). By this time they were come ſo near the ruler's houſe, that they could hear the mournful tunes and cries that were made over the dead damſel, who had expired in the interim; and Jeſus, who beheld with pity his paternal grief, bid him not fear but firmly believe; and entering the houſe with him, and with two or three only of his diſciples, ordered the mourners to ceaſe their doleful muſic, ſince the child was only aſleep; but, whilſt theſe derided him, he took Peter, James, and John, with the girl's father, into the upper room, and taking her by the hand, bid her riſe; which ſhe immediately did [u]. This miracle did ſtill the more encreaſe his fame, notwithſtanding all his prudent cautions to prevent it (G).

He

[u] Matth. ix. 18, &c. Mark v. 22, &c. Luke viii. 41, & ſeq.

(F) Euſebius tells us, that the woman, out of gratitude, erected a braſs ſtatue to her miraculous phyſician, in which ſhe was carved kneeling behind him, and laying her hand on the ſkirt of his coat. The ſtory is much queſtioned, if ever there was any ſuch monument of this miracle; ſhe can hardly be ſuppoſed to have been in a capacity of rearing it, becauſe St. Mark and St. Luke tell us, that ſhe had ſpent all her ſubſtance on phyſicians; ſo that it muſt have been done by ſome of the inhabitants of Cæſarea Philippi, of which city Euſebius ſays ſhe was.

(G) Chriſt's often enjoining ſecrecy to the perſons whom he cured, has been cenſured by ſome of our unbelievers, as unſeaſonable, and contrary to the deſign for which they were wrought, the proving of his divine miſſion. But he had ſeveral cogent reaſons for preventing his miracles being to much blazed abroad, at leaſt till after his reſurrection; one of which was moſt probably, that he might not haſten the effects, as well as aggravate the guilt, of the Phariſaic malice, which, he knew, was to fall on him, before he had gone through every part of his work.

But there was a much greater motive to have theſe miracles concealed for the preſent; for the multitudes, who had already beheld

He ſoon left Capernaum, to go and reviſit his ungrateful city Nazareth, and, in his way thither, cured two poor blind men. He went, as uſual, into their ſynagogue, and preached to them with ſuch powerful eloquence, as aſtoniſhed the whole audience; bur they, remembring the meanneſs of his education and parentage, were offended at him, inſtead of admiring him the more for it. This ſtubbornneſs of theirs prevented his working any ſignal miracles there; ſo that he contented himſelf with healing ſuch ſick perſons as offered themſelves in his way, and departed, never to viſit them again. By this time Sejanus having been put to death at Rome, and Tiberius been undeceived with regard to the falſe accuſations of that helliſh miniſter againſt the Jews, ſent orders to all his governors to have them treated with greater mildneſs, as we obſerved a little higher out of Philo; and Tacitus [w] obſerves thereupon, that they enjoyed a long peace under that emperor; which could mean no more, than that they neither diſturbed his government, nor he their tranquillity; but they were at this time in too great a ferment among themſelves to be properly ſaid to have been at peace. But theſe inteſtine feuds of theirs were beneath the notice of a Roman hiſtorian, if he knew any thing of them; for theſe troubled themſelves no farther about what was done in foreign provinces, than the intereſt or fame of their commonwealth was concerned in it; and this, as a judicious hiſtorian of our own obſerves[x], is probably the reaſon, why they are ſo ſilent about the glorious tranſactions of theſe three laſt years of our Saviour's life.

Comes to Nazareth.

We are now come to the third year of his public miniſtry, which he began with making a thorough progreſs through all the cities of Galilee; where beholding, with his

Sends his apoſtles to preach.

[w] Annal. l. vi. c. 25. [x] Echar. cent. 1. ch. 4.

held ſo great a number of them, had conceived ſuch notions of his being the Meſſiah, that, upon his feeding five thouſand perſons with a few loaves, they made a bold puſh to take him by force to make him a king (14); ſo that he was obliged to withdraw himſelf from them into ſome private mountain. Such attempts might therefore have proved of dangerous conſequence, either by cauſing an inſurrection, and bringing the civil power upon him; all which, and many others of the like nature, were oppoſite to his deſign, and the ſcheme of providence concerning the time, nature, and manner of his death.

(14) John vi. 17.

his wonted compaſſion, the multitudes that followed him every-where, and how few the labourers were in compariſon of the plentiful harveſt in view, he ſent his twelve apoſtles, two and two, to preach alſo through all that country. To qualify them for this high office, he endowed them with his own miraculous gifts, commanding them to diſpenſe them with the ſame gratuitous liberality as they received them, and at the ſame time forbidding them to incumber themſelves with any worldly conveniencies, but depend upon providence for a ſupply and reward worthy their charitable labour. He reminded them, however, that they muſt not expect it ſo much in this life as in the next; for, added he, I ſend you as lambs among wolves; and ſince you have been witneſſes of the ill returns which I have met with from this blind and ungrateful generation, you muſt not expect to fare better than your maſter; but rather rejoice to be, like him, deſpiſed, rejected, and perſecuted; for they will hurry you many a time to the judgment-ſeat, and inflict many a grievous puniſhment on you; but be not terrified at it, nor ſolicitous what anſwer you ſhall make to their puzzling and ill-natured queſtions; for ye ſhall be endued with ſuch wiſom at thoſe times, as all your adverſaries, ſhall not be able to gainſay [y]. In other caſes, remember always to join the innocence of the dove to the cautiouſneſs of the ſerpent (H). Bleſſed indeed will be the caſe of thoſe who receive you and your doctrine; but miſerable and dreadful, beyond that of Sodom and Gomorrah, ſhall be the fate of thoſe who reject you. And as for yourſelves, depend upon it, that he, without whoſe permiſſion not a ſparrow falls to the ground, will be ſtill your ſure guide and protector [z]. With theſe excellent gifts and inſtructions they departed, whilſt Jeſus tarried ſtill at or in the neighbourhood

[y] Vide Luke xxi. 15. [z] Matth. ix. 36, & ſeq. x. 1. & ſeq. Mark vi. 7, & ſeq. Luke ix. 1. & ſeq.

(H) That ſeems the moſt obvious ſenſe of the two Greek φρονιμος, and not wiſe, as moſt verſions render it. We have elſewhere ſhewed upon what account that creature is ironically called cunning and crafty in ſeveral parts of the ſcripture, and refer our readers to what has been ſaid there †. But here our Saviour only bids his diſciples to intimate their cautiouſneſs or preſence of mind, they being known to guard with their heads the reſt of their bodies, and to dart it with ſurpriſing quickneſs wherever the other parts are in danger.

† Append. in Vol. iv. p. 188.

bourhood of Capernaum, where he heard, about this time, the news of the baptiſt's death, mentioned a little higher, and whither his diſciples ſoon after returned, and with no ſmall joy acquainted him with the ſucceſs of their late miſſion [a].

HEROD all this while had only laid his conſcious fears aſleep by the death of his troubleſome monitor, which were ſoon awaked again at the name of Jeſus, whom he ſuppoſed to be that prophet riſen from the dead, whilſt others took him for Elias, or ſome other of the antient prophets. This obliged him to withdraw himſelf, with his diſciples, into a deſert place, where he was, however, followed by a great multitude, and taught them there. The day being far ſpent, and victuals ſcarce in ſuch a place, Jeſus, unwilling to ſend them away faſting and faint, made the troops ſit down in a convenient place, and having bleſſed his mean and ſcanty proviſion, which conſiſted in all of but five barley loaves and a few ſmall fiſhes, multiplied, and diſtributed it amongſt them; and, after they had all eaten to ſatiety, his diſciples were ordered to gather the remaining fragments, and they filled twelve baſkets with them, over and above what had been eaten by the multitude, which amounted to five thouſand men, beſides women and children. This ſtupendous miracle made them look upon him as the promiſed Meſſiah. They therefore were conſulting to have made him king by main force; but, as ſoon as he perceived it, he reſolved to convey himſelf far enough out of their reach [b]. He bid therefore his diſciples to croſs over the lake towards Bethſaida, whilſt he ſtayed to diſmiſs the people, after which he was to follow them. Whilſt they were on the water, he withdrew into a retired part of the mountain, to ſpend ſome part of the night in prayer. The wind, being then contrary and very fierce, hindered them from reaching the ſhore; but whilſt they were rowing and toiling in vain, Jeſus came towards them, about the fourth or laſt watch of the night, walking on the boiſterous waves, and made as if he would paſs by them; at which they gave a hideous cry, ſuppoſing that they had ſeen what the Jews call a mazick, or ſpectre of the worſt kind, concerning whoſe power of doing miſchief their rabbies tell us wonders too abſurd to deſerve a place here [c]. Jeſus ſoon recovered them of their fright, by aſſuring them that it was he; Peter, between doubt and ſurprize, anſwered

Feeds five thouſand with five loaves.

Walks on the ſea.

[a] Matt. ibid. & ſeq. Mark vi. 29. [b] Matth. xiv. 14. & ſeq. John vi. 5. & ſeq. ad 17. [c] Vide ouct. Tzeror, Hammor, & Hebr. comment. in Pſal. xci.

anſwered him, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water; and being permitted, vetured to walk towards him. A ſudden guſt of wind having ſwelled the ſurges, and his faith beginning to fail, he found himſelf ſinking, and cried out to his maſter for help. Jeſus ſtretched forth his hand to ſave him, upbraided his want of faith, and led him into the boat, where himſelf being alſo entered, there followed a calm, and they were agreeably ſurprized ſoon after with the ſight of the wiſhed-for ſhore [d]. Here he was again met by innumerable multitudes, who brought him their diſeaſed from all parts to be cured. Among them were a great number of thoſe whom he had lately ſo miraculouſly fed, who had miſſed him, and came ſeeking after him, and expreſſed a more than ordinary joy when they had found him. Jeſus, however, blamed their untimely diligence, becacuſe it did not ſo much proceed from a love to his doctrine, or from an earneſt deſire after that eternal happineſs which he preached to them, as from the temporal advantages which they expected from his carnal reign, as they believed him to be the Meſſiah. He therefore exhorted them to ſeek after thoſe more ſpiritual ones, which he was came to tender to them. This unexpected turn had a ſtrange effect upon them, inſomuch, that they, who, at the firſt ſight of his late miracle, had cried him up for the great deliverer promiſed by Moſes [e], began now to queſtion him, and to aſk for ſome freſh and ſurer tokens of his being ſo. Moſes, they ſaid, had proved his miſſion, by giving their forefathers manna from heaven, but as for him, he had done nothing like it for them, but only talked of his coming down from heaven, tho' they knew him to be the ſon of Joſeph and Mary, and promiſed them no other food and drink than that of his body and blood, which was ſtill a ſtranger and more offenſive doctrine. Jeſus tried in vain to perſuade them, that theſe were not ſo imaginary or unnatural food as they apprehended, but ſuch a real and efficacious one, as could alone fit them for, and raiſe them to, a happy immortality. All theſe, and ſeveral other, ſpiritual topics, ſerved only to convince them, that he was not the Meſſiah they wanted, and were taught to expect; ſo that the greateſt part of them forſook him from that very hour. Jeſus was nothing leſs than ſurpriſed at this defection, which, he obſerved to his diſciples, was owing to a want of ſuch a true diſpoſition of mind, as nothing could work in them, but the miraculous grace of his heavenly father, Reproaches the carnal zeal of the multitudes.

[d] Matth. ubi ſupra, ver. 24. & ſeq. Mark vi. 46, & ſeq. John vi 16 &c. [e] Conf. Deut. xviii. 15. John vi. 14, & 30, & ſeq ther, ſince nothing leſs than that could rectify the carnal warp, which their prejudices had given to their minds. He addreſſed himſelf next to his diſciples, to know of them whether they felt any inclination to leave him, as the reſt had done? To whom Peter gave this glorious anſwer in the name of the twelve, Lord, whither, or to whom ſhould we go? Thou haſt the words of eternal life, and we are now fully aſſured, that thou art the Chriſt, the ſon of the living God. Jeſus took occaſion here to hint to them, that he had indeed choſen them twelve, but that one of them was a devil, meaning Judas Iſcariot, who was to betray him [f], though he continued to follow him with the reſt (I).

Simon's noble confeſſion.

THESE

[f] John vi. 30, ad fin.

(I) The choice of this traitor into the apoſtolic college was not without a manifeſt providence, not only as he was thereby to fulfil that prophecy, that Chriſt ſhould be betrayed by one of that number (15), but as his character and actions juſtified the admiſſion of him into it. It is plain from what Chriſt ſays here of him, and the apoſtles elſewhere, that his offering himſelf a candidate for the apoſtleſhip was wholly from ſiniſter motives, and this made him put in preſently after for the office of treaſurer.

On the other hand, he ſaw enough to have made him a true convert to Chriſt and his heavenly doctrine, for he not only was a witneſs to all his ſtupendous works and excellent ſermons, but was, like the reſt, endued with the ſame miraculous power and chriſtian knowledge; ſo that if he continued in the ſame helliſh diſpoſition of mind, it was not out of any doubt concerning either the miracles or doctrine, much leſs from any knowledge, or even ſuſpicion he could poſſibly harbour, that his maſter was acting ſome grand impoſture; for had either of theſe been the caſe, he would have been ſo far from hanging himſelf out of remorſe for his treachery, that he would have gloried in the action, and juſtly too. The great horror therefore which he expreſſed for his guilt, and his deſperate end, when he ſaw him unjuſtly condemned by the ſanhedrim, could proceed from nothing elſe but a full conviction, that the perſon whom he had thus betrayed was the true Meſſiah, that his miracles were real, and his doctrine altogether divine.

If it be aſked, how a man, under ſuch conviction, could act ſuch a perfidious deed? it may be anſwered, that he did it in a fit of anger and reſentment, when he diſdainfully beheld the profuſion of a precious ointment beſtowed on his maſter, which, he thought, might have been better ſold for three hundred pence, and put into his bag (16). He might perhaps not foreſee all the ill

(15) Conf. Pſal. xli. 9. John xiii. 18. (16) John xii. 3, & ſeq.

THESE things happened a little before the third paſſover after his entrance into his miniſtry; for the evangeliſt [g] hints, that that feſtival was at hand; but whether Jeſus went up to it, or ſtayed in Galilee, is no-where expreſly ſaid. Only the former is moſt probable, not only from his conſtant and zealous attendance on all other feſtivals, but becauſe his abſence at this time, on any pretence, might have ſhewn an ill precedent to his diſciples, and given the Phariſees an occaſion of ſcandal and accuſation. But, if he went up to Jeruſalem, he did it ſo privately, and ſtayed ſo ſhort a time there, by reaſon of the plots which the heads of the Jews had laid againſt his life, that it was not known to them till he was gone back into Galilee, where we find him preſently after [h]. It is at this paſſover, that Pilate is ſuppoſed to have made ſuch a ſevere example of the rebellious Galileans or Gaulonites, whoſe blood he mingled with their ſacrifices, as they were performing their devotions in the temple [i]; the news of which being afterwards brought to Jeſus, as well as the misfortune of thoſe eighten men, whom a tower in that metropolis, named Siloam, cruſhed to death, he aſſured them, that neither of them came to ſuch a dreadful end, becauſe they were greater ſinners than the reſt; but that, without a ſpeedy repentance, they ſhould all ſhare in ſome ſuch-like dreadful fate.

THE

[g] Ibid. ver. 4. [h] John vii. 1. & ſeq. [i] Luke xiii. 1, & ſeq.

ill conſequences of his treachery, but might ſuppoſe, either that the ſanhedrin would acquit him, or that he would work ſome ſignal miracle to extricate himſelf out of their hands; ſo that when he found it quite otherwiſe, it threw him into that horrid deſpair and madneſs in which he died.

We ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to ſpeak more fully of the nature of his death. In the mean time we beg leave to obſerve, after an eminent critic, an error which has crept into moſt tranſlations concerning him, which ſeems to intimate as if there had been ſome worſe place than ordinary appointed for him in the other world on account of his crime. The words run thus in the verſion (17). Lord,——ſhew whether of theſe two thou haſt choſen, that he may take part in this miniſtry and apoſtleſhip, from which Judas by tranſgreſſion fell, that he might go into his own place. Whereas theſe laſt words ought more properly to be rendered, that he, viz. the perſon now to be choſen may go into his (that is, Judas's) place, that is, may fill his vacant office (18).

(17) Acts i. 24, 25. (18) Le Scene. eſſay ubi ſupra.

THE feaſt being over, the ſcribes and Phariſees, who miſſed him there, ſent ſome of their ſpies after him to watch his words and actions, and to catch ſome matter of accuſation againſt him. The firſt thing theſe laid hold on was, his and his diſciples eating with unwaſhed hands, contrary to the traditions of the antients, and the conſtant cuſtom of the Pharaſaic ſect. Jeſus eaſily exploded this accuſation, by ſhewing them the hypocriſy of cleanſing the hands, diſhes, and other veſſels, whilſt their hearts, which did moſt want it, were careleſsly left in their filth of rapine, deceit, and other real defilements. But he went further to ſhow the miſchiefs ariſing from too cloſe an adherence to thoſe traditions, a great part of which, though plainly oppoſite to the divine law, were yet preferred to it in point of authority and obſervance. He inſtanced in ſeveral particulars, eſpecially that abominable one, by which they had made void the only command with a promiſe, that of children honouring and ſuccouring their parents [k]. He not only ſhowed them the impiety of ſome, but the unreaſonableneſs and ſtupidity of others, of thoſe traditions; ſuch as thoſe that abſolved a man that ſwore by the temple, but not him that ſwore by the gold of the temple, or him that ſwore by the altar, though not him that ſwore by the gift that was on it; though, as he juſtly obſerved to them, it was the temple that ſanctified the gold, and the altar that ſanctified the gift. Theſe ſevere reflections did ſo much the more gravel theſe Pharaiſaic ſpies, as they ſeemed to come down to the capacity of the meaneſt of his audience, and could not but inſpire the people with a ſingular contempt for thoſe expounders of the law, as well as with a great veneration for himſelf.

To avoid therefore the perſecutions which were likely to be raiſed againſt him from that quarter, he withdrew himſelf towards the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into a houſe privately, being unwilling to be known there; but it was ſoon beſet by a great number of ſick folk, who flocked to him to be cured. Among theſe was a Pagan woman (K), who yet addreſſed him with the title of Lord, and Son of [k] Matth. xv. 1, & ſeq. Mark vii. 1, & ſeq. & alib.

(K) St Mark calls her a Syro-Phœnician, becauſe ſhe was an inhabitant of Phœnice, of which Sidon was the metropolis, that province having been joined by conqueſt to that of Syria *. St. Matthew, who wrote in Hebrew or Syriac, calls her a Canaanite, becauſe of David, and earneſtly intreated him in behalf of her daughter, who was tormented with a devil. Jeſus at firſt ſeemed ſo far to overlook her, that his diſciples begged of him either to grant her ſuit, or diſmiſs her with a denial. The woman, becoming thereupon more importunate, received this unexpected repulſe from him, that it was not fit to deprive the children of their bread, to caſt it unto dogs; but ſhe, nothing diſcouraged at ſo mortifying an anſwer, threw herſelf at his feet, and owned herſelf indeed unworthy of a child's portion; but at the ſame time humbly expoſtulated with him, that the whelps were permitted to feed on the crumbs that fell from their maſters table. Jeſus highly commended her ſingular faith, and pronounced her daughter healed; and the woman highly ſatisfied with his promiſe, returned home, where ſhe found her daughter ſitting on the bed and perfectly cured [l].

* See before, Vol. ii. p. 330, & Vol. ix. p. 5.

Heals the Syro-Phœnician's daughter.

SHORTLY after this, Jeſus went more eaſtwards towards the head of Jordan, and took a progreſs through Decapolis (L), where, among other miraculous cures, he gave ſpeech and hearing to a man born deaf and dumb, inſomuch, that the aſtoniſhed multitude cried out, That he had done all things well, and made the deaf to hear, and the dumb to ſpeak [m]. He was followed by the multitude from thence into ſome deſert mountain, where he tarried three days with them, teaching them and healing all their ſickneſſes of what ever kind. But as they had brought no ſufficient quantity of proviſions, Jeſus pitying their caſe, and being unwilling to ſend them away empty, ſignified his deſign to his diſciples; and finding they had ſtill ſeven loaves and a few fiſhes, he multiplied both, as he had done before, into a ſufficient quantity, to ſatiate four thouſand men, beſides women and children; and ſeven baſkets full, which the diſciples gathered of the remaining fragments [n]; after which he diſmiſſed the multitude, and croſſed the lake of Tiberias towards the ſouth-eaſt parts of Magdala or Dalmanutha Multiplies ſeven loaves among four thouſand.

[l] Matth. ibid. v. 21, & ſeq. Mark vii. 24, & ſeq. [m] Matth. ibid. 31, & ſeq. Mark viii. 1, & ſeq. [n] Id. ibid. & ſeq.

becauſe Phœnice was the antient ſeat of the Canaanites, Sidon being the eldeſt ſon of Canaan (19.)

(L) A canton in Paleſtine, ſo called from its ten cities, ſituate ſome on this, and ſome on the other, ſide of Jordan, the capital of which was Scythopolis; it was moſtly inhabited by Gentiles.

(19) Vid. Geneſ. x. 15. & vol ii. p. 339.

manutha (M). Here he was accoſted again by ſome of the Phariſees and Sadducees, who came to aſk of him a ſign; to whom having anſwered as formerly, that they ſhould have no other but that of the prophet Jonah, he ſailed back, and left them to make the application. In their paſſage, he bid his diſciples beware of the leaven of the Phariſees and Sadducees, which caution gave them a ſtrange kind of an alarm, becauſe they had forgot to take ſome proviſion with them; but after he had put them in mind of his two late miracles on the loaves, they came at length to underſtand, that the leaven he forewarned them againſt, was the pernicious doctrines of thoſe two ſects °. Upon his landing at Bethſaida, the native ° Iid. xvi. 1, & ſeq. Mark viii. 10, & ſeq.

(M) It is not eaſy to know, whether theſe be two names of the ſame place, or two different ones, nor to gueſs where their ſituation was, only ſomewhere upon the coaſts of the ſea of Tiberias. For ſo much St. Mark intimates, when he ſays, that Jeſus, croſſing that ſea, came to Dalmanutha (20); and St. Matthew, ſpeaking of the ſame thing, ſays, he came to the coaſts of Magdala (21). Some manuſcripts of this laſt have Magedan and Magdan inſtead of Magdala. This makes it next to impoſſible to gueſs with any probability at their ſituation; for which reaſon we ſhall refer thoſe who have a mind to know the conjectures of the learned, to the authors quoted in the margin (22).

The laſt quoted author ſuppoſes Dalmanutha to be the ſame with Medan, a pleaſant place near the Phiala, or ſpring of the Jordan, where a kind of fair is kept, and much reſorted to, all the ſummer. Hegeſippus, it ſeems, calls that place Melda and Meldan, from which he thinks Dalman to be a corruption, by degrees ſtretched out into Dalmanutha. This is going very far for an etymology, and yet it is by far the beſt we have met with, and perhaps nearer than that of our learned Hammond, who takes it to be the Meggiddo mentioned by the prophet (23), and famous for the death of two Jewiſh kings, Ahaziah, and Joſiah (24).

Magdala is a corruption of the Hebrew Migdol, ſignifying an high tower. There might be many places of that name in Judæa, as well as in the neighbouring provinces; and if this Medan or Meldan was the ſame with Dalmanutha, then Magdala may have been ſome famous tower or land-mark leading to it, or ſome ſtrong caſtle or fortreſs belonging to it. All which is at beſt but conjecture.

(20) c. viii. 10. (21) xv. ult. (22) Euſeb. Hieron. in loc. Hebr. Reland. Lightfoot, Hammon, Calmet, & al. (23) Zechar. xii. 11. (24) Kings xix. 27. xxiii. 29.

tive place of ſome of his diſciples, a blind man was brought to him to be reſtored to his ſight. Jeſus could not refuſe his help to ſuch objects; but, as he had received ſuch ungrateful returns from the people of that city, for the many miracles he had wrought among them [p], he was unwilling to aggravate their guilt by freſh ones. Taking therefore the blind man with him out of the town, he reſtored him to his ſight, and bade him go directly to his home, without entering into the city again [q].

Cures a blind man.

BEING come to the borders of Syria, in the neighbourhood of Cæſarea Philippi, a city built by Philip the tetrarch of that canton, the ſon of Herod the Great, as was hinted a little higher; he began to queſtion his diſciples, who had by this time been about a year choſen into the apoſtleſhip, what the Jews commonly thought of him? Being anſwered, that he was ſuppoſed by ſome to be John the Baptiſt, by others Elias, or ſome other prophet, he aſked them, what their own opinion was of him? To this Peter anſwered for himſelf, as well as for the reſt, whoſe judgment concerning him he could not but know, and affirmed him poſitively to be the Meſſiah, the Son of God. It was upon this noble confeſſion that Chriſt ſurnamed him Peter, or Rock, and promiſed him upon that rock to build his church, to give him the keys of his heavenly kingdom, and the power of binding and looſing; ſo that which of the two ſentences he pronounced upon earth, ſhould be ratified in heaven. But he charged him and the reſt of his collegues not to let it be ſo much as whiſpered abroad, that he was the Meſſiah or Chriſt, till he was riſen from the dead [r].

The Jews opinion of Chriſt.

Peter's noble confeſſion of him.

FROM this time finding their faith ſo well founded, he began to open a myſtery to them, which they little dreamed of, but which it was high time for them to be acquainted with; namely, that of his ſufferings and death at Jeruſalem. Peter, thunder-ſtruck, as it were, at ſuch an unexpected diſcovery, could not forbear crying out, Lord, far be it from thee, that ever any ſuch thing ſhould befal thee; but he preſently received ſuch a ſevere rebuke from him, as gave him to underſtand, that he was but a novice in the doctrines of man's redemption and ſelf-denial. He took therefore that fair opportunity to rid them of all their prejudices concerning a temporal kingdom, and to aſſure them, that there was no way for them, or any other of his diſciples, to enter into his Chriſt foretels his ſufferings and death.

[p] Vid. Matth. xi. 21. [q] Vid. ibid. & ſeq. [r] Matth. xvi. 12, & ſeq. Luke ix. 18, & ſeq. & alib.

his heavenly one, but by treading in his ſteps, and going from the croſs to that glorious crown, which waited for them at the end of their race. He concluded this ſorrowful diſcourſe with aſſuring them, that ſome of thoſe that were there preſent ſhould not ſee death, till they had ſeen the beginnings of this his kingdom powerfully diſplayed before them [s] (N). But as he had given ſuch a kind of foretaſte of his ſufferings and death, as could not but make a deep effect upon them, conſidering that they had always looked upon him as the reſtorer of the kingdom of Iſrael, and continued to do ſo even after his reſurrection [t]; he thought fit to give ſome of the moſt intimate of them a ſpecimen of his future glory.

THESE were Peter, and James, and John, whom he took up with him to an exceeding high mountain, generally believed to have been mount Tabor or Thabor, deſcribed in a former volume †, and was there transfigured before them. This happened whilſt he was at prayer [u], when they ſuddenly beheld a luſtre darting from his face, outſhining even that of the ſun. His garments contracted a ſplendid whiteneſs, exceeding that of ſnow. Moſes and Elias appeared immediately after, in all the brightneſs of their glorified ſtate, and conferred with him about the ſufferings and death which he was ſhortly to undergo at Jeruſalem, and for which he was to be exalted above every name in heaven or earth [w]. During this extraordinary intercourſe, the three apoſtles, whether overpowered with the heavenly viſion and fallen into a kind of trance; or whether it happened at night, when their eyes were uſed to be cloſed with ſleep; they found themſelves in Transfigured upon the mount.

[s] Matth. ibid. verſ. 22, & ſeq. Luke ubi ſupra. verſ. 22, & ſeq. Mark viii. 31, & ſeq. [t] Vid. Acts i. 6. † See vol. iii. p. 109. (A). & ſeq. [u] See Luke ix 28, & ſeq. and the parallels. [w] Conf. Pſ. cxxxviii. 2, & Philip. iii. 9. and before, page 41, note.

(N) Accordingly, he gave them ſoon after ſeveral ſure indices of it: Firſt, in his glorious transfiguration, then in his reſurrection, aſcenſion, in the wonderful change that was wrought on them by the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, when they came to ſee and taſte of that ſpiritual kingdom, which they had before but the moſt imperfect notion of; in the ſucceſs of the goſpel, through the greateſt part of the world, in ſpight of all the oppoſition of the Jews and Gentiles; and laſtly, in the dreadful vengeance he took againſt the former, by the arms and power of the latter, according to this formal prediction of that laſt cataſtrophe. All which will be beſt ſeen in the ſequel.

a kind of ſlumber for ſome time, from which being at length recovered, they beheld the glory, wherewith their maſter and his two heavenly viſitors were ſurrounded; and Peter, in a kind of ecſtatic ſurprize, cried out, Lord, how good is it for us to be here! Let us make three tabernacles, one for you, one for Moſes, and the third for Elias (O), being ſcarcely ſenſible of what he ſaid. Their ſurprize encreaſed, when they found themſelves ſurrounded by a bright luminous cloud; ſoon after which they heard a voice from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed: hear ye him. At theſe words they remained proſtrate on the ground, ſtruck with wonder and amazement, till their maſter came and raiſed them up; when, upon their looking about, they were ſurprized to find him alone, and in his uſual dreſs and appearance [x].

Comes down from the mount.

THEY came down ſoon after to rejoin the reſt of their company, and in the way, Jeſus gave Peter and his two aſſociates a ſtrict charge to conceal the viſion, till he was riſen from the dead. Theſe laſt words cauſed a freſh queſtion among them, what the expreſſion of his riſing from the dead ſhould mean; for, it ſeems, they could not yet perſuade themſelves of what he had ſo lately told them concerning his death at Jeruſalem. However, they took care not to ſpeak of his transfiguration till after his reſurrection. St. Peter, by his ſecond epiſtle, which he wrote a little before his own death [y], appears to have retained ſtill the moſt lively impreſſion of it, by that ſhort, but elegant, deſcription he gives of it there [z], though he owns at the ſame time the evidence which is drawn from the teſtimony of the prophets to be ſuperior to it. By that time they were got to the foot of the mountain, where a great multitude, and among them ſome Phariſees, waited for them, and had had no ſmall ſtrife with thoſe diſciples of his, whom Jeſus had left behind him; before he could well enquire into the occaſion of their diſpute, a man preſſed through the croud, and fell proſtrate at his feet, and implored his aſſiſtance in the behalf of his ſon, who was miſerably [x] Matth. xvii. 1, & ſeq. Mark vi. 2, & ſeq. [y] Chap. i. v. 13, 14. [z] Ibid. v. 20, 16, & ſeq.

(O) Bede informs us (25), that, in conſideration of this requeſt of the apoſtle, the chriſtians in after-times built three ſumptuous churches on the top of that mount, which were had in great reverence, and very much reſorted to by the devout pilgrims.

(25) Homil. in Matth. xvi.

ſerably tormented with a dumb demon, by whom he was ſometimes hurried into the fire, and at other times into the water, and was become ſuch a diſmal object of pity, that he had brought him to his diſciples, but they had not been able to give him any relief. Jeſus, moved with the deepeſt compaſſion at this doleful ſtory, could not forbear upbraiding both his diſciples and the whole Jewiſh generation with their want of faith; and, to convince them the more powerfully of it, ordered the child to be brought before him; and whilſt he was in the ſtrongeſt convulſions and agonies, and his ſorrowful father beſeeching him in moſt moving terms, only returned him this anſwer, that, if he could believe, the cure of his ſon would be eaſily performed. At theſe words the father immediately cried out, Lord, I believe; ſupply my unbelief; and Jeſus rebuking the evil ſpirit, forced him to go out, not without hideous cries, and leaving the boy breathleſs on the ground, inſomuch, that the by-ſtanders believed him dead. But Jeſus ſoon undeceived them, and taking him by the hand, raiſed him up, and delivered him to his father perfectly cured. As ſoon as they had withdrawn themſelves from the aſtoniſhed multitude, his diſciples begged of him to know the reaſon, why they had in vain attempted to caſt this devil out? to whom he anſwered, that all their diſappointments in general were owing to their want of faith; but that this particular one was owing to their neglect of faſting and prayer, which alone could obtain a ſufficient power from heaven to expel that kind of evil ſpirits [a].

Heals a demoniac.

Jesus having obſerved the three, at their coming down from the mount, queſtioning about his reſurrection, took this opportunity, as they were moving towards Capernaum and freed from the crouds, to ſpeak to the twelve afreſh concerning his approaching death; and to aſſure them, that he ſhould be betrayed into wicked hands, to be crucified, but that he ſhould riſe again on the third day. But their heads ſeem to have been ſo filled with a notion of an earthly kingdom, that, inſtead of deſiring him to explain further to them the grating myſtery of his croſs, they were rather debating how he was likely to diſpoſe of his new dignities, which they had more immediately in view. This diſpute laſted till they were got to the city, where the collectors aſked them, whether their Foretels his crucifixion and reſurrection.

[a] Matth. xvii. 14, & ſeq. Mark ix. 14, & ſeq. Luke ix. 37, & ſeq.

Pays the tribute.

master did not pay the usual tribute (P)? and Peter, who knew his disposition to give God and Cæsar their due, answered them in the affirmative. Jesus, however, expressed himself to him in such manner, as plainly hinted that tribute to be due only from strangers, and not from the children, or those who are free-born. Nevertheless, added he to Peter, to prevent giving any offence on that account, go and cast thy hook into the lake, and in the mouth of the first fish thou takest, thou will find a piece of money (Q); pay that for thee and me [b].

Reproves the ambition of his disciples:

As soon as Peter was returned, Jesus asked them, what they had been disputing about in their way thither, whilst they, conscious of their ill-timed ambition, held their peace. But Jesus, who knew it perfectly well, taking a child in his arms

[b] Matth. ibid. 22, & seq. Mark & Luke ubi supra, ad fin.

(P) Several interpreters have thought the tribute-money here exacted to have been that which every one was to pay yearly to the temple; and that Jesus pronounced himself exempt from it on account of his being the Son of God. But we rather think with Beza, that it was the capitation money, which had been made in the time of Cyrenius, after Archelaus's banishment; of which we have lately spoke. For as our Saviour seems to observe to St. Peter here, it was a tax imposed upon the Jews, by the arbitrary will of Cæsar against justice and equity, because, by their former alliances with Rome, they were to be free from all such imposts. However, to avoid giving offence, or too great a countenance to the pernicious Gaulonitish faction, Jesus rather chose to work a miracle, than refuse to conform to the law of the conqueror, and bring thereby a greater mischief upon himself and nation.

It seems, as if by this law or tax every man had been obliged to inrol himself in some city, whether of his nativity or abode. Jesus had made his chief residence at Capernaum, after he had forsook Nazareth. Peter had done the same in all likelihood, and that is the reason why he bids him give the piece of money for them both, without mentioning any thing of the other apostles, who might be inrolled at Bethsaida, or some other town near the lake.

(Q) This piece the Greek calls Stater, and the Hebrew or Syriac אסתירא, astira; it was equal to the double shekel, and was worth about half a crown of our money (26).

(26) De hoc vid. int. al. Breerwood de ponder. Bernard. De mensur & Prideaux in præf. ad Connect. Beza, & al. in Matth. ubi supra.

arms, expresly told them, that the only way of becoming great in his heavenly kingdom was, to become like that little child in innocence and humility; and that the more nearly they resembled him in those two excellent virtues, the peculiar foundation of his religion and of all the christian virtues, the greater and higher would their rank be there; whereas pride and ambition, the bane of his new and divine institution, were the ready means to exclude them from having any share or title to that glorious kingdom. Here one of the apostles interrupted him, to acquaint him, that they had observed a man take upon him to cast out devils in his name, and had forbidden him, because he thought himself above following them. But Jesus blamed his untimely zeal, since no man could work miracles in his name, but out of some due regard to his person and character [c]; then, resuming his figurative discourse, he told his audience, that whosoever should receive one of these little children, or meek and humble disciples, the least favour bestowed on them, though but a cup of water, in his name, should not fail of a reward. On the other hand, added he, whosoever shall presume to despise or give them just cause of offence (as it is indeed scarcely possible for men of that low and humble character to escape such a contemptuous treatment from a haughty and degenerate world), such indignities will meet with the same severe punishment, as if offered to my own person, or even to God himself, whose greatest favourites they are. But whilst mankind entertain a spirit so contrary to that of my gospel, they will hardly ever be free from such pernicious offences; and this is the reason why I, who am come to save that which is in danger of being lost, am so earnest in warning you against them. If a good sheperd find, that one in a hundred of his sheep is gone astray, how readily doth he leave the rest, to go and fetch back the straggling one! and how much greater pleasure would it be to me to recall every poor straggling mortal, who know how desirous my heavenly father is that none of them should perish, but that they may be all saved!

Recommends humility.

But I tell you moreover, that you should be so far from offending these meek disciples of mine, who are incapable of given you the least just provocation to it, that you ought to avoid even retaliating the wrongs and offences that are done to you. You all stand in great need of forgiveness from your heavenly father; but how can you ever expect it from him, if you refuse it to your fellow-creatures? In offences of Charity.

[c] Mark. ibid. ver. 38, 39 Luke ix 49.

a different nature, and of an ill tendency to religion, your duty is to admoniſh the offender, firſt in the privateſt manner; if this fails, repeat it before one or two witneſſes; if this doth not reclaim him, declare his offence to the church; and if he rejects their admonition and cenſure, let him be reſcinded from it; and, till he return and ſubmit, look upon him as an infidel; pity and pray for him, but avoid all familiar intercourſe with him. For here I repeat it again, whatever ſentence is thus regularly paſſed upon ſuch an obſtinate offender by you here on earth, ſhall be ratified in heaven. For whatever any number of you, though ever ſo ſmall, thus gathered in my name and ſpirit, ſhall agree to aſk from above, I will ſurely be in the midſt of them, to direct and help their prayers, and ſend them home with the deſired bleſſing [d].

Forgiveneſs: HERE PETER, finding that an offender was to be forgiven, if private admonition reclaimed him, aſked his maſter, how often he muſt repeat that forgiveneſs? whether ſo far as ſeven times? and was anſwered, not only as far as ſeven, but as ſeventy times ſeven, times. But to prevent their being ſcared at ſuch an unlimited number, he explained to them the unreaſonableneſs, as well as danger, of an unforgiving temper, by the ſignificant parable of a wicked ſervant, who, having had the vaſt debt of ten thouſand talents mercifully forgiven by his lord, went and arreſted a fellow-ſervant for a poor hundred pence, and, without any regard to his entreaties and tears, threw him into a goal; for which mercileſs cruelty his lord condemned him to a condign puniſhment. The application was eaſy, and the force of the parallel eaſily felt; but Jeſus was pleaſed to corroborate it, by aſſuring them on his infallible word, that they muſt expect no forgiveneſs from his heavenl Father, unleſs they were willing and ready to forgive each other their treſpaſſes.

AFTER a ſhort ſtay at Capernaum, the feaſt of tabernacles drawing near, ſome of his near relations, who were, it ſeems, the backwardeſt to believe in him, obſerving what a long ſtay he had made in Galilee, and how the fear of the Jews had made him avoid going into Judæa [e], took upon them to reprove him for it, telling him, that, if his deſign was to make himſelf known to the world, he ought to go and ſhew himſelf at Jeruſalem to the great concourſe of people that were juſt ready to flock to that feaſt, inſtead of hiding himſelf in thoſe obſcure corners of Galilee. Jeſus, inſtead of reproving their temerity, only took occaſion to remind them, them, that they indeed had nothing to fear there from the Jews; but that it was otherwiſe with him, againſt whoſe life the heads of that nation were more buſily plotting at this time than ever. He therefore told them, that they might go thither as ſoon as they pleaſed; but as to himſelf, he would take his own time. He ſtaid not long, however, after them, but went thitheri n the privateſt manner he could, for fear of awaking the jealouſy of his enemies [f]. He choſe to go through ſome parts of Samaria, and ſent one or two of his diſciples to prepare a lodging for him at one of their towns on the road; but theſe, according to their uſual rancour, underſtanding that he was going to Jeruſalelem to the approaching feaſt, refuſed to give him any entertainment; which ſo exaſperated his company, that the two Boanerges, whom we mentioned in a late note, were for bringing down fire from heaven to conſume that ungodly place. But Jeſus gave them ſo ſevere a rebuke, as made them ſenſible how diametrically oppoſite ſuch a revengeful and murdering ſpirit was to that meek and charitable one, which brought him from heaven to ſave mankind [g].

[d] Matth. xviii. 15. ad fin. & alib. ubi ſupra. [e] John vii. 1, & ſeq.

Jeſus goes to the feaſt of tabernacles:

BEFORE he reached Jeruſalem, he was pleaſed to appoint another college of diſciples, to the number of ſeventy, anſwering to the number of the elders choſen by Moſes to be his aſſiſtants [h], as that of the twelve apoſtles did to the twelve tribes of Iſrael (R). Theſe he ſent alſo

Appoints ſeventy diſciples:

[f] Ibid. ver. 4. & ſeq. [g] Luke ix. 51, & ſeq. [h] Vid. Exod. xviii. paſſ. Deut. i. 9. See alſo vol. ii. p. 600, & vol. iii. p. 5, (H)

(R) The names of theſe ſeventy or ſeventy-two (for they are indifferently called by either number, the firſt becauſe expreſly mentioned by St. Luke, and the latter from a ſuppoſition that he uſes the round number inſtead of that of ſeventy-two, anſwering to ſeven out of each of the twelve tribes are moſtly unknown to us. We find only twenty eight of them in Euſebius (27), Epiphanius (28), and Papias (29), chiefly mentioned in the acts, they are as follows: Matthias, Mark, Luke, Barnabas, Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, Nicolas, Juſtus, Apelles, Soſthenes, Rufus, Niger, Cephas, Thaddeus, Ariſtion, John, Barſabas, Andronicus, Junius, Silas, Lucius, Menahem, Mnaſon, and Ananias the ſame who baptiſed St. Paul (30).

(27) Eccl. hiſt. l. i. c. 12. Vid. & Mills in Luke x. 1. (28) De Chriſt. c. 4. (29) Ap. Euſeb. ubi ſupra, l. iii. c. 39. (30) Acts ix. 10, & ſeq.

also by two and two, and with the same instructions and miraculous power which he had given to the twelve apostles; with this difference only, that the former were permitted to go to any city of Israel, but these only to those particular cities where himself designed to come after and preach [i]. By this time the feast of tabernacles was come, when there was no small search after, nor small strife about, him; some doubting whether he would venture himself, some affirming him to be a prophet, others an impostor. He appeared at length publickly in the temple about the latter end of the feast, and, to their great suprize, taught boldly and openly there; and displayed such a superior knowledge of the sacred books, that they could not forbear asking one another in a kind of amazement, whence a man of so mean an education could ever attain to it? When Jesus heard this reasoning, he assured them, that his doctrine was not from men, but from heaven; and that if any of them were but sincerely disposed to do the will of God, they would soon be convinced of the truth of what he said. Whilst therefore some admired his courage, in speaking such bold truths at the hazard of his life, and affirmed his miracles to demonstrate him to be the true Messiah, others, more obstinate, objected the meanness of his birth and parentage. To these he answered, that whatever they might know of his earthly descent, they were wholly ignorant of his heavenly one; all which he enforced by such irrefragable proofs, that a great number of them began to believe openly in him, which when the Jewish magistrates knew, they sent some of their officers to apprehend him. But as his time was not yet come, instead of following their instructions, they came back filled with admiration, and told those chiefs, that they never heard a man speak like him [k].

Teaches in the temple.

On the last day of the feast, in which they used the ceremony of drawing water, and bringing of wood into the temple, concerning which the reader may see what we have said in a former volume *, Jesus took occasion to entertain his audience with a discourse on those living waters, which were to be imparted to those who believed in him, alluding, as the evangelist observes, to those gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which were shortly after to be poured on his church. This last speech caused a fresh division among them, some believing that none but the Messiah could express himself in that exalted manner; others objecting his being an obscure Galilean, whereas the Messiah was, they rightly said, to be born in

[i] Luke x 1 & seq. [k] John vii. 11. & seq. * Vol. iii. p. 194

in Bethlehem; for ſo he was, though they knew it not. But the Phariſees, more exaſperated than the reſt, to hear ſuch numbers of the multitude, and particularly the officers ſent to ſeize on him, declare themſelves ſo openly for him, were the loudeſt in their invectives againſt him and them, alledging, that none of their learned rabbies or rulers, or indeed any but an accurſed ignorant mob, had believed on him. Here Nicodemus, who was his diſciple, though ſecretly, undertook to moderate the difference, by reminding thoſe hot-headed zealots, that the law did not permit them to condemn a man in that raſh and mercileſs manner, and without hearing what he had to ſay in his own defence. This ſpeech galled them ſo much the more, becauſe, though they were conſcious of the charge, they dared not bring it to ſo fair an iſſue. They therefore aſked him in a tumultuous manner, whether he was a Galilean? and bid him go and ſearch the ſcriptures, and he would find that that province never yet produced a prophet (S); after which the aſſembly was broke up for that time [1].

The Phariſees inveigh againſt him.

Jesus went that night out of the city, aud retired towards the mount of olives, and returned again early in the morning, and taught in the treaſury of the temple, where the Scribes and Phariſees brought an adultreſs before him, ſaid to be taken in the very act (T). We have ſeen in a former volume, that the Moſaic law condemned ſuch offenders to death †, and they failed not to remind him of it; but pretended to have a deſire to know what he thought was to be done in this caſe, that they might find ſome accuſation againſt

An adultereſs brought before him.

[1] John ibid. verſ. 37, ad fin. † See Vol. iii. p. 346.

(S) And yet we have formerly ſhewn that Jonah, who is univerſally acknowledged by them to have been a prophet, was a native of Gathepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun in Galilee †, ſo that theſe men muſt have been either very ignorant or perverſe to have affirmed ſuch a palpable falſhood.

(T) This whole ſtory of the woman is omitted in the Syriac and ſome other antient verſions. Thoſe who conclude from our Saviour's abſolving, or rather refuſing to condemn, her according to the Moſaic law (31), that adultery ought not therefore to be looked upon as a capital crime under the goſpel, may as well argue againſt the lawfulneſs of dividing inheritances, becauſe he refuſed in the like manner to intermeddle with ſuch an affair, when deſired by one of the parties (32).

† Vid. ſup. Vol. iv. p. 129, (A). (31) Deut. xvii. 7. (32) Luke xii. 13.

againſt him, ſuch as his too great ſeverity, if he condemned, or if he did not, his too great indulgence and diſregard to the law; or, in either caſe, his aſſuming a judicial power. Jeſus, who eaſily perceived their malicious deſign, ſtooped down, and made as if he did not hear them, but was writing ſomething with his finger on the ground. This made them more earneſt to make him declare his mind, upon which he roſe up, and told them, that he, who was free from ſin, ſhould caſt the firſt ſtone, and then returned to his former attitude. This unlooked-for anſwer filled thoſe hypocrites, not only with wonder, but with ſuch ſhame and remorſe, that they withdrew themſelves one after another, and left the woman alone with him. When Jeſus ſtood up and found all her accuſers gone, he diſmiſſed her with this mild reproof, Go thy way, and ſin no more, and then reſumed his diſcourſe to his audience [m].

He began with telling them, that he was the true light of the world, aud that thoſe who followed him were free from darkneſs. This expreſſion exaſperated the Phariſees afreſh, who thought that title to belong to them alone. They therefore deſpiſed him, as bearing teſtimony of himſelf, but were anſwered, that they indeed were peculiarly famed for bearing a pompous teſtimony and complimenting one another; but as for him, he had the teſtimony of Moſes and the prophets, of John the Baptiſt, and above all, that of his heavenly father, of which the ſtupendous works, which he wrought before them, were an undeniable proof. But added he, this will more evidently appear after ye have lifted me up on the croſs; for then ſhall my diſciples find themſelves truly freed from that yoke and thraldom, under which the reſt of the world doth groan. Here the Phariſees, not perceiving that he ſpoke of the freedom from ſin and guilt, told him with their wonted aſſurance, that they being Abraham's children, it was out of his power to make them freer than they were, ſince they had never been in bondage to any; but Jeſus, inſtead of exploding the falſhood, told them, that if their actions were to determine whoſe children they were, their pride, avarice, perſecuting and murdering ſpirit, and their perverſe oppoſing of all ſaving truths, rather proved them the children of the devil and the ſlaves of ſin, than the free-born offspring of a righteous Abraham. The Jews, unable to refel ſo juſt a cenſure, contented themſelves with calling him a Samaritan and a demoniac, but were anſwered, that the zeal which he had as conſtantly expreſſed preſſed for his father's honour, and the malice with which they had as conſtantly oppoſed him in it, could eaſily determine which of the two did moſt deſerve the appellative of demoniac. However, he added, turning to his audience, This I aſſure you of, that he who obeys that divine law which I am preaching unto you, ſhall never die. This equivocal expreſſion raiſed new arguments, as well as new invectives, from the carnal Jews, which, in this and ſome other occaſions, we ſhall for brevity omit; tho' they roſe to ſuch height, that they attempted ſeveral times to ſtone him, but he as often miraculouſly conveyed himſelf away from them [n].

[m] John viii. 1, & ſeq.

The ſeventy return with joy.

Upon his departure from the city, the ſeventy diſciples rejoined him, and with no ſmall joy acquainted him with their ſucceſs, and that the very devils became ſubject unto them. Jeſus, though pleaſed with the approaching downfal of Satan's power, yet obſerving that his diſciples ſeemed to expreſs too great a ſatisfaction at their miraculous power, bade them rather rejoice at their having their names written in heaven. Whilſt he was giving them ſome further directions for their rightly diſpenſing of theſe new gifts, a certain doctor of the law aſked him, what he muſt do to be ſaved? Jeſus referred him to the Moſaic law, the ſum and ſubſtance of which conſiſted in loving God above all things, and our neighbour as one's ſelf. But as the ſteight-laced Jews ſcarcely accounted any but thoſe of their nation and ſect for their neighbour, the lawyer aſked him further, whom he ought to look upon as ſuch? Upon which Jeſus put forth that moſt excellent parable of the Jew that fell among thieves; and, after having been over-looked and neglected by prieſts and levites, was at length happily relieved by the charitable Samaritan. From which he concluded, that our duty to our neighbour was not confined to ſect, nation, or any other circumſtance, but extended to all mankind. In his way to Galilee, he ſtopped at a ſmall village called Bethany, ſituate on the furtheſt part of the mount of olives, where he was entertained by Lazarus and his two ſiſters. Theſe upon his arrival were very differently employed, Martha in preparing an elegant ſupper, and Mary in liſtening at Jeſus's feet to his heavenly diſcourſe. Martha vexed to ſee her ſiſter Mary (U) leave the whole care of the feaſt to her, went and complained Parable of the good Samaritan.

[n] Ibid. verſ. 12, & ſeq.

(U) This Mary has been wrongfully confounded with that ſinful woman, mentioned a little higher, out of the ſame evangeliſt, complained of it before him; but, instead of her help, she received this severe rebuke from Jesus's mouth, that she incumbered herself too much about the trifling affairs of a supper, whilst her wiser sister was minding the one thing necessary, the concerns of another and a better life[o].

Teaches in Galilee.

FROM Bethany he proceeded to Galilee, where he went about teaching in every synagogue and other convenient places, instructing his followers with many excellent parables, and confirming all still with some new miracles[q]. Among the last, he wrought one on the sabbath day, in some Jewish synagogue, on a poor decrepit woman, whom old age and sickness had so bowed down, that she had not been able to raise herself up during the space of eighteen years. Jesus moved with her misery, called her to him, and having laid his hands on her, pronounced her free from her infirmity, not without moving the Pharisaic indignation and resentment; but Jesus retorted their reproofs with such powerful arguments and familiar parables, as did at least silence them, though all too little to convince them, that doing such good deeds was the proper work of that day. The following is a very pregnant instance of it.

JESUS, after frequent preragrations through Galilee and Judæa, was come to the feast of the dedication of the temple, instituted by Judas Maccabæus, and mentioned in a former section *. He chanced one day, which was the sabbath, to meet in the street a man that was born blind, concerning whom his disciples asked him, whether the sins of his parents, or his own, had brought that calamity upon him (W)? Jesus answered, that neither his own nor his forefathers sins were the cause of his blindness; but that God suffered such things to happen for the greater manifestation of his unlimited power, [o] Luke x. 17. ad fin. [p] Luke cap. xi. & xii. pass. * See vol. x. p. & 136, & note (W).

gelist, who doth not tell us her name, but only that she came to be absolved by Jesus. It doth in no case appear, that Mary, Lazarus's sister, was ever a woman of that loose character; on the contrary, Jesus, who often lodged at their house, is expressly said to have had a particular affection for the whole family; we shall see a pregnant instance of it in the sequel.

(W) This question plainly proves, that the Jews believed the doctrine of the soul's sinning in a pre-existent state, and being punished for it in another. Else a man born blind could not be supposed to have been born so on account of his own sins.

power, adding, that he was chiefly come to make a fuller diſplay of it. Having thus ſaid, he ſpit upon the ground, and anointed the blind-man's eyes with the moiſtened earth, and bid him go and waſh himſelf in Siloam's pool. He did ſo, and obtained his ſight to the no ſmall admiration of all that ſaw him, who could hardly perſuade themſelves that he was the ſame perſon, till he had aſſured them of it. The news of this wonderful cure was ſoon brought to the ſanhedrin, whither the man was alſo brought, and carefully examined; but, upon his acquainting them with the circumſtance of Jeſus's anointing his eyes with the clay made of his ſpittle, a great diſenſion aroſe among them, one ſide affirming this action to be a breach of the ſabbath, and the other aſking them, how they could ſuppoſe it poſſible for a ſinner and ſabbath-breaker to work ſuch an extraordinary miracle? To be therefore ſatisfied of the truth of the fact, they ordered his parents to be brought before them, who, upon examination, owned the man to be their ſon and to have been born blind; but pretended to be ignorant how he had recovered his ſight. Upon their receiving this further evidence, they called the young man in again, and bid him aſcribe the glory of his cure to God alone; for as to the man who had wrought it, they knew him to be a ſinner and a cheat. After ſeveral other enquiries, in which they betrayed the moſt unaccountable partiality and inveterate rancour againſt his divine phyſician, the young man at length took the liberty to plead in his defence; and to remind them, that ſince the creation of the world, no ſuch cure had ever been wrought on a man born blind, and that it was conſequently not only above the power of ſuch a hateful ſinner as they repreſented him, (ſince all ſuch are in the higheſt deteſtation with God) but even above the power of any but a true prophet ſent from above.

Cures a man that was born blind.

The ſanhedrin condemn him.

SUCH ſtrong reaſoning, accompanied with ſo much candor and honeſt boldneſs, might have wrought on any hearts, but thoſe of the Phariſaic mould; but theſe, exaſperated to hear themſelves ſo juſtly reproved by a man whom they accounted altogether born in ſin, after a ſevere and contemptuous rebuke, ordered him to be turned out of the aſſembly [q] (X). But Jeſus, who found him ſoon after in the temple

[q] John ix. per tot.

(X) The text doth barely ſay, that they ordered him to be turned out; but ſome underſtand it of his being caſt out of the ſynagogue, or, in other words, that they excommunicated him. It is temple, gave him a more gracious reception, and then turning to the audience, took occasion, from the late partial behaviour of the sanhedrin, to exclaim against those false and pernicious teachers, under the similitude of shepherds and their flocks, and to shew them, that many of those climbed up into the sheep-fold by private and unlawful ways, like thieves and robbers, only to kill and destroy the sheep. That others, who were only hirelings, and had neither property in, nor true concern for, their flocks, minded nothing but their fleece and their milk; so that when they saw them in danger from ravenous beasts, they left them to become a prey, instead of protecting and defending them. Hence he proved himself to be the true shepherd, because he came to give his life for his sheep, and to procure them wholesome and lasting pasture. He concluded with telling them, that he had other sheep, than those of the Jewish kind, to bring into his fold, which would prove more tractable and obedient to his voice, intimating thereby the conversion of the heathen world.

THIS discourse had likewise a different effect on his audience, some calling him a demoniac and blaming the rest for listening to him; others asking, when they had ever known a demoniac utter such excellent truths, or open the eyes of a man born blind [r]?

Year of the flood 4035. Of Christ 36. The last year of Christ's ministry.

WE pass now to the fourth and last year of his public ministry, an epoch full of the most surprizing and signal events that ever the world beheld; the redemption of mankind by the blood of the Son of God; his resurrection, ascension, mission of the Holy Spirit; miraculous change wrought on the apostles and first preachers of christianity; the church of Christ planted by the powerful preaching of a few plain and illiterate fishermen, confirmed by great and glorious miracles wrought by them, by many supernatural gifts bestowed on them is true, they had passed that sentence on every one that should acknowledge Jesus to be the Christ (33), and his actually doing so before them all had made him liable to it; but it doth not appear from the evangelist, that they pronounced excommunication against him: if they did, he seems to have been the first confessor, as John the Baptist had been the first martyr, for the testimony of Christ.

[r] John x. pass.

(33) John ix. 22.

them, and by them on the first believers and preachers, and in a little time cemented by the blood of innumerable martyrs, and founded on so firm and immoveable a rock, that neither the powers of earth or hell have since been able to destroy it. We shall omit a great number of his excellent sermons, parables, strenuous struggles with the incredulous Jews, and frequent persecutions from the Pharisees and Sadducees; but especially a much greater number and variety of miracles which he wrought within this short interval, to come to that celebrated one, which determined the sanhedrin at length at any rate to put him to death. We mean the raising of his friend Lazarus from death to life, after he had been four days buried and corrupting in his grave, and in the presence of a great multitude of considerable Jews, who, by reason of the nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem, were come thither from that metropolis to the burial, and were eye-witnesses of this stupendous fact.

He raises Lazarus from the dead.

Jesus had designedly conveyed himself away at some distance from him, during the time of his sickness, and had at last acquainted his disciples with his death, adding to it, that he would now go and raise him up to life. Upon his approaching to Bethany, Martha, who was informed of his coming, went to meet him at some distance from the place, and complained to him with tears, that if he had been there, her brother would not have died. Jesus comforted her with the promise of his rising again, but she understanding it of the last resurrection, earnestly entreated him, that he would now use his never-failing intercession with his heavenly Father to have him restored to life. Having obtained a gracious promise from him, she went in haste to call her sister, who came accordingly accompanied with a great number of Jews, who were come to comfort her, and by her hasty departure supposed, that she was going to vent her tears at her brother's grave. As soon as she came in sight of Jesus, she fell on her knees, and expressed her grief in such a pathetic manner, as drew some sighs and tears from him, as well as from the rest of the by-standers. At length, seeing fresh multitudes coming towards him, he desired the two sisters to conduct him to the grave, the sight of which drew a fresh shower of tears from him, insomuch, that the Jews wondered, that he, who could give sight to a man born blind, should not interpose the same miraculous power to have saved so dear a friend from death. Whilst they held this discourse, Jesus ordered the grave-stone to be removed, at which Martha cried out, Lord, by this time he stinketh! But he, after a gentle reproof for suffering her faith to fail so soon, addressing himself to heaven in a pathetic prayer, called out aloud, Lazarus, come forth. Upon which he that was dead came out, bound as he was, in his funeral dress (Y); from which he was at Jesus's desire immediately loosed [s].

It is easy to imagine either the joy of the two sisters, or the surprize of the rest of the Jews, at the sight of so stupendous a miracle; and indeed it wrought such a conviction in the greatest part of them, that they began now to confess him in good earnest to be the Messiah. And not only those who had been witnesses of it, but vast multitudes of others, who,

[s] John xi. 1, & seq.

(Y) This circumstance, expressly mentioned by the evangelist, renders the miracle still more authentic and unquestionable. We are told by him in another place (34), that the custom of the Jews (those at least that could afford it) was to embalm the dead with an aromatic mixture of myrrh, aloes, and other gums, mixed with spices, with which they rubbed their bodies all over, more or less profusely, according to their circumstances, or regard to the dead person; after which they wrapped their heads all over with a napkin, and their whole body with a shroud or winding-sheet, both which they afterwards sweathed as tightly as they could with proper bandages (35).

We formerly observed also, that they buried their dead very soon †, seldom or never keeping them twenty-four hours above ground. Lazarus therefore, having been dead four days, must have lain at least three of them in his grave, which was a cave cut into the rock and covered with a large stone; so that it was impossible for any cheat or imposture to be transacted with all those circumstances, since if it could be even supposed, that a person could live so many days in such a damp and airless cave, yet the linen sweathed on his face and body, and over such a gummy composition, must have smothered him in less than so many hours.

This was so plain and unquestionable, that neither any Jews there present, nor even any of the sanhedrin, pretended to deny or doubt of the fact, but rather condemned him upon the notoriety of it, and as tending to give rise to a new sect, which would endanger their church and state. Of the same nature afterwards was the apostle's cure of an old cripple; which though the whole sanhedrin owned and acknowledged to be a miracle (36), yet they endeavoured by the like unjustifiable means to suppress, and upon the same account.

(34) xix. 39. (35) De his vid. Jo. Nicolas sepult. Hebræor. Calmet. dissert. in ead. Leo de Moden. cerem. Jud. part. 5. c. 8. Lamy apparat, & al. † Vid. Vol. iii. p. 393. (36) Vid. Acts iv. 14, & seq Conf. cum cap. iii. 1, & seq.

who, hearing of it from them, came flocking to Bethany to be further satisfied of it, believed also in him. The sanhedrin was soon acquainted with this transaction, and were in no small concern how to put an effectual stop to this dangerous encrease both of his fame and of the number of his disciples. For, as they rightly argued, if we let him alone and suffer him to work such signal miracles, all men will believe on him; the consequence of which will be that the jealous Romans will come and destroy both our place and nation. At length Caiaphas, the then high-priest stood up and spake to this effect: You seem to know nothing at all, nor to consider that it is expedient that one man should die to prevent the ruin of a nation [t]. Little did he or they think he was then inspired from above, and that he was delivering the will and decrees of heaven, that Jesus should suffer death, not for the Jewish nation only, but for the faithful, which were to be gathered together in him, from the four corners of the earth. For being high priest that year, it pleased God to give him the spirit of prophecy, to utter this great and comfortable truth, and thereby further manifest the accomplishment of the divine oracles, concerning the Messiah's dying for the sins of the world. His advice was readily embraced, and after they had once resolved on his death, they were easily determined to cut off Lazarus also, the sight of whom daily encreased the number of believers.

The Jews consult to put him to death.

Caiphas prophesies.

But Jesus, who knew his own appointed time, as well as the result of their last consultation, withdrew himself into a small city, called Ephraim, in the neighbourhood of the wood or wilderness of that name [u], and there continued with his disciples till the approaching feast of the passover. He left the place six days before that feast to go to Jerusalem, and took Bethany in his way, where Lazarus and his sisters entertained him and his disciples at a sumptuous supper; it being a sabbath night, at which times they kept a more plenteous table. Whilst they were eating, Mary, to shew her extreme regard to their guest, came and anointed his feet with a precious ointment of spikenard, whose fragancy filled the whole house. Whilst the disciples were wondering at her profuseness, Judas, whom we observed to have been their knavish treasurer, could not conceal his indignation at it, and asking why the ointment was not rather sold and the money given to the poor; the rest of the twelve seemed also in some measure to join with him in it [x], till Jeſus had ſeverely rebuked him, and excuſed her generous action, as an anticipation of his burial rite; adding moreover, that the memorial of it ſhould be preſerved to her honour, as far, and as long as, the preaching of his goſpel ſhould reach, or endure [y].

[t] Ibid. vers. 47, & seq. [u] Vid. 2 Sam. xviii. 6, & seq.

On the very next day (Z), Jeſus, knowing his time to be juſt at hand, marched now boldly towards Jeruſalem, whilſt his diſciples, to whom he had more than once or twice foretold all the circumſtances of his future ſufferings and death[z], accompanied him with heavy and trembling hearts. As for the traytor Judas, he conceived ſuch a grudge againſt him at the laſt night's action, that he reſolved to betray him into the hands of his enemies upon the very firſt opportunity. When they were come to Bethpage upon mount Olivet, within a ſmall mile of Jeruſalem, Jeſus directed two of his diſciples to a place where two roads met, and bid them bring from thence a ſhe aſs, with a young colt by her, that had never been backed; and if the owners aſked them any queſtions, they ſhould only anſwer, that the Lord had occaſion for them, and they would readily permit them to be brought to him. They brought the aſs and colt accordingly, and having ſpread a garment upon the latter, ſet Jeſus on it, and accompanied him to Jeruſalem, in a kind of triumph, attended by great multitudes; ſome of whom going before, ſtrewed the way with their garments and green boughs, crying out Hozanna (A); bleſſed is the ſon of David, and bleſſed is the king of Iſrael, who cometh in the name of the Lord. Thus was that famous prophecy of Zachary fulfilled;

[x] Conf. Math. xxvi. 8. Mark xiv. 4. & John xii. 4. [y] John ibid. vii. & ſeq. [z] Vid. Math. xx. 17, & ſeq. Mark x. 31, & ſeq. Luke xviii. 31.

(Z) This happened in this year on the tenth day of the month Niſan, anſwering to the twenty-ninth of our March, and was the day on which the paſſover lamb was taken up and preſented at Jeruſalem (37).

(A) Or rather, according the Hebrew, Hoſhah-na, Save, we pray; ſo that this was a kind of prayer or bleſſing uſed by the Jews, and taken from the hundred and eighteenth pſalm (38), and ſignified Save, preſerve, and proſper, Lord, this Son of David.

(37) Vid. Uſſer, & Echard, & ſup. Vol. iii. p. 185, & ſeq.
(38) verſ. 25.

filled; Fear not, O daughter of Sion, behold thy king cometh to thee, juſt, humble, and meek, and riding on the foal of an aſs [a]. The multitudes ſtill encreaſing as they went on, the Phariſees, which beheld the ſight and heard thoſe acclamations with no ſmall indignation, drew nearer to him, and earneſtly deſired him that he would command at leaſt his diſciples, if not the whole croud, to be ſilent. But Jeſus rather choſe to ſilence their own envy, by aſſuring them, that if thoſe ſhould hold their peace, the very ſtones would cry out, and proclaim the divine author of ſo many glorious miracles. But he took a much more effectual method to ſuppreſs the pomp and noiſe of that mock triumph, as well as the Hozannas of the multitude, which, he but to well knew, would in a few days be changed into the blaſphemous cry of, Away with him, crucify him. For as he drew nearer to Jeruſalem, the ſight of that rebellious and unhappy metropolis having revived in his mind the more dreadful proſpect of that approaching ruin, which was now haſtening on upon it, and which he himſelf had more than once foretold to his diſciples (B), it

Jeſus weeps over Jeruſalem.

[a] Conf. Zach ix. 9. Iſaiah lxii. 1. Matth. xxi. 1, & ſeq. Mark xi. 1, & ſeq. & alib.

(B) Particularly in that full, elegant, and pathetic deſcription he gave to them of it, when being near the ſame place, the twelve deſired him to look back, and behold the beauty and magnificence of the temple, the ſtrength and prodigious ſize of its ſtones; and the like (39); and where he foretold them, that before the preſent generation was dead and paſt, not only that ſtately and ſtupendous fabric, but the whole city, would be reduced into a heap of rubbiſh (40).

And on this occaſion it was, that from the likeneſs of the deſtruction of the Jewiſh polity, and that of the world, or, (as others perhaps more rightly underſtand it) the final end of idolatry, irreligion, and every wicked work, uſhering in the millennium, in which Chriſt and his doctrine ſhall be univerſally acknowledged and profeſſed throughout the world, during a thouſand years; from the near reſemblance, I ſay, of thoſe two dreadful cataſtrophes, of which the former ſeems to have been a lively type of the latter, whether as to its prognoſtics, ſuch as univerſal degeneracy and apoſtacy, a general deception by falſe prophets, lying wonders, abominable wickedneſs, cruelty, oppreſſion, wars, tumults on the earth, dreadful ſigns in the heavens, and the like; or, as to its diſmal conſequences, the horrid deſtruction of the Jews

(39) Vid. Matth. xxiv. 1, & ſeq. (40) Ibid. verſ. 34.

was then a proper time to damp their untimely joys, by reminding them of it; and here it was, that the diſmal ſcene, having quite diſarmed him of his anger and reſentment, made him break out into the following compaſſionate expoſtulation, mixed with a flood of tears: "Oh that thou hadſt but known, "at leaſt in theſe thy latter days, the things that would have "conduced

Jews by war, peſtilence, and famine, in the former, or of the ſinful race of men in the latter, typified by that of Gog and Magog, and other figurative expreſſions preceding the millennium; Chriſt takes occaſion to make ſuch a natural, but almoſt unperceptible, tranſition, that the primitive chriſtians could not eaſily diſtinguiſh them, but were led into a notion, that he ſpoke of one and the ſame cataſtrophe, which was conſequently to happen before the extinction of the then living race.

For it was in this ſenſe that they took the word "generation," according to which it was alſo meant, and really fulfilled with reſpect to the Jews; but the word דור, dor, was no leſs capable of a larger ſenſe; the Hebrew, Syriac, &c. having none other or better to expreſs a much longer ſeries of time. Thus they indifferently ſpeak of the generation of the antediluvians, of that under the judges, king's, prieſts, &c. and we have elſewhere more than once obſerved that they divided the world into three epochas, or in their ſtyle, into three generations, conſiſting each of two thouſand years. The firſt before, the ſecond under, the law, and the third under the meſſiah. It was therefore to the exit of this laſt, that the ſecond part of his prophecy had an eye, when that thorough change was to be wrought in the world, elegantly expreſſed in the prophetic writings by a new heaven, and a new earth, a new Jeruſalem, &c.

As long therefore as the miſtake of the primitive chriſtians, in cutting the epocha ſo very ſhort, had no other tendency than to make them more fervent, zealous, and heavenly-minded, more patient and heroic under ſufferings and perſecutions, and more fervent and diligent in preaching the goſpel; the inſpired writers might have thought it a ſufficient warrant for their overlooking it. But St. Peter, among others, ſeems to have taken particular care to rectify it, and to obviate the objection which might be raiſed from their non completion at the expected time, by reminding them that what they miſtook for a delay, was not really ſuch, ſince with God a thouſand years are but as one day (41). A phraſe well underſtood then by the Jews, to whom he wrote, and which alluded moſt probably to the notion of the ſix days of the creation, preſignifying the ſix thouſand years duration of the world, before the great and glorious change, which it was to receive at Chriſt's ſecond coming.

(41) 2 Peter iii. 8. Conf. cum Revel. xx. 6.

" conduced to thy peace! but now are they hidden from thee;
" and now the ſad and appointed time draws near, when the " enemy ſhall ſurround thee with trenches, and incloſe thee
" on every ſide, butcher thy children within thy boſom, and " level thee with the ground, ſo that not a ſtone ſhall be left
" ſtanding upon another, becauſe thou would not know the " time of thy viſitation [b] (C)". The people, however, more full of the preſent triumph, than mindful of his diſtant threatenings, went and entered the city with their uſual acclamations, and drew ſuch a vaſt concourſe after them, to know who this prophet was for whom they made all this buſtle, that the whole city was in an uproar; and well it might, when they heard them ſay, that it was Jeſus of Nazareth, the promiſed Meſſiah, and remembered at the ſame time what a ſevere ſentence the ſanhedrin had paſſed againſt not only him, but every one who ſhould acknowledge him to be the Chriſt.

[b] Conf. Luke xix. 37, & ſeq. & John xii. 12, & ſeq.

(C) Thoſe who maintain the doctrine of predeſtination, though even in the more moderate ſenſe of it, called by them the Sublapſarian ſyſtem, would do well to conſider, what a horrid ſcene of mockery and injuſtice they make the ſon of God, and redeemer of the world, to act here upon this melancholy occaſion. For if the Jews blindneſs and infidelity, their perſecuting and murdering of him, their obſtinacy in rejecting him and his doctrine, and thoſe dreadful puniſhments which were ſhortly to be the conſequence of it, were not only abſolutely unavoidable by them, but were owing to the want of that ſupernatural grace and power, which he only came to impart to ſome few elect, whilſt he wholly excluded the reſt of mankind from it; with what ſincerity could he ſay to them, even with tears, Oh that thou hadſt known at leaſt, &c. or with what juſtice cry out againſt them, Oh Jeruſalem, that murdereſt the prophets, &c. how often would I have gathered thee and thy children, with the ſame care and tenderneſs, that a hen doth her chickens! and ye would not, therefore, &c. (42); but there is ſomething ſo monſtrouſly ſhocking and impious both in that ſupooſition, and in the doctrine from which it flows of courſe that we may juſtly wonder, that neither this, nor all the learned treatiſes which have been written againſt it (43), have hitherto been able to explode it; but as the argument belongs no farther to our province, than as we are bound to vindicate the divine juſtice and mercy diſplayed in the goſpel, we ſhall gladly diſmiſs it.

(42) Matth. xxiii. 34, & ſeq. (43) Vid. int. al. Le Clerc, Pelling, Whitby.

Monday before his passion.

JESUS repaired immediately to the temple, and, as he had formerly done, expelled all the mercantile brood ftom that ſacred place, and convinced them of his authority for ſo doing, by working ſeveral cures there, on the ſick, lame, and blind, whilſt the wondering multitude continued their loud accclamations of Hoſannah to the ſon of David [c]; to the great ſcandal of the Phariſees, who did all they could to ſilence them. But Jeſus, who knew the main ſpring of all their pretended zeal, not only ſtopped their invectives, by reminding them of that prophecy out of the pſalmiſt; Out of the mouth of babes and ſucklings thou haſt perfected praiſe; but expoſed their malice and obſtinacy by ſuch ſtrong arguments and pungent parables, that they would doubtleſs have laid hold on him, had not the ſight of ſo great a multitude overawed them [d]. There were at this time a number of Greeks (D), who were come to the feaſt, and expreſſed a deſire to ſee him. Jeſus readily cauſed them to be called in; and to take off the ſcandal of the croſs, by which he was going to procure the ſalvation of both Jews and Gentiles, he entertained them with a diſcourſe on his ſufferings, and cloſed it with aſſuring his audience, that thoſe only, who, after his example, were ready to lay down their lives for the ſake of heaven, would be intitled to it. Reflecting next on the glory which God would receive from his death, he broke out into this ejaculation, Father, glorify thy name; and was anſwered by a voice from heaven, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. This was probably meant of the plentiful effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt, and that converſion of the Gentile world, which was ſhortly to follow his death; but the people, not rightly attending to it, miſtook the voice, ſome for that of an angel ſpeaking to him, ſome for what the called the bath-col (E), and others for a clap of thunder; till he aſſured

[c] Conf. Pſ. viii. 2, & Matth. xxi. 16. [d] Matth. ibid 24. ad fin.

(D) Theſe were properly neither Jews nor Gentiles, but what the former called proſelytes of the gate, of whom we have ſpoken more fully in a former volume †.

(E) This word which literally ſignifies the daughter voice, or daughter of the voice, is what the Jews have ſubſtituted to the gift of prophecy, after this laſt had been extinct in Zachary and Malachi, the laſt of the prophets. For though they allow, that ſeveral eminent men among them have been ſince endowed with it, † See Vol. iii. p. 318, 319.

assured them, that it was a real voice sent from heaven, not for his but their sakes; and to warn them to make a right use of it, such as we have seen some of the Essenians; yet they looked upon them in an inferior view to the former, who received theirs by immediate inspiration, whilst these had it chiefly by the help of the bath-col.

They are, however, divided in their notions concerning this last, having no other guide to go by than their pretended tradition, which they make no difficulty to understand, every one in his own way, and as it best serves their turn. Whilst therefore some pretended, that it was a plain, loud, and articulate voice, such as was heard by young Samuel (44); others looked upon it either as a kind of a soft whisper, and others again as a kind of internal voice speaking to the heart of the person.

Whether there is any foundation for the two former, is hard to affirm upon so tottering a testimony of the rabbies, who all own to have lived long after they had in some measure ceased to be so common. Of this nature was that which is affirmed to have been heard to pronounce rabbi Akiba happy in the next world, after he had been sent out of this by order of the emperor Hadrian; and another, which declared two famous doctors, Hillel and Samuel, to be worthy to receive the Holy Ghost; and some others (45), which if really heard, might be yet owing to some juggle of those who were concerned in it. As for the last, or inward one, though it were hard to disprove good men having such secret motions or impulses, yet they may be of two uncertain a nature to be always depended upon.

But if we examine the practice of the compilers of the talmud, or even of those that lived before them, we shall find them consulting this bath-col in a much different way, and not unlike that of the Romans in their sortes Virgilianæ, and other heathenish superstitious methods; of which the two or three following, taken out of the talmud (46), will be a sufficient proof. "Rabbi Jochanan and Rabbi Simeon, desirous of seeing the face of "Rabbi Samuel, a prince among the Babylonish doctors, said, "Let us follow the directions of the bath-col. As they were "passing by a school in their travel thither, they heard one of "the boys reading these words out of the book of Samuel; "And Samuel died; from which they inferred, that the person "they were in search after was dead, and so it actually proved."

Two other doctors going to see a friend of theirs, and hearing a woman speak the words, "The lamp is going out," and her next neighbour answer, "May the lamp of Israel never go "out," of that light, or irrefragable evidence, which he had afforded them, leſt they ſhould bring upon themſelves a judicial blindneſs. For, added he, when I am once lifted up, alluding to his death upon the croſs, I ſhall draw all men unto me [e], intimating thereby doubtleſs, that his laying down his life in confirmation of his doctrine, joined to all the other evidences, that had preceded and were to follow it, and to the excellency of his precepts and rewards, would be ſufficient to draw all ſincere and well-diſpoſed perſons to his goſpel and religion.

(44) 1 Sam. iii, 4, & seq. (45) Vid. de his Basnag. hist. des Juifs, tom. 3. ch. 5. sect. 8. & seq. (46) Tractat. Shabbath fol. 8. col. 3. Vid. Prid. connect. sub an. c. 29.

THIS heavenly diſcourſe made a deep impreſſion on many of his audience, and amongſt them upon ſome of their chief rulers, who yet did not dare own themſelves his converts, for fear of being thruſt out of the ſynagogue. When the evening came, Jeſus, to avoid the croud, withdrew himſelf and his diſciples for that night to Bethany; and on the next morning they returned to Jeruſalem. In his way he obſerved a fig-tree afar off, full of leaves indeed, but upon his approaching nearer it, as expecting to have found ſome fruit upon it, according to the ſeaſon of the year (F), and finding himſelf

[e] John xii. 20, & ſeq.

"out," took this alſo for a warning from the bath-col (47). But the moſt ſurpriſing was, that one rabbi Aſher, who had been guilty of ſo many notorious crimes, that upon his being led through thirteen different ſynagogues, in each of which they examined the verſe which the readers were then upon, they were every one found to be reading a grievous ſentence againſt him, ſuch as in one, the words, There is no peace to the wicked; in another, thoſe of the pſalmiſt, Unto the wicked God ſays, What haſt thou to do to preach my laws? &c and ſo of the reſt (48).

The whimſical way likewiſe of prying into futurity by the caſual opening of a book, was not confined to Jews and Gentiles, but was even practiſed by the chriſtians in the times of ignorance and ſuperſtition, of which the reader may ſee ſome inſtances in dean Prideaux, in the place laſt quoted out of his connection.

(F) It is ſtrange, that all verſions, except the antient Saxon one, have made St. Mark there ſay, that the time of the figs was not yet come, when the very time of the year, the warmneſs of the climate there, as well as the tenor of the ſtory, the deſign and juſtice of the curſe (for who can think the judge of all the earth

(47) Otho, hiſt. doct. Miſhm. ap. Baſnag. ubi ſupra, ſect. 9.
(48) Vid. Hotting. excerpt. gemar, & Baſnag. ubi ſupra.

himſelf diſappointed, he curſed the tree, upon which it preſently withered down to the very root. On the next morning, which was the Tueſday, Peter caſting his eye upon it as they went to Jeruſalem, could not forbear wondering at the ſuddeneſs of the change; upon which Chriſt took occaſion to aſſure them, that if they had but a ſtedfaſt faith in God, they might work much greater wonders than this; which they did accordingly, when their faith was ſoon after miracuouſly ſtrenghthened by the ſupernatural effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt upon them. Being arrived at the temple, the Phariſees began to aſk him again for ſome ſurer tokens of his authority, than thoſe miracles he wrought before them. Jeſus, who knew that nothing could convince them, if theſe did not, appealed immediately to the teſtimony of the baptiſt, aſking them at the ſame time, whether or no they acknowledged it from heaven? Here they found themſelves ſadly entangled; if they anſwered in the affirmative, they condemned themſelves; and if negatively, they were in danger earth could pronounce an unjuſt one?) all ſhew, that the time of the figs was come (49).

Tueſday.

Confutes the Phariſees.

The deſign of this ſentence on a fruitleſs tree, like that other, Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground, was, to ſhew the Jews what they muſt expect to be their lot, if, after having received ſo many incentives to repentance, eſpecially of late from the preaching of the baptiſt, of Chriſt's apoſtles and his own, they continued ſtill, like the fig-tree, barren and fruitleſs. This ſhould therefore have made the interpreters ſee, that there was either ſome error crept into the text, or a manifeſt one in the verſion; and upon due conſideration, they would have found, that, without any violence in the former, the latter ſhould have been rendered, For where he was, the time of the figs was come, or it was the time of the figs there.

This verſion will likewiſe juſtify the act, ſince it could be no injuſtice to the owner to rid his ground of a plant which ſucked its nouriſhment from it, without making any return to him; and here we beg leave to obſerve, that except this withering of the fig-tree, and that of ſending the ſwine into the lake, of which we have ſpoken in another note, all the other miracles were of the beneficent and merciful kind; ſo that to complain of two miracles of ſevere juſtice, if they were really ſuch, againſt him, who, ſetting aſide his abſolute power, has given us ſo many thouſands of goodneſs and mercy, argues a mind ſo extremely perverſe and ungrateful, as ought to make them fear leſt ſomething worſe ſhould befal them.

(49) Vid. Heinſ. in loc. Le Scene Eſſay, part 2, c. 6.

ger of being condemned by the audience; ſo that they were forced, after ſome deliberation, to have recourſe to that pitiful ſhift of owning that they knew not whence it was, for which Jeſus juſtly pronounced them unworthy of any further evidence from him [f].

It was upon this occaſion, that he tried to awaken them to a ſenſe of their obſtinacy and dangers, by ſeveral familiar, but pungent, parables, ſuch as that of the unjuſt and murdering huſbandmen; of the wedding ſupper; and of the ingratitude and inhumanity of thoſe that were invited to it; and ſome others of the ſame nature. But theſe, though feelingly enough underſtood by that hypocritical tribe, wrought no other effect upon them, than to ſet them upon ſeeking for ſome more effectual means to cut him off; and ſince they found it dangerous, by reaſon of the admiring multitude, to make any attempt upon him, to expoſe him at leaſt to the reſentment of the civil power. It was with this view that they ſent their diſciples, with ſome of the Herodians, to intangle him with the grand queſtion about the lawfulneſs of paying tribute to Cæſar, of which we took notice in the laſt ſection; and which being eaſily perceived, Jeſus as eaſily defeated their malicious intent, by calling for a piece of Cæſar's coin, and expoſing their hypocriſy, in making uſe of his money and protection, and yet refuſing to pay tribute to him, as affirming it inconſiſtent with their duty to God [g]. Next to theſe came the Sadducees, armed, as they thought, with ſuch a puzzling queſtion againſt the reſurrection, as all his learning could not elude the force of. It was of a woman, who, having been married, according to the Moſaic law [h], to ſeven brethren, had died at length, without having any children by any of them. They aſked him therefore, if there was any reſurrection, whoſe wife ſhe muſt be, ſince they all had her to wife?

Jesus prefaced his anſwer to their ſtupid queſtion with this excellent one; Do ye not therefore err, becauſe ye know not the ſcriptures, nor the power of God? implying thereby, that their denial of the reſurrecton proceeded from their either not acknowledging (G), or, if they did, from their not rightly conſidering

[f] Matth. xxi 23, & ſeq. Mark xi. 27, & ſeq. Luke xx. 1. & ſeq. [g] Matth. xxii. 15, & ſeq. Luke & Mark. [h] Deuter. xxv. 5. [i] Mark xii 24.

(G) We think the words, not knowing, might be more properly rendered, according to the Hebrew idiom in other parallel

conſidering the ſenſe of the ſcriptures and the extent of the divine power. For, ſaid he to them, the ſtate of the bleſſed after the reſurrection is not to be meaſured by the exigencies of this life. Here marriage is neceſſary to keep up the race of mankind; there they will like the angles in heaven, be free from ſuch carnal and ſuperfluous appetites, where their life will be wholly ſpiritual. He concluded with proving the truth of the reſurrection from thoſe of the ſacred books, which Silences the Sadducees.

lel places, not acknowledging the ſcriptures and the power of God. Thus St. Paul, is introduced, as not knowing the high-prieſt, (50), who preſided at the judgment ſeat, before which he was brought to be tried; when it is plain every child could not but have known him, both by his garb and the place where he ſat. Thoſe who underſtand it, that the apoſtle, in the height of his reſentment, had forgot, or did not conſider that he was the high-prieſt, make him ſay ſomething unworthy of his great character and uſual behaviour on ſuch occaſions; beſides, that it puts ſome ſtrain upon the plain meaning of the word know, which cannot be properly uſed to imply to "conſider, call to mind."

But the ſenſe which with ſome critics we give here to that word is both more agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, and to the known zeal of the apoſtle; and he may juſtly ſay, "I do not acknowledge him to be high-prieſt;" ſince we have ſeen throughout the two laſt ſections, that that dignity was become ſo venable that the vileſt wretches might obtain it, provided they proved but the higheſt bidders. All which was contrary to the Jewiſh law. In this ſenſe then, the Sadducean error will be founded on their unbelief of, and not in their not underſtanding, the ſcriptures, or the power of God; and, indeed, conſidering their denial of the immortality of the ſoul and the rewards and puniſhments of another life, they can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed to have believed either ſcriptures or the divine power.

But if we take the word in the other ſenſe, and admit, that their error proceeded from the want of a right and due underſtanding of both, and not through a queſtioning or diſputing of either; yet as long as they took upon them to limit the ſenſe of the one and the extent of the other, by the ſhallow ſcan of their reaſon, they did but pretend to believe, or at leaſt fancied they did ſo, though in fact they denied, them. If we were to examine the ſource of that ſcepticiſm and infidelity which reigns now ſo much among us, and oppoſes all goſpel truths with ſuch ſeeming aſſurance, we ſhould find it flowing from this Sadducean leaven, which is ever ready to limit the divine power and will, as ſoon as their reaſon cannot keep pace with it.

(50) Acts xxiii. 5.

which they professed to acknowledge; which not only put a final end to that dispute, but forced even an approbation from the contrary sect of the Pharisees [k]. He next received a singular applause from one of the scribes for his excellent answer concerning the grand and chief command in the law [l]; after which he ventured to propose a question to them concerning the Messiah, namely, Whose son they thought he was to be? To which they answered with one acccord, the son of David; if so, said he to them, how came David to call him Lord by the Spirit, saying, The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand? How then think ye he could be at once his Lord and his son (H)? This last question quite nonplussed his whole audience, insomuch, that they never ventured to put any more puzzling questions to him from that time [m]. It was probably on this night, that being retired with his small attendance to Bethany, he was there invited by Simon, surnamed The Leper, and where Mary came and anointed his head and feet with a fresh quantity of the same precious ointment, which she had lately bestowed on him on the like occasion (I); and gave a new subject of murmuring, not to Judas

His question about the Christ.

[k] Matth. xxii. 23, & seq. Vid. & parallel. [l] Ibid. vers. 32, & seq. [m] Ibid. vers. 42, & seq. Mark x. 35. Luke, &c.

(H) It doth not indeed appear that they had any notion of his divine nature, and therefore might be easily puzzled to answer this question; though it seems from some expressions in the gospel, that they had some higher idea of him, than that of his being the bare son of David, or deliverer of Israel. Thus Nathanael, being convinced of his being the Messiah, addresses him with these words, Rabbi, Thou art the son of God, thou art the king of Israel (1). Thus Peter, and Martha also, to name no more, affirmed him to be the Christ the son of God, and that was come into the world (2).

However, the Jews have since found out a more effectual way of evading the force of this question, by affirming, that David did not there speak of the Messiah, it never being the custom any where for the ancestors to give any of their successors the pompous title of their lord; but the meaning of David, according to them is, the Lord (God) said unto my Lord Abraham, Sit thou on my right hand, &c. (3), for Abraham being superior to David in point of Geniture, might be properly called Lord by him.

(I) The circumstances of these two actions are so alike in all parts, except the first being said to have happened at the house of

(1) John i. 49. (2) Ibid. xi. 27. Matth. xvi. 16. (3) Vid. Munst. vers. Hebr. Matth. not. ult. in cap. 22.

Judas only, but to the reſt of the twelve. Jeſus excuſed her a ſecond time as he had done before, and perhaps to the ſatisfaction of the reſt; but Judas, who thought it an unreaſonable profuſion, reſolved that night to go and betray him to the ſanhedrin [n].

In the mean time Jeſus knowing his time to be juſt at hand, and recollecting how often the twelve had quarrelled among themſelves about precedency, and perhaps they had ſtarted the ſame diſpute on this very night [o]; to give therefore an effectual check to their unreaſonable ambition, ſo contrary to the ſpirit of his goſpel, and to leave them a laſting memorial of the contrary virtue, inſtead of rebuking them as he had done heretofore, he roſe up from the table, and having laid aſide his upper garment, and girded himſelf with a napkin in the guiſe of a waiting ſervant, came with a baſon of water, and began to waſh their feet, and wipe them with a towel which girded him. Peter, however, was ſo offended at this condeſcenſion, that he could not ſee the reaſon of it; whereupon Jeſus told him, that though he could not ſee the reaſon of it now, he ſhould be made ſenſible of it in time. But Peter, ſtill ſtiffly perſiſting in his refuſal, was commanded immediately to ſubmit, under the penalty of forfeiting all his right and title in him [p]; which terrible threatening frighted him at length into a ready compliance (K). After Waſhes his diſciples feet.

Jeſus

[n] Matth. xxvi. 6, & ſeq. Mark xiv. Luke, &c. [o] Vid. Luke, xxii. 24. [p] John xiii. 8.

of Lazarus, and this laſt at that of Simon, the leper, (ſo called perhaps, becauſe he had been lately cured of that diſtemper, either by Jeſus, or by ſome other means) that it is not eaſy to know whether they were really two, or one and the ſame. We ſhould be apter to ſuppoſe the laſt, were not the generality of commentators for the firſt. The houſe might belong to Simon, and go by his name, and Lazarus might be a tenant and the maſter of the feaſt, and ſo both evangeliſts be reconciled.

(K) If ever a non-compliance to a command was juſtifiable, or even, we had almoſt ſaid, commendable, it was certainly on this occaſion, where it apparently flowed from the deepeſt regard which that apoſtle had of his maſter, as well as from the humbleſt ſenſe of his own unworthineſs. Since therefore Jeſus was ſo far from admitting it as an excuſe, that, without giving him any further ſatisfaction, he bids him to obey under the moſt ſevere penalty; this whole circumſtance ſeems to be tranſmitted to us as a warning how we make our ſhort-ſighted reaſon

the

Jeſus had gone round with his humble taſk, he took up his upper garment, and addreſſed himſelf to the twelve in words to his effect: Ye rightly call me lord and maſter, for ſuch I really am; if then you have ſeen me, for your example and encouragement, condeſcend ſo low as to waſh your feet (which among the Jews was reckoned the loweſt office a man could do to another), know and remember, that thoſe who pretend to be my diſciples, muſt never think themſelves above performing the loweſt office of charity to one another. It is by ſuch acts of mutual and ſincere love, that men will know, and I acknowledge, you for mine. A new command I leave with you, that as I have loved you, and did not think my life too dear a price to ſave you, ſo ye alſo love one another, and ſtop at no difficulty or diſcouragement, where the good of your fellow creatures, eſpecially fellow chriſtians, calls for your charitable aſſiſtance. Upon theſe conditions I leave you my peace, ſuch a peace as neither the world can beſtow on you, nor any thing make you capable of taſting the ſweet influence of, but the divine virtue I am recommending to you [r].

Recommends charity to them.

AFTER theſe and ſome other heavenly diſcourſes, with which he choſe to entertain them, during the ſhort time he had to ſtay, that they might make the ſtronger impreſſion on them, he concluded the whole with an elegant and pathetick deſcription of the laſt day, when every man ſhould receive the rewards of his deeds done in this life, according as they were either good or evil. And becauſe he knew how apt men were to be more apprehenſive of the divine anger for the commiſſion of wilful crimes, than for the omiſſion of ſuch neceſſary duties, as he had been enforcing, and to find out a ſalvo to excuſe their neglect of them; he choſe to awaken them from that fatal miſtake, by deſcribing the general enquiry of that ſolemn day, as running chiefly on theſe laſt; that is, whether they had, or had not, fed the hungry, cloathed the naked, viſited the ſick, and the like; and the retribution of his rewards or puniſhments, as chiefly diſpenſed

Deſcribes the day of judgment.

[q] De hoc vid. 1 Sam. xxv. [r] John, ibid. & ſeq.

the ſtandard of our faith or obedience, in things plainly revealed or expreſsly commanded. Since God is not obliged to give us, nor we indeed capable of comprehending his all-wiſe ends and purpoſes, whoſe ways and reaſons muſt be allowed to be infinitely above our comprehenſions.

penſed according to their performance or neglect of thoſe eſſential duties [s].

WHILST he was inſtructing his diſciples in theſe and many other excellent truths [t], the ſanhedrin were holding their conſultations how to lay hands upon him, at ſome proper ſeaſon, when the multitude were out of the way. As they therefore feared doing it during the approaching feſtival, leſt they ſhould cauſe ſome inſurrection among the people, Judas came to their relief; and offered to betray him unto them for a certain reward, which they gladly agreed to, and paid him out of hand. The ſum covenanted had been long ago foretold by one of the prophets, and we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more of it in the ſequel. The feaſt of unleavened bread or paſſover being then juſt at hand, the Jews ſet about removing all the leaven from their houſes, according to the Moſaic law, and preparing themſelves for the celebration of that grand feſtival. Wedneſday. Judas betrays him.

THURSDAY being come, in which Jeſus was to celebrate his laſt, and moſt ſolemn, paſſover, he directed two of his diſciples by a ſpecial token to a houſe in Jeruſalem, where they ſhould prepare all things for it; and he followed them thither with the reſt of the twelve towards the evening. When they were ſet down on their couches, according to the cuſtom of thoſe countries, he drank a glaſs of wine, with which the maſter of the family always began the ſolemnity of the paſchal lamb; after which, whilſt they were eating, he told them with ſome concern, that one of them ſhould betray him, pointing to Judas; that Peter, who had always appeared the moſt zealous, ſhould thrice deny him; and that the reſt ſhould all forſake him on that very night; and reminded them of ſome prophecies, in which theſe things were written concerning him. At the concluſion of the ſupper, Jeſus took the bread, and, having broke and bleſſed it, diſtrbuted it among them, ſaying, Take, eat, this is my body, which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me. Then taking and bleſſing the cup of wine alſo, he ſaid, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Teſtament, which is ſhed for you, and for many, for the remiſſion of ſin (L). He ended Thurſday. Chriſt's laſt ſupper.

[s] Matth. xxvi 31. ad fin. [t] John xiv, xv., xvi, xvii. paſſ.

(L) We have contented ourſelves with repeating the bare words of the divine inſtitution, without venturing to give them any ended this ſolemn rite, with aſſuring them, that this was the laſt wine he ſhould drink; for the traytor's hand, which was ſhortly to betray him, was juſt ready to deliver him up to death; when all things, that were written of his being numbered with the tranſgreſſors, would have their full accompliſhment [u]. The whole ceremony was cloſed as uſual, with a proper hymn (M); after which, Jeſus having exhorted his diſciples to continue ſtedfaſt in their faith and reliance on him, and recommended them to the protection and care of his heavenly Father, by a moſt fervent and pathetic prayer, he ordered them to follow him over the brook Kedron [w].

WHILST

[u] Matth. xxvi. 20, & ſeq. Mark. xiv. 18, & ſeq. Luke xxii. 1, & ſeq. &c. [w] John xvi, & xvii. paſſ.

any gloſs that ſhould ſeem to lean towards any of thoſe various ſyſtems, which every church and ſect has ſeverally formed from them; and which, being not only endleſs, but out of our province, we gladly forbear entering further into, to avoid giving any offence.

The oppoſition which a conſiderable writer has of late met with from ſeveral quarters, upon his venturing to give the world his own particular one on that ſacred ſubject, ſhews, how dangerous it is to revive a controverſy of this high nature, in which every ſide is ſo jealous of any word that glances even the leaſt contradiction to their received doctrine

And yet we cannot but own, that too tenacious a zeal ſeems in this laſt inſtance to have carried his opponents cenſures farther than is, perhaps, conſiſtent with chriſtian candor and charity. The ſmall regard that is paid to that ſacred inſtitute by very great numbers, or on the one hand, and the viſible neglect of it in others, from ſome miſtaken dreadful apprehenſions about it, might incline that writer to think his book and ſyſtem excellently well calculated to obviate thoſe two grand obſtacles to a more frequent uſe of it.

As for thoſe men, who from a firm and ſincere perſuaſion, that God diſplays ſome further miracles of grace and mercy in that ſacrament, find themſelves inſpired with greater love to God, and charity to men; with a greater propenſity to virtue, and abhorrence to vice; and, in a word, feel their minds and hearts more effectually attracted from earth to heaven; that author muſt be ſuppoſed too ſagacious to have wrote his book for ſuch men, ſince they could not come down to his notions of it, without being conſiderable loſers by the change.

(M) Or rather what the Jews call the Hallal, conſiſting of ſix euchariſtical pſalms, beginning at the hundred and thirteenth, and Enters the doleful garden.

WHILST they were going to the mount of olives, to a place called Gethſemane (N), Judas ſlipped from them, and went to the high-prieſt's palace to get a ſufficient number of hands to come and ſurpriſe Jeſus in his retirement. Jeſus, on the other hand, being entered into the garden, where he uſually reſorted, bid ſome of his diſciples to ſtay and watch near the entrance of it, whilſt he took Peter, James, and John further into the garden; that as they had been the witneſſes of his glorious transfiguration, they might now be ſo of his preſent ſorrows and dreadful agonies. Having therefore earneſtly enjoined them to be watchful, he parted from them about a ſtone's caſt; where his human nature feeling the moſt violent ſtruggles between fleſh and ſpirit, at the apprehenſion of his future ſufferings, he threw himſelf proſtrate on his face, and with utmoſt fervency, mixed with the moſt ſubmiſſive reſignation to the heavenly will, he prayed, that, if it were poſſible, the dreadful cup might paſs from him. He repeated the ſame prayer twice more, but with ſuch fervency and reſignation, that the vehemency of the ſtruggle between thoſe two paſſions, joined to the proſpect of what he was to undergo from the malice of men and devils, threw him into an agony and bloody ſweat, inſomuch, that there was an angel ſent on purpoſe to comfort and ſtrengthen him under it (O) [x]. By this time the traytor Judas, at the head of his

His agony and prayers.

[x] Luke xxii. 40, & ſeq.

and ending with the hundred and eighteenth, and with which they uſed to cloſe all thoſe ſolemnities (4).

(N) So called probably from the Hebrew גת השמן, gathaſhemen, "the oyl-preſs." For as the mount had its name from the quantity of olive-trees that grew upon it, it is probable, that this garden, which was at the foot of it, had a preſs in it; and this reconciles the evangeliſts, two of whom mention only the mount (5), another the garden (6), and the fourth the gethſemane or oyl preſs (7).

(O) This dreadful ſcene muſt be confeſſed to contain ſome myſteries far enough above our utmoſt capacities; but which, we think, may be much more reaſonably and ſafely believed on the authority of the ſacred writers, than the latter diſputed on the account of the former. The whole œconomy of man's redemption armed gang, was far advanced into the garden, whilſt the diſciples were fallen into a ſound ſleep. Jeſus therefore, having awakened them with the news of his enemies being at hand, went forward to meet them, whilſt Judas, who led the van, came to offer him the treacherous kiſs, which was to be the ſignal to the reſt; who thereupon ſurrounded and made ſure of him. In the interim, Peter drew his ſword, and ſtruck off the ear of one of the high-prieſt's ſervants, but was ſeverely rebuked for it by his maſter, who, by a miraculous touch, healed the wonded perſon, and then ſuffered himſelf to be bound and led away as a malefactor, without any other mark of reſentment, than his obſerving to them, that it was now their hour, in which the power of darkneſs was let looſe againſt him. When the eleven heard this ſaying, they immediately forſook him and fled, according to his prediction (P), and the ſoldiers conveyed their priſoner firſt to Annas, the late high-prieſt and father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was

(4) Vide הגדה של-פסח & al. ritual. Jud. (5) Matth. xxvi. 30. Luke xxii. 39. (6) John xviii. 1. (7) Mark xiv. 32.

Is betrayed and apprehended.

now

tion is every-where repreſented to us as an unſearchable myſtery of divine wiſdom and goodneſs, and as the object of our belief, and not of our comprehenſion.

For this reaſon therefore it is, that God has taken ſuch care to confirm it to us by the moſt irrefragable evidence, by types and prophecies from the beginning, and by innumerable miracles and ſupernatural gifts accompanying the preaching of theſe ſaving truths. It was on that divine authority, that the primitive chriſtians received them, and ſealed their faith in them with their lives; and it is on the ſame grounds, that they have been conveyed to us through a ſucceſſion of near ſeventeen centuries; and it will be time enough for us to give up the one, when infidelity has overthrown the other. Till when the imperfect notion we have of the mutual action of our ſouls and bodies will be an effectual check, how we preſume to call in queſtion, or to reconcile, thoſe oppoſite paſſions in the human to the divine nature of Chriſt.

(P) Which he quoted to them out of the prophet (8); I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheep ſhall be ſcattered. In the like manner the whole ſcene of his ſufferings is moſt lively deſcribed by another prophet (9), who is therefore called evangelical, becauſe his prophecy ſeems rather a rehearſal of things paſt, than a prophecy of what was to happen ſo many centuries off; as the ſequel will preſently ſhew.

(8) Zechariah xiii. 7. (9) Iſai. liii. paſſ. & alib.

now in poſſeſſion of that dignity, as we hinted a little higher out of the Jewiſh hiſtorian [y].

Tried before the ſanhedrin.

HERE they found the ſanhedrin ſitting, though at that late time of night, and waiting for Jeſus to be brought before them, as he was accordingly; upon which the high-prieſt began to aſk him ſeveral queſtions concerning his doctrine and diſciples, in hopes to find either ſome hereſy in the one, or rebellion in the other. Jeſus contented himſelf with referring him to theſe laſt, whom he told them he had always taught in the moſt publick manner, and who were therefore fitted to bear witneſs againſt him, if he had taught them any thing amiſs. For this anſwer, juſt and modeſt as it was, an officer ſtruck him a violent blow on the face; and Jeſus, having given him a gentle reproof for his raſhneſs, ſtood before them wich aſtoniſhing patience and humble ſilence, whilſt the inſtruments of the ſanhedrin were buſy in ſeeking out freſh evidence to put him to death. After much ado, they brought a couple of fellows, who depoſed, that they had heard him brag, that he would deſtroy the temple and rebuild it in three days; but even their evidence jarring in ſome particulars, as the expreſſion of Jeſus was figurative, they dared not condemn him upon it; but were forced to have recourſe to another expedient, which was to make him turn his own accuſer. Caiaphas therefore riſing up, adjured him by the living God, to anſwer directly to the ſupreme court, whether he was Chriſt the ſon of God or not (Q); and, upon his readily anſwering in the affirmative, and adding, that they ſhould hereafter be convinced of it, when they beheld him ſitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven; fell a rending his cloaths, which was not lawful for an high-prieſt to do [z], and pronounced him guilty of blaſphemy. The reſt of the court did readily join with him, and having pronounced him guilty of death, and ordered him to be brought early on the next morning to receive his ſentence, they left him to the mercy of the guard, who made it the cruel diverſion of that night to uſe him with the vileſt indignities and blaſphemies [a], Condemned.

[y] Antiq l. xviii, c. 3. Vid. & Luke ubi ſupra, v. 54. Matth. xxvi. 57. John xviii. 12, & ſeq. [z] Vid Levit. xxi. 10, & alib. [a] Matth. xxvi. 57 ad fin. Mark xiv. 53 ad fin. Luke & John. Vid. & Iſai. l. 6.

(Q) Nothing could be more cunningly excogitated than this queſtion, to which if he anſwered in the affirmative, they were ready to condemn him as a blaſphemer, and if in the negative, as an impoſtor and deceiver of the people.

WHILST this melancholy scene was acting, Peter and John, the latter of whom was known to some of the family, having recovered themselves from their last fright, had got admittance into the hall, willing to know what was likely to be determined concerning their master. Their courage, however, was soon cooled again, when they saw what treatment he underwent from an inraged and insulting rabble; so that Peter, being thrice challenged for one of his disciples, as often stifly denied it, and, rather than not be believed, bound it the last time with an oath. The cock crowing now the third time, put him in mind of Jesus's prediction; but that which gave him a more lively sense of his cowardice and perfidy was, a pitying look which he received at that instant from that gracious and forgiving Saviour; upon which the tears gushing plentifully out of his eyes, he was forced to leave the hall to go and hide his grief and shame [b].

Denied by Peter.

EARLY on the next morning, the chief-priests and sanhedrin, being convened at their usual place, sent for Jesus to have him further examined, and to pronounce their final sentence upon him, in order to have it ratified by the Roman governor (R). In the mean time, Judas, being surprised at what Friday.

[b] John xvi. i. 15, & seq. Matth. Luke, &c.

(R) Not as some have imagined, because the Romans had some years ago deprived that court of the power of life and death; for we shall meet with several instances of the contrary in the sequel; in particular that of the protomartyr Stephen, who was regularly tried, condemned, and stoned, by their single authority (10), about a year after. But they seem to have had a double end in it; the one to throw the odium of his death, as much as possible, upon Pilate and the Romans, as if he had condemned him for raising some rebellion against them; and the other, to make him undergo a more severe and ignominious punishment, and such a one as they could not inflict upon him by their own power, because it was not one of those that were prescribed by their law; concerning which the reader may, if he please, turn to our third volume †. So that their pretence of its not being lawful for them to put any man to death was no farther true, than in cases where the crime was against the state; of which the governor was the proper judge. But as to blasphemy, or any other crime against the Jewish religion, the instance above related what had passed within the sanhedrin, was stung with such lively remorse, that he came and threw the reward of his treachery down before them, owing himself the vilest of wretches, for having betrayed on innocent person to them; but they, regardless of his sorrow and despair, bid him to look to it; upon which he went, and, as most versions render it, hanged himself (S) [c]. But those hypocritical judges Judas's remorse.

(10) Acts vi. 8, & seq. vii. per tot. † Page 338, & seq.

[c] Matth. xxvii. 5.

lated of St. Stephen plainly shews, that they made no scruple to put the guilty person to death without the governor's consent.

Yet nothing of this was done without the direction of providence, since crucifixion was the death which it had been foretold by David he should undergo (11), and which he himself had likewise often hinted, both to the apostles and to the rest of the Jews (12). Accordingly therefore, the accusation, which they intended against him before Pilate, was of a civil nature: We have found, said they, this turbulent fellow raising up seditions, and forbidding to pay tribute to Cæsar (13).

It is true, indeed, when they found that this accusation could not determine that governor, who saw through their malice and injustice, to condemn him; they tacked the other of blasphemy to it, and insisted, that their law made it capital; but this was only added to give more weight to their other accusation; upon which they wanted him to be condemned, as the sequel will shew.

However, it was necessary to observe these circumstances thus far here, against those, who, from the notion of the whole power of life and death being taken away before this time, have inferred, that the scepter spoken of by Jacob (14) was also departed from Judah. The contrary of which will be seen in its due place.

(S) The difficulty which interpreters have found to reconcile what is said of his hanging himself here with what St. Peter says in another place (15), That he fell headlong, and burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out, has made them fall into several conjectures, such as the breaking of the rope before he was quite dead, and his throwing himself down some precipice, which brought on the last dismal circumstances, of his death, and the like *; all which is said without foundation.

What the same apostle says a little lower, and which the versions have, as we observed in a former note, misrendered, that he might go into his own place (16), had led others to look upon his were ſoon after taken with a quite different qualm of conſcience, thinking it now unlawful to refund thoſe thirty pieces of ſilver into the treaſury, becauſe it was the price of blood, though they had made no ſcruple to take them out of it, to purchaſe that very blood. After ſome deliberation therefore, they agreed to buy a potter's field with them, for a burying-place for ſtrangers; and in ſo doing fulfilled an old prophecy, in which the number of pieces, the deſign for which they were given, the purchaſe made with them, and the potter, to whoſe ſhare they came at laſt, were expreſly foretold [d]. The field was accordingly bought ſoon after the feaſt was over, and from thence was called in their tongue, Haccelda-ma, or the field of blood [e]. It ſtood on the ſouth ſide of mount Sion, within a ſtone-caſt of the pool of Siloam.

(11) Ps xxii. 16. (12) Vide John iii. 14. xii. 32, 33. (13) Luke xxiii. 2. (14) Gen. xlix 10. Vid. & vol. ii p. 486, (G). (15) Acts i 18. * Vid Theophylact. Maldonat. & al. in loc. (16) Act. ibid. vers, 25.

Jeſus brought before Pilate.

As ſoon as the ſanhedrin had ended their proceſs againſt Jeſus, he was hurried before the Roman tribunal, and there accuſed of perverting the people, raiſing ſeditions, ſetting up for a king, and forbidding tribute to be paid to Cæſar. They would not, however, venture into the prætorium, or judgment-hall, for fear of polluting themſelves, and becoming unfit his fall, burſting, &c. as a further judgment on that unhappy wretch (17), who did yet ſhew the moſt lively tokens of a ſincere repentance, viz. the moſt public acknowledgment of his crime, reſtitution of the ill-gotten money, reparation to the beſt of his power to the injured perſon, and an open condemnation of their unjuſt proceedings againſt him Now all theſe difficulties might be eaſily removed, if they had rendered the words of St. Matthew, according to Le Scene, that he was ſuffocated, namely with grief, ſhame, and remorſe, or, which is the ſame thing, died of a ſquinancy occaſioned by it (18).

[d] Conf. Zechar. xi. 12, 13. [e] Vide Matth. ubi ſupra, verſ. 7, & ſeq. Acts i. 18.

His fall on his face, which, as the ſame critic obſerves, is all that is implied by what we render, he fell, and others, he thruſt himſelf headlong, and burſt aſunder, is, it ſeems, no more than what is common to people in that diſtemper; who fall down on their faces for want of breath, and commonly burſt after it (19). This ſenſe therefore will eaſily reconcile the two ſacred hiſtorians, without either doing violence to the text, having recourſe to improbable conjectures, or introducing the divine vengeance purſuing even his breathleſs carcaſe.

(17) Vid. int al Taylor's life of Chriſt, in loc. Echard eccleſ. hiſt. Tremell. Beza, & al. (18) Le Scene's Eſſay, part 2. c. 7. ſect. 3, (19) Vid. eund. & auct. ab eo citat.

unfit for the approaching solemnity; but desired the governor to come out to them, whilst they stood in the open place before his palace-gate. When Pilate heard the accusation, and found that it was cognizable by himself alone, he caused Jesus to be brought before his tribunal, where he asked him, whether he was really a king? Jesus readily answered him in the affirmative (T); but added at the same time, that his kingdom was not of this world; for if it had, his servants would have fought in his defence, and saved him from falling into the hands of his persecutors. This was enough to convince the governor of the injustice of his accusation, which he already knew was the effect of some private malice they had against him. However, that he might know something more concerning his imaginary kingdom, for such and no other he seems to have supposed it, he asked him again, Art thou really a king? To which he replied, I am indeed. For this cause was I born, that I might bear witness to the truth; and none are my subjects, but such as obey the voice of truth. Pilate, being still more out of conceit with this new kind of kingdom, contented himself with asking, what he meant by truth? and, without staying for an answer, went out to the people, and told them, that he could find no fault in their pretended criminal. When the Jewish rulers heard this, they were still more vehement in their accusations. Pilate therefore urged him to give some kind of answer to them; but he, who knew how vain it was to attempt it, made them no other defence, than that of a surprising and invincible silence.

THE Jews took this opportunity to be more vehement in their invectives, in order to exasperate the fluctuating governor against him, by assuring him, that he had filled not only Jerusalem and all Judæa, but even all his own country of Galilee, with his seditious doctrine. As soon therefore as Pilate heard that he was of that country, and belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he ordered him to be immediately sent to him, in hopes at once to lay an obligation on that tetrarch, with whom he had been at some variance, and to throw the whole burden of this intricate and dangerous trial upon him; he being then come to Jerusalem to the feast. Herod was no less

Sent to Herod.

(T) Our and some versions make his answer somewhat ambiguous, as if he dared not to speak out, "Thou sayest it," or "thou sayest that I am a king; whereas, according to the Hebrew idiom, it should properly be rendered, "It is as thou "sayest, I am indeed a king."

leſs glad to ſee a perſon, of whom he had heard ſuch wonders, and from whom he expected to have ſeen ſome ſignal miracles; but Jeſus, ready and liberal as he was of them to the poor and afflicted, diſdained to work them, either to gratify the curioſity of ſuch a tyrant, or to ſilence the malice of his enemies; ſo that, in ſpight of all their vehement accuſations and of Herod's ſcornful treatment of him, he would not ſo much as vouchſafe him an anſwer to any of his queſtions. Herod, affronted at his obſtinate ſilence and his own diſappointment, began to treat him as a deſpicable perſon, and turned him over to his guards, with orders to ſend him back to Pilate; and theſe, after ſeveral rude indignities, arrayed him in a gorgeous robe of mockery, and brought him back to the hall of judgment. From this time, however, Pilate and Herod laid aſide all their reſentment, and were perfectly reconciled to each other.

WHILST this was doing, Pilate's wife had ſent to warn him againſt having any hand in condemning that juſt perſon, on whoſe account ſhe had been terrified with ſome dreadful dreams that night. The Romans were very obſerving of theſe kinds of ſuperſtitions; ſo that this meſſage made him ſtill more afraid to yield to the preſſing inſtances of the tumultuous Jews. As ſoon therefore as Jeſus was brought back to him, he came out to them, and plainly told them, that he could not condemn a perſon, in whom, after the ſtricteſt examination, he had not been able to find the leaſt capital crime; nor even Herod himſelf, who, though much better acquainted with their laws, had ſent him back to him abſolved. I will therefore, added he, inflict ſome lighter puniſhment on him, and let him go. This propoſal, inſtead of mollifying them, made them more inſtant to have him crucified. He bethought himſelf at length of another expedient, which he expected would have both ſaved him, and aſſuaged their fury. You know, ſaid he to them, that it is a cuſtom for your governors to releaſe to you ſome one criminal on theſe feſtivals, whom you ſhall name. Tell me therefore, ſhall I deliver you this man, or Barabbas, who lies in priſon for an inſurrection and murder? He judged indeed, and reaſonably too, that they would not carry their reſentment or boldneſs ſo far, as to prefer a rebel and a murderer before an innocent perſon; and therefore it was, that he gave them only the choice of theſe two. But, to his great ſurprize, the people, inſtigated by the prieſts and rulers, demanded Barabbas to be realeaſed, and Jeſus to be crucified, in ſpight of all he could ſay in his behalf.

Brought back to Pilate:

Barabbas preferred to him.

SINCE

Since therefore he could not work on their reason and conscience, he resolved to try what he could do on their pity, and ordered Jesus to be sent to the pillar, and to be severely scourged (U); which was accordingly done, and (as we may suppose, from the natural barbarity of the Roman soldiers, as well as from the additional indignities which they offered to him presently after) was executed with utmost severity. After they had untied him, the whole cohort gathered about him, threw a ragged purple robe about his mangled body, set a crown of thorns upon his head, and put a reed in his hand; and whilst some bowed the knee to him in mockery, and saluted him king of the Jews, others did buffet him, spit upon him, and use him with utmost insolence and inhumanity. Pilate thought this a proper time to bring him forth to them in this sad and deplorable guise, not doubting, but the sight of so dismal an object would have melted them into pity and remorse. But he little knew the temper of the Jews, and that the more abject and miserable the person appeared, on whom they had fixed such great hopes and expectation, the more they would detest and abhor him. And so he found it happened on this occasion, though to his greatest surprize; and the very people, who, but six days before, followed him with their loud Hosannah's, could not now behold him in that abject state, without crying out with greater vehemence, Jesus scourged and mocked.

Away

(U) This punishment was not like that used among the Jews, of which we have given an account in a former volume †, and did neither exceed forty stripes, nor was reckoned dishonourable, since even their monarchs were subjected to it But among the Romans, it was very severe and shameful. The person being stripped naked, at least down to the girdle, and his hands tied to a ring fastened to a stone pillar, not above a foot and half high, if so much, so that his body was bent forward almost double, which gave such an advantage to the executioners, that the blows came down, as it were, with double force.

This particular part of our Saviour's suffering is rightly supposed to be foretold by the psalmist (20), in these words; The plowers plowed upon my back, and made long furrows. As likewise that of his being buffeted, and scornfully spit upon in the halls of the high-priest, and of the governor, by the prophet Isaiah (21) in these terms; I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; neither did I hide, or defend, my face from being shamefully spit upon.

† vol. iii. p. 338, & (A) (20) Ps. cxxix. 3. (21) Ch. l. 6, & seq.

Away with him, crucify him. Pilate, surprized at this horrid cruelty, refused again to comply, alledging, that he found no fault in him; upon which the priests and elders, finding it impossible to get him condemned for sedition, began to accuse him of blasphemy: We have a law, said they to him, which condemns him to death for calling himself the Son of God. At these last words, Pilate, still more terrified, took him again to his tribunal, and asked him several questions, to which Jesus disdaining to answer, he tried again to provoke him to it, by reminding him, that it was in his power to condemn or release him. Jesus gave no other answer to it, than by reminding him in his turn, that all his boasted power came to him from above, and that he should therefore be accountable for his abuse of it, though the greater guilt did fall on those who had delivered him up unto him. These last words made such an impression on the governor, that he went out to the people, fully determined, as he thought, at any rate to release him. But during this interval the priests and rulers, who knew but too well the temper of the Roman prætor, bethought themselves of an expedient which would quickly bring him into a compliance; so that, before he could well discover his resolution to them, they began to cry out, with one accord and in a threatening tone, Thou are not Cæsar's friend, if thou letteſt a man go, who, by assuming the royal title and forbidding to pay the usual tribute, has declared himself his open enemy. This argument proved more powerful than all the rest, and Pilate now no longer daring to refuse their unjust demands, for fear of bringing his loyalty to Cæsar into question, having first washed his hands (W) before them all, and declared himself innocent of the blood of that innocent person, delivered him up to be crucified, and released the seditious murderer, according to their desire [f].

Accused of blasphemy.

Condemned to the cross.

As soon as Pilate had pronounced that most unjust sentence against the most innocent of men, the Roman soldiers led him back [f] Vid. Matth per. tot. Mark xv. pass. Luke xxiii. per tot. John xviii. & xix. pass.

(W) This mock ceremony seems to have been a kind of form used by judges in cases of this unjustifiable nature. Else Pilate could not but be conscious, that all the water of the sea could not wash away the guilt of his unrighteous sentence; no! not, though the impious Jews did then pray, that the sin and punishment of it might fall on them and their unhappy posterity (22).

(22) Matth. xxvii. 25.

back to the hall, where they ſtripped him of his mock royalty, and put on him his own garments; and having laid his croſs on him, they led him with two other criminals out of the city (X), to a place called in Hebrew, Golgotha, and in Latin, Calvary, to be crucified. His tender body, quite ſpent with watching and ſufferings, beginning to ſink under its weight, they compelled a Cyrenean Jew †, named Simon, to help to bear his croſs after him. In this doleful march he beheld ſome women melting into tears at the ſight of his deplorable condition; but it ſeems, as if the more dreadful fate, which waited the unhappy Jews, had made him quite inſenſible of his own miſery; for turning to them with uſual compaſſion, he bid them rather weep at the more diſmal proſpect of their future ruin, when their calamities would make them wiſh their wombs had been barren, and their breaſts incapable of yielding any nouriſhment to a generation, whoſe fidelity would ſhortly render them the ſad object of the divine vengeance, and the ſcorn and hatred of the world ᵍ.

It was now about the ſixth hour of the day, anſwering to our mid-day (Y), when they came to the place, where they offered † De his vid. ſup. pag. 69. & (D). ᵍ Luke xxiii. 27, & ſeq.

(X) The Jews ſuffered no criminals to be put to death in any of their cities, much leſs in the metropolis; and this was done in imitation of what had been practiſed in their camps in the wilderneſs (23), and was typified by the red heifer and ſcape-goat, of which we have ſpoken in a former volume *; ſo that Chriſt, the grand propitiatory victim, was led, loaden with the ſins of mankind †, to be offered up without the gates of Jeruſalem.

Golgotha or Calvary was a rocky hill on the weſt ſide of the city (24), and was a kind of charnel ſtore-houſe, from which it had thoſe names, which ſignify the place of a ſcull, probably from its reſemblance to it; and was alſo made uſe of for a place of execution.

It is ſuppoſed by the antient fathers to have been the mountain where Abraham went to ſacrifice his ſon. Some of them add, on the authority of a Jewiſh tradition, that the ſcull of Adam had been there buried by Shem, to whom his father gave it in charge after the flood, as it was he who was to people that holy land (25).

(Y) The difference between St. Mark, who calls it the third hour offered him some wine mixed with myrrh (Z), which, when he had tasted, he refused to drink. They then stripped

(23) De hoc vid. int. al vol iii. p. 13, & p. 78, & note. *Ibid. 222, (V) 228, & (Z). †Ibid in fin. not. (Z). (24) See the map of the city. (25) Hieron. Euſeb. Tertul. Orig. & al. mult.

hour (26), and the other two evangelists, who call it the sixth (27), is easily reconciled by their different ways of dividing the day, namely, either into twelve hours, beginning at the sun-rise (28), which the two last follow, and into four parts, called also hours; but which they distinguished only by three, six, nine, and twelve; and these were the usual hours to repair to the temple or synagogues, &c. to pray (29); and to this last way of reckoning the former seems to allude, calling it the third hour, probably because the sixth was not quite begun. Perhaps also is he there speaking, not of his real crucifixion, but of the Jews obtaining Pilate's sentence of it against him, which was certainly near the third hour, or our nine of the clock in the morning.

(Z) This mixture was probably given to intoxicate the sufferers, that they might be less sensible of their torment; and Jesus might refuse it upon that very account, because it became him, who was then going to offer himself a free and voluntary sacrifice to God for the sins of men, and was to shew them a pattern how to bear afflictions with due resignation to the divine will; to avoid a thing which might too far discompose his thoughts, and shew too ill a precedent to his followers.

One of the evangelists makes this mixture to consist of myrrh and wine (30), and another of vinegar and gall (31). Hence some suppose, that though the former was usually given on such occasions, yet the soldiers out of spight and contempt gave him the latter, which would have a contrary effect. But we much doubt, whether the Romans, naturally delighting in being cruel to persons in misery, could be capable of so much compassion towards criminals. Their barbarous sports and spectacles argue rather the reverse. Besides, the vinum myrrhatum, we are told (32), was highly esteemed by them, insomuch, that one of the laws of the twelve tables forbad their dead to be washed or sprinkled with it. And who can imagine, that they would bestow it on such criminals as they condemned to this kind of death, which was held in the greatest ignominy and reproach among them?

It is more likely, that the evangelist, who wrote in the Hebrew or Syriac, made use of the word מר, mar, which signifies bitterness, or any bitter ingredient, and that his translator mistook it for מור, mor, myrrh; and thus the two evangelists will be reconciled, and the prophecy fulfilled, They gave me gall to eat,

and

(26) Ch. xv. 34. (27) Luke xxiii. 44. John xix. 14. (28) Vid. Matth. xxi. 3, & seq. John xi. 9. (29) Ut Act iii. 1. x. 9. Dehis vid. & Drus. in loc. Goodwin, Moses & Aar. l. iii. c. 1. sect. 6. 7. & seq. (30) Mark xv. 23. (31) xxvii. 34. (32) Vid. Plin. l. xiv. c. 13.

ped him of his cloaths, and extended his body on the croſs, faſtened him to it, with nails driven through his hands and feet, whilſt he was earneſtly praying to his father to forgive them a deed, which they committed through ignorance. After which they reared up the croſs, and fixed it on the ground, ſo that his body hanged on four wounds, made on the moſt tender and ſenſible parts of the body. With him they crucified two malefactors (A), one on each ſide, according to that oracle, which foretold his being numbred with tranſgreſſors [h]. Pilate had likewiſe ordered the title of his accuſation to be fixed to the croſs; it was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the three moſt known tongues at that time, and in theſe words; Jeſus of Nazareth king of the Jews. The chiefs were therefore highly affronted at it, and came to beg of Pilate to have it altered, and, inſtead of calling him king of the Jews, to have it inſerted that he aſſumed that title to him. But he as ſtifly refuſed it, and ſent them away with this haughty anſwer, What I have written, I have written. Here, whilſt the ſoldiers, who were ſet to watch him, fulfilled another prophecy of him, in the diviſion they made of his garments and caſting lots on his robe, becauſe it was without ſeam and woven from top throughout [i]; the prieſts and elders were verifying another, in the ſcornful taunts and injurious reflections they caſt upon him, in the height of his anguiſh and dying pangs. He ſaved others, ſaid they, in a deriding tone; but cannot ſave himſelf: he pretended to truſt in God, let him now deliver him, if he had ſuch delight in him [k]. Their example was followed by all the multitudes that were gathered to ſee the diſmal ſight. The very criminals, who were crucified on each ſide, could not forbear

Jeſus crucified between two thieves.

Reviled by the prieſts &c.

[h] Conf. Iſai. liii. ult. & Mark xv. 28. Luke xxii. 37, xxiii. 33. [i] Conf. Pſ. xxii. 18. & Luke xxiii. 34. John xix. 24. [k] Conf. Pſ. xxii. 7, 8, & Matth. xxvii. 41, & ſeq.

and in my thirſt, vinegar to drink (33). For the whole tenor of this pſalm ſeems to be a continued prophecy of Chriſt's ſufferings, as well as of that judicial blindneſs, ruin, and diſperſion, which fell on the impenitent Jews (34).

(A) Theſe are reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been two of the gang of thoſe free-booters, whom the Jews called לסטים, liſteſſin, and the Romans prædones; ſuch as, we have obſerved in a former ſection, uſed to infeſt thoſe countries, and had given Herod ſo much trouble to ſuppreſs.

(33) Pſ. lxix. 21. (34) Vid. a verſ. 22. ad. fin.

forbear reviling him, till one of them, ſtung at laſt with ſome lively remorſe, gave his fellow-ſufferer a ſevere rebuke for his impiety, then addreſſing himſelf to the ſuffering Jeſus, who was then, more than ever, touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and ſympathizing with his torments and agonies; in the humbleſt terms confeſſed his own guilt; and in that pathetic and glorious confeſſion he made of him, whilſt under the ſame ſhameful ſentence and puniſhment, gave ſuch a ſignal inſtance of his faith and piety, as no age of the chriſtian church ſince that time could ever parallel (B); and for which he received this comfortable aſſurance, from him that had the keys of life and death, This day ſhalt thou be with me in paradiſe [l].

The penitent thief forgiven.

WHILST Jeſus hanged on the croſs, he beheld his ſorrowful virgin mother ſtanding by, on whom was now verified the ſaying of old Simeon, that a ſword ſhould pierce her very ſoul; and with her ſtood his beloved diſciple, with Mary Magdalen, and ſome other women, The ſight of her grief, which muſt be ſuppoſed to be beyond expreſſion at this diſmal juncture, revived his tenderneſs for her; ſo that, being now come to the laſt period of his life, he recommended her to the care of that favourite diſciple, entreating them to ſhew to each other from thenceforward the endearing duties of mother and ſon; and from that time John took her to his own houſe [m]. In the mean tlme, a horrid darkneſs overſpread the face of the earth; the ſun hid, as it were, himſelf from ſo diſmal

[l] Luke ibid. 39. & ſeq. [m] John xix. 25, & ſeq.

(B) This remarkable circumſtance is the more worthy being obſerved in all its parts, becauſe many a wicked perſon have flattered themſelves with a dangerous notion, that ſome ſuch ſhort ejaculation at their laſt agonies will meet with the like ſucceſs, though in every other particular quite oppoſite to him.

He ſees Jeſus rejected and condemned by his whole nation, who had been witneſſes of his ſtupendous works; ſentenced by the Romans; reviled by the Jewiſh prieſts and elders; forſaken by his own diſciples; undergoing a moſt ignominious and excruciating death; and yet, under all thoſe diſadvantageous circumſtances, acknowledges him a King, a Saviour, and a Lord. He proclaims the unrighteouſneſs of his ſentence, and the juſtice of his own: he declares his faith and hope in him; his belief of another life; and ſo ſubmiſſive is he under his torments, that, inſtead of praying to be delivered from them, either by ſome miracle, or by a ſpeedy death, his extreme humility will not ſuffer him to aſk for more than a bare remembrance of him, when he came into his kingdom.

diſmal a ſight (C); all the ſpectators were ſeized with a ſudden terror and amazement. Some returned to Jeruſalem, ſmiting their breaſts, and proclaiming him a righteous man, whilſt the reſt, more hardened, ſtood in a kind of mournful ſilence, expecting the event. This unnatural darkneſs and diſorder, which laſted from the ſixth to the ninth hour, that is, from noon to three of the clock after it, was followed by a greater, when Jeſus, quite ſpent with pain and anguiſh, cried out, Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachtani (D); and having taſted

(C) This darkneſs was the more miraculous, becauſe it happened in the time of the oppoſition of the two luminaries, when conſequently there could be no eclipſe of the ſun. For we have formerly obſerved, that the paſſover began in the full moon *; beſides, the total darkneſs of the ſun's eclipſes laſt but at moſt twelve or fifteen minutes; whereas this is recorded to have laſted three full hours (35). Whether it reached the whole hemiſphere, or only the land of Judæa, is not eaſily determined, the antient fathers being divided about it. Origen and ſome others confined it to the latter (36), whilſt others (37) extend it over the former. Theſe quote the famous aſtronomer Phlegon, the freed-man of the emperor Adrian, who affirms, that in the fourth year of the CCII olympiad, which is ſuppoſed to be that of the death of Chriſt, there was ſuch a total eclipſe of the ſun at noon-day, that the ſtars were plainly to be ſeen. It has indeed been diſputed, whether this year of Chriſt's crucifixion anſwered to that of the olympiad above mentioned; and what is there of this nature that ſome bold critics will not diſpute? but we ſhall refer our readers for a fuller view of the controverſy to the learned doctor Dawſon's diſſertation on that ſubject. Tertullian, in his uſual elegant way, refers the heathens to their public records for this ſupriſing phœnomenon, wherein midnight happened at noon-day (38). And Suidas introduces Dionyſius the Areopagite, then at Heliopolis in Egypt, expreſſing himſelf to his friend Apollophanes concerning this unnatural eclipſe; that either the Author of nature ſuffered, or was ſympathiſing with the ſufferer.

(D) Or, which is more probable, repeated the whole twenty-ſecond pſalm, of which thoſe are the title, or firſt words, and in which there are the moſt lively ſtrokes of all the remarkable particulars of his paſſion; ſome of which we have already quoted, others we have elſewhere explained in a manner wholly new, and yet ſatisfactory, as we have found, to many of our readers †. The word

* Vol. ii. p. 572. & vol. iii. p. 185. & ſeq. (35) Vid. Matth. xxvii. 45. (36) In Matth. ubi ſupra. & alii. (37) Jul. African. ap. Syncel. Euſeb. in chronic. Hieron. & al. (38) Apolog. c. 21 † Vid vol. iii. p. 228. in fin. (Z).

ed the mingled vinegar, which was offered to imbitter his laſt gaſp, recommended his ſpirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, and in an agony of prayer yielded up the ghoſt.

For

word שבקתני, ſabachtani, here uſed, inſtead of the Hebrew, עזבתני, hazabthani, ſhews, that it was quoted out of the Chaldee paraphraſe, which was then the moſt in uſe, and in which alone that word is to be found (39). So that he ſeems here to have, as it were, reminded his heavenly Father, how he was now fulfilling all thoſe prophecies contained in that pſalm, which is a kind of epitome or ſummary of all the other oracles relating to his ſufferings and death. In conſequence of which, he was praying to him that he would make good to him and to his ſpiritual poſterity, that is, to his church; all thoſe gracious promiſes, which are contained in the lattet part of the ſame pſalm, from the twenty-ſecond verſe to the end.

The Jews therefore, who knew that there was no other way then, to quote either a pſalm, or any other ſection of the holy writ, but from the firſt words of it, as we have elſewhere ſhewn, might have ſaved their invectives againſt Chriſt, as if he had been then ſeized with a kind of deſpair (40), and objecting to him the words of the pſalmiſt, I never ſaw the righteous forſaken, &c. (41) Our commentators might likewiſe have ſaved themſelves the trouble of accounting for this ſeemingly deſpairing expoſtulation, from this ſuppoſition, that the Deity had wholly withdrawn every ſpark of comfort and hope from him, whilſt he was thus undergoing the puniſhment due to ſin; ſome of whom have carried it to ſuch a height, as cannot be read without horror (42). Whereas the ſuppoſition above-mentioned, that he was then repeating this noble pſalm, which, after the capitulation of his unparallelled ſufferings, concludes with the moſt comfortable promiſes both to him and his followers; ſhews him to have been ſo far from either doubt or deſpair, that he comforted himſelf under the terrible weight of the former by the aſſured proſpect of the latter. And that he really died in this godlike temper of mind, all the other circumſtances of his paſſion and death, as well as his laſt dying ejaculations, and the noble teſtimony which the centurion gave of it, do plainly ſhew.

And here we beg leave to make one remark more on the elaborate metrical verſion, mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, wherein that learned prelate, ſpeaking of the pſalm we are now upon, thinks to have found in it ſuch difference of ſtyle, matter, &c. that he cannot forbear ſuppoſing they are two different pſalms,

(39) Vid. Munſt. in Pſ. xxii. note b. Prid. connect. part. 2. l. 8. ſub an. A. C. 27. (40) שוחד טוף & al. comment. in Pſal. (41) Pſal. xxxvii. 24, 25, & alib. (42) Vid. inter al. Calvin. in loc. & inſtitut.

The ſtrange prodigies which happened at his death.

For immediately upon his expiring, the frame of nature fell as it were, into convulſions: the earth quaked, the rocks were pſalms, abſurdly tacked together by the Jews, and which ought to be divided at the twenty-ſecond verſe above-mentioned, where a kind of new theme ſeems to begin,

But, with due ſubmiſſion to his lordſhip's great judgment, we think this difference of ſtyle, &c. highly conſiſtent with the two-fold deſign of it, the one to foretel the great humiliation of Chriſt, and the other to ſhew his glorious exaltation immediately following it (43). The ſubject of thoſe two prophecies being vaſtly different, it could hardly be otherwiſe, but the ſtyle muſt be ſo likewiſe. We may add, that the fifty-third chapter of Iſaiah, which runs almoſt parallel in both theſe caſes, and is allowed by all chriſtians, as it was once by the antient Jews, to relate to the Meſſiah (44), might be as properly divided into two, as this pſalm; which yet never came into any man's head, on account of that difference, or any other. No not even into that of the Jews, though ſo cloſely pinched by it, that they have even ventured to ſplit the perſon here ſpoken of into two.

Before we diſmiſs this noble pſalm, we beg leave to anſwer an objection which the latter raiſe againſt our reading in the ſixteenth verſe, כארי caru, they pierced my hands, &c, inſtead of כארי caare, which they pretend is the true reading, and ſignifies like a lion, as if the meaning had been, my hands and feet, like thoſe of a lion; (to which they were forced to add to make it ſenſe,) were watched or obſerved. And this exchange of the latter for the former they do not ſcruple to charge us with, as done deſignedly by the ſacred hiſtorian (45).

As we have no manuſcript of ſo old a date as to be able to decide the matter on either ſide, it might be a ſufficient anſwer to obſerve to them the unlikelihood, that St. Matthew, who was a converted Jew, and wrote in a language ſo well underſtood by the whole nation, ſhould dare to quote a paſſage ſo contrary to its received reading and ſenſe, if theirs had really been the right one.

We might tell them farther, that by their own confeſſion the ſeptuagint verſion had altered the ſenſe of ſeveral texts of ſcripture, which they thought looked derogatory of either their lawgiver, or of the Meſſiah. Of this laſt nature was the changing of the words of the text, Mine ears haſt thou bore, for a body haſt thou prepared for me. Concerning which we have ſpoken more fully in our third volume ‡; to which we might add, that Juſtin Martyr

(43) De hoc vid. Philip. ii. 8, & 9. (44) Vid. int. al. Mori Diatrib. in Iſai. liii. præf. & not. paſſ. & paralleliſm. int. loc. & nov. teſt. ſcript. (45) Vid. int. al. Auct. lib. Nitzachon. ‡ Pag. 210. not. (N).

were cleft aſunder, the graves opened, the dead raiſed; and the veil, which covered the moſt holy place, was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, uncovering thereby thoſe myſteries of the Moſaic diſpenſation, which had now in his death their full accompliſhment; in token of which he broke out in his laſt agonies with thoſe ſignal words, It is finiſhed. Here the centurion and infidel ſoldiers, obſerving his meek and pious exit, and the miraculous circumſtances which attended it, were ſtruck with ſuch admiration and dread, that they confeſſed him to be the ſon of God [n]. Not ſo did the Jewiſh prieſt and elders, who remained inflexible in ſpite of all

[n] Matth. xxvii. 50, & ſeq.

Martyr charges them (46) with having made many other more conſiderable alterations, and in particular with having expunged the words ἀπο τȣ ξυλȣ out of the tenth verſe of the ninety-ſixth pſalm, when both that verſion and the antient Latin one made from it, called Vetus Itala, read, Dicite in gentibus, Dominus regnavit á ligno; which laſt words are likewiſe to be ſeen in ſome other verſions in the ſame tongue (47); and is it not more reaſonable to think, that when the old Mazorites came to find what uſe was made of this text againſt them, they might at firſt ſlide the word כארי in the margin, or keri, and by degrees change that into ketib; than to ſuppoſe an evangeliſt to be guilty of ſuch a manifeſt and wilful corruption. Thoſe who are unacquainted with the terms of keri and ketib; may ſee what we have ſaid of them at the beginning of this chapter *.

But let the words have ſlipped in or out of the text as they will, as long as they own that כארי is the true reading, it will be ſufficient to anſwer them with the learned Hottinger, in his diſſertation on that word, that it may as well be the participle כרי, and ſo ſignify as properly piercing, the א being there euphonical or heemantic; in which caſe the ſenſe will run ſtill more elegant and agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, which often uſes the participle for the verb, piercing my hands and my feet; whereas, take the caari in the Jewiſh ſignification, the ſenſe is imperfect, and muſt be ſupplied with a far-fetched verb, to make it intelligible.

However, we are far enough from allowing this laſt to be the true antient reading; the contrary has been fully proved from the ſeptuagint verſion, which read it as we do, Caru; and from the confeſſion of ſeveral rabbis, as the reader may ſee, among many more, in the two learned authors quoted in the margin (48).

(46) Dialog. cont. Tryph. (47) Vid. Orig. hexapl. in loc. Pſalter. pentaglot. Auguſt. in Pſ. in loc. * Pag. 31. (Z). (48) Bochart. hieroz. p. 1. l. iii. c. 6. Hare in Pſ. xxii. note 35.

all theſe prodigies, and purſued their malice to the utmoſt, and without the leaſt relenting. It was now paſt three of the clock, the time in which the evening lamb was daily offered up; and this was the eve of their ſabbath, and of one of their grand feſtivals; that the ſolemnity of it therefore might not be ſullied or diſturbed by the hanging of the three bodies on the croſs [o], they went to beg of Pilate, that he would order their legs to be broke, and that they might be taken down, and carried off. This was immediately executed on the two criminals; but when they came to Jeſus, and found him already dead, they broke not his legs, but one of the ſoldiers, ſeemingly out of wantonneſs, ſtruck his lance into his ſide, which immediately iſſued forth water and blood. Theſe laſt circumſtances happened, not without a peculiar direction of providence, not only as they fully aſſured us of his being really dead, but as they verified two ſignal prophecies concerning him; the one, that not a bone of his ſhould be broken [p]; and the other, that they, the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, ſhould behold him whom they had pierced [q].

WHILST theſe things were tranſacting on mount Calvary, Joſeph of Arimathea (E), a wealthy and honourable Jewiſh ruler, and a ſecret diſciple of Jeſus, but yet of ſuch courage and integrity, as to proteſt againſt their violent and unjuſt proceedings againſt him, went boldly to Pilate, and begged leave to take down and bury his ſacred remains. Pilate at firſt could ſcarcely believe that he could be ſo ſoon dead, but being aſſured of it by the centurion, he readily granted his requeſt. Joſeph had Chriſt embalmed and buried.

[o] De hoc vid. Deut. xxi. 22, & ſeq. & Vol. iii. p. 338, & ſeq. [p] Vid. Exod. xii. 46. Numb. ix. 12, & alib. [q] Zechar. xii. 10. Conf. cum John xix. 36, & ſeq.

(E) The ſame which is called in the ſacred Hebrew books Ramah, and Ramathah, and ſignifies a high place; and this is the reaſon why we meet with ſeveral of the ſame name, which have been confounded one with another. This therefore here ſpoken of by the evangeliſts, and which St. Jerom places between Joppa and Lydda (49), and ſome modern travellers on an eminence between the former and Jeruſalem, being conſequently on the weſt of that metropolis, was very different from Ramathaim Zophim, Samuel's native place which was ſituate on the north of it. As the reader may ſee by comparing Saul's journey, in ſearch of his father's aſſes (50), with the map of Paleſtine (1.)

(49) Epitaph. in Paul. (50) 1 Sam. ix. 4, & ſeq. (1) Vid. Rel. Palæſt.

had a garden adjoining to the place, in which he had hewn a new tomb in the rock, which he designed for himself, but was now by a particular providence better disposed of, and was made the repository of his masters body. We have formerly observed in what manner criminals that died by the hands of justice were to be buried apart †; but, in reconding him in this maiden grave, they seem to have fulfilled another signal prophecy in the same chapter of Isaiah, where the history of his sufferings is so lively represented, that where this remarkable circumstance is foretold, that though he was numbered (in his death) with the transgressors, yet he should have his grave among the great or wealthy [r]. Nicodemus, another of his private disciples, assisted at the doleful rite; and these two having hastily embalmed the body with a large quantity of myrrh and aloes, and wrapped it in a new winding sheet, deposited it into this new sepulchre, wherein no corps had as yet been laid; and covered the mouth of it with a large stone, not to be removed but by a good number of hands; after which they went to prepare themselves for the celebration of the ensuing solemnity [s]. In the mean while, the jealous Jews went to Pilate, and acquainted him, that Jesus, whom they there style this deceiver, had formerly boasted, that he would rise again on the third day; and that it was therefore highly necessary to have his tomb well guarded till then, lest his disciples should privately steal him away, and then give out, that he was really risen, which would make the last mistake more dangerous than the first. Pilate easily agreed to what they asked, and, to prevent any imposition of that kind, told them, Ye have a guard (F); go ye therefore and make every thing as sure as you can. So they went and set a guard at the door of the sepulchre

His tomb sealed and guarded.

† See Vol. iii. p. 341, & seq.

[r] Isaiah liii 9. Vid. Mor. diatrib. in loc. & parallel. in fin.

[s] Matth. xxvii. 57, & seq. Mark xv. 42, &c. Luke xxiii 50, &c. John xix. 38, & seq.

(F) We think there is here a material circumstance, which has hitherto past unobserved, and which still more secures the truth of Christ's resurrection. viz. his tomb being guarded, not by a Roman, but a Jewish watch. The former might have been liable to suspicion, and these Pagan soldiers, little minding whether the Jews or Christ's disciples were most in the right, might have been bribed by the latter to countenance an attempt to impose on a whole nation, which they hated and despised. But a Jewish guard, or as they are elsewhere called, the officers and band of the ſepulchre, and ſet their ſeal upon the ſtone [t]; and, by their extraordinary care to prevent any private attempt, made the truth of his reſurrection appear in the ſtronger light, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection.

[t] Matth. xxvii. 62. ad fin.

the high-prieſts (2), and were perhaps the ſame who had ſo lately brought him from the garden into that pontiff's palace, where they had made him ſuffer ſo many indignities, theſe, we ſay, could not be ſuppoſed to join in ſuch a cheat.

Now this ſeems to be the reaſon why Pilate, who by his late behaviour ſeems to have entertained a much higher notion of Chriſt, might now be ſo apprehenſive of his keeping his promiſe, that to prevent all ſuſpicion from him or his ſoldiers, he tells the Jewiſh chiefs, You have a guard of your own; make the beſt uſe you can of it. We do not, however, pretend to inſinuate, that they were permitted by the Romans to keep any troops of militia of their own; but only, that ſince the high-prieſthood had been joined to the royalty in the time of the Maccabees, they uſed to have a conſiderable body of life-guards, it is more than probable, that, after theſe two dignities were parted, the pontiffs were ſtill allowed the ſame, though perhaps in a leſs number, or elſe it will be difficult to gueſs what to make of thoſe ſoldiers and officers of the high prieſt, which are ſo often met with in the goſpels and in the acts.

(2) Vid. John xviii. 3. Conf. cum. vii. 32, 45. Matth. xxvi. 47. Mark xv. 43. Acts iv. 1, & alib.

SECT. VII.

The hiſtory of the Jews, from Chriſt's reſurrection to the total deſtruction of their city and temple, and diſperſion of that people.

WE have hitherto ſeen Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God in his loweſt humiliation, deſpiſed, rejected, and abhorred; perſecuted, tried, and condemned to a death of utmoſt ſhame and ignominy; expiring on a croſs and laid in a grave, and in all theſe reſpects in the loweſt and moſt abject condition of a man. The third day after his death, being the firſt day of the week, or our Sunday, and the fifth of April [a], offers him to our view in his glorified ſtate, and riſen again from Chriſt riſes from the dead.

[a] Vid. Uſſer. ann. ſub A. M. 4036, p. 843.

from the dead, according to his own promiſes, and the oracles written of old concerning him [b]. By the earlieſt dawn of this day, thoſe pious women, who had accompanied him through his laſt three years travels, and had prepared a coſtly mixture to embalm his body, not dreaming at leaſt of his ſo ſudden reſurrection, made their way towards the place, where they had ſeen him depoſited two days before. They do not ſeem to have known any thing of a guard being ſet over it, their great concern was only how to get the ponderous ſtone rolled from the entrance. But that obſtacle was already taken off by a miraculous earthquake, which had likewiſe put the guards to flight, ſo that at their arrival they found the ſtone rolled on one ſide, and an angel cloathed in a refulgent array ſitting upon it. Their ſurprize was ſtill greater, when they heard the heavenly meſſenger reprove their officious, but untimely, piety, in words to this effect: Why ſeek ye the living among the dead, forgetful of what he often repeated to you, that he was to ſuffer death, and to riſe again on the third day? Behold the place where he was laid, and from which he is riſen, and go and acquaint his diſciples with it, and tell them, that he will meet you in Galilee according to his promiſe. They did ſo accordingly, and, with the greateſt joy and wonder, went and told them what they had ſeen and heard; but thoſe, ſtill backward to believe, looked upon it as the effects of fancy and deluſion [c].

The angel's ſpeech to the women.

Two of them, however, had the curioſity to run to the ſepulchre: John, who was the youngeſt of the two, came firſt; and ſtooping down found, that the body was really gone; but when Peter came next, he went into the place along with that beloved diſciple, and to their ſurprize found the grave-cloaths and the napkin, not haſtily and confuſedly thrown by, but neatly folded up ſeparately; upon which they began to entertain ſome hopes, and returned to acquaint the reſt with the news [d]. Whilſt they were thus together, and the women with them, Mary Magdalen, who had ſtayed in the garden, prying about to find whether the body had not been removed to ſome other place; came haſtily to them, and aſſured them, that the Lord had appeared to her there [e]. But neither could this further confirmation diſpell either their ſorrow or unbelief; till Jeſus at length came and ſhewed himſelf ſelf to them, gave them a gracious All hail, and bid them be of good comfort, for he was alive again, and, according to his promiſe, would ſhortly meet them in Galilee. In the mean time, the frighted guards, leaving the garden with utmoſt ſpeed and confuſion, went to acquaint the chief-prieſts and rulers with what had happened; upon which a council was immediately called. Here one might have reaſonably expected, they would either have yielded to ſo much evidence, or at leaſt ſuſpend all further reſolutions, till they had made a full enquiry into the fact. But inſtead of that, they rather choſe at any rate to ſuppreſs a truth, which was ſure to caſt the deepeſt guilt on their late unjuſt ſentence againſt Chriſt [f]; and accordingly bribed the watch with a good round ſum, to give out, that his diſciples had ſtolen him away whilſt they were aſleep, promiſing them at the ſame time, that if the matter came to the governor's ears, they would find means to pacify him, and bear them harmleſs. Upon which they went and ſpread abroad that report, which was readily ſwallowed by the greateſt part of the Jews, and went ſtill current among them for many years [g] (A).

[b] Conf. Pſalm xvi. 10. & Act. ii. 31. & alib. [c] Matth. xxviii 1, & ſeq. Mark xvi. 1, & ſeq Luke xxiv. 1, & ſeq. John xx. 1, & ſeq. [d] John ibid. verſ 3, & ſeq. [e] Ibid. verſ. 15, & ſeq.

On that evening, two of the diſciples going to a village called Emmaus, diſtant about ſixty furlongs, or eight miles north-weſt of Jeruſalem, were diſcourſing with each other about the ſtrange tranſactions of the day, when Jeſus overtook them, and without making himſelf known, aſked them the cauſe of their melancholy entertainment. Cleophas, one of the two, in a kind of ſurprize, that he ſhould ſeem ſo great a ſtranger to the tranſactions of the laſt week, began to give him an account both of them and of thoſe of that day; particularly [f] Vid. int. al. Acts v. 28. [g] Matth. xxviii. 9. & ſeq.

(A) So ſays the evangeliſt (1). But the Jews have ſince found out another way to oppoſe this ſignal truth, by denying that of his crucifixion, under pretence, that it was a puniſhment unuſual and unwarranted among them. We have had frequent occaſion to mention this and ſome others of their poor and ſhameful evaſions, and ſhall not repeat them here.

Much leſs ſhall we take upon us to anſwer all the cavils which our modern ſceptics have raiſed againſt this important article, which has been ſo ſtrenuouſly defended by ſo many abler hands, and more particularly of late by a very learned pen, and in a manner wholly new, but ſo convincing, that nothing need be added to it (2), as indeed nothing has, or can be, replied to it.

(1) Matth. xxviii. 15. (2) Trial of the witneſſes, paſſ.

particularly their ſurprize at the viſion, which the women had ſeen at the ſepulchre, concluding the whole with a kind of complaint, that though they had hitherto looked upon Jeſus as the future deliverer of their unhappy nation; yet it being now three days ſince they had ſeen him expire on a ſhameful croſs, their hopes were almoſt at an end, in ſpite of the women's report of his reſurrection, and its being in ſome meaſure confirmed by ſome of the apoſtles, who had been that morning at the ſepulchre. Here Jeſus took occaſion to blame their want of faith, not only in him, but in the ſcriptures, where both his ſufferings and death, reſurrection and glory, were ſo plainly foretold, and to give them a thorough expoſition of them from the firſt to the laſt. By this time they were got to the village, where Jeſus made a ſhew as if he deſigned to go farther; but they had been ſo comforted by his diſcourſe, that they entreated him to ſpend that night with them; the evening been then juſt upon cloſing. He went in with them accordingly, and, being ſat down at table, began with the breaking of the bread, as he had been wont to do; upon which they knew him, and he immediately vaniſhed. This ſurprizing diſcovery, added to the warmth which their hearts had felt, whilſt he expounded the ſcriptures to them on the road, would not ſuffer them to tarry longer there; but they went to communicate their joy that very night to the reſt, that were then gathered together at Jeruſalem, and who acquainted them at the ſame time with his having appeared unto them [h].

Appears to the twelve at ſupper.

All theſe circumſtances had been ſo far from convincing them hitherto, that they rather concluded, from his ſo ſudden diſappearing, that they had only ſeen ſome ſpirit in his likeneſs. They ſeemed ſtill more confirmed in it, when being ſat down to ſupper, with the gates faſt for fear of the Jews, he ſurprized them with his preſence, and gave them his uſual ſalutation, Peace be to you. To convince them therefore of their miſtake, he commanded them to draw near, and conſider his pierced hands and feet, handle his body, and ſatisfy themſelves by all proper means, that he was no ſpirit, or phantaſm, but their real riſen lord and maſter. Whilſt they were ſtill fluctuating between joy and doubt, he reminded them of his former promiſes, explained thoſe oracles to them, in which theſe things were preſignified of him, renewed his former commiſſion and power to them to preach and confirm his goſpel, and left them for that night with his uſual bleſſing, full [h] Luke xxiv. 13, & ſeq.

full of joy and wonder, to collect and compare the ſeveral tranſactions of that glorious and ſignal day [i] (B).

THOMAS, one of the eleven apoſtles, called Didymus, chanced to be abſent when this happened; ſo that when the reſt informed him of it, he plainly told them, that he ſhould never believe it, till he had thruſt his fingers into the print of the nails, and his hand into his wounded ſide. Eight days after, being the twelfth of April, Jeſus appeared again unto them, when Thomas was there, and invited him to come and take that full demonſtration, which he had ſo ſtifly inſiſted on; but the incredulous ſervant, being now fully aſſured without it, fell at his gracious feet, and, with an humble ecſtaſy of joy, confeſſed him to be his Lord and his God; upon which he was diſmiſſed with this gentle reproof; Thou believeſt, Thomas, becauſe thou haſt ſeen; but bleſſed are they that have not ſeen, and yet believe [k]. Some days after, they all left Jeruſalem, and went according to his appointment into Galilee; where he appeared again unto them, and, after his uſual ſalutation, ſaid unto them, All power is given me in heaven and earth. Go therefore and preach to all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, &c. [l] Seven of them being ſoon after gone to the ſea-ſide to fiſh, namely Peter, John, James, Thomas, Bartholomew, or Nathanael, and two others not named, and having toiled all night in vain, Jeſus manifeſted himſelf again to them in the morning, by the kind and known token of a beneficial miracle; and, after they had dragged their loaded net to the ſhore, condeſcended to eat and drink with them. After breakfaſt, Jeſus addreſſing himſelf to Peter, aſked, whether he loved him more than the reſt? and being anſwered in the affirmative, commanded him to feed his flock. He repeated the ſame queſtion twice more to him, inſomuch, that Peter, being grieved at it, broke out into this expreſſion; Lord, thou, who knoweſt all things, muſt know that I love thee. After this Appears to Thomas.

To ſeven others.

[i] Luke xxiv. 34, & ſeq. John xx. 19, & ſeq. & alib. [k] John ibid, verſ. 24, & ſeq. [l] Matth. xxviii. 16, & ſeq.

(B) This laſt was the fifth appearance he made of himſelf on this one day, viz. 1. to Mary Magdalen; 2. to the other woman; 3. to Peter, in ſome manner not plainly recorded, but mentioned tranſitorily by St. Luke and St. Paul (3); 4. to the two diſciples; and 5. to the whole college at ſupper.

(3) Luke xxiv. 34. 1 Corinth. xv. 5.

His commiſſion to Peter.

this treble confeſſion of his unfeigned love, deſigned probably as a kind of expiation for his treble denial of him, Jeſus plainly told him, that the time would come, when he ſhould make a much more authentic acknowledgment of him, when he ſuffered himſelf to be bound and led to a glorious martyrdom for his ſake, and in imitation of him, intimating thereby, as the evangeliſt hints, his crucifixion, by which he was to glorify God, as he did accordingly many years after, with a conſtancy becoming a chief apoſtle (C), This was the

(C) The ſufferings and martyrdom of the primitive preachers of the goſpel being not only an irrefragable teſtimony of their ſincerity, as well as aſſurance of the facts and truths delivered by them, but moreover one of the higheſt inſtances of the divine wiſdom and power, which was to be diſplayed in the propagation of it (4); it will not be amiſs to ſpeak a little more fully of them, in this place, and upon this occaſion; ſince the thread of this chapter will not permit us to follow them into thoſe foreign countries, where they ſealed it with their blood.

Whoever conſiders what a ſtrenuous oppoſition the degenerate world has always made to chriſtianity, muſt own, that whatever fate had attended the preachers of it, was ſure to be turned into an objection againſt it. Were they encouraged, admired, and careſſed, or did their charitable labour meet with ſuitable returns; no wonder, would it have been ſaid, they are ſo zealous and indefatigable to propagate a goſpel, which turns ſo much to their credit and advantage. Were they deſpiſed, abhorred, perſecuted, and liable to the moſt ſhocking diſcouragements, how inconſiſtent would it have been thought with the divine goodneſs and juſtice, to ſuffer ſuch faithful, zealous, and charitable ſervants to be thus treated by thoſe, whom their chief ſtudy and deſign was to render the moſt happy perſons both here and hereafter; or to permit men of ſuch excellent and godlike diſpoſitions to be expoſed to the barbarous fury of the very vileſt of human race!

What medium the moſt conſummate human forecaſt could have found out between theſe two caſes, we may well be at a loſs to imagine. But here it was, that infinite wiſdom and power triumphed in ſuch a manner, as was once more to confound the moſt wiſe and prudent of the world. And this was done, by creating, as it were, ſuch a new nature in thoſe primitive profeſſors of the goſpel, as ſhould not only render them inſenſible of, but even capable of receiving the moſt ecſtatic comforts in the moſt excruciating torments, to which they were going to be expoſed. By this, the objections of worldly gain on their part, or of the third time of his appearing to the full body of his diſciples after his reſurrection. After that prediction, Jeſus bid Peter come after him; who turning about and ſeeing the beloved diſciple, asked his maſter, whether he would have him alſo follow him? But Jeſus rebuked his untimely curioſity, with telling him, if I will have him tarry till I come, what have you to do with it? hence aroſe a ſtrange notion among the reſt, that that diſciple ſhould not die [m]; though, in all probability, Chriſt meant no more than his tarrying on earth, till his coming to take vengeance on the Jewiſh nation, which St. John actually lived to ſee totally diſperſed.

(4) Conf. Iſai. xxix. 14. 1 Cor. i. 19, & ſeq.

THUS

[m] John xx. per tot.

of injuſtice on God's, were fully obviated; whilſt the amazed world beheld them moſt calm, ſerene, and joyful, when, to all human appearance, they laboured under the heavieſt loads of pain, and miſery.

This miraculous change once wrought in them, they are no more the cowards that forſook their maſter, or ſhut their doors for fear of the Jews; but in the ſynagogues, the ſtreets, and even to the face of death, freely confeſs and preach him (5). Peter, who through fear of the danger of being his, had thrice denied and forſworn him, can now ſleep as calmly and ſoundly in a dungeon, with his hands and feet loaded with irons, and on the eve, as he thought, and Herod deſigned, of his martyrdom, as if he had been in his own bed, and out of all danger (6). Paul and Silas, after having been unmercifully ſcourged, are thruſt down into the loweſt hold of a common gaol, and are heard by all the priſoners to ſing pſalms and hymns in the middle of the night (7).

In a word, this ſurprizing change was not confined to the apoſtles, diſciples and preachers of the goſpel, much leſs to the infancy of it, but extended itſelf to their proſelytes of all ranks, ages, ſexes, conditions, and countries, during near three hundred years, if not much beyond. All which is a ſubject ſo well known and atteſted, not only by the primitive fathers and apologiſts; the former of whom, ſealing the truth with their blood, and the latter, moreover, appealing to the records of their enemies and the notoriety of the facts, muſt conſequently be allowed unexceptionable witneſſes; but likewiſe the very heathen authors themſelves, who ſeemed as much to deſpiſe them for their folly, as they were aſtoniſhed at their univerſal conſtancy; ſo that it would be ſuperfluous to inſiſt longer upon it.

We

(5) Vid. Act. ii, iii; & ſeq. paſſ. (6) Ibid. xii. 3. & ſeq.
(7) Ibid. xvi. 23, & ſeq.

THUS did our riſen Saviour manifeſt himſelf, either to his whole church, or to ſome of them more particularly, during the ſpace of forty days, in all-convincing proofs; inſtructing them ſtill further in his heavenly doctrine, diſcourſing more familiarly with them of his ſpiritual kingdom, diſpelling their doubts, allaying their fears, and comforting their hearts with the glorious proſpect of an eternal life to crown their painful and arduous race. At length, the appointed time of his departure drawing near, he gathered them together, to the number, as St. Paul tells us, of above five hundred [n]. He led them into a retired part of a mountain, where he again gave them freſh aſſurances of his never-failing love, care, and protection, to the end of the world, renewed his commiſſion and miraculous powers to them, together with the promiſe of a plentiful effuſion of his Holy Spirit to direct them into all truth, and fit them for their glorious work, the converſion of the world [o].

HAVING

[n] 1 Corinth. xv. 6. [o] Mark xvi. 17. ad fin.

We are not inſenſible indeed, how much the innumerable inſtances of this kind, which we meet with in the later hiſtories of Socrates, Sozomen, and others, have been thought exaggerated, and what little credit thoſe writers have of late among us. The ſtory of a Laurence throwing his ſarcaſtical jeſts on his judges and executioners, whilſt broiling on a gridiron, has been thought ſo monſtrouſly abſurd and unnatural, that it has almoſt diſcredited all the reſt. We would therefore beg leave to ask theſe doubtful gentlemen, whether they would have believed that ſtory, had it been tranſmitted down to us by any, but chriſtian writers; or, which is ſtill more, by men profeſſed enemies to chriſtianity, and at the ſame time of avowed ſenſe, learning, and integrity? If they would, we hope we may be permitted to ſubjoin one here of altogether as ſurprizing a nature, and upon the authority of a perſon of the unqueſtionable character laſt mentioned.

Libanius, the famous orator of Antioch, a perſon greatly eſteemed by all for his learning and humanity, but eſpecially by the emperor Julian, as appears by their mutual literary intercourſe, is the author we are ſpeaking of (8). The ſtory he relates is of one Mark, a venerable old biſhop of Arethuſa, a city in

(8) De Liban. & ejus epiſtol. Vid. int. al. Eunap. vita Liban. Johan Chriſt. Volf. præfat. in cent. epiſt. Liban. ſophiſt. cum not. Leipſik, 1711.

HAVING finiſhed his diſcourſe, he bid them return to Jeruſalem, where he would meet them before his aſcenſion, as he accordingly did; and ordered them to remain till they had received the promiſed Comforter, by whom they ſhould ſhortly after be endowed with power from above, anſwerable to their high commiſſion. Great need they ſtill ſtood in of ſuch divine director, ſince theſe laſt words filled them again with hopes, that their maſter was now going indeed to reſtore the kingdom of Iſrael. Jeſus was here again obliged to check their untimely curioſity, but referred the further diſplay of this important point to that promiſed heavenly inſtructor. And now, having finiſhed his glorious work, he led them forth towards Bethany, to the mount of Olives; where being arrived, he tenderly gathered them about him, and, in their full in Syria between Emeſa and Epiphania; who endured the moſt exquiſite torments, under the above-mentioned emperor, not only with utmoſt conſtancy, but braved his enemies with ſuch biting ſarcaſms in the midſt of his torments, that, being at laſt overcome by his heroic behaviour, they were forced to let him down, and go off with his life, to prevent the heathen ſpectators falling down and worſhipping him. The deſign of this ſtory, as well as of the orator's letter, was, to ſtop a perſecution newly raiſed under that apoſtate monarch againſt the chriſtians, for the havock they had made of the Pagan temples under his predeceſſor's reign; and the judge to whom he writes it, had then a zealous chriſtian priſoner, named Orion, who, it was apprehended, would prove a ſecond Mark, if the ſame ſeverities ſhould be uſed againſt him, and much more, leſt the known conſtancy of the reſt ſhould cauſe an univerſal defection from paganiſm. For which reaſon Libanius, though a bitter enemy to chriſtianity, is for putting an immediate ſtop to all further perſecution.

His letters, to the number of above ſixteen hundred though preſerved in manuſcript, in ſeveral public as well as private libraries, and a good number of them printed and tranſlated into Latin (9), are yet ſo little known by our Engliſh readers, that we hope it will not be thought impertinent, if we ſubjoin here the ſubſtance both of the letter and of this ſignal ſtory; though, for the better underſtanding of it, we ſhall be forced to have recourſe to Theodoret's (10) aſſiſtance. For the ſtyle of the former is ſo intricate and laconic every-where, eſpecially where he ſpeaks

(9) Fr. Zambicar. Johan. Sommerfeld. Morel. & al. ap. Volf. ubi ſupra. (10) Hiſt. Eccl. iii. c. 7. Vid. & Sozomen. l. v. c. 10.

Aſcends into Heaven.

full ſight, went up to heaven, leaving his gracious bleſſing upon them, and the comfortable aſſurance, that he was going ſpeaks of things and facts of a recent nature and univerſally known, that without the guide of ſome other hiſtorian, one would never gueſs what he means or alludes to, becauſe he contents himſelf with the bare hint of them, as the reader may ſee by the lettter itſelf (11). We hope the curiouſneſs of the ſubject, as well as the character of the author, will excuſe the length of this note; though, to ſhorten it as much as we can, we ſhall join the account out of theſe two authors together, leaving it to our readers to compare them with each other at their own leiſure.

" Mark, the heroic biſhop in queſtion, having in the reign " of Conſtans built a chriſtian church by and on the ruins of " a Pagan temple, and being like to ſuffer for it under Julian, " endeavoured at firſt to avoid it by flight; where being inform- " ed that ſome of his dioceſe were going to be taken up for it, " he came back and ſurrendered himſelf to the heathen officers, " as the only perſon accountable for that fact. But theſe, with- " out regard to his learning, dignity, or great age, ordered him " to be ſtripped naked, and ſcourged from head to foot. From " thence he was flung into a ſtinking common-ſhore; and be- " ing taken out again, was expoſed in that condition to the " mercy of a great number of ſchool-boys, who made it their " cruel ſport to pink his fleſh with their writing inſtruments.

" All this was done to oblige him to refund the damages of " the demoliſhed temple, which when he conſtanly refuſed to " do, they beſmeared him all over with honey and a kind of " ſweet ſauce, called "garon," and hoiſted him up into the air in " a kind of net, or open basket; where, it being then the heat " of ſummer, the bees, waſps, &c. did eat him up alive. Whilſt " he hung in this dreadful condition, they offered to abate him " half of the ſtipulated ſum, thinking his refuſal owing to his " inability of paying the whole. But to their ſurpriſe, he an- " ſwered, that he ſhould think it as impious to refund a doit, as " the whole ſum. But what encreaſed their wonder beyond ex- " preſſion is, he was all this time ſo far from uttering a groan, " or ſhewing the leaſt ſenſe of pain, that he even ſeemed to " make himſelf merry with his Pagan tormentors, telling them, " that " they were from beneath, but he from above;" allud- " ing to his ſuſpenſion. The conſequence of the whole was, " that, being at length overcome by his ſupernatural conſtancy, " they let him down, and releaſed him full of the deepeſt vene- " ration and reſpect".

Now,

(11) In epiſt. lxx.

ing to prepare a place for them in his own kingdom; whilſt they, in an adoring poſture, followed him with their wiſhful eyes, till a bright cloud received him out of their ſight (D). Whilſt their eyes were thus fixed ſtill towards him, two angels appeared to them in bright apparel, and ſaid unto them, Ye men of Galilee, why ſtand ye gazing up to heaven? The ſame

Now, when a ſtory comes to us confirmed by a perſon of Libanius's character, and who was not only cotemporary to it, but ſpeaks of it with the ſame aſſurance, as if he had been an eye-witneſs of it; we know not well how that of Laurence, or any other, can be queſtioned in thoſe hiſtorians. The ſame ſophiſt adds to what Theodoret ſays, that the people were ſo aſtoniſhed at the old biſhop's conſtancy, that they worſhipped him as a god; and that when Julian heard of it, though he was vexed at the demolition of the temple, he yet choſe rather to forgive him, than to make further trial of his patience.

He concludes his letter with deſiring his friend the judge not to make of Orion his priſoner a ſecond Mark, or a ſecond Marſyas (who had been lately flayed alive.) If, ſays he, you think Orion has a golden mine in his skin, you would do well to get it out; if not, by Jupiter, you had better let him go; or if you muſt puniſh him, do it in ſuch a manner, that he may have no opportunity to make a public ſhew of his patience and conſtancy. Some have thought, that all this moderation of our orator might be owing to an apprehenſion of Julian's being ſucceeded by a chriſtian (12); but, be that how it will, it cannot invalidate the teſtimony which he gives to thoſe heroic ſufferers. However, many of his letters appear full of the ſame moderate ſpirit, in other inſtances; and the tenor of the letter above-mentioned ſhews him to have been rather afraid of the effects of the chriſtian conſtancy, which under ſuch grievous perſecutions always drew, as well it might, a great number of converts, and threatened a total dereliction of their heathen temples and worſhip.

(D) This happened, according to our learned Uſher's computation, hinted a little higher, on a Thurſday, the fourteenth of May, which is the ninth month of the Jewiſh year, and in the thirty-ſixth, or according to others, the thirty-third year of his age, and the nineteenth of Tiberius's reign. There is an antient tradition, which adds, that it was about the time of noon when he was taken up, and aſcended from one of the ſummits of mount Olivet, where the print of his feet, where he laſt ſtood, was ſtill to be ſeen, and on that account has been had in great veneration ever ſince. The reader may ſee what we have ſaid of it in a former volume †.

(12) Le Clerc. bibl. A. M. 1715. part 2. ſect. 4. † See before, vol. iii. p. 113. & ſeq ſame Jeſus, whom ye have now beheld aſcending thither, ſhall in the like manner come down again from thence [p]; meaning, doubtleſs, at the laſt day to judge the world; till when he will there remain, and reign at the right hand of his Father, till all his enemies be made his footſtool [q] (E).

THE

[p] Ibid. ver. ult. Luke xxiv. 46. ad fin. Act. i. 6, & ſeq. [q] Conf. Pſ. cx. 1. Matth. xxii. 44. Act. ii. 35. Hebr. i. 13, x. 12, 13.

(E) It will not be amiſs to cloſe this hiſtory of the Saviour of the world with thoſe other teſtimonies which we find concerning him, both in Joſephus and in ſome eminent heathen authors. We begin with the former, becauſe we have elſewhere promiſed to ſay ſomething further concerning that known and much controverted paſſage of his, which runs to this effect (13):

" At the ſame time there was one Jeſus, a wiſe man, if at " leaſt he may be called a man, who was a great worker of mi- " racles, and a teacher of truth, to all that were deſirous to " learn it, and had a great number of diſciples, both of Jews " and Gentiles. This was (or, as St. Jerom read it, credeba- " tur, was believed to be) the Chriſt, whom Pilate through the " envy of the heads of our nation, cauſed to be crucified; but " this did not hinder his diſciples from cleaving ſtedfaſtly unto " him. He was ſeen by them three days after his death, ac- " cording to the prophecies concerning him. The chriſtian " ſect ſubſiſt to this day, call themſelves by his name, and ac- " knowledge him for their head."

This paſſage being not only found in all the manuſcrips of that hiſtorian, but quoted by St. Jerom, Euſebius (14), and other antients, the main objection againſt it is, how Joſephus could expreſs himſelf in ſuch a manner concerning Chriſt, and yet live and die a Jew. To which may be added another difficulty, viz. how he could acknowledge him the promiſed Meſſiah, after he had once complimented the Roman emperor with that title (14). But thoſe who believe it to have been foiſted in by ſome pious chriſtians, will find it ſtill much more difficult to account how they could get it inſerted in all future copies, and ſuppreſs all the old and genuine ones.

Thoſe who know how much has been already writ for and againſt it, will eaſily excuſe our not entering further into that controverſy, than referring our readers to the authors themſelves, whom he will find quoted in the margin (15).

All

(13) Antiq. l. xviii. c. 4. (14) Lib. de ſcriptor. Vid. & Euſeb. eccl. hiſt. l. i. cap. 11. iii. c. 9. (15) Vid. int. al. Huet. demonſtr. evang. prop. ſect. 11. & Arnold. diſſert. de loc. ſup. an. 1661.

THE disciples, thus warned, returned immediately to Jerusalem, where they spent their time in prayers, fastings, and

All that we shall add by way of lessening the two difficulties raised against the genuineness of the text is, 1st, That Josephus was no less a courtier, than a Jew and a Pharisee; he might, as an historian, who made great shew of sincerity, be forced to publish a truth, the suppression of which would have brought his character in question, and yet not have resolution enough to sacrifice his temporal interest to his conviction. The cruel treatment which the disciples of Christ met with from Jews and Gentiles might be a sufficient obstacle, to a man of his mould, listing himself into their number. He might, and had in all probability conversed with several learned christians, who might have inspired him with a great veneration for their divine master, and, from the many prophecies concerning him, have convinced him of his being the Messiah, and at the same time, his brethren of the Pharisaic leaven might trump up their notion of a double Messiah, viz. a suffering one, and the other a great and glorious conqueror.

For no time could be more likely to produce such a wild distinction, than that about which he wrote his history, when all their hopes were wholly quashed, the sceptre long ago departed from Judah, the second temple destroyed, the nation ruined, the utmost length of their computation of Daniel's weeks long since ended, and the christians every-where beating them out of all other retrenchments, and forcing them at length to thrust themselves to this broken plank; and was not a man of Josephus's character as likely to prefer this soothing notion, to the manifest danger of becoming a professed christian, as any of his fraternity?

But, lastly, who can tell, how far the ill treatment which he met with from these last, at the siege of Jerusalem, their invincible obstinacy and ingratitude, their cruelty, hypocrisy, and irreconcileable hatred to him, may have provoked him to lay this heavy charge upon them, of crucifying the Messiah, and to aggravate it with those other testimonials concerning him, without being himself thoroughly satisfied with them, through prejudice and interest; If we join his resentment against them, and their notion of two Messiahs, with his fawning action of complimenting Vespasian with the title of Messiah, we shall find, that he acted nothing but what became such a consummate politician; and the passage above-quoted concerning Christ, and that concerning the Roman emperor, though set at that great distance from each other, to conceal his design, when brought nearer together, may amount to no more than this: Since the heads of our nation did unjustly reject and crucify the first Messiah, who ſuch-like other duties, as were likelieſt to qualify them for the reception of the promiſed Comforter. They were about a hundred and twenty perſons, probably excluſive of the women, who did not uſe to be reckoned in the number, though they kept ſtill with them, and among the reſt the virgin Mary, who is here particularly mentioned, and for the laſt time came to them in the ſpirit of meekneſs and charity, and in all reſpects anſwered the deſcription given of him by the antient prophets, it is but juſt that the ſecond, who is to be the glorious conquering one, ſhould ſignalize the premiſes of his reign, with the extirpation of thoſe unworthy wretches, and thereby fulfil the prophecies concerning himſelf, and his glorious and univerſal kingdom. All which was in a great meaſure already done before the hiſtorian wrote his two hiſtories, in the laſt of which he ſpeaks of his conference with that prince (16), and may have dreſſed it in the moſt advantageous manner to gain the applauſe of the Romans.

If therefore this text ever ſuffered any alteration, it ſeems to have been only in the omiſſion of the word "was believed," which we find was in St. Jerom's copy, though not in that of Euſebius, Rufinus, and others, where it was left out; but whether through careleſſneſs, or wilfully, muſt be left to the readers candor. And, after all, we may as well ſuſpect the great character which the Jewiſh hiſtorian gives to John the Baptiſt, and to St. James, whom he calls the brother of Chriſt (17), which yet caſt no ſmall honour to this laſt, whoſe martyrs they were.

Concerning the teſtimony of heathen writers, we have already mentioned thoſe which confirm the ſupernatural eclipſe which happened at Chriſt's paſſion and the appeal which the apologiſt fathers made to the heathen records for that and other facts. Tacitus confirms alſo Chriſt's having been put to death by Pilate governor of Judæa under the emperor Tiberius (18) We might add ſome others, were we not afraid of ſwelling this note too much. The readers may ſee them in the apologies above-mentioned, and the authors quoted in the margin (19).

For the ſame reaſon we ſhall forbear mentioning that of the Mohammedans, and all further debate on the apocryphal goſpels, epiſtles, and other writings concerning him, and all uſeleſs enquiries after his perſon, ſhape, mien, and other ſuch particularities of neither importance, nor the leaſt certainty. As for his pretended correſpondence with the king of Edeſſa, we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid in a former volume †.

(16) Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 14. v. c. 12. (17) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8. (18) Annal. l. xv. c. 44 (19) Vid. int. al. Minut. Felix. H. Grot. de verit. Le Clerc. in eund. Abadie & al. † vol. ix p. 632.

time [r], The place they uſed to aſſemble in, was a large upper room (F), where a few days after their maſter's aſcenſion, Peter addreſſed himſelf to the reſt, and reminded them how neceſſary it was, before they entered into their grand commiſſion, to chuſe a new member into the apoſtolic college, from among thoſe who had been converſant with Jeſus from John's baptiſm to that preſent time, to fill the vacancy which the traytor Judas had made to their number. The propoſal being approved, two candidates were offered to them, namely Joſeph, ſurnamed Juſtus and Barſabas (who is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the brother of James the Leſs, and by others the ſame with Barnabas), and Matthias, who was one of the ſeventy diſciples (G). After a ſhort prayer to the diſcerner of all hearts, to direct them to the perſon whom he had made choice of, they caſt their lots, and Matthias was choſen into the appoſtolical miniſtry, and their number completed again [s].

WHEN fifty days from Chriſt's reſurrection were finiſhed, which uſhered in the grand feaſt of pentecoſt, whilſt the diſciples were all aſſembled at their uſual place, ſuddenly there was hard a mighty ſound from heaven; a vehement wind filled the room they were in, when there appeared a kind of cloven tongues of fire ſitting upon each of their heads; upon The Holy Ghoſt deſcends on the apoſtles.

[r] Act i. 14. [s] Act. ibid. 15. ad fin.

(F) The words εἰς τὸ ὑπερῶον (20), do certainly imply ſome upper room of a houſe, and not of the temple, as ſome have imagined. This might be therefore that large one in which Jeſus had celebrated the laſt paſſover with his diſciples (21); and is ſuppoſed to have belonged to one of them, namely to John, ſurnamed Mark, and is ſaid to have been turned, in proceſs of time, into a ſtately church.

(G) The tradition concerning theſe two, and others of their collegues, are ſo uncertain, that there is no relying on them, otherwiſe this Joſeph ſhould be the ſame with that often mentioned in the goſpel among the relations of our Saviour; and by his ſurname of Barſabas, he ſhould be the ſame with Barnabas, who is yet ſaid to be a Cyprian levite (22). Matthias ſhould likewiſe be the ſame with Zaccheus (23), though this laſt became a diſciple but a few weeks before Chriſt's death, and the apoſtles choſe only thoſe for candidates, who had been with him from the beginning of his miniſtry.

(20) Acts xiii. (21) Mark xiv. 14, 15. (22) Acts iv. 36. (23) De his vid. Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. N. De Lyra, Corn. a Lap. & al.

upon which they were all filled with the Holy Ghoſt, illuminated with his heavenly light, inflamed with his divine heat, inſpired with the knowledge of foreign tongues, and endowed with all other ſupernatural gifts, to qualify them for their glorious taſk, the converſion of the world. They ſet themſelves immediately about it, Jeruſalem being then filled with people, who came from all parts of the world, both Jews and proſelytes, who flocked thither, as uſual, to that grand ſolemnity. Theſe, hearing of that wonderful event, came to them in great crouds, and were beyond meaſure ſurprized to hear ſuch poor illiterate Galileans, who never knew any but their own mother tongue, and that no better than as ſimple fiſhermen, expreſs themſelves with ſuch unheard-of readineſs and energy, and diſplay in all their different tongues and dialects the moſt ſublime myſteries of the goſpel. The ſacred hiſtorian mentions fifteen different countries, out of which this aſſembly conſiſted [t]. Whilſt therefore ſome, ſtruck with amazement at what they ſaw and heard, were queſtioning what the iſſue of ſuch a prodigy would be, others abſurdly attributed it to ſome exceſs of new wine, which they ſuppoſed the apoſtles had been guilty of that morning. Which when Peter underſtood, he firſt exploded the ſuppoſition, by reminding them, that is was but the third hour of the day, or nine of the morning; and then proved to them from the ſcriptures, that there was nothing happened in this extraordinary change, but what had been plainly foretold and elegantly deſcribed by one of the prophets [u]. From that he proceeded to thoſe other oracles, which had preſignified the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, the true Meſſiah; all which he ſhewed to them, with ſuch powerful and convincing eloquence, that three thouſand of his audience were immediately converted to his doctrine, and continued ſtrict and zealous profeſſors of it [w] (H).

They convert three thouſand ſouls.

Some

[t] Ibid. c. ii. 8, & ſeq. [u] Joel ii. 28, & ſeq. conf. cum Iſai. xxix. 19, & ſeq xliv. 3, & ſeq. cum Act. xi. 15, & ſeq. [w] Act, ibid. verſ. 37. ad fin

(H) Thoſe that will not acknowledge the truth of this miraculous tranſaction, muſt ſuppoſe that ſurpriſing change in the apoſtles to have been wrought by ſome ſuch method as this which follows; we leave them to their choice They muſt ſuppoſe the hen-hearted college to have been all at once ſeized with a deſperate phrentic courage, or inſpired with it by ſome one of the boldeſt

Some time after Peter and John, repairing to the temple at the uſual evening hour of prayer, healed a poor cripple, boldeſt of them, ſuppoſe the pretended champion Peter, by ſome ſuch ſpeech as this:

Men and brethren, The natural conſequence of our having been ſo egregiouſly cheated by our late maſter, and made to wait ſo long in vain for his pretended reſurrection, ſhould according to human prudence be this; that we ſhould for the future deteſt the very memory and mention of him; that we ſhould become ſo much the more tenacious of the expoſitions and traditions of our betters, ſince it was our departing from them, to follow him, that has brought us into this dilemma; and laſtly, that we ſhould go and beg for abſolution of the ſanhedrin, which they'll hardly make a difficulty to grant; for what wonder is it, that ſuch poor illiterate fiſhermen as we are ſhould be ſo eaſily deceived, when ſo many of their learned bench were caught in the ſame ſnare?

But for my own part poor and ſimple as I am, I think I could undergo the moſt dreadful hazards in life, rather than to ſtoop to ſuch a baſe ſubmiſſion, and my project, if I can but bring you into it, is to do the very reverſe; to cry our late maſter up ſtill for the true Meſſiah, to profeſs a greater love and veneration for him than ever, to affirm that we have ſeen him riſen from the dead, converſed with him full forty days, in all convincing proofs, and at length ſeen him go up to heaven; and to propagate the cheat, not only among our nation, but alſo among the Gentiles, as far and wide as we can; and, to make it the better go down with the world, we will pretend to a new and miraculous commiſſion from heaven to the ſupernatural gifts of prophecy, tongues, miracles, and every thing that is great and ſtupendous, or apt to raiſe our maſter's glory and our own.

Methinks, I hear you already making ten thouſand objections and difficulties againſt my project, which I doubt not but you look upon as the moſt romantic that ever came into a crazy brain; and I who have duly weighed them, do give you leave to think ſo ſtill, if I do not remove every one of them, and convince you that my ſcheme is no leſs practicable, than it is heroic and glorious.

You will object in the firſt place, that ſuch a deſign will expoſe us to the higheſt oppoſition and reſentment from Jews and Gentiles, to impriſonments, ſcourges, tortures, and death; I own it, and that is the reaſon of my being ſo zealous for it; and I promiſe myſelf an unconceivable pleaſure in carrying it on under all theſe difficulties and dangers. But our pretence you'll ſay, to miracles, tongues, and other ſupernatural gifts, will be a moſt effectual means to betray us, becauſe we ſhall at every turn be who ſat begging at the gate. This drew immediately a great concourſe of people about them, to the place called Solomon's ready to diſcover our want of them. Suppoſe it happen ſo; can we not ſtill face them down that we have them, though they cannot ſee them? Can't we find means to impoſe, not only upon the eyes and ears of the world, but upon the very underſtandings of the greateſt philoſophers that now reign either at Rome or Athens? Let us but reſolutely undertake, and I promiſe you, you will meet with a thouſand unexpected accidents, that will force, as it were, a ſucceſs into your very laps.

But the greateſt objection perhaps to you is, that we ſhall bring the hatred of even God himſelf, as well as of the world, upon us; we ſhall not only deprive ourſelves of all the hopes of the true promiſed Meſſiah, but of all other comforts of this or of the next life; and what a dreadful thing muſt it be to be thrown into a dungeon, or led to ſome cruel execution; abhorred by God and man, tortured by the ſting of a conſcience as black as the very hell we are haſtening to, without one poor glympſe of hope or comfort, either from within, or from without us?

There is indeed ſomething in this thought which may appear terrible to mean ſouls; but mine is above ſhrinking at ſuch bugbears, when the glorious proſpect of impoſing one of the vileſt cheats is put in the ſcale againſt it. For let our guilt be of never ſo deep a dye, and the generality of the world judge never ſo juſtly of it, yet as long as we make the greateſt boaſts to ſanctity, piety, charity, and every real virtue, and take care that our life, at leaſt outwardly, doth not bely our pretence; we ſhall ſtill meet with admirers enough to keep up our ſpirits from flagging in this noble undertaking; and who could grudge to run any dangers, or even to die, for ſuch a cauſe?

And now, methinks, I ſee you all, like me, impatient to ſally out in this heroic race; but there is ſtill one danger, againſt which I muſt warn you all. It is likely, that when we come to be diſperſed at a vaſt diſtance from each other, as we muſt be of courſe to carry on the work, ſome one of us may through fear of torments, or of ſome cruel death, be cowardly enough to diſcover the whole impoſture, in which caſe we ſhall all loſe the fruit of our labours. Our late puſillanimous behaviour, and mine in particular, to our late maſter in the garden, might indeed incline one to fear, leſt there ſhould turn out another Judas from among us. But there is ſomething within me that gives me a quite contrary notion of you all, and that you will reſolutely perſiſt in carrying on the common cauſe, and not, through any baſe fear or terror, torture or death, make ſhipwreck of that glorious deſign, to which we are going to ſacrifice all that is dear and valuable in this and the next world.

And

lomon's porch; where Peter, having reproved their ſtupidity in gazing at them, as the authors of ſo ſignal a miracle, aſſured

And therefore let me only add a few neceſſary directions to you, and then let us go and proſper: 1. It is cuſtomary for perſons of our character to be elated at every ſucceſs or applauſe, and ſunk down at every foil. We muſt act the reverſe. Never appear more joyful, lofty, and undaunted, than when you meet with the greateſt oppoſition, ſcorn, and ill treatment; nor ever more humble and abaſed, than when men are ready to fall down and worſhip you. This you know was our maſter's caſe, and we muſt, whatever we do, profeſs an utter contempt of every thing that this world is fond of, and ſeem to court nothing but poverty and miſery, croſſes and perſecutions. We may in all likelihood fare the better for it; but if we don't, we ſhall at leaſt ſave our credit, if we ſave nothing elſe.

2. It is not only natural, but ſweet, to ſuch men as we, to retaliate ill uſage, though never ſo juſtly deſerved, with ill language and ill offices, to complain of injuſtice and cruelty, and even to call for vengeance from heaven on our pretended oppreſſors. But I adviſe you, whatever betide us, to let your behaviour breathe nothing but the moſt ſurpriſing patience, meekneſs, reſignation, and charity to your worſt enemies, and, in the midſt of the moſt exquiſite racks and tortures, and even with your laſt breath, to pray to heaven for them. You'll perhaps aſk how human nature can be capable of ſuch heroic courage? But remember only your character and reputation, as apoſtles, will riſe or ſink, according as you follow this rule; and then I doubt not, but that will enable you to go through all this, and much more.

Many other ſuch-like directions will occur in the courſe of our race, which I ſhall take care to communicate to you as often as opportunity offers. But one main one I muſt not omit before we ſet about the work: for without this, you will be apt, in your preaching or writing the hiſtory of our late maſter, to aggravate every word and action of the Jews againſt him, to exclaim againſt the pretended injuſtice and impiety of the ſanhedrin for condemning him; on the baſeneſs and cowardice of Pilate in ratifying their bloody ſentence; on the cruelty of the Roman ſoldiers for their inhuman treatment of him; and on the obſtinacy and perverſeneſs of the Jews for not believing our report concerning him. And you may think yourſelves intitled to do ſo from the example of the antient prophets, of the baptiſt, and even of our maſter, who made no ſcruple to reprove our nation in the ſevereſt terms.

But I abſolutely forbid all ſuch invectives and aggravations, as derogatory to our honour, and to that hitherto unexampled plainneſs and ſimplicity, to which, I inſiſt, every one of you ſhall confine himſelf in the relation of thoſe facts without betraying the leaſt

ſured them, that they had wrought it by no other power than that of Jeſus Chriſt, whom their elders and rulers had through ignorance condemned to the croſs. He concluded with ſuch a powerful diſcourſe on the danger of an obſtinate and ungrateful unbelief, and on the unſpeakable benefits of a ſpeedy faith and repentance that five thouſand more were added to them. Thus did the new church of Chriſt daily improve, not in the number only, but in the zeal, and fervour, holineſs and charity, of its members, beginning now a kind of heavenly life upon earth, diſclaiming all property, ſelling all they had, and chearfully laying it at the apoſtles feet, to be diſtributed to the relief of their brethren; and being even in their wordly goods, as well as in their hearts and affections, ſo perfectly united, that they became the wonder of the world, even leaſt reſentment, or indeed any other emotion, but what ſhall ſeem to flow from the deepeſt concern, pity, and charity to all the actors in that ſcene. You may perhaps at firſt not be aware of the uſefulneſs and excellency of this caution; but a little experience will ſoon convince you, that nothing will preſerve or raiſe your character more. And now men and brethren, &c.

A new miracle adds five thouſand more.

We ſhall go no further with this ſuppoſed ſcene, becauſe we think it clearly appears by this time that a man muſt be capable of believing any thing, that can think it poſſible for one, or all, of theſe twelve fiſhermen to concert, much leſs to execute with ſuch ſurprizing ſucceſs and efficacy, a plot and impoſture of ſo black and helliſh a nature, under all thoſe difficulties and diſadvantages.

But here it will perhaps be pretended, that the whole ſtory of the goſpel, acts, &c. was made a long time after, and the characters, facts, and other advantageous circumſtances feigned at leiſure. But then the queſtion will be, by what miracle, inchantment, or faſcination, they could be introduced into the world, be univerſally received, believed, and atteſted by the ſeries of men of all ranks and qualities, by men of learning and probity, who ſealed thoſe truths with their blood? How and in what age or generation, after Chriſt or his apoſtles, theſe things were introduced? a ſucceſſion of prelates, preachers, and martyrs, together with a great number of their pretended writings, the decrees of councils, and other records, each quoting their predeceſſors up to the ſacred writers, foiſted in with the whole concomitant chain of evidence, which has hitherto illuded the attempts of the ſubtileſt enemies of chriſtianity? When, we ſay, the bare poſſibility of ſuch an univerſal impoſition, with all theſe circumſtances, can once be ſhewed, it will be then time enough to turn ſceptics; and if ever that ſhould prove the caſe, where we ſhall ſtop, God alone can tell.

even of their very enemies. Thus were the divine oracles fulfilled, the promiſes of Chriſt performed, and his church miraculouſly planted and propagated by that heavenly ſpirit; to continue under his direction to the end of the world, maugre all oppoſitions of Jews and Gentiles [x].

BUT the malice of the prieſts and rulers did not expire with the death of its divine author. This new and ſignal miracle on the impotent man; the number of converts it drew after; the zeal, boldneſs, and eloquence of the apoſtles all contributed to awaken their fears with their wonder, and to put them upon freſh means to ſuppreſs what they called this new and dangerous ſect. The apoſtles and the cripple were brought before them, and Peter in an elegant ſpeech aſſured them, that it was by the name and power of their great maſter, now glorioufly inthroned in heaven, that they had wrought this miraculous cure; demonſtrated to them from the ſcriptures, that he was that chief corner ſtone, which was long ſince foretold to be rejected by the builders [y], and was now become the foundation of the new covenant, ſince there was no name given under heaven, by which men might be ſaved, but that of Jeſus Chriſt, crucified indeed by them, but raiſed again by his own victorious power. The ſanhedrin, having nothing to oppoſe to theſe pregnant proofs, and yet aſhamed to be convinced, and afraid to uſe violent means, by reaſon of the admiring multitude, contented themſelves for the preſent with forbidding them to preach any more in that name; to which Peter replied, We have received a contrary command from God, and you may eaſily judge which of the two ought to be obeyed [z].

Peter's ſpeech to the ſanhedrin.

PETER, upon his return to his collegues, acquainted them with what had paſt, and the orders they had received from the Jewiſh chiefs; upon which they joined unanimouſly in prayer to God, to ſtrengthen their faith, courage, and miraculous power, that they might boldly go on in their miniſtry, and preach his crucified Son in ſpite of all oppoſition and diſcouragements; upon which they felt their upper room violently ſhaken, and their hearts inſpired with ſuch zeal, that neither threatenings nor perſecutions, racks, tortures, or cruel deaths, could put a ſtop, either to their preaching, or to its miraculous ſucceſs: for ſuch it really was, being ſtill attended with ſome

H's ſecond defence.

[x] Act. iii. 1, & ſeq. [y] Pſ. cxviii. 22. [z] Act. iii. & iv. paſſ.

some fresh miracle (I), which at once confirmed the believers, and still added fresh-ones to their number. In the mean while the sanhedrin, which consisted chiefly of Sadducees, finding their endeavours ineffectual, began to think it high time to try some severer means; and to that end ordered them to be seized, and cast into a common gaol. But, before the next morning, an angel had opened the prison gates to them, and bid them return to their preaching, which they did accordingly. By that time the council was set to determine something concerning them, word was brought to them, that the prisoners were escaped by some miracle; for that on that morning not one of them was to be met with, though the prison gates were found closely shut. Whilst they were debating about this new prodigy, the news came, that they were preaching as usual at the temple. Their fears now encreasing, with their surprize, they sent for them, yet without violence; and Caiaphas having expostulated with them, how they dared transgress their command, they boldly answered for themselves, that as obedience ceased to be due to magistrates, as soon as it began to contravene that which was due to God, they had strictly followed their duty in preaching the resurrection of Christ, and the remission of sins through him, and giving the same irrefragable proofs of those saving truths, which they themselves had of them [a].

Gamaliel's advice to the sanhedrin.

THIS noble answer, which gave them to understand, that they were not to be frighted into a base compliance, did raise their indignation to such a degree, that they were just ready to vent it in some severer manner, when Gamaliel (K), one of their

[a] Ibid. & ch. v. 17, & seq.

(I) These miracles, we are told (24), became so frequent and known by this time, that they drew multitudes of people from all the neighbouring cities and countries to Jerusalem, who brought their sick friends, paralytics, lunatics, demoniacs, &c. to be healed by the apostles. Insomuch, that the very shadow of Peter passing by cured many of them, who, by reason of the throngs that followed him, could not by any other means get access to him.

(K) This was the person at whose feet St. Paul had been brought up (25); some add also Stephen and Barnabas (26); he is affirmed by an antient writer to have been already converted to their members, a perſon of greater coolneſs, and a learned Phariſee, ſtood up, and moderated their reſentment for the preſent, by reminding them, that if this counſel was merely human, it would ſoon be cruſhed, as many others of the like nature, which he named, and they knew, had lately been; but if it was of God, it was vain, as well as impious, in them to oppoſe it. Wherefore, concluded he, my opinion is, that we let theſe men alone, and wait the event, leſt we ſhould be found at length to contend with an almighty power. His counſel was readily agreed to, and the apoſtles being called in, after having received a ſevere correction and rebuke for their contumacy, were diſmiſſed, and they joyfully rejoined their collegues [b]. About this time the tetrarch Philip, the brother of Herod, died at Julias, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his reign, from the death of Herod the Great. He was buried in a magnificent tomb, which he had erected during his life; and, as he left no heirs of his own body, his tetrarchy was reſumed by Tiberius, and annexed to the province of Syria, then under the government of Flaccus Pomponius; but with this reſtriction, that the revenues of that country ſhould ſtill be kept within the limits of it. Joſephus tells us, that Philip was of ſo oppoſite a diſpoſition to his father or brother, that his government was mild and quiet; that he went always attended with a ſmall number of ſervants, ſome of whom carried a chair after him, which ſerved him as his tribunal, to be ready to receive every petition or complaint, and to do juſtice every-where upon the ſpot [c].

(24) Acts. v. 15, & seq. (25) Ibid. xxii. 3. (26) Vid. Lucian. Rev. de. S. Steph. Basnag. hist. des Juifs, Tom. 2. l. iv. c. 3.

Year of the flood 4037. Of Chriſt $38\frac{3}{4}$

ABOUT the ſame time, the apoſtles, at the complaint of ſome Grecian proſelytes, ordained ſeven deacons from among the number of believers, to be overſeers of the miniſtry in the relief of the neceſſitous members. We know little of five of them, beſides their names, which the reader will find in the margin (L). But Stephen, who is mentioned at the head to chriſtianity (27); others pretend, that he was not till after the martyrdom of Stephen. But we have no certainty of any of theſe facts, nor of ſeveral others that are ſaid of him, concerning which the reader may conſult Baſnage in the place laſt quoted.

Seven deacons choſen.

[b] Acts, ibid. ver. 33. ad fin. [c] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 6.

(L) Theſe were, Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas; this laſt is there called a proſelyte

(27) Recogn. c. 65, & ſeq.

head of the reſt, was a man of extraordinary faith, learning, and zeal, and full of the Holy Ghoſt, who wrought ſuch wonders among the people, that he gave great umbrage to the Jews. He had confuted ſeveral of the heads of them in their reſpective ſynagogues [d], concerning their notion of the perpetuity of the Moſaic law, for which he was accuſed before the ſanhedrin. Here the high-prieſt having given him leave to ſpeak for himſelf, he began his defence, with an hiſtorical deduction of the true worſhip of God, excluſive of the Moſaic rites; which laſt he ſhewed by authentick proofs were to be done away, to make room for a more ſpiritual religion under the promiſed Meſſiah. This ſpeech was accompanied with ſuch powerful eloquence, angelick majeſty, and with ſuch a ſevere reproof for their conſtant reſiſting the Holy Ghoſt, and perſecuted thoſe who delivered his divine oracles to them, that not being longer able to bear what they called his blaſphemy, they condemned him to death, and hurried him, as was uſual in ſuch caſes, out of the city; where the witneſſes, who were to throw the firſt ſtones, laid their upper garments at the feet of young Saul, then a zealous Phariſee and enemy to chriſtianity, but ſince the great apoſtle of the Gentiles; and having, according to the Moſaic law, laid their hands on the condemned perſon, overwhelmed him with ſtones, whilſt he called on God to forgive them his death, and on Jeſus to receive his departing ſoul [e]. Authors are not agreed about the exact year of his death, Stephen ſtoned.

[d] Acts vi. 9, & ſeq. [e] Ibid. vii. per tot.

lyte of Antioch. The reſt being alſo all Greek names, ſhews them to have been Helleniſts, and that this new order was made in favour of the converts from them.

Some have affirmed this laſt to have been the author of the beaſtly Nicolaitan ſect, that ſprung up in the earlieſt age of the church (28); others have ſtrenuouſly vindicated him from it (29). We can gather nothing certain concerning it. Philip is probably the ſame who converted the Samaritans (30), baptized the eunuch of queen Candace (31), and had four daughters endowed with the gift of prophecy (32). As for the other five, we know no more of them, than what has been mentioned above.

(28) Vid. Epiphan. hæreſ. 25, & not. Cotcler. (29) Clem. Alexandr. ſtromat. l. iii. Euſeb. Theodoret. Auguſt. & al. (30) Acts viii. 5, & ſeq. (31) Ibid. ver. 26. ad fin. (32) Ibid, xxi. 9, & ſeq.

death, but moſt of them, after Uſher, Pearſon, and others, place it about this time, that is, about a year after that of his divine maſter.

The chriſtians perſecuted.

THE death of this glorious protomartyr was ſoon followed by a more grievous perſecution againſt the chriſtian converts, which yet the divine providence turned into a means of propagating the goſpel far and wide, by the diſperſion of a great number of them, who, after Stephen's death, left Jeruſalem and Judæa, according to our Saviour's advice, When you are perſecuted in one city, flee into another [f]. So that few but the apoſtles ſtayed at Jeruſalem, whilſt the reſt went and preached, ſome at Samaria, ſome at Cyprus, and others elſewhere; but ſtill among the Jews, for the time for the converſation of the Gentiles was not yet come. One of the chief inſtruments of this new perſecution was, the young Saul, mentioned a little higher, who obſerving with what zeal the ſanhedrin endeavoured to cruſh the growing church, got a commiſſion from them to ſeize, bind, and impriſon all its members where-ever he met them; purſuant to which, he made a terrible havock among them, without regard to quality, age, or ſex, till being himſelf miraculouſly converted in the midſt of his bloody career, as he was going to Damaſcus, he became as zealous a promoter of it [g]. During this perſecution, Samaria having received the goſpel by the preaching of Philip, and Simon Magus, who had formerly bewildered them with his ſorceries, being himſelf become a convert, the apoſtolic college at Jeruſalem deputed thither Peter and John, who being come, imparted the Holy Ghoſt unto them by their prayer and impoſition of hands. Simon, obſerving the wonderful efficacy of this laſt ceremony, would have purchaſed the ſame power of the apoſtles at a large ſum; for which profane propoſal Peter ſharply rebuked him [h], and after-ages have branded his memory, by giving that new and unheard-of ſin the name of Simony.

The Samaritans converted.

Vitellius's kindneſs to the Jews.

ABOUT the beginning of the next year, L. Vitellius, being ſent by Tiberius proconſul of Syria, came to Jeruſalem about the feaſt of the paſſover, where he was honourably received by the magiſtrates of that metropolis, in requital of which he remitted to its inhabitants the whole duty of the fruits that were ſet to ſale. He likewiſe put all the pontifical habits, which uſed to be kept in the fortreſs of Antonia under the cuſtody of a Roman officer, into the poſſeſſion of the Jewiſh [f] Matth. x 23. [g] Vid. Act. viii, ix, & ſeq. [h] Ibid. viii. 24, & ſeq.

Jewish high-priest, to be thenceforth kept and disposed of at their pleasure; after which, having deposed Caiaphas from the pontifical chair, and raised Jonathan the son of Annas or Ananus to that dignity, he departed for Antioch, his capital [i]. Soon after this a tumult happened at Samaria, in which Pilate acted with such arbitrariness and cruelty, that it proved a main step to his ruin. There had appeared there a certain impostor, some think the Simon lately mentioned, who persuaded the Samaritans, that if they would repair to their sacred mount Garizzim, for such they held it above all mountains, as we have often seen in this chapter, he would direct them to the sacred vessels, which Moses had formerly buried there. The credulous people came in shoals armed to him and encamped before a village called Tirathaba, waiting for others to join them there, till they could make a sufficient body to go up and take possession of the pretended holy treasure. Pilate, who had timely notice of it, sent a strong body of horse and foot, who attacked them with such fury, that they killed a great number of those deluded wretches, took many of them prisoners, and dispersed the rest; after which he ordered those of the best rank and quality to be beheaded without mercy or delay. The Samaritans had immediately recourse to Vitellius, and complained of the massacre done among them, assuring him at the same time, that their assembling in arms was not with a seditious view, but to secure themselves from the intolerable oppressions of the Jewish governor. Vitellius, who was well acquainted with his cruel and rapacious character, upon this complaint, dispatched his friend Marcellus to take the government of Judæa upon him, and sent orders to Pilate to repair immediately to Rome, there to answer the Samaritans accusation before Cæsar's tribunal. Pilate was forced to obey, but, being detained by contrary winds, Tiberius was dead before he could reach Rome. This deposition, which was but the the fore-runner of much greater evils to that cruel oppressor, happened in the tenth year of his tyrannic government [k] (M).

During

[i] Conf. Joseph. antiq. l. xv. 14. & xviii. 6. [k] Antiq. ibid. c. 5.

(M) The acts of Pilate have made so much noise among the learned, that it will doubtless be expected we should give our English

DURING theſe tranſactions in Judæa, Herod had been carrying on his unſucceſsful war againſt Aretas, of which we have Engliſh readers ſome idea of them, ſince they are ſo confidently quoted by a great number of antient fathers (33), and have been as ſtrenuouſly oppoſed or defended by learned moderns (34). It ſeems indeed very probable, that every governor of a province of the Roman empire was obliged to ſend an account, at leaſt, of the moſt material tranſactions that happened in his time; and if ſo, the crucifixion of a perſon of the Meſſiah's character, through the tumultuous malice of the Jews, and contrary to Pilate's own inclination, was of too ſignal a nature not to be tranſmitted to Rome by him, though but to diſculpate himſelf of that unjuſt deed, and to throw all the odium of it on the ſanhedrin.

It is true, thoſe acts that have been tranſmitted to us vary in many particulars, according to the ſeveral hands they have paſſed through; and ſome of them carry ſuch a face of forgery, that they cannot be reaſonably ſuppoſed the ſame with thoſe which thoſe antient writers ſpeak ſo poſitively of, and have given us ſuch ſeemingly authentic fragments of. So that to conclude them all to be forged by ſome pious zealots, is to carry ſcepticiſm beyond its due bounds. For who can think that men of ſuch ſenſe, learning, and integrity, as the apologiſts were, ſhould dare to appeal to thoſe records in favour of the perſecuted chriſtians, which, if once found to be forged, muſt have done their cauſe the greateſt prejudice? How could they ſpeak of them, not only as of things commonly known and acknowledged, but with the ſame confidence, and ſeeming exactneſs, as if they had ſeen them, conſulted, and copied them out of their archives? Is it not more reaſonable to believe, that there were ſuch records, though ſadly blended and corrupted in thoſe after-ages, which, through the baſeneſs of arch-heretics and the blind zeal of others, produced ſuch numbers of other apocryphal writings? Euſebius tells us, that even the Pagans did, in the beginning of the fourth century, trump up a new account of the acta Pilati (35), doubtleſs to oppoſe to thoſe cited by Juſtin and Tertullian in the foregoing one: Another mongrel ſect, called Quatuordecimans, had likewiſe a ſet of them quite different from the reſt, and from which, Epiphanius tells us (36), they defended ſome of their tenets: And where is the wonder that records of ſuch important nature have already ſpoken; and Tiberius, vexed at the ſucceſs of the latter, had ſent expreſs orders to Vitellius to invade his country, nature ſhould be corrupted and altered, by deſigning men, ſo long after? Is it not rather a greater one, that thoſe of the two apologiſts above-mentioned, who wrote as if they had had the authentic copies of the true ones before their eyes, ſhould have been preſerved to us? We ſhall now give our readers the ſubſtance of them in as few words as we can,

(33) De his vid. Juſt. Mart. Apol. 2. Tertul Apolog. 5. Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. ii. c. ii. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 4. Chryſoſt. Epiphan. hær. 50. Greg. Turon. & al. mult. (34) Vid int. al. Caſaub. Exercit. 16. Baron. annal. Fabric. apocryph. N. T. & al. ab eo citat. (35) ubi ſupra, l. ix. c. 4. (36) Hæreſ. 50.

Pilate to Tiberius,

"I have been forced to conſent at length to the crucifixion of "Jeſus Chriſt, to prevent a tumult from the Jews; though it "was very much againſt my will. For the world never ſaw, "nor probably will, a man of ſuch extraordinary piety and "uprightneſs. But the high-prieſt and ſanhedrin fulfilled in it "the oracles of their prophets, and of our ſibyls. Whilſt he "hung on the croſs, a horrid darkneſs, which covered the "earth, ſeemed to threaten its final end. His diſciples, who "pretend to have ſeen him riſe from the dead, and aſcend into "heaven, and acknowledge him for their God (37), do ſtill "ſubſiſt; and by their excellent lives ſhew themſelves the wor-"thy diſciples of ſo extraordinary a maſter. I did what I could "to ſave him from the malice of the Jews; but the fear of a "total inſurrection made me ſacrifice him to the intereſt and "peace of your empire, &c.

There is nothing in all this that can appear inconſiſtent with the character of ſuch a governor as Pilate was, if we except his ſaying there, that Chriſt's death had been foretold by the prophets and ſibyls; and Joſephus of Arimathea, when he went to beg his body, might in all likelihood inform him of the one, and the other he might either know, or be told by ſome of his own people. As for the reſt, the fear he was in of being called to an account for his unjuſt ſentence, might make him the more diligent in ſending ſuch a favourable relation of the tranſaction, as might beſt prejudice that tickliſh emperor in his favour. Some apocryphal writings tell us, that he was forced to do it in his juſtification; and that Tiberius, who had long lingered under a decay, which eluded the ſkill of his phyſicians, had been adviſed to ſend for Jeſus from Judæa, to cure him by his miraculous power. They add, that when he received this account from Pilate, he not only highly reſented it from him, but much more from the Jewiſh ſanhedrin, whoſe court he ordered the former to demoliſh, that, being the only place where they were allowed to ſit in council, they might never more pronounce another ſentence from it. But this ſtory we would be far from putting on the level with the acts of Pilate in point of evidence. As for that prætor, there is no record what became of him after his being ſent country, and either to take him priſoner, or ſend his head to Rome. Vitellius, in his march into Arabia, deſigned to have paſſed through Judæa, but was happily diverted from it by the Jewiſh heads, on account of the Roman ſtandards. Upon this condeſcenſion Herod and he came to Jeruſalem, where they were highly honoured, and offered the uſual ſacrifices, and removed Jonathan from the prieſthood to give it to his brother Theophilus [l]. Here they received the news of Tiberius's death, and of the inſtallation of the emperor Caius, of which a fuller account ſhall be given in its proper place; and Vitellius ſtayed to receive the oath of fidelity from the people to the new emperor. Jeruſalem was the firſt eaſtern city, it ſeems, that heard the news of his ſucceſſion, and offered up ſacrifices for him [m]. By this time Artabanes having ſucceeded Aretas in Arabia, Vitellius went and made an alliance with him near the Euphrates, where Herod gave them a magnificent entertainment under a ſtately pavilion, which he had reared for that purpoſe near the banks of that river. The Roman general ſent immediately an account of this tranſaction to the emperor, and was ſurprized to find by his anſwer, that Herod had been before-hand with him, and had acquainted him with all the particulars of it; for which he bore him a mortal grudge ever after [n].

(37) Theſe laſt particulars are only in Tertullian and Euſeb. ubi ſupra.

ALL this while the chriſtian church encreaſed to a ſurprizing degree, not only in Judæa, but in all other parts of the world; to which the apoſtles themſelves, after having left James the Leſs biſhop of that of Jeruſalem (N), diſperſed ſent to Rome. Only an antient tradition, ſupported by ſome ſeeming authentic monuments, ſays, that he was baniſhed to Vienne in Dauphine, where his miſery forced him to kill himſelf with his own ſword.

[l] Antiq. ibid. c. 8. Vid. & Dio. l. lix.. [m] Vid. Philo. legat. ad Caium. [n] Joſeph. & Dio, ubi ſupra.

(N) When this choice or inſtallation was made, whether immediately after the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, or after the death of the protomartyr, or in any intermediate ſpace between, is not eaſy to gueſs; and that he was made biſhop of Jeruſalem, and that this metropolis was made the firſt chriſtian ſee, we have not from any ſacred writers, but from the fathers (38) and antient tradition; and both add, that he wore a golden plate on his forehead, probably in imitation of the Jewiſh high-prieſt †. Is is

(38) Clem. Alexand. Hegeſip. ap. Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. l. ii. c. 1. Epiphan. hæreſ. 29, & 78. † De quo vid. vol. iii. p. 258, & ſeq.

ed themſelves, either about, or ſoon after, this time. It is out of our province, not only to follow them out of Judæa, but is ſuppoſed, that both St. Peter and the two ſons of Zebedee gave him the preference of being the firſt biſhop, on account of his being ſo nearly related to Chriſt. For he was the ſon of Cleophas or Alpheus, the brother of the bleſſed virgin, from whom he was therefore his firſt couſin, and hence called his brother, according to the Hebrew cuſtom (39).

This his preference is further confirmed by his being mentioned by the apoſtle before Peter and John, who are there called the two other pillars of the church (40), and eſpecially by his ſitting as preſident at the firſt council at Jeruſalem, when the queſtion about the circumciſion of the heathen converts was condemned (41). For there Peter having opened the point to the aſſembly, and Paul and Barnabas related the main particular of their converſion, James ſtood up and ſummed up the whole debate; and having delivered his own opinion, and backed it with ſcripture authority, he gave the definitive ſentence, which was aſſented to by the reſt (42).

The fathers above-mentioned ſpeak very much of his great ſanctity, mortified life, miracles, &c. for which he was ſurnamed by Jews as well as chriſtians, The Juſt. They add, that he had alſo that of Obliah or Ophliah given him, which ſignifies the fortreſs of God; and that he was even allowed to enter into that part of the temple which was only permitted to the prieſts, though he was not of that order, and that the people crouded about him to kiſs the hem of his garment (43).

Baronius quotes a ſtory out of the Talmud (44), that a Jew, named Eleazar, having been bit by a venomous ſerpent, James was ſent for to cure him in the name of Jeſus the ſon of the carpenter, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by a Jewiſh rabbi there preſent; and that whilſt they were debating about the lawfulneſs of the cure, the venom grew to ſuch a head, that the patient died; upon which the ſtiff-necked rabbi congratulated him for dying without breaking the rules of the Jewiſh doctors.

Some apocryphal writings were attributed to St. James, but were condemned by the church, which receives none but the epiſtle that bears his name, and which he is ſuppoſed to have written a little before his death, which happened about the year of Chriſt 62; when his great ſanctity having rendered him obnoxious to Ananus, the ſon of Annas the high-prieſt mentioned in the goſpel, he drew him into the following ſnare. He ſent for him but even to enter into many of their transactions within it, which have no concern with the Jewish history we are upon. Such as their councils held at Jerusalem, their converts, miracles, ordination of bishops, and many more of that kind; which regarding only the first propagation and planting of the christian church, we shall refer our readers for them to those christian annalists, historians, and other authors, who have wrote on the subject, and which are too numerous and too well known to need being mentioned in the margin.

(39) Vide Galat i. 19. Joſeph. antiq l. xx. c. 8. (40) Galat. ii. 9. (41) Acts xv. 4, & ſeq. (42) Ibid ver. 13, & ſeq. Vid. & Leſley's caſe ſtated. (43) Vid. Hieron. in Galat. i. (44) Annal an 63.

THAT we may therefore resume and finish our history without any further digression, we shall conclude what relates to the christian church with the miraculous conversion of Cornelius, the Roman centurion, the first-fruits of that of the gentile world; because it is there, that we formerly fixed the final departure of the poor remains of the Jewish sceptre or power †. We there observed, after the learned Mr. Mede, that the words of Jacob might, and by the event ought to, be read, The sceptre shall not depart, &c. till Shiloh come, and to him the nations be gathered; which could not therefore be totally removed, till this promised conversion of the Gentiles was in some measure accomplished. It had indeed began to dwindle long before, but there were still some remains left; they were still governed by their own laws, their sanhedrin had still a great power, even of life and death, as we observed in the case of St. Stephen. The him to declare unto the mistaken people what they ought to think of Jesus, concerning whom they had, he pretended, conceived some wrong notion. For the better conveniency of his being heard, he was placed in some gallery, or high balcony, of the temple, where the people from below enquired of him concerning the crucified Jesus, to which the good old bishop answered, "That Jesus, whom you crucified, sits now at the right hand of "God."

† See before, vol. ii. p. 468, note (G).

As the populace below were of the Jewish leaven, the priests and Pharisees that headed them expected them to have broke out into invectives and blasphemies, instead of which they all broke out into Hozannah's to him; upon which the chiefs cried out, The Just, alluding to his surname, is also in the delusion, and ordered him to be thrown headlong down. His fall not having made an end of him, they fell a covering him with stones, whilst he prayed to God for them, for which one of them came and knocked his brains out with a club (45).

(45) Euseb. ubi supra. l. ii. c. 23.

reader may ſee ſome further tokens of it in the margin (O). But from this time it was ſo curtailed and reduced, that no footſtep

(O) We have a pregnant inſtance of this in the aſſault which was made on St. Paul in the temple (36), where he was ſeized, and was going to be carried before the high-prieſt, but was reſcued by Claudius Lyſias, the commanding officer of that place. This is the firſt inſtance we meet with of the Romans interfering in a caſe of this nature; and accordingly, when the priſoner was brought before the governor, Tertullus, the Jewiſh orator, complained of the violence done to them, in theſe words (37); We found this peſtilent fellow, meaning Paul, raiſing ſedition through the world, a ring-leader of the Nazarite ſect, who went alſo to profane our temple: whom we therefore laid hold on, and would have judged according to our law. But the chief captain Lyſias came, and by main violence reſcued him from our hands, &c.

What judgment they deſigned to have paſſed upon him, is eaſy to know, both by what the people cried out when he made his defence (38), and by the accuſation they brought againſt him, ſedition and ſacrilege; for ſuch they deemed the profanation of the temple, which was made capital by their law. Accordingly, we have taken notice in a former ſection of certain inſcriptions faſtened to certain pillars of the building, forbidding all ſtrangers, and polluted Iſraelites, to enter beyond the court of the Gentiles, under pain of death †. It may be likewiſe gathered from the judgment which Feſtus, Agrippa, and others made of him, that he had done nothing worthy of death (39); by the reaſon which Feſtus gave for not delivering him into their hands; It is not the cuſtom, ſaid he, for the Romans to deliver a man to die, before, &c. (40) and by the Jews laying in wait to kill him by ſtratagem, ſince they could not get it done in a judicial way.

All this ſeems further confirmed to us by his appeal to Cæſar. He knew the crime alledged againſt him to be capital, and chiefly of a religious nature; and yet refuſes to be tried by the ſanhedrin, and affirms that he ought not to be judged by any other tribunal than that of Cæſar. Doth not this imply that the power of life and death, even in religious caſes, was by this time taken away? Doth not the defence he made there before Feſtus (41) ſeem to amount to this? Though the new governor, out of a deſire to ingratiate himſelf to the Jews, offers to make them judges of my cauſe; and if they ſhould condemn me, has ſtill the power to put a negative upon their ſentence; yet, for as much as all capital caſes are now to be tried only before Cæſar's tribunal, I appeal footstep was to be seen of it, even before the last siege of Jerusalem, which was to give the finishing stroke to that and several noble prophecies. As this conversion of the Roman centurion was to usher in a new and singular epoch, it is no wonder, it was accompanied with such remarkable and miraculous circumstances. Of this sort were the extraordinary piety and charity in that new proselyte, and the vision that appeared to him, and directed him where to send for Peter, who was to preach Christ to him; the surprizing vision, which that apostle had about the same time; the explanation and the command which he received from the Spirit; the great readiness with which Cornelius and his company received the word preached; and their being endowed with the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, even before their baptism. All which are so well known, that we shall not dwell longer upon them; but only observe, that there was a further necessity of some such extraordinary and miraculous circumstances, to determine Peter and satisfy the rest of the apostles and Jewish converts; since it plainly appears, that notwithstanding Christ's repeated commision to them to convert all nations, yet they so little dreamed of the heathen being to be brought into his fold, that the former would never have gone to proselyte this or any other heathen, nor the rest have been pacified for his so doing, if these remarkable occurrences had appeal to that, and protest against his complaisance to them as contrary to the present law.

(36) Acts xxi. 27, & ſeq. (37) Ibid. xxiv. 5. & ſeq. (38) Ibid. xxii. 22, 23. † Vid. ſup. p. 310, ſub not. (B). (39) xxvi. 31. (40) Ibid. xxv. 16. (41) Acts xxv. 9, & ſeq.

Upon the whole we have an instance of the sanhedrin's trying, condemning, aud executing Stephen by their own authority about a year after Christ. Twenty-six years after they endeavoured to do the same by St. Paul, and were prevented by the Roman captain. Being hindered from doing it by their own authority, they endeavoured to prevail first upon the old, next upon the new governor, to consent to his being put to death, and are refused by both, unless after a fair tryal and conviction at the Roman tribunal. At length they found means to persuade the new one to recede in some measure from his prerogative, and let them try the pretended criminal themselves; and this last protests against it, and appeals to Cæsar as the only tribunal where he can be lawfully tried. What can this argue, but that, between the death of St. Stephen and the trial of St. Paul, the Jews had lost all their power of trying criminal causes; and since this instance of the latter is the first we meet with, of their being divested of that power, about twenty years after the conversion of Cornelius; seems it not to follow, that the Jewish sceptre was not totally departed, till after the Gentiles had been gathered to that of the Shiloh there prophesied?

not reminded them, that a happy entrance was to be thereby opened to the reſt of the gentile world [o].

We return now to the Jews, who, ſoon after the death of Tiberius, received a new governor from Rome, named Marullus, inſtead of Pontius Pilate, or rather of Marcellus, to whom the care of Judæa had been committed after his depoſition. At the ſame time Caius Caligula gave his old friend Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and grandſon of Herod the Great, of whom we have formerly ſpoken *, the tetrarchy of his late uncle Philip, and added to it that of Abylene in Syria, which had formerly belonged to Lyſanias. Agrippa, whom St. Luke calls by the common name of Herod [p], had been brought up at Rome with Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius, and by his extreme generoſity, or rather profuſeneſs, had gained himſelf many friends at court; but they were of the courtly mould. For after Druſus's death, the emperor having removed all the friends of that young prince from him, leſt they ſhould revive the memory of his ſon, Agrippa found himſelf reduced to the greateſt extremities, indebted over head and ears, pennyleſs, and almoſt friendleſs. In this condition he came into Judæa, and ſhut himſelf up in a caſtle in Idumæa, reſolved through ſhame, vexation, and miſery, to ſtarve himſelf to death. His wife Cyprus, the daughter of Phaſael, did what ſhe could to aſſiſt him, writ to his ſiſter in his behalf; and theſe two furniſhed him with ſome preſent ſubſiſtance, but all too little for a prince of his extravagant temper. To this Herod, Herodias's huſband, added ſome further favours to him, made him a magiſtrate of Tiberias, and aſſiſted him with ſome ſmall ſums. But this kindneſs was ſoon at an end, and Herod having one day upbraided him with it at ſome banquet, Agrippa, who could not brook the affront, retired to Flaccus, governor of Syria, where he had not ſtayed long before he diſobliged him, and was forced to retire again into Italy. After many other rubs and misfortunes, which the reader may ſee in Joſephus [q], he was at length, through the ill offices of one of his freedmen, thrown into priſon, and loaded with chains, by Tiberius. He continued in this miſerable condition till that prince's death, when Caius, with whom he had formerly contracted an intimate friendſhip, ſent for him from his priſon to his own palace, arrayed him in purple, exchanged his iron chain for one

Agrippa priſoned by Caius. Year of the flood 3037. Of Chriſt $\frac{42}{39}$

[o] De hoc vid. Act. x, & xi. paſſ. & alib. * See before, ſect. v. p. 323. in fin. not. [p] Act. xii. 1, & ſeq. [q] Antiq. l. xviii c. 7.

one of gold of the ſame weight, put a diadem on his head, and gave him the two tetrarchies above-mentioned, with the title of king. Agrippa did not, however, come immediately into his new dominions, but continued about a year longer at Rome with the new emperor. He obtained at length leave of him to come and viſit his Jewiſh territories, and to ſet things in the beſt order, and took Egypt in his way. He embarqued at Puteoli at the end of July, and came a few days after in ſight of Alexandria. The magnificence of his entry into that city, though he choſe to make it in the night to avoid its being too much obſerved, drew the envy of the Alexandrians, who could not behold this new upſtart Jewiſh king in ſuch ſplendor, without offering ſeveral indignities to him, though at a diſtance (P); and Flaccus their governor, who was no lover of the Jews, not only winked at it, but beheld it with a ſecret pleaſure. He was likewiſe there informed of the indirect means which Flaccus had taken to render the Jewiſh nation odious to the emperor. All which made him willing to leave the place as ſoon as poſſible. The great oppreſſions, perſecutions, and horrid butcheries which the Alexandrian Jews ſuffered from this baſe governornor, for refuſing to worſhip the new mad emperor, and his behaviour to the ambaſſadors ſent to him to repreſent their loyalty in all other caſes that were conſiſtent with their law, are out of our province; the reader may ſee a full account of it in Philo above-mentioned[r]; and we ſhall ſee by-and-by, that thoſe of Judæa were like to have ſuffered as much from him, though they had ſuch a powerful advocate as king Agrippa to intercede for them, had not Caius's death put a happy period to his impious project of being acknowledged as a deity.

Jews perſecuted at Alexandria.

WHILST theſe horrid cruelties were acting at Alexandria, Agrippa, who had left that city to get into his new kingdom, took Flaccus's cruelties puniſhed.

[r] In Flaccum.

(P) One of them was the ſetting up a poor fooliſh fellow that uſed to go naked about the ſtreets, dreſſing him in a kind of mock royalty, and making him ride through the great places of the city, with a tattered life-guard like himſelf, and huzzaing of him with the word Maris, which means the ſame as, God bleſs the king; whilſt others came to preſent their petitions, demanded juſtice, &c. and expoſed his royalty to the moſt audacious redicule (42).

(42) Philo in Flaccum Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 8.

took care to acquaint the emperor with them, who dispatched Bassus immediately to seize that bloody governor, and bring him to Rome, where he was stripped of all his riches, banished into an island of the Archipelago, and at length put to death there.

Herod Antipas's ambition.

In the mean time Herod Antipas, who had formerly treated Agrippa with such contempt, could not now behold his glory and his being in such favour with Caligula, without the deepest envy. His wife, a haughty woman, could not brook that he should be contented with the bare title of tetrarch, whilst her brother was now raised to that of a king; and did not cease teazing him, till she made him take a journey to Rome to obtain the same title from the emperor. She even accompanied him thither, in hopes that her presence would greatly influence that monarch; but Agrippa, who was timely acquainted with their ambitious designs, had taken care to send thither one of his freedmen, named Fortunatus, to accuse Herod with having had a hand in Sejanus's late conspiracy, and as a proof of it, to mention the arsenals which he had filled with arms sufficient to furnish seventy thousand men. As soon therefore as Herod was entered into the presence, and had paid his respects to the emperor, Fortunatus presented him with Agrippa's letter. Caius having read it, asked Herod whether he had really such a great reserve of arms? He was forced to confess it; upon which he was stripped of his tetrarchy, and sent into banishment to Lions in France. Caius understanding, however, that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, he offered to pardon her, and to procure her the payment of all the sums she had lent her brother; but she refused his generosity, and since she had been the cause of her husband's disgrace, she chose to accompany him, and to share the same fate with him (Q); upon which Caius gave both his tetrarchy and all his treasure to Agrippa, after Herod had enjoyed the former forty-three years [s].

Accused to Caius.

Banished.

In

[s] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 9. Vid. & Dio, lib. lix. Philo, ubi supra.

(Q) Josephus tells us elsewhere, that he was banished into Spain (43), and that he died there; so that he must either have fled thither afterwards, or, which is more likely, he was sent thither from Lyons, when Caius and Agrippa came to this last place, and made some stay in it. This was the Herod before whom Christ was brought before his death.

(43) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 16.

A new ſtorm raiſed againſt the Jews. Year of the flood 3038. Of Chriſt 43 40.

In the mean time, Caius, having taken it into his head to cauſe his ſtatue to be ſet up in the very ſanctuary of the temple, ſent orders to Petronius, then governor of Syria, to ſee it executed, and to have a number of troops ready to prevent any obſtruction from the Jews. Petronius, who knew the zeal of theſe, as well as the impetuoſity of his maſter, could not ſet about ſuch a command without ſome dread; and to gain time, ſent for the beſt ſtatuaries and materials from diſtant parts, whilſt he gathered his army into the neighbourhood of Ptolemais. This laſt action having alarmed the nation, he was forced to tell them the orders he had received; upon which he was addreſſed by all the heads of the Jews, who in the humbleſt manner aſſured him, that they would ſooner hazard the loſs of all that was dear to them, even their lives, than ſuffer their temple to be thus profaned. The governor ſtrove to bring them into a compliance, by reminding them of the danger of their oppoſing, or of his not obeying, the emperor's command, and that their reſiſtance would be interpreted as a downright rebellion. They anſwered him, that the prayers and ſacrifices they offered daily for the emperor were a ſufficient token of their loyalty. However, added they, we are ſo far from deſigning to riſe up in arms upon this occaſion, that we will ſuffer ourſelves to be butchered in the moſt cruel manner; and this will be all the reſiſtance you will meet with from us, if you go on with your deſign.

Agrippa intercedes for them.

Soon after this, Ariſtobulus the brother of Agrippa, accompanied with ſome of the royal family, came to Petronius, and begged, that they might have leave to try to mollify the emperor by an embaſſy, and that he would ſecond it with a letter to that monarch in their behalf. Petronius at length conſented to write to the emperor, but forbad them to ſend any embaſſy, or let their reluctance be ſo much as ſuſpected at the Roman court. He wrote accordingly to the emperor, that he had met with difficulties in the execution of his orders, through want of proper hands; and that the ſtatue, which he deſigned ſhould be a maſter-piece of its kind, was not yet reared, becauſe he feared leſt the taking ſo many men from their other labours, ſhould bring a ſcarcity in the land, lower the tribute, and ſuch other reaſons, which, inſtead of appeaſing, greatly exaſperated the emperor. He was juſt reading the letter, and in the height of his reſentment, when king Agrippa, who was then at Rome, came into his preſence. He was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee ſuch a mixture of paſſions in his looks and geſtures, and began to fear

fear he had either offended, or been in ſome way miſrepreſented to him; when Caius, who eaſily obſerved his diſorder, broke the ſecret to him in words to this effect: Your Jewiſh ſubjects are ſtrange creatures to refuſe to acknowledge me for a god, and to provoke my reſentment againſt them; I had commanded the ſtatue of Jupiter to be ſet up in their temple, and they have, it ſeems, oppoſed it, and raiſed a kind of univerſal inſurrection.

Obtains his ſuit.

AT theſe words Agrippa, like one thunder-ſtruck, after having in vain tried to keep himſelf up, fell into a ſwoon, and was carried off into his own palace, where he continued in that condition till the third day, when having taken a little ſuſtenance, he ſet himſelf about writing to the emperor the letter which the reader may ſee at full length in Joſephus [t], and the ſubſtance of it in the margin (R). Caius, inſtead of being [t] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 11. Vid. & legat. ad Caium.

(R) He began with juſtifying the love he had expreſſed for his own country in their laſt interview, and to which he was bound, not only by the law of nature, but even by thoſe of his own religion, he being deſcended from a race of ſuch noble anceſtors, as had during a long ſeries of ſucceſſions enjoyed the regal and pontifical dignity; for ſo he really was by his grandmother Mariamne, the beloved wife of Herod the Great who was of the race of the Aſhmonean princes, as we have often hinted in ſome former ſections.

He went on with acquainting him, that he choſe to intercede for his own nation in writing, rather than by word of mouth, as he thought it the moſt reſpectful way of the two; and that the many ſignal favours he had received from him, gave him grounds to hope, that he ſhould now obtain a favour, which would coſt him nothing, but would be eſteemed by the Jews as the greateſt he could beſtow on them: That Jeruſalem could not but be thought worthy of his regard, ſince it was the firſt city of the eaſt, which had proclaimed him emperor, and offered up ſacrifices for him: That as to the temple of that metropolis, it had been highly reverenced by Auguſtus, Tiberius, and many others of his anceſtors, for whoſe memory he profeſſed a ſingular honour, and whoſe pious conduct, he hoped, he would imitate upon this occaſion: That as to himſelf, the greateſt favours he had heaped upon him would only encreaſe his unhappineſs, if he did not think fit to grant him this laſt: That it was impoſſible for him to outlive the profanation of that ſacred place, and the diſgrace and ruin of his nation.

He concluded with reminding him, that he ſhould be juſtly eſteemed a traytor to both, if he ſhould be wanting in uſing his utmoſt being moved at the king's concern, was rather the more exasperated against the Jews, and against him, for his concern for such an ungrateful race, as he called them, whom all his favours could not work into a compliance to his will. However, he began to relent when he read the letter, and Agrippa, who drew a good omen even from his not answering it, took the liberty to invite him to a sumptuous entertainment, which Caius, who really loved him, easily accepted. Here the Jewish king, having well warmed his guest with wine, began to extol the great and signal favours he had heaped upon him; and, by his large encomiums and expressions of gratitude, found means to get a fresh promise of whatever he should ask. To this Agrippa answered, Since it is your pleasure to add this new favour to all the rest, I will beg for such a one as will at once be an irrefragable proof of your goodness to me, and draw a plenty of heavenly blessings upon your head; and that is, that you will set aside your resolution of setting up the statue in the temple of Jerusalem. This petition, which shewed not only the greatest disinterestedness, but also the most unfeigned love for his country and religion, even at the hazard of his life, had such an effect on that emperor, that he wrote immediately to his governor, that if his statue was not already set up, he should forbear doing it; adding, that he had altered his design out of friendship to Agrippa. However, the lightness of his temper soon made him repent of his complaisance to him; so that he designed to have made a second attempt, unknown to him. At the same time his resentment against Petronius being kindled afresh, he sent him an order to dispatch himself; but Caius was assassinated time enough to prevent either mischief taking effect [u] (S).

AGRIPPA

[u] Antiq. ubi supra. Sueton. in Caligul.

utmost interest at this juncture, and that the world would not fail to think him discarded of his imperial favour, if he did not succeed in a petition of this nature. This long and pathetic letter was immediately sealed, and sent to the emperor; and Agrippa waited with the utmost impatience for an answer, but in vain; Caius, though mollified by it, not vouchsafing to take the least notice of it to him.

(S) During this interval, besides the raging persecution in Alexandria, there happened some others in other places, and upon Agrippa's policy at Rome.

AGRIPPA, who was still at Rome, did not a little contribute to the succession of Claudius (T); in consideration of which, this last confirmed to him all Caligula's grants, gave him Judæa, Samaria, and the southern parts of Idumea, entered into a solemn alliance with him, and made several edicts in favour of the Jews. At his request, he gave likewise the kingdom of Chalcis to his brother Herod, who was also his son-in-law; Agrippa had the honours of the consulship, and Herod those of the prætorship, conferred upon them; both were intitled to enter into the senate, and to pay their compliments to the emperor in Greek, which was usually done in Latin [w]. All these grants were engraven on copper, and set up in the capitol; thus was Agrippa raised to the height of glory, his territories extended to the furthest limits of his grandfather Herod the Great, and his power and credit with the senate even much greater than his, when at the highest pitch.

Claudius's friendship to him.

Agrippa comes to Judæa.

HE returned soon after into his kingdom, where he shewed a more extraordinary attachment to the Jewish religion, than any of his predecessors, and began with the solemn performance of the vow of Nazareat †; after which he caused upon other accounts, particularly in Mesopotamia and Babylon. But we chuse to refer our readers for them to Josephus (44), rather than swell this history with things that happened out of Palestine.

[w] Antiq. l. xix. c. 3, & 4. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 18. Dio. lib. lx.
† De hoc vid. vol. iii. p. 249, & seq.

It will be sufficient to observe here, that as the Jews in other parts withstood the preaching of the gospel, where-ever the apostles and primitive converts brought it, and with the same vehemence as those of Palestine, they seldom, if ever, failed sharing in their punishment.

(T) It must be owned, that the part which Agrippa acted in this election between the new emperor and the senate, is not much to his honour, and was more becoming a consummate courtier than a king (45), as we shall see in the Roman history. But the wonder will cease, when we remember that he had been brought up at that court, had spent most of his life there, and that the various vicissitudes his fortune had formerly led him through, would not suffer him to be over nice at such a juncture, when his kingdom and all depended upon his securing the friendship of the next successor. In other things he really acted in a quite different character, as the sequel will shew.

(44) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 12, per tot. (45) Vid. Joseph, & Dio, loc. sup. citat.

cauſed the golden chain, which Caius had given him, to be hanged up in one of the moſt conſpicuous parts of the temple, to be a monument to poſterity of the inſtability of human affairs. He depoſed Theophilus from the high-prieſthood, and gave it to Simon Cantharas the ſon of Boethus. He deveſted him of it ſoon after, to beſtow it on Jonathan the ſon of Annas, who had already enjoyed it after Caiaphas; but he modeſtly refuſed it, telling the king, that he thought himſelf ſufficiently honoured to have once enjoyed that dignity; upon which it was given to his brother Matthias [x].

His character.

AGRIPPA was not only a zealous obſerver of the Jewiſh religion, but he was likewiſe an excellent prince, delighting in acts of generoſity and clemency (U). He had been at an immenſe

[x] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 5, 6, & 7.

(U) We have a ſignal inſtance of it in the caſe of one Simon, a ſurly fanatic lawyer, who had ventured to exclaim againſt him in a public aſſembly, as unfit to enter into the court of the Iſraelites, becauſe he was an Idumæan by the father's ſide. The king, who was then at Cæſarea, only ſent for him to the theatre, made him ſit down by him, and, inſtead of reproving his boldneſs, mildly asked him, whether there was any thing in him, or his actions, which he thought contrary to the Jewiſh law. This behaviour ſo mollified the man, that he anſwered him in the negative, approved of all he did, (for Agrippa was very fond of thoſe public ſhews) and in a ſubmiſſive manner begged pardon for his former ſpeech, which was readily granted to him (46).

His treatment of Silas, whoſe great obligations he had already rewarded with the command of all his forces, has indeed been cenſured as ſavouring of ingratitude; but the abuſe which that general had made of his power, his contemptuous behaviour towards him, and his public proteſting that he would never ceaſe upbraiding him with his former condition, and his own paſt ſervices to him, might well deſerve his reſentment; which yet he carried no further than impriſoning him: for it was Herod that put him to death immediately after that of Agrippa (47).

Joſephus, in the place laſt quoted, inſtances, as a monument of his magnificence, the ſtately theatre which he built at Berytus in Phœnice; in which, among other ſpectacles he gave the people there, he cauſed fourteen thouſand condemned criminals to repreſent a fight, which they did in ſuch good earneſt, that there was not one left alive of all that number.

(46) Antiq. l. xix. c. 7. (47) Id. ibid.

immenſe charge in building, beautifying, and fortifying a new quarter on the north ſide of the city, which he called Bezetha, or the new city, and in procuring the emperor's leave to ſurround it with a ſtrong wall, which, if he had obtained, would have rendered that metropolis impregnable. But Vibius Marſus, who had this year ſucceeded Petronius in the government of Syria, repreſented the danger of ſuch a deſign, which had already been carried on to ſome forwardneſs, in ſuch lively colours, that Claudius immediately ſent him an order to deſiſt. So conſiderable was he, and eſteemed by all his neighbours, that in one of his progreſſes to Tiberias, he had no leſs than five kings, who came to compliment him there. Theſe were Antiochus, a king of Comagene, Samſigeran, king of Emiſa, Cotis, king of Leſſer Armenia, Polemon, king of Pontus, and Herod, king of Chalcis. This meeting, however, gave Marſus ſuch jealouſy, that he came thither himſelf; and tho' Agrippa complimented him ſo far, as to go ſeven ſtadia to meet him, yet that governor commanded them all to depart, and return to their reſpective kingdoms. This action did ſo affront the Jewiſh king, that he ſent to deſire the emperor to recal him from his government, and eaſily obtained it; but Claudius died juſt before the orders had reached Syria [y].

Year of the flood 3040. Of Chriſt 42 or 45.

Viſited by five kings.

Upon his return to Jeruſalem, he depoſed Matthias the ſon of Annas from the high-prieſt-hood, and gave that dignity to Elionæus the ſon of Cithæus; and as he was very fond of pleaſing the Jewiſh nation, he began to perſecute the chriſtians, who till then ſeem to have been very quiet at Jeruſalem ever ſince St. Paul's converſion. The firſt who fell a victim to his popular zeal was, James the Leſs, ſurnamed Boanerges, whom he cauſed to beheaded (W). The pleaſure Beheads James, and impriſons Peter.

[y] Antiq. ibid. cap. ult. ad fin.

(W) This was not the James whom we mentioned a little higher to have been a near relation of Chriſt, and on that account choſen biſhop of Jeruſalem, and was not martyred till many years after; but one of the ſons of Zebedee, and brother of John.

Euſebius adds (48), upon the teſtimony of Clement biſhop of Alexandria, that the ſoldier or captain that was to lead him to execution, was converted to chriſtianity, by the noble defence which that apoſtle made at his trial, and that they were both martyred together. Some other particularities concerning his auſtere life, pleasure which this action gave to the Jews, encouraged him to imprison Peter also, with a design to cut him off also immediately after the feast, which was that of the passover, and fell on that year on the first of April, in the forty-fourth year after Christ. Peter was therefore strongly guarded, having four quaternions of soldiers at his prison door, and being fastened hands and feet with chains to his dungeon; whilst prayers were put up for him by all the christians in and about Jerusalem, and obtained him a miraculous deliverance. For on the very night before his designed martyrdom, an angel came and awaked him out of a sound sleep, knocked of his fetters, opened the prison door, and led him safe through some of the streets of the city, and left him to go and seek for some safe asylum; which he accordingly did, after he had gone and acquainted some of the brethren with his miraculous deliverance [z].

(48) Eccl. Hiſt. l. ii. c. 9.

Soon after this disappointment, Agrippa returned to Cæsarea, where he designed to have exhibited some public games in honour of Claudius Cæsar, and was attended thither with a numerous train of the most considerable persons, both of his own, and of the neighbouring nations. He appeared early on the second morning of the festival at the public theatre, in a costly suit artfully wrought, so that the sunbeams darting upon the silver ground of it, where reflected with such an uncommon lustre, that the people beheld him with a kind of divine respect. He addressed himself in an elegant speech to the deputies of Tyre and Sidon, who had been some time in disgrace with him, and were now come to beg his pardon, and the continuance of his favour to their respective nations. Here the embassadors, prompted perhaps by some of his court sycophants, as is usual in such cases, gave a great shout, crying out, that it was the voice of a god, and not of a man, and added some gestures of a kind of adoration. The king, too sensible of the people's praise, approved, instead of checking, their impious flattery; upon which the angel of the Lord smote him with a dreadful disease [a], under which having lingered five days, he expired life, great piety, &c. are added, which tho' they may be true enough, we dare not vouch for upon the bare testimony of antient tradition (49).

His dreadful death.

[z] Act. xii. per tot. [a] Ibid ver. 20. ad fin. Antiq. ubi supra.

(49) Vid. Epiph. hæres. 58. c. 4, & seq. & al.

pired in all the miſery that can be expreſſed or imagined (X). He left a ſon of the ſame name, who was then but ſeventeen years old, and had been brought up at Rome, and three daughters, Berenice married to Herod, and then ſixteen years of age, and Mariamne, and Druſilla, both young and unmarried, though contracted, the former to Julius Archelaus, the ſon of Chalcias, and the latter to Epiphanes, the ſon of Antiochus king of Comagene. He died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign. Claudius was going to beſtow the kingdom on his ſon, according to a former promiſe; but was diſſuaded from it by his courtiers, on pretence that he was too young to be truſted with the care of ſuch a nation; upon which Judæa became again a province of the empire, and Cuſpius Fadus was ſent governor of it, with this particular order, that he ſhould act nothing in concert with Marſus, that he ſhould ſeverely puniſh the inhabitants of Cæſarea and Sebaſte, or Samaria, for the indignities they had offered to the memory of the late king (Y); and that he ſhould ſend the troops that were kept in Judæa away into Pontus. But he was ſoon after perſuaded to let them abide Judæa made a province by Claudius.

(X) The ſacred hiſtorian ſays, that he was eaten of worms (50), and Joſephus, that he was ſeized with ſuch violent pains in his heart and bowels, that he could not but reflect on the baſeneſs of his flatterers, who had but lately complimented him with a kind of divine immortality, who was now going to expire in all the torments and agonies of a miſerable mortal.

The latter adds, that whilſt he was as yet in his priſon, an owl happened to pearch over his head; upon which a German, who was there, foretold him his future riſe and happineſs; but bid him take notice, that the next time that he ſaw that bird, it would prove ominous to him; and that he would live but five days after it; which happened accordingly. For whilſt he was applauding himſelf with the ſhouts and compliments, which the aſſembly were paying to him, on occaſion of his oration, the ſame bird appeared over his head, pearching upon a rope, from which he concluded that his life and glory was at an end (1).

(Y) Theſe ungrateful wretches, not contented with making the greateſt rejoycings at Agrippa's death, and blackening his memory with the vileſt outrages, had pulled down the ſtatues of his three daughters from the theatres, and other public places, and carried them into their public ſtews; where they proſtituted them in ſuch a manner, as is unfit to be mentioned (2).

(50) Act. xii. 23. (1) Conf. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 8. & l. xix. c. ult. (2) Antiq. l. xx. c. 1.

abide ſtill in the former, which proved a ſource of new troubles and miſeries [b]. It was about this time that the famine foretold by Agabus, a chriſtian prophet [c], began to rage; againſt which the new churches, planted at Antioch and other places, ſent the believers at Jeruſalem a liberal relief, by the hands of Paul and Barnabas; whilſt Helen, queen of Adiabene, is ſaid to have relieved the Jews, and afterwards the chriſtians, in the pious and plentiful manner we have ſpoken of in a former volume †.

FADUS, upon his arrival into Judæa, was forced to ſuppreſs the banditti, which were by that time grown very numerous and powerful; and to quell an inſurrection which the Jews had raiſed againſt the inhabitants of Philadelphia, which was the ſame city with Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites [d]. In the mean time, Claudius, having recalled Marſus out of reſpect to the late king, had ſent Caſſius Longinus into that government, who came immediately to Jeruſalem, and inſiſted upon the pontifical veſtments being put into his poſſeſſion, in order to be kept, as formerly, in the fortreſs of Antonia. The Jews ſurpriſed at thisnew demand, begged leave that they might ſend a deputation to the emperor againſt it, and did not obtain it from that governor, till ſome of the heads of the nation had put their ſons as hoſtages into his hands. But upon the embaſſadors applying to Claudius, in which they were backed by the young Agrippa, they obtained a grant, that thoſe ſacred robes ſhould be kept in the poſſeſſion of the high-prieſt, in the manner Vitellius had granted it, ſix years before. At the ſame time Herod king of Chalcis obtained of that emperor the ſuperintendency of both the temple and ſacred treaſury; together with the authority of naming whom he would to the pontifical dignity; in purſuance to which, he depoſed Cantharas, and raiſed Joſeph the ſon of Cami to it; After Herod's death, young Agrippa obtained the ſame grant for himſelf, and enjoyed it till the time of the Jewiſh war [e].

Fadus ſent into Judæa.

Year of the flood 3043: Of Chriſt 45 or 48.

DURING Fadus's government there aroſe a notable impoſtor, named Theudas (Z), who drew great number of the deluded Theudas an impoſtor beheaded.

[b] Antiq. ubi ſupra. [c] Act. xi. 27. ad fin. † Vol. ix. p 641. [d] Antiq l. xx. c. 1, & 2. [e] Ibid.

(Z) We muſt take care not to confound this Theudas of Joſephus with another mentioned by St. Luke, and ſaid to have appeared juſt after the death of Herod the Great, and has been taken deluded Jews after him, bidding them follow him beyond Jordan, and promiſed them that he would divide the waters of that river, as Joſhua had done, by his ſingle word. Cuſpius ſent ſome troops of horſe and foot againſt him and his followers, killed ſome of them, took others priſoners, and amongſt them Theudas himſelf, whom he cauſed to be beheaded, and his head to be brought to Jeruſalem. This, according to Joſephus, is the moſt remarkable thing that happened during Fadus's government [f]: he was ſoon after ſucceeded by Tiberius Alexander, an appoſtate Jew, of ſacerdotal race, and nephew to the famous Philo, often quoted in this chapter [g]. One of his firſt exploits was the crucifying James and Simon, the ſons of Judas, ſurnamed Galileus, head of the Gaulonitiſh ſect, ſpoken of in a former ſection; and about the ſame time Herod, king of Chalcis, having depoſed Joſeph the ſon of Cami, gave the high-prieſthood to Ananias the ſon of Nebedeus, and died ſoon after, in the eighth year of Claudius. That emperor gave his kingdom to young Agrippa, in prejudice of Ariſtobulus, the eldeſt ſon of the deceaſed.

VENTIDIUS CUMANUS ſucceeded Alexander in the government of Judæa, and it was in his time that thoſe troubles began, which ended in the ruin of the Jewiſh nation. The great concourſe of people, which their feſtival brought to Jeruſalem, obliged the Romans at ſuch times to keep a guard before the gates of the temple, to prevent tumults. It was now the paſſover, when one of the Roman ſoldiers upon duty, had the impudence to expoſe his nudity to open ſight; this indignity raiſed the reſentment of the Jews to ſuch a height, that they went and complained of it to Cumanus, and in an inſolent mannner told him, that the affront was offered by his order, not only to the nation, but to God. He tried at firſt to appeaſe them by fair means; but finding them to grow more tumultuous, he ordered all his troops to come to the place; the ſight of which alarmed them ſo, that they fled in the greateſt fright and confuſion, inſomuch, that upwards of ten thouſand were ſtifled to death in their flight,

Year of the flood 3050. Of Chriſt 55 or 52.

[f] Id. ibid. [g] Ibid. c. iii. & bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 11.

taken notice of in a former ſection †; and is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the ſon of Ezechias mentioned by Joſephus under the name of Judas.

† Pag. 402, & (S).

flight, by running over one another in the narrow passages that led to and from the temple. The copies of Eusebius and St. Jerom say thirty thousand. Soon after this disaster another happened in Samaria, where some Galilean Jews, going to one of the feasts, were insulted, and one of them killed. This brought on a terrible skirmish, in which a great number of the Jews were killed, and the rest went to complain to Cumanus against the Samaritans; but he, being bribed by these, refused to do them justice; upon which the matter was brought before Quadratus, governor of Syria, who sent both parties toRome, and Cumanus with them, to answer for themselves there (A). The Samaritans were cast, and condemned to die, Cumanus sent into banishment, and Celer, one of his tribunes, who had been involved in the same guilt, condemned to be dragged through the streets of Jerusalem, and then put to death [h].

Felix made procurator of Judæa.

In the year following Claudius Felix, the brother of Pallas, the emperor's chief favourite, being then in Judæa, succeeded Cumanus in the government of it, under whom the Jewish affairs went from bad to worse (B). The land swarmed [h] Antiq ubi supra, c. 4, & 5.

(A) They were all sent in chains thither, though they were the heads of each of the contending nations. Those among the Jews were Annas and Jonathan, who had been both high-priests, Ananias the present pontiff, and his son the captain of the temple, or rather chief of the Levites, who were the keepers of it, with some others. Those of the Samaritans were likewise considerable persons, and those joined interest with Cumanus; but the credit of young Agrippa at the Roman court easily turned the scales in favour of the Jews.

Those in Judæa had not met with so favourable a judge, and Quadratus, who had the power to try and condemn even the governors themselves, if he found them guilty, though he remitted the grand trial to Cæsar's court, had caused a great number of the most stirring among them to be, some crucified, and others beheaded, besides those that had been killed in the several engagements, especially in the canton of Acrabatene (3).

(B) Josephus says, that the Jewish nation, especially Jonathan the late high-priest, had desired him for their governor. He had been the year before chosen one of the judges by Quadratus, in the dispute between them and the Samaritans, and had perhaps ingratiated himself to them by his mild behaviour towards them; but after he became their governor, he behaved without with robbers and banditti, and within with false prophets, and pretended miracle-mongers, who were still blowing the coals of discontent and sedition; so that there passed scarcely a day, in which there was not some dreadful execution made upon some of those miscreants [i]. To these we may join the Sicarii or assassins (C), which crouded themselves into all the cities and towns of the kingdom, and committed the most horried murders and butcheries, under covert and pretence of zeal for their religion and liberties. Among the false prophets, and pretended saviours, by whom that infatuated nation was seduced, there was a signal one that came from Egypt, and had drawn above thirty thousand men after him, by the large promises he made to them of a speedy deliverance. His followers were, however, soon dispersed by the Roman troops; but one was no sooner gone, but there haved like a tyrant. Tacitus says rightly of him (4); that he governed them with the arbitrariness of a monarch, and with the genius of a slave. He was the brother of Pallas, and therefore made no difficulty of committing the greatest oppressions and cruelties, till the flame broke out into an open rebellion, and ended in the most dreadful ruin and misery that ever nation felt.

(3) Antiq. l. xx. c. 5.

[i] Ibid. c. 6. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 12.

(C) These were another kind of robbers, who came and mixed themselves among the crouds and assemblies, with short daggers under their cloaks, and stabbed all that came near them in open day, and then were the first to cry out murder. They not only, by this vile method, rid themselves of their enemies, but would hire themselves to murder any others for a small sum. So that it became extremely dangerous to go into any places of public resort.

They are supposed to have been the spawn of the Gaulonitish faction, which began near fifty years before, as we have seen in a former section *; and in spight of all the severities which the Romans made them feel, still kept up their seditious spirit, and daily encreased in number. They were afterwards better known by the name of zealots, and under that specious title committed such unheard of crimes as hastened the total ruin of their city and nation. We have seen in a former volume †, whence they pretended to derive their origin; though by their actions one would rather think it came from hell, as we shall see in the sequel.

(4) Hist. l. v. c. 9. Conf. cum. antiq. ubi supra, c. 6.

* Pag. 362, & seq. † See vol. iii. p. 345, &c.

there ſtarted up another, ſo that the moſt violent remedies did rather inflame, than aſſuage, their ſeditious diſeaſe. But Felix did not exert his cruelties on the rebellious rout alone, but on all others indiſcriminately, whom his avarice or reſentment marked out for deſtruction. This obliged the good old prieſt Jonathan, who had been moſt inſtrumental in procuring him the government, to expoſtulate often with him, and to complain of his ill conduct. Felix at length, unable to bear his juſt cenſures, hired one Doras, a perſon in whom Jonathan put great confidence, to aſſaſſinate him, which was accordingly done (D). This murder going unpuniſhed, becauſe the perſon who ſhould have revenged it was the chief actor in it, proved the ſcource of an infinite number of others, which were committed every-where, the temple not excepted; and the Jewiſh chiefs and even the pontiffs made no ſcruple to hire the aſſaſſins above-mentioned, to rid them of any perſons that were obnoxious to them [k]. His character.

Marries Druſilla.

We have already taken notice, that Druſilla, Agrippa's daughter, had been contracted to Epiphanes; but he refuſing the circumciſion, her brother gave her to Azizus king of Emeſſa, who conſented to that ceremony out of love to her, ſhe being one of the fineſt women of that age. But as her virtue was far enough below her beauty, Felix, who was become enamoured with her, did eaſily perſuade her to forſake her huſband, and to be married to him, though a Pagan, and one of the worſt of that kind [l] (E). He was himſelf

[k] Id. ibid. [l] Id. ibid. & ſeq.

(D) It is impoſſible to gueſs from Joſephus, in what year this murder was committed; only by his expreſſions it ſeems to have been done about the beginning of Felix's government (5).

(E) Her two ſiſters did not prove much more virtuous than ſhe. Berenice the eldeſt, and formerly married to her uncle Herod king of Chalcis, being become a widow, was ſhrewdly ſuſpected of holding an inceſtuous intercourſe with her brother Agrippa. To ſuppreſs that ſuſpicion, ſhe married Polemon king of Pontus, and of part of Cilicia; but, ſhe ſoon after broke off with him, and by her looſe behaviour confirmed the reports that had been ſpread concerning her unlawful intrigues Her huſband on the other hand, who had embraced Judaiſm on her account, was no ſooner forſaken by her, than he caſt off herreligion, and returned to his paganiſm.

Mariamne

(5) Antiq. ubi ſupra c 6.

made perhaps more ſenſible of it than ever he had been, when the apoſtle St. Paul was brought before him, and made that noble diſcourſe on juſtice, temperance, or chaſtity, and a judgment to come; which threw him into ſuch a fit of remorſe and trembling, as made him cry out to him, It is enough, go thy ways for this time; and when I am more at leiſure, I will ſend for thee [m]. It proved however but of ſhort duration. Felix did afterwards ſend for him indeed more than once, but it was rather in hopes of a bribe from him, than a deſire of being made better acquainted with thoſe important truths, which he had heard of him; ſo that after near two years, finding himſelf diſappointed, and ready to be recalled from his government, he choſe to leave his priſoner in bonds, to ingratiate himſelf to the exaſperated Jews [n].

Feſtus ſucceeds Felix. Year of the flood 3056. Of Chriſt 62 or 59.

He was accordingly ſucceeded by Portius Feſtus, who upon his coming found the nation in that diſtreſſed condition, we have been ſpeaking of; and, which was ſtill worſe, the very prieſthood had begun a civil war among themſelves, ever ſince the laſt year of Felix's government, the occaſion of which ſeems to have been the frequent depoſitions of the pontiffs, and their pretenſions after it to a greater ſhare of the tythes than the inferior prieſts could afford them (F). Agrippa had the [m] Act. xxiv. paſſ. & antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 7. [n] Act. ubi ſupra, ad fin.

Mariamne the youngeſt had been married betimes to Archelaus the ſon of Chelcias or Elchias, probably of the Herodian family; but ſhe likewiſe forſook him to marry one Demetrius, an Alexandrian Jew, and one of the richeſt and moſt conſiderable of that city, and was then their Alabarea or chief (6).

(F) We have obſerved in a former volume *, that the Levites were to gather in the tythes from the people, and to allot a tenth part of them to the prieſts. Theſe allowed the high-prieſt a proportion of it ſuitable to his dignity, and divided the reſt among themſelves. When therefore the number of depoſed pontiffs began to encreaſe to ſuch a degree, as to leave the inferior ones too ſmall a quantity for their ſuſtenance, it bred a mutiny among them. The latter refuſing them their competency, they ſent their armed men to force it from them, to plunder their houſes and barns, and to kill all that oppoſed them. This obliged them to hire the ſicarii to repel force by force, and thoſe that could the year before depoſed Ananias, and put Iſhmael in his room; there were ſtill ſeveral more ſuch diſcarded pontiffs alive, who all pretended to the ſame income of the tythes, which they enjoyed with that dignity, which muſt of courſe impoveriſh the inferior ſort, who therefore refuſed it to them. The rancour aroſe at length to ſuch a height, that each party uſed to go along accompanied with a troop of the ſicarii, and upon every rencounter fell foul on each other, killing all that oppoſed them, and filled both city and country, and even the very temple ſometimes, with blood. Feſtus was therefore forced to begin his government with the greateſt ſeverity, in order to ſuppreſs this treble butchery; that of the prieſthood againſt each other; that of the ſeditious laity againſt the Romans and thoſe that contentedly ſubmitted to them; and that of the banditti abroad, who infeſted the whole country, and robbed, plundered, and maſſacred every-where without mercy [o]. The ſuppreſſion of all theſe different parties, and the ſevere examples he made of their leaders, impoſtors, and of the moſt ſtirring and mutinous of the rebels, was what took up the greateſt part of his time and labour during his ſhort government.

(6) Ibid. c. 5. * vol. iii. p. 239, & ſeq. (7) In vita ſua.

A civil war among the prieſts.

THREE days after his arrival in Judæa, he went to Jeruſalem, where Ananias the late high-prieſt, and the reſt of the Jewiſh chiefs, came to demand juſtice againſt Paul, who was ſtill kept priſoner at Cæſarea. As ſoon therefore as he was returned thither, he cauſed him to be brought before him, Paul brought before Feſtus.

[o] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 6.

could not ſtand thus in their own defence, were ſtripped of all they had, and left to ſtarve.

Joſephus ſays, that Felix had ſent a good number of them in chains to Rome to anſwer for their crimes, which yet he adds were of a light nature; and might therefore be ſome of this oppreſſed ſort who had armed themſelves againſt the cruelty of thoſe tyrants. He adds, that they were kept priſoners, ſome years, till he came himſelf thither on purpoſe to procure their freedom, which he did by the intereſt of Poppea, who was a lover of their nation, and was ſoon after married to the emperor Nero. He highly applauds the piety of thoſe prieſts, who, ſays he, were content to live upon nuts, and dry figs, rather than pollute themſelves with the uſual food of the Gentiles (7).

(7) In vita ſua.

him, and after a full hearing of both sides, especially of the prisoner's defence, pronounced him innocent of any capital crime. But his enemies still insisted that he was worthy of death, and Festus being willing to oblige them with a second trial at Jerusalem, Paul took hold on the privileges which the law then gave him, to appeal to Cæsar, and prevent there-by the effects of their further malice. Agrippa and his sister Berenice being come to Cæsarea to compliment the new governor, and having expressed a desire of seeing this celebrated prisoner, Festus, who knew that prince to be thoroughly versed in the Jewish laws and customs, readily agreed to have him brought once more to the bar. Here Paul being permitted to speak for himself made such a noble defence, that Festus acquitted him of every fault, except that of having turned his brain with too much learning; whilst Agrippa, conscious of the truth and force of his reasoning, owned himself almost convinced by him, and after some private conference with the governor, it was declared that he might have been released, if he had not appealed to Cæsar [P].

And Agrippa.

Agrippa displeases the Jews.

In the mean time Agrippa, who came often to Jerusalem, and had a lodging near the temple, of which he had the superintendency given him after his uncle Herod, took it into his head to build him a palace there, of such a height, that he could oversee all that was done in the innermost court of it. The Jews were the more displeased at it, because Festus and the Romans would likewise come and take a view of it from thence; for which reason they built a partition wall high enough to cover that sacred place, which, the king and governor taking it as an affront, ordered to be pulled down. The Jews, after much opposition, obtained leave at length to send deputies to Rome; and these by the intercession of Poppea (G), got a grant from the emperor, for the keeping up of the wall. Ishmael the then high-priest, being at the head of this embassy, was for his laudable zeal deposed by Agrippa, who bestowed that dignity on Joseph, surnamed Cabbis, the son

[P] Act. xxv, & xxvi. pass.

(G) Josephus highly commends that empress's piety, though, setting aside her love to the Jewish nation, she had not one virtue that could intitle her to this compliment. On the contrary, she was known to be a leud princess, the promoter of a great number of murders, which she made her husband commit on the greatest persons of the empire, and prevailed at length on that mad monarch to repudiate, banish, and at length put to death, his virtuous wife Octavia, to marry her, as we shall see more at large in the Roman history.

ſon of the late pontiff Cantharus. Joſephus, adds, that Poppea detained Iſhmael and Chelcias as hoſtages at Rome [q].

FESTUS dying towards the latter end of this year, Nero nominated Albinus to ſucceed him; in the mean time Agrippa, having given the high-prieſthood from Cabbis to Ananus, a proud Sadducee, this laſt took that interval before the arrival of the new prætor to call a council, and to have James the apoſtle and biſhop of Jeruſalem, aud ſome other chriſtians, condemned and ſtoned to death (H). Upon the governor's arrival at Alexandria, complaint was made to him of this preſumptuous and unlawful ſtep. Albinus reſented it, and ſent the new pontiff a very threatening letter; and Agrippa, who feared the conſequence of his anger, took care to depoſe him, and to put another in his room, viz. Jeſus the ſon of Damneus, before the governor was got to Jeruſalem. Judæa gained nothing by the change of either governor or pontiff. As for the former, he was ſuch a cruel rapacious monſter, that Felix and Feſtus, bad as they were, were honeſt men to him; and yet he was ſtill in one reſpect better than his ſucceſſor, in that he endeavoured at leaſt, either to hide or to colour his ill actions by ſome pretext or other.

HIS firſt care was to ſuppreſs the ſicarii, robbers, and banditti, which were now grown more numerous, and bolder than ever. He puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity as many as came into his hands, and they only became the more impudent by it; inſomuch that they ventured one night, during one of their feaſts, to enter into the city, and to carry off Eleazer the ſon of Ananias, the late high-prieſt, who was ſecretary of the temple, and to ſend his father word that they would not releaſe him, till he had procured the enlargement of ten of their aſſociates, whom Albinus kept in priſon. Ananias, who was a very opulent perſon, eaſily bribed with a round ſum the rapacious governor to conſent to it, but his compliance [q] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 7, ad fin.

(H) So ſays Joſephus; but we have related the manner of his death according to the teſtimony of ſome antient fathers in a late note, to which we refer the reader.

This Ananus was the fifth ſon of that Ananus or Annas, mentioned by the evangeliſts, that had enjoyed the high-prieſthood after their father, an honour and happineſs that never happened to any but him, ſays that Jewiſh hiſtorian (8).

(8) Antiq. l. xx c. 8.

compliance was attended with very bad consequences; being forced still to redeem some near relation at the same price, as often as any of the banditti were got into the governor's hands[r]. On the other hand Agrippa, having given the high-priesthood from Jesus the son of Damneus to Jesus the son of Gamaliel, those two pontiffs got each of them a strong escort of armed men, and committed the vilest outrages; not only against each other, but against the inferior sort, who were often plundered of all they had, and reduced to the lowest misery. About this time the Levites and singers, who, as we have formerly observed *, had no particular dress to distinguish them from the laity, obtained leave of Agrippa, to wear white robes like the priests, and some other privileges, which were contrary to the Jewish law, and did not a little displease the better sort of the Jews, as well as the whole priesthood. Agrippa was likewise become odious to his subjects, on account of his high taxes on them, to support his extravagance, sumptuous building, public spectacles, games, and such-like profusions [s].

About this time all the work of the temple being quite finished, and eighteen thousand hands at once discharged, as we observed in a former section †, a proposal was made to that prince to employ them in the taking down an old stately gallery of the temple, four hundred cubits high, which was in danger of falling, and rebuilding it a-new; but Agrippa considering the expensiveness and length of the work, absolutely refused it, and told the Jewish chiefs that they might employ those hands in paving the city with white stones; but that not being agreed to, the greatest part joined themselves with the banditti for fear of starving. Albinus after a two years government was recalled by Nero, and succeeded by Gessius Florus, the last and worst governor that ever Judæa had. Josephus seems at a loss for words bad enough to describe him by, or a monster to compare him to [t]; his rapines, cruelties, conniving for large sums with the banditti, and in a word, his whole behaviour, was so open and barefaced that he was looked upon by the Jews, more like a bloody executioner sent to butcher, than as a magistrate to govern them. His design was to provoke them to such an open rebellion, as might either give him the brutish pleasure of seeing them destroy each other, or prevent his oppressions, murders, and

Gessius Florus's bloody government. Year of the flood 3065. Of Christ 67 64

[r] Ibid. c. 8. * Vol. iii. p 275, & seq. [s] Antiq. ubi supra. Bell Jud l. ii, c. 1. 3 † pag. 308, & (Z). [t] Antiq. ibid. c 9. Bell. Jud. ubi supra.

and other helliſh works being enquired into. He ſucceeded but too well in it; and a war was kindled accordingly through his means, which ended not but with the total ruin of the Jewiſh nation. This great event, ſo plainly foretold by Chriſt, ſo punctually fulfilled, and ſo lively deſcribed and related by a Jewiſh hiſtorian, and an eye-witneſs, might well deſerve a larger place in this chapter; but as it is ſo very well known, and abounds with ſuch dreadful murders, cruelties, and other circumſtances, fit only to fill a reader with horror, we ſhall content ourſelves with giving ſome of the moſt remarkable ſtrokes of it, to avoid drawing the chapter to too great a length.

A prodigious warning to the Jews.

ABOUT four years before this dreadful war broke out, and about ſeven before the ſiege of Jeruſalem, whilſt the Jews did ſtill enjoy ſome kind of peace, a country fellow, named Jeſus, came to the feaſt of tabernacles, and was on a ſudden ſeized with a kind of phrenſy, as the Jews thought it, which made him cry out without ceaſing; Wo to the city, Wo to the temple: A voice from the four corners, a voice againſt Jeruſalem, a voice againſt the nation, &c. and in this lamentable tone he run through all the ſtreets of the city night and day, and on the ſabbaths and other feſtivals, was heard to ſpeak thoſe words louder, and in a more diſmal tone, without ever loſing his voice, or even being hoarſe with crying; and, what was ſtill more ſurprizing, neither threats nor the moſt ſevere puniſhments that could be inflicted on him (I), could make him deſiſt or utter a groan or complaint, or any other words than thoſe dreadful woes, till he ſaw his predictions begin to be fulfilled by the ſiege of the city, when he cried out in a more diſmal tone, Woe alſo to my ſelf; and was in that inſtant killed by a ſtone thrown in by the beſiegers [u]. There were ſeveral more ſuch prodigious warnings ſent to that unhappy nation in the ſequel, which though all too little to bring them to a better mind, are ſufficient to convince us, that [u] Bell. Judaic. l. vii. c. 12.

(I) Joſephus adds, that ſome of the Jewiſh heads, being highly diſpleaſed at this poor fellow, cauſed him to be ſeverely whipped; and that this not proving ſufficient either to ſilence him, or to make him anſwer to other queſtions; they had him brought before Albinus, who ordered him afreſh to the whipping poſt; where they gave him ſo many and ſevere laſhes, that his ribs were quite uncovered, without forcing a word or groan from him. And laſtly, that being diſmiſſed as a madman, he continued his dreadful outcries, without taking the leaſt notice by word or geſture, either of thoſe that hurted him, or gave him food.

that god did not doom them to this dreadful destruction, till their impiety and hardness of heart had forced that severe punishment from him.

Complaints made to Cestius Gallus. Year of the flood 3064. Of Christ. 69 66.

Judæa being thus distracted within and without, and groaning now more than ever under a tyrant, who openly promoted those mischiefs he should have remedied; vast numbers of Jews forsook it to seek an asylum among foreign nations, whilst those that stayed behind applied themselves to Cestius Gallus, the then governor of Syria, who was then at Jerusalem at the passover, and besought him to pity their wretched state, and free them from the tyranny of a man who had totally ruined their country. Florus, who was present when these complaints were preferred against him, made a mere jest of them; and Cestius, instead of making a strict enquiry into his conduct, dismissed them with a bare promise, that Florus should behave better for the future, and set himself about computing the number of Jews that were then at Jerusalem, by that of the lambs that were offered at that festival (K), in order to send an account of it to Nero; and by that computation the whole was found to amount to two millions five hundred and fifty-six thousand. Josephus thinks they rather amounted to three millions [w].

Soon after this, the contest betwen the Jews and Syrians about the city of Cæsarea, which had been kept in suspense ever since the time of Felix (L), being at length decided in favour [w] Ibid, l. ii. c. 13, & alib.

(K) This computation could not be very certain, because, though none but Jews offered these lambs at the feast, yet those who had contracted any legal pollution were excluded from it. Besides, one lamb might serve for twenty persons, though never for less than ten. However, they took this last number for each lamb; and found that of the lambs to amount in the whole to two hundred and fifty-five thousand. But as, among the poor, one of them might serve for more than ten, and as far as for twenty, Josephus rightly guesses that there must have been a much greater number, though considering the bigness of the place, one would wonder how it was possible for it to contain even that.

(L) This contest, in which the Jews maintained that that city belonged to them, because it had been built by Herod, and the Syrians pretended that it had been always esteemed a Greek city, since even that monarch had reared temples and statues in it; grew to such a height, that both parties came at last to blows, and took up arms against each other. Felix at length put an end to it for a time, by sending some of the chiefs of each nation to Rome to plead their cause before the emperor, where it hung in suspense till favour of the Syrians, the decree was no sooner brought to Judæa, but, as if it had been agreed, that this should be the signal for a revolt, the Jews every-where, resolved to take up arms; and thus began the fatal war in the second year of Florus's government, in the twelfth of Nero's reign, the seventeenth of that of Agrippa, and in the sixty-ninth year of Christ [x]. Agrippa, who was at this time at Jerusalem, at the beginning of this revolt strove in vain to assuage them by a long and elaborate speech, as well as by other proper means; they only listened to him, till he came to insist on their submitting to Florus, till a new governor could be obtained from Rome; this single proposal exasperated them to such a degree, that they began to pelt him with stones, and forced him to leave the city, which was immediately in a flame. Florus beheld all this with an inhuman pleasure, and without putting the least help to quell the sedition, though earnestly entreated to it by the Jewish heads. Agrippa sent them indeed three thousand men; but what could they do now against such an enraged multitude as were then up in arms? The evil soon spread all over the kingdom, and though the Jews were every-where the sufferers, yet did not their desperate rage abate in the least. Nothing was now to be seen but robberies, murders, and all manner of cruelties; cities and villages filled with dead bodies of all ages, sexes and quality, even down to the sucking babes. The Jews on their part neither spared Syrians nor Romans, but retaliated their cruelties where-ever they got the better of them, for which vast numbers of their peaceful brethren were butchered in their places of abode. The Cæsareans fell suddenly on those of their city, and massacred twenty thousand of them, two thousand were murdered at Ptolemais, and fifty thousand at Alexandria. In a word, there was neither town nor city, where the pagans proved either stronger or quicker than they, where they did not commit the same horrid butcheries. At Jerusalem Florus caused one day his troops to go and plunder the high market, and to kill all they met; and they murdered accordingly three thousand five hundred persons, men, women, and children. Among those that were brought prisoners to him, there were some men of quality, and who had been even honoured with the Roman knighthood; yet this till this time, when Nero decided it in such a manner as caused this insurrection.

Jews terribly persecuted.

[x] Conf. antiq. l. xx. c. ult. & Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 14.

this did not save them from his cruelty; on the contrary, he caused them to be whipped before his tribunal, and then crucified [y].

Berenice intercedes in vain.

BERENICE, who had stayed at Jerusalem after her brother, being bound there by a vow of Nazareat thirty days, spared neither prayers, messages, nor visits to mollify the brutish prætor, till at length she was likely to have lost her life by it, and with great difficulty recovered her palace before his hellish instruments could reach her. Yet not discouraged by it, she went barefoot to him on the very next day, threw herself at the footstool of his tribunal, and in the most submissive terms entreated him to put a stop to the shedding of so much blood. The brute did not so much as vouchsafe her the least token of common respect, so that she ran a second risk of being torn in pieces before she could get home [z]. This may serve to give a sketch of that governor's character, who, because he was depending on that of Syria, failed not to write to Cestius, and throw all the fault on the Jews; insomuch, that this last knew not well which to believe, Florus, or Agrippa, Berenice, and other considerable Jewish heads, who gave him a quite different account [a].

The zealots beat the Romans.

IN the mean time, a great number of assassins having joined themselves to the seditious, beat the Romans out of the fortresses of Massada, Antonia, and the towers of Phasael, Mariamne, and others; killing all that opposed them. They began next to set fire to the palaces of Agrippa, Berenice, of the high-priest Ananias, and of his brother Ezechias; and these two last, who had hid themselves from their fury, be-being discovered, were murdered without mercy. Menahem, one of the sons of the late Judas, chief of the Gaulonites, had now put himself at the head of the sicarii, who now called themselves zealots; and being come to Jerusalem, was chosen chief of the seditious there, but was soon after massacred by them, with a great number of his men. His nephew Eleazar succeeded him as chief of the zealots, and besieged the Romans so close in their castle, that they capitulated at length to retire only with their lives; which being promised to them, he caused them all to be massacred on the spot, though it was on the sabbath [b]. This treachery was cruelly retaliated on the generous Jews of Scythopolis, or Bethshean, who had offered the Greeks of that city to stand by them against their brethren, who were besieging them. But their sincerity being unhappily suspected by their townsmen, Scythopolitan Jews massacred.

[y] Ibid. [z] Ibid. c. 15. [a] cap. 16. [b] Ibid. c. 17, 18.

men, these obliged them to retire into some neighbouring wood, where on the third night they came upon them, when they were asleep, and killed thirteen thousand of them, and seized upon all their wealth [c] (M).

By this time the revolted Jews had carried their conquests beyond Jordan, and had taken the fortresses of Macheron and Cyprus; this last they rased to the ground, after having put all the Romans to the sword; so that Cestius Gallus, who had hitherto kept himself an idle spectator of all these mutual devastations, began to think it high time to bestir himself. He marched into Judæa with a powerful army, burned all the towns and villages in his way, massacred all the Jews he could come at, and came and encamped before Gibeon (N), about the feast of tabernacles. The people at Jerusalem no sooner heard of his approach, than they forsook the solemnity, and, though on the sabbath, armed themselves, and came out against him with such fury, that they had in all likelihood defeated him, had not his foot been timely succoured by his cavalry. He lost above five hundred men, and the Jews but twenty-two. The latter having seized on all the passes round about,

[c] cap. 19.

(M) It was on this dreadful occasion, that a considerable Jew, named Simon, who had signalized himself in the defence of Scythopolis against those of his own nation, observing what bloody returns the Greeks made them for their friendship, in a fit of rage and despair, instead of standing in his own defence, fell on his father, mother, wife, and children, who clung round about him, and killed every one of them; after which, getting on the heap of their dead bodies, he run himself through with his own sword (9).

(N) This city, the capital of the antient Gibeonites †, was distant about fifty stades or seven little miles north of Jerusalem, and situate on an eminence, as its name properly imports (10). Josephus says elsewhere, it was but forty stades from that metropolis (11).

Cestius's army consisted of the whole twelfth legion, two thousand men picked out of the other legions, six cohorts of foot, four of horse, besides three thousand horse and six thousand foot sent him by Agrippa and Antiochus, and four thousand from Soemus; in the whole about twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse.

(9) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 19. † Vid. Vol. ii. p. 201. (10) Joseph. ubi supra. Euseb. loc. Hebr. (11) Antiq. l. vii. c. 10.

Year of the flood 3064. Of Christ 69 66.

about, Cestius was forced to stay three days near Bethoron, where Agrippa joined him, and assisted him with his troops, his person, counsel, and good offices. He tried once more to bring the Jews to some temper, by sending two of his chief captains to offer them a pardon, and some terms of peace; but the revolters, instead of hearkening to their proposals, killed one of them, and wounded the other, who narrowly escaped with his life. This base action, which was highly condemned by the more moderate Jews, caused a dissension between them, which Cestius failed not to improve, by sallying suddenly against them, and pursuing them almost up to Jerusalem. He stayed three days at Scopas, a small mile from it, to try whether their fright would make them relent, and then advanced towards them in order of battle on the thirtieth of October, and put them into such consternation, that they abandoned all the outer quarters of the city, and retired into the inner cincture near the temple. Cestius set fire to the former, and began himself to besiege the latter, and took up his head quarters in the royal palace [d].

Cestius defeated.

HAD the governor vigorously pushed on the siege, it is likely he might have put an effectual end to the sedition; but that sinful nation was now reserved for greater evils, and the siege was on the sudden shamefully raised, at the instigation of some of Cestius's generals, whom Florus had corrupted; which gave a new life to the seditious. They pursued him to his camp at Gibeon, harassing him in the rear, whilst those that kept the passes attacked him in flank. His army in despair, not being able to move forward or backward, made the mountains echo with their hideous cries, and after a loss of four thousand foot, and four hundred horse, and of a great part of their baggage, being assisted by the intervening night on the eighth of November, happily got down through the narrow streights of Bethoron, and escaped [e]. The Jews, after this success against the Syrian governor, set themselves about the propereſt means to carry on the war against the Romans, and chusing some of their bravest chiefs to command in the several cantons and fortresses of Judæa, Josephus the writer of these wars, a brave Jewish priest, of considerable rank, was appointed governor of the two Galilees. Joseph the son of Gorion and the high-priest Ananus had the government of Jerusalem; and Eleazar, the chief of the revolters, that of Idumea; soon after which they departed to take care each of their particular commands. All this while there reigned Escapes with loss.

Jews and christians leave Jerusalem.

[d] Ibid. c. 20, 21, & seq. [e] cap. 23. 24.

reigned ſuch a diſſenſion among the Jews, that great numbers of the better ſort, foreſeeing the ſad effects of the Roman reſentment, forſook the city, as men do a ſinking veſſel, and the chriſtians, mindful of their Saviour's warning (O), retired into Pella, a ſmall city on the other ſide of Jordan, in the tetrarchy of Herod, whither the war did not reach [f].

WHILST the new choſen governors were putting their reſpective cantons in the beſt poſture of defence, the ſon of Gorion in repairing the fortifications of Jeruſalem, Joſephus in fortifying a vaſt number of places in the upper and lower Galilee, and raiſing of forces to the number of a hundred thouſand, preparing arms and amunition, and Eleazar was doing the ſame in Idumea; the news came to Nero of all theſe preparations, as well as of the ill ſucceſs of Ceſtius againſt the Jews. Veſpaſian, who had already ſignalized himſelf in Germany and England, being then with the emperor in Achaia, was nominated to march with all ſpeed againſt Judæa with a powerful army [g]. He came accordingly into Syria, gathered all his forces and thoſe of his auxiliaries, among whom Agrippa did not fail to meet him at the head of a conſiderable reinforcement of his own, whilſt Titus was ſent by his father to fetch the fifth and tenth legions from Alexandria into Judæa [h]. It is likely, Ceſtius did not long outlive his diſgrace, for we hear no more of him; and the Jews, elated at his defeat, if not alſo at his death, took it into their heads to go and beſiege Aſcalon. Antony, who commanded there, came out againſt them, and killed ten thouſand of them; they made a ſecond attempt, and were ſurpriſed in the way, and cut off to almoſt the ſame number. Niger, who headed the Jews, fled into a tower, to which Antony ſet fire; and not doubting but he was burnt in it, left the place; but upon the Jews coming three days after to bury their dead, they found him in a cave under-ground, where he had ſaved himſelf from the flames [i].

Veſpaſian ſent into Judæa.

Year of the flood 3065. of Chriſt. 70/67.

[f] cap 25, & ſeq. [g] lib. iii. c. 1. [h] cap. 2, & 3. [i] Ibid. c. 1, & ſeq. paſſ.

(O) Euſebius aſſures us (12), upon the teſtimony of ſome ancient fathers, that God was pleaſed to direct them to this flight even before the beginning of the war; and Epiphanius adds (13), by the miniſtry of an angel ſent on purpoſe to the church of Jeruſalem.

(12) Hiſt. Eccl. l. iii. c. 5. (13) Hereſ. 29, & ſeq.

Veſpaſian enters Judæa.

VESPASIAN, on the very beginning of the next year, having ſent Placidus to ſuccour the inhabitants of Sephoris (P) againſt the Jews, advanced towards Ptolemais with Agrippa, and was there joined by Titus at the head of another body of troops, with whom he had marched thither even in the very depth of winter, and came much ſooner than was expected. Their whole forces of horſe and foot conſiſted now of upwards of ſixty thouſand men, beſides ſervants, all excellently diſciplined, with which they entered Galilee, and having burnt Gadara, were marching to beſiege Jotapa. Joſephus, now governor of that province, having timely notice of it, went into that place, and defended it with great bravery and vigour, forty-ſeven days, in ſpight of all the Roman efforts and bravery. It was at length taken by aſſault about the beginning of July (Q), and put to fire and ſword; not one Jew eſcaped to carry the dreadful news, but they were all either murdered or made priſoners. There were reckoned forty thouſand of the former, and but twelve hundred of the latter, among whom was Joſephus, who had hid himſelf in a deep cavern, but was at length diſcovered, and by Veſpaſian's generous offers and entreaties, though much againſt the conſent of thoſe Jews that were with him (R), went and ſurrendered Jotapa taken by Veſpaſian.

(P) We have already obſerved, that this city was the metropolis of Galilee, and was very conſiderable for its ſtrength, ſituation, bigneſs, and opulence. It was now become obnoxious to the revolted Jews, by reaſon of its adherence to the Romans, ſo that it would have undergone a dreadful fate, had not Veſpaſian ſent timely ſuccours to it (14).

(Q) The reader may ſee the ſtrength of this place in Joſephus (15), with the many other remarkable particulars of this obſtinate ſiege (16), wherein the Romans were terribly peſtered by the valour and conduct of the beſieged, and the general himſelf wounded in the heel (17). This ſtout reſiſtance occaſioned the great ſlaughter he made of them, and the vaſt diſproportion between the number of the ſlain and of the priſoners, the latter being in all probability only women and children.

(R) This cavern was cut into the rock by the ſide of a well and well ſtored with proviſion; and there Joſephus found forty o his own men. He went out the firſt night to ſee whether ther was any poſſibility of eſcaping; but finding none, he reſolved t abide there as long as he could. He was diſcovered on the thi day by a woman, and Veſpaſian, who had a great deſire to ſe him

(14) Bell Jud. l. iii. c. 3. (15) ubi ſupra, c. 7. (16) Ibi c. 8. ad 13. (17) Ibid. c. 14.

ſurrendered himſelf priſoner to him. When he was brought before Veſpaſian, the whole army crouding about to ſee him, he was put under a guard, with a deſign to be ſent to Nero; which when the Jewiſh general underſtood, he deſired to have the liberty to ſpeak to him; which being granted, he addreſſed himſelf to him in words to this effect: My meſſage to you being from the God of heaven, is of much greater concern to you, than the diſpoſal of me as your priſoner, or ſending me to the emperor; and, as a Jewiſh commander, I ſhould have preferred death to this ſurrender, had it not been to deliver his divine commiſſion to you. The interval between Nero's end and your ſucceeding him is ſo ſmall, that I already look upon you as emperor, and your ſon Titus as your happy ſucceſſor. Keep me only as your priſoner, and if you find I have abuſed God's name in promiſing you from him the empire of the world, then puniſh me with the ſevereſt death. Veſpaſian took him at his word, uſed him with great reſpect and generoſity, but cauſed him to be kept cloſe priſoner, having a deſign to make ſome further uſe of him in his war againſt the Jews [k]. This prediction of the Jewiſh hiſtorian to the Roman general, is likewiſe confirmed by Suetonius [l] and Dion Caſſius [m]. Something like this, but with a more dreadful proſpect to the Jews, Lactanius tells us [n], had been foretold at Rome about the ſame time, by the two great apoſtles Peter and Paul; the ſubſtance of which Joſephus ſurrenders himſelf.

His ſpeech to Veſpaſian.

Kept cloſe priſoner.

A prophecy of St. Peter and Paul.

 the

[k] Id. ibid. cap. 12, 13, & 14. [l] In vit. Veſpaſ. [m] lib. lx. [n] lib. iv. c. 21. Vid. Uſſer ſub an. Chr. 67.

him, ſent him two of his tribunes to promiſe him his life and friendſhip. Upon his refuſal to ſurrender himſelf, he ſent a third, named Nicanor, and an old acquaintance of his; but he returning likewiſe without him, the Romans were for burning him and his men out of it, but were hindered by their brave general.

At length finding it dangerous to reſiſt any longer, he propoſed to the reſt to accept of Veſpaſian's generous offer; for which they upbraided him with treachery and baſeneſs, and threatened to kill him, if he preſumed to ſtir out. He tried once more to remonſtrate to them the unlawfulneſs of ſelf-murder, which he ſaw them now fully bent upon; he was forced at laſt to propoſe to them to draw lots, who ſhould kill the next, and ſo on, till the laſt man; which being agreed to by the reſt, providence ſo ordered it, that there were but two left, viz. Joſephus and one more; ſo that being loth either to kill him, or be killed by him, he at length perſuaded him to a ſurrender, which was accordingly done (18).

(18) Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 14.

the reader will find in the margin (S). As ſoon as the news of Jotapa's being taken had reached Jeruſalem, the Jews, who heard alſo that Joſephus had been killed in it, made the greateſt mourning and lamentations for him a whole month; but when they came to hear that he had ſurrendered himſelf priſoner to the Romans, they, who had till then retained a ſingular eſteem and regard for him, began now to look upon him as a baſe betrayer of his country, and to perſecute him with the moſt irreconcileable hatred and diſdain, of which they gave him many ſingular proofs, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

Jotapa and other cities taken.

WHILST Veſpaſian was beſieging Jotapa, Trajan (T) had been ſent to form that of Japha, in the neighbourhood, and took it on the twentieth of June, but complimented young Titus with the honour of it, who came accordingly upon the laſt aſſault. Upon their entering the place, the Japhians held out a bloody and obſtinate ſtreet fight during ſix whole hours; but being at laſt overpowered, all the men were put to

(S) That God ſhould in a little time ſend a prince againſt the Jews that ſhould overcome them, and level their metropolis with the ground: that during the ſiege of it, they ſhould pine with hunger and thirſt, even to the eating of one another: that after it was taken, they ſhould ſee their women grievouſly tormented before their eyes, their virgins deflowered, their young men torn aſunder, and their babes daſhed in pieces, themſelves reduced to the loweſt miſery, their country waſted with fire and ſword, and the whole nation baniſhed out of their own land, becauſe they had exalted themſelves above the moſt gracious and approved Son of God.

Theſe two apoſtles, according to the records of both eaſtern and weſtern churches, ſuffered martyrdom on the twenty-ninth of June, the laſt day of which month falls within the reign of Nero (19); and an antient father affirms, that the day of St. Paul's death was more certainly known than that of Alexander the great (20); and Dionyſius biſhop of Corinth tells us, that St. Peter ſuffered death on the ſame day (21). St. Paul was beheaded; but St. Peter was, according to our Saviour's prediction (22), crucified, but with his head downward at his own deſire, and out of reſpect to his divine maſter (23).

(T) Probably the ſame, who was afterwards emperor; but at preſent he was only a colonel of one of the legions.

(19) Uſſer's annal. ſub an Chr. 67. (20) Homil 26, in 2 Corinth. ap. eund. (21) Ap. Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. ii. c. 24. (22) John xxi. 18, & ſeq. (23) Orig. com in Gen. tom. 3. Vid. Euſeb. ubi ſupra, l. iii. c 1 to the ſword, and the women and children carried away priſoners [o]. A week after, the Samaritans, who had aſſembled upon mount Garizzim, with a deſign of defending themſelves, having been cloſely ſurrounded by Cerealis at the head of a Roman detachment, were ready to periſh for want of water. Many of them ſuffered themſelves to die with thirſt, and thoſe who refuſed to ſurrender, were all butchered to one man [p]. Joppa, which had been lately laid waſte by Ceſtius, being again repeopled by a great number of ſeditious Jews, who infeſted the countries about, Veſpaſian ſent ſome troops to take it, which they ſoon atchieved. Above four thouſand Jews endeavouring to eſcape the maſſacre, by betaking themſelves to their ſhips, a ſudden tempeſt drove them back, ſo that they were all either drowned, or put to the ſword. Tarichea and Tiberias were taken next (U): the former of theſe, being ſituate on an eminence and by the lake of Genezareth, was beſieged by land and by water, and made a deſperate defence, till a diſſenſion happened within; which being overheard by Titus, who commanded at the ſiege, the town was taken by ſtorm, and all the ſeditious condemned to die [q].

AFTER the reduction of thoſe two places, all the other cities of Galilee ſubmitted themſelves to the Romans, except thoſe of Giſchala and Gamala, and the mountain of Itabyr (W). Againſt Gamala, which was ſituate over-againſt [o] Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 11. [p] Ibid. c. 12. [q] Ibid. c. 15, & ſeq.

(U) Theſe two cities belonged to Agrippa, but had revolted; the latter was divided; ſome of the citizens, being for peace, were oppoſed by the ſeditious party. Veſpaſian ſent ſome officers to perſuade them to ſubmit, but they were repulſed, and forced to flee for their lives; for which he would have burnt the city, but the peaceable citizens having repreſented their caſe to Agrippa, he interceded for them, and obtained their pardon (24).

(W) The ſame with Thabor, ſpoken of in a former volume (25), with a ſpacious plain near twenty ſtades in ſquare on the top, with a city of the ſame name upon it. The area was encompaſſed with a large wall, built by Joſephus in about forty days (26).

As for the town of Sephoris, which was extremely rich and ſtrong, it never once rebelled during all this war, but kept conſtant

(24) Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 16. (25) Vol. iii. p. 109, & 110. (B). (26) Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 2.

Tarichea, on the ſame lake, as Agrippa had in vain carried on a ſiege of near ſeven months; the Romans were forced to come and aſſiſt him. He tried, however, by a ſet ſpeech to perſuade them to ſurrender, before they were reduced to greater ſtreights. The only anſwer they made him was with ſtones from their engines, one of which wounded him in the arm. The Romans, provoked to behold the little regard which thoſe wretches paid to their monarch, made ſuch a deſperate aſſault againſt them, that they had got poſſeſſion of the town; but being inferior in number, they were ſoon driven out of it with conſiderable loſs. It was renewed afreſh with greater fury, and as obſtinately oppoſed by the beſieged, who put the Roman courage and ſtrength to the ſevereſt proof they had as yet felt. At length three ſtout Romans having beaten down one of the towers, the army entered in at the breach, and put all they met to the ſword, to the number of four thouſand. But a much greater number periſhed by their own hands, flinging themſelves down from the rocks, walls, and by other violent means. During this ſiege, Placidus was ſent to take Itabyr mentioned in the laſt note. He went and ſlily drew the Jews down into the plain by a pretended flight, faced about, and defeated them, and got poſſeſſion of the mountain[r].

Giſchala taken.

AFTER this ſtout ſiege was over, Veſpaſian ſent his ſon Titus to form that of Giſchala; and this laſt, who was now beginning to relent at the great ſlaughter made at Gamala, earneſtly exhorted them to prevent, by a timely ſurrender, involving themſelves in the ſame fate. The citizens were inclinable enough to take his advice; but a ſeditious Jew of that town, named John, the ſon of Levi, head of the faction and a vile fellow, oppoſed it, and, having the mob at his beck, overawed the whole city. That day being the ſabbath, this wretch begged but of Titus to forbear hoſtilities till the morrow, and then he would accept of his offer; but inſtead of that fled to Jeruſalem, where he committed an infinite deal of miſchief. On the morrow the citizens came and ſurrendered themſelves, and told the Roman general of John's flight, begging of him that he would ſpare the guiltleſs, and only puniſh the factious, which he readily conſented to, and ſtant to their ſubjection to the Romans, ſo that Gamala and Giſchala were the two laſt towns in Galilee to be reduced.

[r] Ibid. l. iv. c. 1, & ſeq.

and only ſent ſome of his horſe after the fugitives. But John had reached Jeruſalem, before they could overtake him; they killed, however, near ſix thouſand of his followers on the road, and brought back three thouſand women and children priſoners. The taking and garriſoning of this laſt place completed the conqueſt of Galilee, and Titus rejoined his father at Cæſarea, where they gave their troops ſome reſpite before they went to beſiege Jeruſalem [s].

Two parties in Judæa

THE Jewiſh nation by this time was divided into two very oppoſite parties: The one, foreſeeing, that this war, if continued, muſt end in the total ruin of their country, were for putting an effectual end to it, by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion to the Romans: The other, which was the ſpawn of the Gauloniti ſh incendiary, and breathed nothing but war, confuſion, and cruelty, oppoſed all peaceable meaſures with an invincible obſtinacy. This party, which was by far the more numerous and powerful, conſiſted of men of the vileſt and moſt abandoned profligate character that ever hiſtory could parallel.

A character of the zealots.

They were proud, ambitious, cruel, rapacious, and committed the moſt horrid and unnatural crimes, under pretence of religion. In a word, if Joſephus's character of them may be credited, they acted more like incarnate devils, than like men, who had any ſenſe left of goodneſs and humanity. They covered, however, their helliſh brutality with the ſpacious title of zeal for the glory of God, affirming everywhere, that it was offering the greateſt diſhonour to him to ſubmit to any earthly potentate, much more to the Romans and heathens; and that this was the only motive that induced them to take up arms, and to bind themſelves, under the ſtricteſt obligations, not to lay them down, till they had either totally extirpated all foreign authority, or periſhed in the attempt [t] (X). This obliged the contrary party to riſe up

[s] Ibid. c. 4. [t] Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 6. ad fin. l. v. c. 1, & ſeq.

(X) This dreadful diſſenſion was not confined to Jeruſalem, but had infected all the cities, towns, and villages of Paleſtine. Even houſes and families were ſo divided againſt each other, that, as our Saviour had expreſsly foretold in the dreadful picture he made of this final war (26), a man's greateſt enemies were often thoſe of his own family and houſhold (27).

(26) Matth. xxiv. paſſ Mark xiii. Luke xxi. 5, & ſeq. (27) Matth. x. 36. Luke xii. 52, & ſeq.

up likewiſe in arms in their own defence againſt thoſe hell-hounds, from whom, however, they ſuffered unſpeakably more, than they did even from the exaſperated Romans, as we ſhall ſoon ſee.

Their horrid butcheries. Year of the flood 3065. Of Chriſt 70 67.

THE zealots began to exerciſe their cruelty in robbing, plundering, and maſſacring all that oppoſed them in the countries round about; after which they eaſily entered Jeruſalem, with Zechariah and Eleazar at their head. Here they were, at firſt, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the late high-prieſt Ananus (Y), whoſe zeal upon this occaſion Joſephus highly commends. That pontiff made a pathetic ſpeech to the people, exhorting them to take up arms againſt thoſe factious villains, who had by this time ſeized upon the temple and made it their garriſon, from which they ſallied out to commit the vileſt outrages and butcheries. He eaſily perſuaded them to follow his advice, upon which they went and armed themſelves, and returned in a ſtrong body, and made a vigorous attack againſt them. The engagement was fierce and obſtinate on both ſides, and laſted a conſiderable time. At length, Ananus forced them out of the outer cincture of the temple, whence they retired into the inner, where he held them cloſely beſieged. We have already taken notice of a vile demagogue, John of Giſchala, who had fled lately from this laſt place to Jeruſalem, and was at the head of the ſeditious; this wretch, under pretence of taking the intereſt of the peaceable party, was actually betraying them to the zealots.

Seize the temple.

(Y) He had been depoſed about ſix years before, as we have already ſeen, and ſucceeded by ſeveral others. Matthias the ſon of Theophilus was now in that dignity, to which he had been raiſed a year or two before by king Agrippa (28); but the ſeditious in the temple took it into their heads to chuſe another in his ſtead, which they did by caſting lots firſt for the twenty-four claſſes, in which the twelfth was taken, and in that, upon one Phannias, a man wholly unfit for it, and whom they were forced to teach the manner of performing his office.

This unprecedented boldneſs, joined to their maſſacres and other pollutions of the temple, and even of the very ſanctuary, gave ſuch offence, not to the prieſts only, but to all the religious Jews, that they ſought from that time for ſome means of ridding themſelves of their tyranny, whilſt the zealots crew made a jeſt of them, and of every thing that was ſacred, ſerious, or humane.

(28) Bell. Jud. l. iv c. ult.

zealots. Ananus, not ſuſpecting his treachery (Z), ſent him to offer the beſieged ſome fair terms of accommodation; inſtead of which, when he came to them, he perſuaded them to hold out, and call the Idumeans to their aſſiſtance. They did ſo, and procured twenty thouſand of them to come to their relief; but when theſe approached the metropolis, Ananus refuſed them entrance, and exhorted them in a civil and friendly manner to retire into their own country; at which they were ſo exaſperated, that they accuſed him of being in the Roman intereſt, and juſt going to betray the city to them. They ſet down before the walls for that day, threatening Ananus and Jeſus the ſon of Gamaliel, another depoſed high-prieſt, in the ſevereſt terms, if they did not open their gates to them [u].

Invite the Idumeans.

On that very night there happened ſuch a dreadful ſtorm, accompanied with thunder and lightening, and a violent earthquake, that the zealots, from within the inner court, ſawed the bolts and hinges of the temple gates, without being heard, forced the guards of the beſiegers, and ſallied into the city, and let in the Idumeans [w]. Theſe two parties, thus joined and ſtrengthened, began to commit the moſt horrid and unheard-of murders and butcheries on the oppoſite ſide. Barely to put them to any ſpeedy death, was what they thought too mild a puniſhment; they muſt have the pleaſure to murder them by inches; ſo that they made it now their diverſion to put them to the moſt exquiſite tortures that could be invented, neither could they be prevailed upon to diſpatch them till the violence of their torments had rendered them quite incapable of feeling them. Twelve thouſand perſons of noble extraction, and in the flower of their age, were butchered in that horrid manner, and among them the brave Ananus (A) and Jeſus the ſon of Gamaliel, who had ſo nobly.

Horrid butcheries committed.

[u] Ibid. l, iv. c. 5, 6. [w] cap. 7.

(Z) Such was their infatuation, that this wretch, who had ſkrewed himſelf into all their councils, and betrayed them to the zealots, had behaved with ſuch an affected integrity, that few of them ſuſpected him; and when ſome of the council began to queſtion his counterfeited zeal, they were over ruled by the reſt, who contented themſelves with making him ſwear, that he would be true to them; which gave him all the opportunity of ruining them that he could deſire.

(A) We have obſerved elſewhere, that he was the ſon of Annas mentioned in the goſpel: It was he that cauſed St. James to be bly oppoſed them. In a word, the zealots fury and cruelty was grown to ſuch a height, that the whole nation trembled at their very name; none dared be ſeen or heard to weep or cry for the murder of their neareſt relations, nor even to give them burial [x].

THE Idumeans crying out ſhame at length at the maſſacring of ſuch numbers of worthy perſons indiſcriminately, the zealots began to ſet up a kind of court judicature, to judge thoſe they ſhould think guilty with ſome ſhew of juſtice. Zechariah the ſon of Baruch (B) was one of the firſt who was brought before this mock court, which conſiſted of ſeventy-two perſons. They brought a black catalogue of accuſations againſt him, which he not only refelled with great eaſe and plainneſs, but reminded them of their own black and helliſh crimes, with ſuch noble courage and in ſuch lively colours, that the conſciouſneſs of their guilt made them pronounce him innocent; at which the zealots were ſo exaſperated, that they murdered him on the ſpot, bidding him at the ſame time to take that abſolution at their hands, which would prove ſurer to him than that of his judges; after which they drove theſe out Zechariah murdered in the temple.

[x] Lib. v. c. 1.

be caſt down from the battlements of the temple, and to be put to death. In other caſes, he was a brave man, and the only perſon almoſt that had courage and conduct enough left to ſtem the tide, and to reſtore peace to the nation; and it was for this reaſon that the zealots cut him off.

(B) This brave and worthy perſon is by many chriſtian commentators ſuppoſed the ſame with the Zechariah the ſon of Barachiah, ſaid by our Saviour to have been murdered between the temple and the altar (29). It is indeed objected, that he ſpeaks there of him, as of a perſon long ſince put to death; but it is replied, that he ſpake prophetically, and, according to the prophetic ſtyle, made uſe of the preſent for the future. And it muſt be owned, that unleſs theſe two hiſtorians ſpeak of the ſame perſon, it will be difficult to find out the Zechariah mentioned in the goſpel, the laſt of thoſe juſt perſons, the ſhedding of whoſe blood was to fill up the meaſure of the Jews iniquities.

We ſhall not enter into the merit of the controverſy, but refer our readers to thoſe who have writ upon it, and which the reader will find in the margin (30).

(29) Matth. xxiii. 35. (30) Vid. Grot. Hamm. Le Clerc, Beza, Tremel. L. de Dieu, & Fabric. Apocr. N. T. not in Protevang. Jacob.

out of their ſeats as perſons unfit for their purpoſe. They threw the body of Zechariah out of the temple down into the deep valley that was by the ſide of it; and the Idumeans, aſhamed to act any longer in concert with ſuch bloody aſſaſſins, retired into their own country, after having ſet at liberty two thouſand of their priſoners, and left the zealots to reign in their cruelties without any further reſtraint. From this time theſe bloody hell-hounds, who were glad at heart to ſee their backs turned upon them, gave themſelves a looſe to all manner of barbarities; and as nothing rendered a man more dreadful to them than the bare ſuſpicion of his being honeſt or virtuous, ſo they made the greateſt havock among all that had the leaſt pretence to that character [y].

THEIR rage did not ſtop there; but, after having butchered all the perſons of any diſtinction or character, they began to wreak it on the common people. It was a capital crime to have once ſeemed to oppoſe them: to be unactive, was to be a ſpy on them; and not to applaud their vileſt actions, was to be diſaffected; and to be either rich, or ſuſpected to be ſo, or even having the misfortune of being diſliked by them, was crime enough to deſerve death [z]. This obliged many of the Jews to forſake Jeruſalem and to take ſhelter under the Romans, though the gates and avenues of the city were ſo cloſely guarded, that it was extremely hazardous to retire to them, and as many as were caught doing ſo were put to immediate death. All this while Veſpaſian, who was at Cæſarea, remained a kind of idle ſpectator afar off of the diſmal condition of the Jewiſh nation. His officers, amazed at this ſo unuſual inaction, took the liberty to remind him, what pity it was he ſhould thus neglect the moſt favourable opportunity of making himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem and all Paleſtine. Veſpaſian, who had a longer head than they, ſoon made them ſenſible, that his continuing thus idle in Cæſarea was the moſt probable means of effecting the conqueſt they were ſpeaking of, with the leaſt difficulty and hazard of his own troops; ſince the Jewiſh ſtrength dwindled daily more and more by their inteſtine broils and maſſacres, whilſt his own men, after enjoying ſo long a refreſhment, would be the better able to cruſh them into ſubmiſſion or death [a] (C).

Veſpaſian ſtays at Cæſarea.

EVERY

[y] Ibid. [z] Ibid. in fin. [a] Ibid c 2.

(C) The event ſhewed that he reaſoned like a conſummate general; for thoſe cruelties did not only thin the enemy, but forced

The zealots divided into two factions,

EVERY thing ſucceeded to his wiſh. The zealots, after having maſſacred or driven away the oppoſite party, began to turn their bloody ſwords againſt each other. John of Giſchala, a wretch of unparallelled ambition, could not brook that any ſhould ſhare the command with him; and, in order to make himſelf abſolute, drew the moſt profligate of the zealots into his party. The other chiefs, who oppoſed him with no ſmall heat, made another faction, ſo that they were ever either ſkirmiſhing with each other, or plundering the poor remains of the people. Whilſt things went thus on from bad to worſe in the city, there aroſe a new gang of ſicarii in the country, who having ſeized the ſtrong fortreſs of Maſſada, made it their place of retreat. Theſe plundered, burned, and maſſacred every-where, and carried their plunder into that place. They had at their head one Simon the ſon of Gorias, a bold ambitious young man, a native of Gelaſa, who, to encreaſe his party, cauſed a proclamation to be diſperſed, in which he promiſed free liberty to all the ſlaves, and proportionable encouragements to all the freemen, that ſhould come over to him. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect; and he ſaw his party in a very little time ſwelled into a conſiderable army, and himſelf as reſpected and obeyed, as if he had been a monarch. Many Jews of diſtinction, as well as others forced a vaſt many of the zealots away to the Romans by reaſon of ſome diſſenſions which began to reign among them, and in ſpight of the danger of being caught in the way.

Simon head of the ſicarii.

Among their cruel executions of theſe, there was one Niger, a Peraite or native of Perea, a perſon of diſtinction, who had ſignalized himſelf in their former wars againſt the Romans; who, together with the brave Gorion, was ſeized, and dragged ſhamefully out of the city; where the former, finding his death inevitable, only begged that his body might be afterwards buried. But the mercileſs wretches refuſing to grant him even that, he addreſſed himſelf to heaven, and prayed, that the Romans might at length come, and wreak their direct vengeance on thoſe murderers. His words were looked upon as prophetical; but Joſephus mentions ſome other oracles, which had long ago foretold the total ruin of that nation as well as deſtruction of the city and temple. Whoever reads the eleventh and following chapters of Zechariah, will be apt enough to think, that the Jewiſh hiſtorian had an eye to them (31), among the many others we could name to the ſame purpoſe.

(31) Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, in fin. cap. 1.

others of a meaner rank, were glad thus to put themſelves under his protection from the cruelty of the other parties [b].

Nero's death. Year of the flood 3066. Of Chriſt 71 68.

WHILST theſe things were tranſacting in Judæa, Nero, having been declared an enemy to Rome by the ſenate, left both it and the world to avoid the more ſhameful puniſhment decreed againſt him [c], as ſhall be further ſhewn in the Roman hiſtory. Veſpaſian, who was yet ignorant of it, and did not give great heed to Joſephus's prediction of his becoming emperor, was making great preparations againſt the revolted Jews and for the ſiege of Jeruſalem, whilſt Simon, at the head of a good army, was making war againſt the zealots. Theſe laſt, having notice what great magazines of arms and ammunition Simon had got, in order to come and inveſt them, began to think it high time to try to diſperſe his forces by a vigorous ſally. They did ſo, and were defeated and put to flight; but Simon, not thinking himſelf ſtrong enough yet to beſiege Jeruſalem, went to invade Idumea with an army of twenty thouſand men. The Idumeans marched againſt him with twenty-five thouſand, which was all they could get in that ſhort time. A fierce battle enſued, which laſted from morning till night, by which time it could ſcarcely be gueſſed which ſide had had the better. But Simon found means ſoon after to have that country betrayed to him by a treacherous Idumean (D), who having got the command of their forces, delivered them up to him, as had been agreed between them. Simon put all to fire and ſword, and, by the conqueſt of that province, became more dreadful than ever to the zealots; who from that time did not dare to come out Idumea invaded by Simon.

Betrayed to him.

[b] Ibid. c. 3, & ſeq. [c] Sueton. in Neron. c. 40. Tacit. hiſt. l. i.

(D) This miſcreant, whoſe name was James, was one of the Idumean chiefs, and was ſent by the reſt to reconnoitre the enemy and know the number of their forces. He ſet out from the Idumean camp at Oltura, and privately agreed with Simon to deliver up the army and country to him, on condition he ſhould be treated with honour; which being promiſed, he returned to his camp, and there repreſented the enemy's army as vaſtly more numerous and ſtrong than it really was; by which means he eaſily obtained the command, and compaſſed his treacherous deſign (32).

(32) Bell. Jud. l. 7. c. 7.

out againſt him, but contented themſelves with laying ambuſhes againſt him in all the paſſes, in one of which they took his wife priſoner. They were on the ſudden ſtrangely elated at their ſucceſs, not doubting but they ſhould now eaſily force him to lay down his arms, in order to get her releaſed to him. But it happened quite otherwiſe; for Simon no ſooner heard the news, than he poſted with his army to the very gates of Jeruſalem, where he committed ſuch cruelties, and threatened the enemy into ſuch a fright, that they were glad to ſend him his wife again, after which he left them to go and ruin the ſad remains of Idumea. Theſe miſerable wretches, ſeeing the devaſtations and butcheries which he committed there, left the country to his mercy, and went to take ſhelter at Jeruſalem, and were purſued by his troops to the very walls of that metropolis [d].

THUS Simon without, and John within, ſeemed to ſtrive which ſhould outdo the other in cruelties and in the moſt unheard-of crimes; whilſt thoſe that fell into either hands were ſure to be butchered without mercy; inſomuch, that there was now no ſafe place either in city or country. John had hitherto tyranniſed within at the head of his blood-hounds with uncommon ſucceſs, when the Idumeans, who were left in the city and were of his party, not being longer able to bear his tyranny, revolted againſt him, killed a great number of his men, plundered his palace (E), and forced him to retire into the temple. In the mean time, the people, having taken a notion that he would ſally out in the night and ſet fire to the city, called a council, in which they pitched upon a remedy far worſe than the diſeaſe, which was to open the city gates, and let in Simon with the troops to oppoſe thoſe of John and his zealots. Matthias, the then high-prieſt, againſt whom theſe laſt had ſet up an obſcure prieſt into that dignity, promoted the deſign, without troubling himſelf

[d] Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 7.

(E) This palace had, it ſeems, been built there by the princeſs Grapta, couſin to Izates king of Adiabene, of whom we have had occaſion to ſpeak in the laſt volume *.

As for the horrid crimes and beſtialities of the zealots within, as well as of Simon without, they are of ſo ſhocking a nature, that we ſhall paſs them by in ſilence. Thoſe that can read them without horror, may ſee them in the Jewiſh hiſtorian (33).

* Vol. ix. p. 635, & ſeq.

(33) Bell. Jud. ibid. & ſeq. ad c. 9.

himself about the consequences of it, and was sent to acquaint Simon with it. Simon was accordingly admitted into the city, where his chief care now was to render his strength as great, and authority as absolute, as he could. To this end he looked indifferently on those that had invited him in, and those against whom he was called, and soon began to exert his cruelty against them equally, though the former had received him, with great honours and universal acclamations, as their future deliverer. But ingratitude and breach of faith were crimes of too light a nature to scare a wretch that had discarded all natural and civil virtues, to abandon himself to the most monstrous vices. He made, however, a bold assault against John and his party; but being as stoutly repulsed, he contented himself for the present with keeping them closely besieged in the temple [e].

Gadara surrendered.

THE Romans, on the other hand, had not stood idle all this last year; but being invited by the inhabitants of Gadara, one of the strongest places on that side of Jordan, had sent Placidus to take possession of it. He was forced to fight his way through several stout bodies of the factious who opposed him. He killed about fifteen thousand of them, as they were endeavouring to pass that river, besides a great number of others, whom he defeated at several encounters, and many more made prisoners. In a word, Placidus bestirred himself so well, that he soon reduced all that part of Judæa which lies on the east side of the Jordan, except the castle of Macheron. All this was done in the winter. In the beginning of the spring, Vespasian, marched out of Cæsarea, and penetrated near half of Idumea, plundering and burning every place he came through, except such as he thought expedient to leave with a Roman garrison to keep the country in awe [f].

Idumea wasted.

SOME months before this time, Vespasian received the news of Nero's death, and of Galba's being chosen his successor; upon which he immediately dispatched his son Titus to Rome, to compliment the new emperor, and to receive his orders concerning the reduction of Judæa. Agrippa desired him to bear him company, but the winter not being quite over and their ships being of a large bulk, they sailed so slowly, that they were got no farther than Achaia, when they received the news of Galba's being murdered, after a seven months reign, and Otho's being proclaimed in his room. Agrippa resolved to continue his voyage, but Titus, as by some divine impulse, was now come back to rejoin his father at Cæsarea, whither he ear of the ood 3066. of Chriſt 73 78

[e] Ibid. c. 9. [f] Ibid. cap. 3.

he was returned after his Idumean expedition [g]. They left Cæſarea on the fifth of June, and led their army towards Jeruſalem, and took every place in their way thither, except Herodion, Macheron, and Maſſada, whilſt Cerealis, one of their chief generals, was laying waſte the upper Idumea with a conſiderable number of troops.

WHILST Judæa was thus miſerably torn with a foreign, and with their inteſtine wars, the Roman empire was in as bad a plight with their own. We ſhall not anticipate on the Roman hiſtory, ſo far as to enter into the particulars of the murder of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Suetonius [h] compares Rome to a veſſel toſſed about by contrary winds, and ready at every moment to ſink, when Veſpaſian was happily choſen emperor, and reſtored a calm to the empire. Joſephus now reaped the benefit of his former predictions, and that emperor recalling them to mind, thought it high time now not only to give him his liberty, but recompenſe him for his faithfulneſs to him with many ſignal favours [i] (F). As ſoon as Veſpaſian had received the news that his election had been confirmed at Rome, he left the beſt of his troops with his ſon, with orders to go and beſiege Jeruſalem and to deſtroy it utterly; after which he prepared himſelf to return to the capital of his empire.

Veſpaſian choſen emperor.

Joſephus ſet at liberty.

ALL this while the Jewiſh diſſenſions encreaſed, and Eleazar, the ſon of another Simon, a perſon of the ſacerdotal order

Three factions in Jeruſalem.

[g] Tacit. Sueton. ubi ſupra. bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 8, & ſeq.
[h] In vit. Veſpaſ. [i] Ubi ſupra, cap. 12.

(F) Veſpaſian was then at Berytus, where vaſt numbers of embaſſadors came crouding to compliment him on his election, and to offer him the uſual crowns and letters of ſubmiſſion. Here he held a grand council, wherein having highly extolled the courage of the Jewiſh chief, he related to them how he had foretold his coming to the empire even during Nero's life.

Titus, who was there preſent and had conceived a great eſteem for him, declared, that it would be an action worthy his goodneſs and juſtice to grant him his liberty, to knock off his fetters, and to reſtore him to the rank and condition which he enjoyed before his captivity; it being the cuſtom of the Romans to break the bonds of thoſe who had been unjuſtly detained in them. Veſpaſian approved his propoſal, and cauſed it to be put in execution out of hand; and Joſephus not only gained his liberty by it, but got the reputation of a prophet, and was in high credit in the Roman army ever after (34).

(34) Bell. Jud. l. vi. c. 2.

order and of great ſenſe and courage, found means to form a new party, and to draw a conſiderable number of John of Giſchala's men to him, under pretence, that this laſt was become ſo inhuman and tyrannic, that it was dangerous to let him lord it any longer over them. With this new party he ſeized on the court of the prieſts, and confined John to that of the Iſraelites. Eleazar kept the avenues ſo well guarded, that none were admitted to come into that part of the temple, but thoſe who came thither to offer ſacrifices, and it was by theſe offerings chiefly that he maintained himſelf and his men. John by this means found himſelf hemmed by two powerful enemies, Eleazar above (G), and Simon, who was maſter of the city, below. He defended himſelf againſt the former by his engines (H), out of which he kept ſtill throwing ſtones into his court; and when he ſallied out againſt the latter, he ſet all on fire where-ever he could reach, by which he deſtroyed great quantities of corn and other proviſions, with which they might otherwiſe have held out a ſiege ſeveral years. Thus were theſe three factions ever watching all advantages againſt each other. Simon had the greateſt number of troops and a ſtore of arms and proviſions, his army conſiſting of ten thouſand zealots and five thouſand Idumeans; but

Their condition and advantages.

(G) We have formerly obſerved in our deſcription of this ſtately building, that the innermoſt court was raiſed conſiderably above the reſt, having a terraſs and nineteen ſteps to aſcend to the area of it *.

(H) John had luckily found a great quantity of large cedar trees, which king Agrippa had cauſed to be brought from Libanus at a vaſt charge, to raiſe the temple twenty cubits higher than it was, or perhaps that part which we obſerved in the note laſt quoted to have been ſunk that number of cubits through the weakneſs of the foundation; but his project was ſet aſide by reaſon of the war.

John, having poſſeſſion of this court, ſoon put this timber to other uſes, and cauſed towers and other engines to be made with it, in order to beſiege his competitor within; and indeed he ceaſed not haraſſing him, but whilſt he was forced to defend himſelf againſt Simon, who beſieged him from without. The flight of ſteps and terrace mentioned in the laſt note not permitting him to bring his towers near enough to the wall of the inner cincture, he was projecting to have removed them towards the weſtern ſide, where the ground was all plain; but providence ſo ordered it, that Titus began the ſiege of the city before he could compaſs it, which made him ſet his project aſide.

* See before, pag. 310 ſub not.

he was the moſt diſadvantageouſly ſituated of the three. John had the advantage over him in this laſt reſpect, but had but ſix thouſand men, and was forced to get proviſions for them by his conſtant ſallies. He was ſuperior to Eleazar in number of men; this laſt having but about two thouſand four hundred. But he was more ſtrongly ſituated, and was continually ſupplied with proviſions, by the continual offerings which the people brought to the temple, and which they often abuſed by luxury and drunkenneſs [k].

THIS was the ſad diſtracted ſtate of Jeruſalem, when Titus marched his army againſt it. He had, beſides the three legions which had ſerved under his father, the fifth legion, which had been ſo ſadly handled by the Jews in Ceſtius's time, and now burned with a deſire of revenge. Beſides theſe, Agrippa, Soemus, and Antiochus, the two former of whom accompanied him in perſon, and ſome allied cities, had furniſhed him with twenty regiments of foot and eight of horſe, beſides vaſt multitudes of Arabs, and a choice number of perſons of diſtinction from Italy and other places, who came to ſignalize themſelves under his ſtandards. Titus ordered the fifth legion to take the road of Emmaus, the tenth that of Jericho, the other two legions marched after him in the order, which the reader will find in the margin [l] (I). It was now the beginning of April and near the feaſt of the paſſ-

over

[k] Bell. Jud. l. vi. c. 1. [l] Ibid. in fin. & cap. 2.

(I) Joſephus, who was an eye-witneſs of it, becauſe he was ſtill ordered to follow the emperor, gives it to us as follows *:

The auxiliaries marched firſt, and were followed by the pioneers, whoſe buſineſs was to level the ground as they went. After them came the general quarter-maſters, who marked out their encampments, and were followed by the baggage of the chiefs of the army under a ſufficient eſcort.

Titus came next, attended with his guard and a ſelect body of troops, followed by a body of horſe, who marched juſt before the warlike engines; and after theſe came the tribunes and chiefs of the cohorts, attended with a choſen number of troops. Then appeared the Roman eagle, ſurrounded with the enſigns of the ſeveral legions, and preceded by a number of trumpets ſounding, and followed by the mean body, which marched in rank and file ſix in a front. Laſtly, came the ſutlers, handicrafts, &c. attended with a ſtrong guard of ſoldiers, which cloſed the whole march. In this order they came to Gophna, which had a Roman garriſon, and on the next day to Gibbeath-ſaul, about thirty ſtades, or three miles and a half, from Jeruſalem.

* Ibid. c. 1. in fin.

over, to which there was a greater reſort of Jews this year, than had ever been known, even from beyond the Euphrates (K).

TITUS being advanced ſo near the city, went himſelf to reconnoitre its ſtrength and avenues, attended only with ſix hundred horſe; he ſeemed even to flatter himſelf, that, upon his firſt appearance, the peaceable part of the Jews would open Titus's army. Year of the flood 3066. Of Chriſt 73 or 68.

(K) The chiefs of the Jews in Paleſtine had written, it ſeems, to invite all their brethren every where, not doubting but their preſence and great concourſe would contribute to quell the factions within, as well as oppoſe the Romans without; ſo that they came flocking to this ſolemnity from all parts of the world.

But it ſeems as if they were directed thither by the hand of providence to ſuffer the puniſhment of their ſins, the bulk of the nation being there, as it were, ſhut up in a priſon, to add to that of the deſtroying ſword, the dreadful plagues of famine and peſtilence, which ſhortly after devoured them. Joſephus reckons eleven hundred thouſand that died during the ſiege.

They neither wanted arms, warlike engines, men, or courage, or any thing but experience to make a brave defence; but this they made up by their invincible obſtinacy and deſpair. Their city was ſtrongly ſituate by nature, ſurrounded with three ſtout walls, and many a ſtately and ſtrong tower. The firſt or old wall, which by reaſon of its vaſt thickneſs was looked upon as impregnable, had ſixty of theſe towers, very lofty, firm, and ſtrong. The ſecond had fourteen, and the third eighty. The former of theſe, beſides its extraordinary height and thickneſs, was raiſed on a high and ſteep mountain, and had a valley beneath it of a prodigious depth. The other two were high and ſtrong in proportion. The circuit of the city was thirty-three ſtades, or four thouſand one hundred and twenty-five geometric paces, or near four of our miles.

Beſides theſe vaſt fortifications, there were ſeveral other caſtles of extraordinary ſtrength, ſuch as thoſe of Hippicos, Phazael, Mariamne, and Antonia; to ſay nothing of the royal, and ſome other ſtately and well-fortified palaces. The temple ſtill exceeded all the reſt in ſtrength, both for ſituation, its walls, towers, and other buildings, and was at leaſt equal to the beſt citadels then in being (35). Yet how inſufficient did all theſe, and the vaſt quantities of arms, ammunition, &c. prove, to ſave a nation, whom the divine juſtice had doomed to the moſt dreadful deſtruction! Well might Titus, after he had taken the city, and came to view the incredible ſtrength of it, cry out, "that God muſt have certainly fought for him, ſince no human power or ſtrength was equal to that which they had now overcome."

(35) See Joſephus, ibid. ch. 6.

pen the gates to him; but to his ſurprize, the factious made ſo ſudden and vigorous a ſally againſt him, that he found himſelf quite ſurrounded with enemies, in a narrow defile, his cavalry ſevered from him, ſo that he had no other way left to eſcape their fury, but to make a deſperate puſh and break his way through them; which he at length, almoſt by a miracle, happily accompliſhed, even without receiving any wound, or loſing more than two of his men [m]. After this narrow eſcape, he cauſed his army to draw near to Scopas, within ſeven ſtades of the city, in order to beſiege it in form, whilſt the factious within were applauding themſelves for their late advantage, which they vainly interpreted as a good omen of their future ſucceſs. His legion, which had come by the way of Jericho, being arrived, he ordered it to encamp on the mount of olives, which was parted from the town on the eaſt by the brook Cedron, and where they were on the ſudden ſo furiouſly aſſaulted by the beſieged, that they were in danger of being cut all in pieces, had not Titus come timely to their reſcue (L).

Jeruſalem beſieged.

It was then that the three factions, ſeeing themſelves beſieged by ſo powerful an army and ſo brave a general, began to think of laying aſide all private feuds and join together in a vigorous defence againſt the common enemy. This union, however, proved but ſhort-lived; for on the fourteenth of April, which was uſhering in the paſſover, when Eleazar had opened the avenues of his court to the great concourſe that came thither to ſacrifice, John of Giſchala found means to ſlide in ſome of his men with ſwords hid under their cloaks among them, who immediately drew their weapons, fell on Eleazar's party and the reſt of the people, filled the court of the prieſts with blood and horrid outcries, and took poſſeſſion of the place. By this bloody and impious ſtratagem the three factions were reduced to two, Eleazar's men being all either cut off, or after their flight were returned with their chief and had ſubmitted themſelves to John, who had now no enemy

[m] Ibid. ad. fin.

(L) Dio adds to what we read in Joſephus, that Titus had many ſuch a bloody encounter with the beſieged under the walls, in which both ſides fought ſo valiantly, that it was not eaſy to ſay which had the better; but that the Jews were at length repulſed, and gave thereby an opportunity to the enemy to open the ſiege (36).

(36) lib. lxvi. Vid. & Tacit. hiſt. l. v. c. 11 but Simon within the walls. From that time this laſt renewed his hoſtilities againſt him with greater vigour: he held now the whole temple, ſome of the out parts of it, and the valley of Cedron. Simon had the whole city to range in, in ſome parts of which John had made ſuch devaſtation, that they ſerved them for a field of battle; from which they ſallied unanimouſly againſt the common enemy, whenever occaſion ſerved, after which they returned to their uſual hoſtilities, turning their arms againſt each other, as if they had ſworn to make their ruin more eaſy to the Romans. Theſe in the mean time were drawing ſtill nearer to the walls, having with great labour and pains levelled all the ground between Scopas and them, by pulling down all the houſes and hedges, cutting down the trees, and even cleaving the rocks that ſtood in their way, from Scopas to the tomb of Herod and Bethara, alias the pool of ſerpents; in which work ſo many hands were employed, that they finiſhed it in four days [n].

John and Simon join againſt the enemy, and then fight againſt each other.

WHILST this work was doing, Titus ſent the beſieged ſome offers of peace; Joſephus was pitched upon to be the meſſenger of them, but they were rejected with indignation. On the morrow they made a ſhew of accepting them, inſomuch, that ſome of the Romans, believing them in earneſt, ventured, contrary to their general's order, to enter the city, and narrowly eſcaped with their lives. He ſent a ſecond time Nicanor and Joſephus with freſh offers, and the former received a wound in his ſhoulder; upon which Titus reſolved to begin the aſſault in good earneſt (M), and ordered his men to raze the ſuburbs, to cut down all the trees, and uſe the materials to raiſe platforms againſt the wall. Every thing was now carried on with invincible ardour, the Romans began to play their engines againſt the city in good earneſt, and it was by one of theſe that Jeſus the ſon of Ananus, who had ſo long foretold the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation, was killed [o].

The ſiege began in form.

Offers of peace rejected.

[n] Ibid. cap. 7. [o] Ibid.

(M) The place which Titus, after having taken a full view round the city, choſe to begin his attack, was towards the tomb of the high-prieſt John, both becauſe it ſtood on the low ground, and becauſe the outer wall was low and not defended on that ſide by the middlemoſt; ſo that when the breach was made on the former, it was eaſy to penetrate to the latter, and ſo come up to, and make themſelves maſters of, the upper city, and next of the temple, by means of the fortreſs Antonia.

THE Jews had likewiſe their machines upon the walls, which they plyed with uncommon fury: they had taken them lately from Ceſtius, when he retired ſo ſhamefully from them, but they were ſo ignorant in their uſe, that they made little execution with them, till they were better inſtructed by ſome Roman deſerters. Till then their chief ſucceſs was rather owing to their frequent ſallies; but the Roman legions, which had all their towers and machines before them, made terrible havock. The leaſt ſtones they threw were near a hundred weight, and theſe they could throw the length of two ſtades, or two hundred and fifty paces, and with ſuch force, that having overthrown thoſe that ſtood in the firſt rank, they could ſtill do miſchief on thoſe that ſtood at ſome diſtance behind them. Titus had reared three towers fifty cubits high on the terraſs above-mentioned; one of which happening to fall in the middle of the night, did greatly alarm the Roman camp, which ran immediately to arms at the noiſe of it; but Titus upon knowing the cauſe, diſmiſſed them, and cauſed it to be ſet up again. Theſe towers being plated with iron, the Jews tried in vain to ſet fire to them, and were at length forced to retire out of the reach of their ſhot; by which the battering rams were now at full liberty to play againſt the wall. A breach was ſoon made in it, at which the Romans entered, and the Jews abandoning this laſt incloſure, retired behind the next. This happened about the twenty-eighth of April, a fortnight after the beginning of the ſiege [P].

The firſt wall broken and entered.

JOHN defended the temple and the caſtle of Antonia, and Simon the reſt of the city. Titus marched cloſe to the ſecond wall, and plied his battering rams againſt it ſo furiouſly, that one of the towers, which looked towards the north, gave a prodigious ſhake. The men that were in it made a ſignal to the Romans, as if they would ſurrender, and at the ſame time ſent Simon word to be ready to give them a warm reception. Titus having ſmelt their ſtratagem, plied his work more furiouſly, whilſt the Jews that were in the tower ſet it on fire, and flung themſelves into the flames. The tower being fallen gave them an entrance into the ſecond incloſure, five days after the gaining of the firſt; and Titus, who was bent on ſaving the city, would not ſuffer any part of the wall or ſtreets to be demoliſhed, which left the breach and lanes ſo narrow, that when his men were furiouſly repulſed by

The ſecond wall taken.

[P] Ibid. c. 8, & 9.

by Simon, they had not room enough to make a quick retreat, ſo that there was a number of them killed in it. This overſight was quickly rectified, and the attack renewed with ſuch vigour, that the place was carried four days after their firſt repulſe [q].

Famine and peſtilence.

THE famine raging in a terrible manner in the city, was ſoon followed by a peſtilence, and as theſe two dreadful judgments encreaſed, ſo did the rage of the factious, who, by their inteſtine feuds, had deſtroyed ſuch quantities of proviſion, that they were forced to prey upon the people with the moſt unheard of cruelty. They forced their houſes, and if they found any victuals in them, they butchered them for not appriſing them of it; and if they found nothing but bare walls, which was almoſt every-where the caſe, they put them to the moſt ſevere tortures, under pretence that they had ſome proviſion concealed [r]. "I ſhould, ſays Joſe-"phus, undertake an impoſſible taſk, were I to enter into "a detail of all the cruelties of thoſe impious wretches; it "will be ſufficient to ſay, that I do not think, that, ſince "the creation, any city ever ſuffered ſuch dreadful calami-"ties, or abounded with men ſo fertile in all kind of "wickedneſs [s]."

TITUS, who knew their miſerable condition and was ſtill willing to ſpare them, gave them now four days to cool; during which he cauſed his army to be muſtered, and proviſions to be diſtributed to them in ſight of the Jews, who flocked upon the walls to ſee it; and it is thought, that even the moſt flagitious among the zealots were ſo frighted at the ſight of it, that they would have agreed to a ſurrender, could they have depended upon that pardon, which their black and horrid deeds made them quite deſpair of. Joſephus was ſent to ſpeak to them afreſh, and to exhort them not to run themſelves into an inevitable ruin, by obſtinately perſiſting in the defence of a place which could hold out but a very little while, and which the Romans looked upon already as their own. The reader may ſee his elaborate and pathetic ſpeech in the chapter laſt quoted, and which, he tells us, drew a flood of tears from him. His ſtubborn people, after many a bitter invective, fell a darting their arrows at him, at which not at all diſcouraged, he went on with greater vehemence; but all the effect it wrought on them, was only, that it prevailed on great numbers to ſteal away privately to the Romans, whilſt the Joſephus's ſpeech to the beſieged.

[q] Ibid. cap. 10. [r] cap. 11. [s] Ibid. in fin.

the reſt became only the more deſperate and reſolute to hold out to the laſt, in ſpite of Titus's merciful offers.

The city immured.

To haſten therefore to their deſtined ruin, he cauſed the city to be ſurrounded with a ſtrong wall, to prevent their receiving any ſuccours or proviſion from abroad, or their eſcaping his reſentment by flight (N). There was now nothing to be ſeen through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem, but heaps of dead bodies rotting above-ground, walking ſkeletons, and dying wretches. As many as were caught by the Romans in their ſallies, Titus cauſed to be crucified in ſight of the town to inject a terror on the reſt; but the zealots gave it out, that they were thoſe that fled to him for protection. Which when Titus underſtood, he ſent a priſoner with his hands cut off to undeceive and aſſure them, that he ſpared all that voluntarily came over to him; which encouraged great numbers to accept his offers, though the avenues were cloſely guarded by the factious, who put all to death who were caught going on that errand [t]. A greater miſchief than that was, that even thoſe, who eſcaped ſafe to the Roman camp were miſerably butchered by the ſoldiers, from a notion which theſe had taken, that they had ſwallowed great quantities of gold: inſomuch, that two thouſand of them were ripped up in one night to come at their ſuppoſed treaſure [u]. When Titus was appriſed of this barbarity he would have condemned all thoſe butchering wretches to death; but they proved ſo numerous, that he was forced to ſpare them, and contented himſelf with ſending a proclamation through his camp, that as many as ſhould be ſuſpected thenceforward of that horrid villainy, ſhould be put to immediate death; yet did not this deter many of them from it, only they did it more privately than before; ſo greedy were they of that bewitching metal. All this while the defection encreaſed, more through the inhumanity of the faction within, who made the miſeries and dying groans of their ſtarving brethren the ſubject of their cruel mirth,

Horrid butcheries within and without.

[t] Ibid. c. 12, & ſeq. [u] cap. 15.

(N) This wall, which was near forty ſtades, or five miles in circuit, was yet carried on with ſuch ſpeed and by ſo many hands, that it was finiſhed in three days; by which one may gueſs at the ardour of the beſiegers to make themſelves maſter of the city (37).

(37) Ibid. c. 13.

mirth, and carried their barbarity even to the ſheathing of their ſwords in ſport on thoſe poor wretches, under pretence of trying their ſharpneſs.

WHEN they found therefore, that neither their guards nor ſeverities could prevent the people's flight, they had recourſe to another ſtratagem equally impious and cruel; which was to hire a pack of vile pretenders to prophecy, to go about and encourage the deſpairing remains of the people to expect a ſpeedy and miraculous deliverance; and this impoſture proved a greater expedient with that infatuated nation, than their other precautions. We ſhall not ſo far diſguſt our readers, as to mention what miſerable ſhifts theſe poor wretches made uſe of to prolong the ſad remains of a life, which ought to have been more loathſome under ſuch circumſtances, than the filthy and unnatural aliments they picked up to ſupport it [w]. It was upon this ſad and pinching juncture (O), that an unhappy mother was reduced to the extremity of butchering and eating her own child. This lady, whoſe name was Miriam or Mary, had taken refuge with a vaſt number of others in this accurſed city from the beginning of the war. As the famine encreaſed, the factious zealots, who, as we obſerved before, lived now altogether upon the plunder of the helpleſs, had often forced into her False prophets ſet up.

A mother eats her own child.

[w] Ibid. l. vii. c. 7.

(O) Nothing could be more dreadful than the famiſhing condition they were now reduced to. The poor, having nothing to truſt to but the Romans mercy, or a ſpeedy death, ran all hazards to get out of the city; and if, in their flight and wandering out for herbs, or any other ſuſtenance, they fell into the hands of any of Titus's parties, ſent about to guard the avenues, they were unmercifully ſcourged, and crucified, if they made the leaſt reſiſtance.

The rich within the walls were now forced, tho' in the privateſt manner, to give half, or all they were worth, for a meaſure of wheat, and the middling ſort for one of barley. This they were forced to convey into ſome private places in their houſes, and to feed upon it as it was, without daring to pound or grind it, much leſs, to boil or bake it, leſt the noiſe or ſmell ſhould draw the rapacious zealots to come and tear it from them. Not that theſe were reduced to any real want of proviſions, but they had a double end in this barbarous plunder, viz. the ſtarving what they cruelly ſtyled all uſeleſs perſons and the keeping their own ſtores in reſerve.

her houſe, and carried off ſuch proviſions as ſhe had been able to procure. She had often tried either by prayers to prevail on them, or by the bittereſt curſes to provoke them, to put an end to her miſerable life; but thoſe inhuman monſters ſtill thought it too great a mercy to be granted to her. Filled at length with fury and deſpair, ſhe ſnatches her ſucking child from her boſom, cuts his throat, and broils him; and having ſatiated her preſent hunger, ſhe hid the reſt. The ſmell of it ſoon drew thoſe voracious carrions again to her houſe; they threatened to put her to the moſt excruciating tortures, if ſhe did not diſcover her proviſions to them; upon which ſhe goes and fetches them the ſad relicts of her mangled infant, and ſets it before them, bids them eat heartily, and not be ſqueamiſh, ſince ſhe, the once tender mother of it, had made no ſcruple to butcher, dreſs, and make a meal of it. At the ſight of this horrid diſh thoſe bloody hell-hounds, who never had till then felt the leaſt ſpark of remorſe or humanity, were ſeized with ſuch ſudden dread, that they went off trembling out of the houſe, and left the aſtoniſhed mother in full poſſeſſion of her diſmal fare [x].

Titus ſwears the ruin of the city.

WHEN this news were ſpread through the city, the horror and conſternation was as univerſal as it was inexpreſſible. It was then, that they began to think themſelves forſaken by the divine providence, and to expect the moſt terrible effects of his anger againſt the poor remains of their nation; inſomuch that they began to envy thoſe that had periſhed before them, and to wiſh their turn might come before the ſad expected cataſtrophe. Their fears were but too juſt; ſince Titus, at the very firſt hearing of this inhuman deed ſwore the total extirpation of the city and people. Since, ſaid he, they have ſo often refuſed my proffers of pardon, and have preferred war to peace, rebellion to obedience, and famine, ſuch a dreadful one eſpecially, to plenty, I am determined to bury that curſed metropolis under its ruins, that the ſun my never ſhoot his beams on a city, where the mothers feed on the fleſh of their children, and the fathers, no leſs guilty than they, chuſe to drive them to ſuch extremities, rather than lay down their arms. In the like manner did that good-natured general expoſtulate with the Deity for the other cruelties which he ſaw and heard were committed in that wretched metropolis, eſpecially at the ſight of ſuch vaſt numbers of dead bodies, which, for want want of burying room, they were forced to throw down from their walls into the adjacent vallies; taking heaven to witneſs, that he was innocent of all thoſe horrid calamities which that infatuated nation had brought upon themſelves, and might have prevented by a timely ſubmiſſion [y] (P).

[x] cap. 8.

THIS dreadful action happened about the end of July, by which time the Romans, having purſued their attacks with freſh vigour, made themſelves maſters of the fortreſs Antonia; which obliged the Jews to ſet fire to thoſe ſtately galleries which joined it to the temple, leſt they ſhould afford an eaſy paſſage to the beſiegers into this laſt [z]. About the ſame time Titus with much difficulty got materials (Q) for raiſing new mounds and terraſſes, in order to haſten the ſiege, and ſave, if poſſible, the ſad remains of that once glorious city and nation; but his pity proved ſtill worſe and worſe beſtowed on thoſe obſtinate wretches, who only became the more furious and deſperate by it. Titus at length cauſed fire to be ſet to the gates, after having had a very bloody encounter, in which his men were repulſed with loſs. The Jews were ſo terrified at it, that they ſuffered themſelves to be devoured by the flames without putting a helping hand, either

Fort Antonia taken.

Gates ſet on fire.

[y] Ibid. in fin. [z] Ibid. cap. 5, & ſeq.

(P) We have thus epitomiſed at one view what Joſephus has ſcattered in ſeveral chapters of this and the foregoing book, of the dreadful effects of this famine, that it might not for the future interrupt the thread of the ſiege, and deſtruction of the city, temple, and nation, which we ſhall now haſten to bring to a concluſion.

All that needs be added to make up the ſad account of this calamity is, that even thoſe, who, at the hazard of their lives, got ſafe to the Romans and were well received of them, did for the generality meet with their deaths in the plenty of proviſions which they found there. Many of them expired with the meat in their mouths; others fell into dropſies and other diſtempers, or quite loſt the uſe of their limbs.

(Q) The greateſt part of thoſe that had ſerved hitherto for the ſiege, were either conſumed, or rendered unfit for ſervice. The ſuburbs and adjacent parts of Jeruſalem, which abounded with the moſt beautiful gardens, orchards, and greateſt variety of fruit and other trees, had been already ſtripped of all their ornaments to ſerve to the ſiege, and were now reduced into a wilderneſs. Titus therefore could not carry on his works with the ſame ſpeed and vigour, becauſe he was forced to ſend his men for freſh timber and other materials, at a great diſtance, even ſo far as ninety ſtades, or between eleven and twelve miles off.

either to extinguish them or save themselves [a]. About the same time Matthias the high-priest, who had encouraged the people to introduce Simon into the city, met with a requital worthy of that monster of cruelty, being first tortured and then condemned to death, together with three of his sons, the fourth having happily conveyed himself out of reach. The pretence was, their holding correspondence with the Romans, and the reverend old pontiff only begged as the last favour, that he might be put to death before his sons, but was denied both that and common burial. Ananias with about seventeen persons more of rank and merit, was put to death after them [b]; besides many more for having been caught weeping for their deceased friends. All this while Josephus did not cease exhorting them to surrender, to represent to them the dreadful consequences of an obstinate resistance, and to assure them, that it was out of his mere compassion to them that he thus hazarded his own life to save theirs: he received one day such a wound in his head by a stone from the battlements, as laid him for dead on the ground. The Jews sallied out immediately to have seized on his body, but the Romans proved too quick and strong for them, and carried him off [c] (R).

Matthias put to death.

Josephus wounded.

By this time the two factions within, but especially that of John, having plundered rich and poor of all they had, fell foul also on the treasury of the temple, whence John took a great quantity of golden utensils he found there, together with those magnificent gifts that had been presented to that sacred

The temple plundered.

[a] cap. 9. [b] cap. 15. [c] Ibid.

(R) Josephus, by his own account, seems to have led but a sad life between the Romans, and his own countrymen. These looked upon him as a vile apostate, a traytor to his God and country: had imprisoned his (the Greek says, father, but the sequel shews it to have been his) mother, and made her suffer many hardships and would have spared no cruelties against him, if they could have caught him in their hands.

On the other side, the Roman officers looked upon him as a faithless wretch, who, under pretence of going to exhort the besieged to surrender, did what he could to encourage them to hold out to the last extremity; insomuch, that several of them did not scruple to accuse him before Titus of this double dealing; but happily for him, the general had conceived too good an opinion of him to harbour any such suspicion, and still vindicated him against his accusers (38).

(38) In vita sua.

ſacred place by the Jewiſh kings, by Auguſtus, Livia, and many other foreign princes, and melted them all to his own uſe. The repoſitories of the ſacred oil, which was to maintain the lamps, and of the wine, which was reſerved to accompany the uſual ſacrifices, were likewiſe ſeized upon, and turned into common uſe, and the laſt of this to ſuch exceſs, as to make himſelf and his party drunk with it. All this while, not only the zealots, but many of the people, were ſtill under ſuch an infatuation, that though the fortreſs Antonia was loſt, as we hinted already, and nothing left but the temple, which the Romans were making ready to batter down, yet they could not perſuade themſelves, that God would ſuffer that holy place to be taken by heathens, and were ſtill expecting ſome ſudden and miraculous deliverance. Even that vile monſter John, who commanded there, either ſeemed confident of it, or elſe endeavoured to make them think him ſo. For when Joſephus was ſent for the laſt time to upbraid his obſtinately expoſing that ſacred building, and the miſerable remains of God's people, to ſudden and ſure deſtruction, he only anſwered him with the bittereſt invectives, adding, that he was defending the lord's vineyard, which he was ſure could not be taken by any human force. Joſephus did in vain remind him of the many ways by which he had polluted both city and temple, and in particular of the ſeas of blood which he cauſed to be ſhed in both thoſe ſacred places, and which, he aſſured him from the old prophecies, were a certain ſign and fore-runner of their ſpeedy ſurrender and deſtruction (S). John remained as inflexible, as if all the prophets had aſſured him of a deliverance, which ſhews the ſad effects of a judicial infatuation. However, a great number of the people were ſo moved by Joſephus's diſcourſe, that they fled preſently after to the Romans, and amongſt them ſome perſons of rank and figure, particularly Joſeph the ſon of Cabbi and Jeſus the ſon of Damneus, who had been

The beſieged ſtill infatuated.

Joſephus's ſpeech to them.

(S) He alluded probably to the eleventh and following chapters of Zechary, of which we have given ſome hint a little higher; or it may be perhaps that he had an eye to the doom which Chriſt had pronounced againſt that murdering and apoſtate city, of which he ſaw the far greater part already accompliſhed enough to aſſure him of the reſt. For, as we have elſewhere obſerved, it is ſcarcely to be ſuppoſed, but that ſuch a man as Joſephus had more than once converſed with ſome chriſtians, who might have appriſed him of it, or, as an hiſtorian, he might have read it in ſome one of the goſpels.

been both high-priests. Titus gave them a gracious reception, and sent them to Gophna, a place situated between Samaria, and Lydda, till the conclusion of the war; but he was forced to send for them back, and contradict a report, which the factious had cunningly spread, of their having been put to death [d].

At length Titus, forseeing the inevitable ruin of that stately edifice, which he was still extremely desirous to save, vouchsafed even himself to speak to them, and to persuade them to surrender. But the factious, looking upon this condescension as the effects of his fear, rather than generosity; only grew the more furious upon it, and forced him at last to come to those extremities, which he had hitherto endeavoured to avoid. That his army, which was to attack the temple, might have the freer passage towards it through the castle Antonia, he caused a considerable part of the wall to be pulled down and levelled, which proved so very strong, that it took him up seven whole days, by which time they were far advanced in the month of July.

The daily sacrifice interrupted.

It was on the seventeenth day of that month, as all Josephus's copies have it (T), that the daily sacrifice ceased for the [d] Cap. 16. † Sect. III. p. 135.

(T) A modern critic supposes an error to be in that date, and that it was originally written the seventh or tenth of that month (39). But besides, that it is seventeen in all copies of Josephus, the Jews have kept their fasts in memory of this cessation on that very day ever since (40).

This daily sacrifice called by the Jews תָּמִיד Thamid, by the Greeks ἐνδελεχισμός, and by the Latins juge, consisted of two lambs, the one of which was offered in the morning towards sunrising, after the burning of the sacred incense, and the other in the evening, or, as the Hebrew hath it, between the two evenings, that is, between three in the afternoon and sun-setting. It was a burnt offering, and was therefore set on a slow fire, that it might be the longer in burning. We have spoken of it in a former volume †, to which we refer.

All that we need to add is, that if the Jews have appointed their fasts right, the ceasing of it here was on the same day on which Moses broke the two tables, the city of Jerusalem was destroyed, the book of the law burnt by Aphsathomos (Epistemon) and the statue of Jupiter set up in the temple, as the reader may see in the three authors last quoted.

(39) Tillemont. not. in ruin Jud. 35. (40) Vid. Mehillath, Tahanith, c. 12. part. ult. Maimon, Helcath, Tahanith, c. 5 Buxt. Synag. Jud. c. 30. † See Vol. iii. p. 230, 244, & (N).

the first time, since its restoration by the brave Maccabitish chief, mentioned in a former section †, there being no proper person left in the temple to offer them up. Titus caused the factious to be severely upbraided for it, exhorted John to set up whom he would to perform that office, rather than suffer the service of God to be set aside; and then challenged him and his party to come out of the temple and fight on a more proper ground, and thereby save that sacred edifice from the fury of the Roman troops [e]. When nothing could prevail on them, they began to set again on fire the gallery, that yielded a communication between the temple and the castle Antonia. The Jews, as we have hinted before, had already burnt about twenty cubits of it in length; but this second blaze which was likewise encouraged by the besieged, consumed about fourteen more; after which they beat down what remained standing. On the twenty-seventh of July, the Jews, having filled part of the western portico with combustible matter, made a kind of a flight, upon which some of the forwardest of the Romans having scaled up to the top, those set fire to it, which flamed with such sudden fury, that many of them were consumed in it, and the rest, venturing to jump down from the battlements, were crushed to death. Artorius was the only one that escaped by a stratagem [f] (U).

Romans outwitted.

On the very next day, Titus having set fire to the north gallery, which inclosed the outer court of the temple, from fort Antonia to the valley of Cedron got an easy admittance into it, and forced the besieged into that of the priests. He tried in vain six days to batter down one of the galleries of that precinct with an Helepolis (W); he was forced to mount his battering rams on the terrarss, which was raised by this time; and yet the strength of this wall was such, that it eluded the force of these also, though others of his troops were busy

Fire set to the temple gates.

† Sect. III. p. 135. [e] Ibid. l. vii. c. 4. [f] Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. 6.

(U) This soldier observing one of his companions below, named Lucius, promised to make him his heir, if he would catch him in his fall. He did so, and saved Artorius, but was himself crushed by his weight (41).

(W) This was a kind of battering engine, its name signifies "a town-taker." We have described it in a former volume *.

(41) Bell. ibid. lib. vii c. vi. * Vol. vii p. 419, & ix. p. 416, (B)

busy in sapping it. When they found that neither rams nor sapping could gain ground, they bethought themselves of scaling, but were vigorously repulsed, and with the loss of some colours and a number of men. When Titus therefore found that his desire of saving that building was like to cost so many lives, he set fire to the gates, which being plated with silver, burnt all that night, whilst the metal dropped down in the melting. The flame soon communicated itself to the porticos and galleries, which the besieged beheld without offering to stop it, but contented themselves with sending whole vollies of impotent curses against the Romans. This was done on the eight of August, and on the next day, Titus, having given orders to extinguish the fire, called a council, to determine whether the remainder of the temple (X) should be saved or demolished. That general was still for the former, and most of the rest declared for the latter, and alledged, that it was no longer a temple, but a scene of war and slaughter, and that the Jews would never be at rest, as long as any part of it was left standing; but when they found Titus stifly bent on preserving so noble an edifice, against which he told them he could have no quarrel, they all came over to his mind. The next day, August the 10th, was therefore determined for a general assault, and the night before the Jews made two desperate sallies on the Romans, in the last of which, these, being timely succoured by Titus, beat them back into their inclosure [g].

Titus calls a council.

The temple set on fire.

But whether this last Jewish effort exasperated the besiegers, or which is more likely, as Josephus thinks, pushed by the hand of providence, one of the Roman soldiers of his own accord, took up a blazing firebrand, and, getting on his comrade's shoulders, threw it into one of the apartments that surrounded the sanctuary, through a window, and immediately set the whole north-side on a flame up to the third story, in the second year of Vespasian, the twenty-first of king Agrippa, and on the same fatal day and month in

[g] Ibid. c. 9, & 10.

(X) That is, the sanctuary and most holy place, with all the chambers, galleries, &c. thereto belonging, as the reader may see them described in a former section. Among those who were for destroying it was Tiberius Alexander, probably the same apostate Jew, who had been prætor of Judæa, and was now commander of the Roman legions.

in which it had been formerly burnt by Nebuchadnezzar [h]. Titus, who was gone to reſt himſelf a-while in his pavilion, was awaked at the noiſe, and ran immediately to give orders to have the fire extinguiſhed. He called, prayed, threatened, and even caned his men in vain; the confuſion was ſo great, and the ſoldiers ſo obſtinately bent upon deſtroying all that was left, that he was neither heard nor minded. Thoſe that flocked thither from the camp, inſtead of obeying his orders, were buſy, either in killing the Jews, or in encreaſing the flames. When Titus obſerved, that all his endeavours were vain, he entered into the ſanctuary and the moſt holy place, in which he found ſtill ſuch rich and ſumptuous utenſils and other riches, as even exceeded all that had been told him of it. Out of the former he ſaved the golden candleſtick, the table of ſhew-bread, the altar of prefumes, all of pure gold, and the book or volume of the law, wrapped up in a rich gold tiſſue; but in the latter, he found no utenſils, becauſe, in all probability, they had not made a freſh ark, ſince that of Solomon had been loſt. Upon his coming out of that ſacred place, ſome other ſoldiers ſet fire to it, and obliged thoſe who had ſtayed behind to come out; they all fell foul of the plunder of it, tearing even the gold plating off the gates and timber work, and carried off all the coſtly utenſils, robes, &c. they found in it, inſomuch, that there was not one of them that did not enrich himſelf by it [i].

Titus enters into the ſanctuary.

A HORRID maſſacre followed ſoon after, in which a great many thouſands periſhed, ſome by the flames, others by the fall from the battlements, and a greater number by the enemy's ſword, which deſtroyed all it met with, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or quality. Among them were upwards of ſix thouſand perſons, who had been ſeduced thither by a falſe prophet, who promiſed them, that they ſhould find a ſpeedy and miraculous relief there on that very day. Some of them remained five whole days on the top of the walls, and afterwards threw themſelves at the general's mercy; but were anſwered, that they had out-ſtayed the time, and were led to execution (Y). They carried their fury to the

A horrid maſſacre.

[h] Conf. 2 Kings xxv. & Joſeph. ubi ſupra, c. 9. in fin.
[i] Ibid. & ſeq.

(Y) Probably to be crucified; for Joſephus tells us there, that in his return from Tekoah, he obſerved a number of them faſtened

ed

burning of all the treaſure-houſes of the place, though they were full of the richeſt furnitures, plate, veſtments, and other things of value, which had been laid up in thoſe places for ſecurity. In a word, they did not ceaſe burning and butchering, till they had deſtroyed all, except two of the temple gates and that part of the court which was deſtined for the women †. In memory of this deſtruction, and of that of Nebuchadnezzar, they keep a ſolemn faſt on the ninth of the month Ab, anſwering in part to our Auguſt, which laſts full twenty-four hours, during which time they neither eat, drink, or uſe the leaſt refreſhment; but the ſtricteſt of them keep themſelves barefoot, in prayers and tears, from ſun-ſetting to the next ſun-ſet [k].

The factious ſuit rejected.

In the mean time the ſeditious having made ſuch a vigorous puſh, that they eſcaped the fury of the Romans, at leaſt for the preſent, and retired into the city, they found all the avenues of it ſo well guarded every-where, that there was no poſſibility left for them to get out; which obliged them to ſecure themſelves as well as they could on the ſouth-ſide of it, from whence Simon and John of Giſchala ſent to deſire a parley with Titus. They were anſwered, that though they had been the cauſe of all this blood-ſhed and ruin, yet they ſhould have their lives ſpared, if they laid down their arms, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. To that they replied, that they had engaged themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths never to ſurrender, and therefore only begged leave to retire into the mountains with their wives and children; which inſolence did ſo exaſperate the Roman general, that he cauſed a herald to bid them ſtand to their defence; for that not one of them ſhould be ſpared, ſince they had rejected his laſt offers of pardon. Immediately after this, he abandoned the city to the fury of his ſoldiers, who fell forthwith on plundering it, ſetting fire every-where, and murdering all that fell into their ed each to a croſs, and ſtill alive; among whom were three of his acquaintance, whoſe lives he obtained of Titus, and ordered them immediately to be taken down, and their wounds to be put under the care of able ſurgeons. He adds, that only one of them outlived it, the other two died under their phyſicians hands.

† De hac vid. ſect. v. p. 310. [k] Vid. Mehilath, Tahanith, ſub Menſ. Ab. Maimon, Buxtorf, & al ſup. citat.

their hands (Z); whilſt the factious that were left went and fortified themſelves in the royal palace, where they killed eight thouſand Jews, who had taken refuge there [1].

In the mean time great preparations were making for a vigorous attack on the upper city, eſpecially on the royal palace; and this took them up from the twentieth of Auguſt to the ſeventh of September, during which time great numbers came and made their ſubmiſſion to Titus, among whom were the forty thouſand citizens mentioned in the laſt note, ſome of the Edomites, and two prieſts, who, upon promiſe of being ſpared, diſcovered to him a private place in the wall of the temple, where they found two candleſticks, ſome tables, cups, and other veſſels of maſſive gold, with many precious ſtones, rich garments, and other coſtly things. By this time the war-like engines plied ſo furiouſly on the factious, that they were taken with a ſudden panic, and inſtead of flying into the towers of Hippicos, Phaſael, or Mariamne, which were yet untaken, and ſo ſtrong, that nothing but famine could have reduced them; they run like madmen towards Siloah, with a deſign to have attacked the wall of circumvallation, and to have eſcaped out

The high city taken.

Year of the flood 3068. Of Chriſt 73 or 70.

[1] Bell ubi ſupra, c. 13.

(Z) Joſephus tells us (42), however, that he ſpared the family of Izates, king of Adiabene, of whom we have already ſpoke, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, who came and ſurrendered themſelves to his mercy, but he kept them ſtill priſoners.

He likewiſe diſmiſſed above forty thouſand of the inferior ſort, who came and implored his pardon, and gave them leave to go and ſettle where they would. The truth is, that they had already gorged themſelves with ſo much blood, that the ſtreams which ran along the ſtreets did even put the fire out. And as for the priſoners, they were ſo very numerous already, that they could not find buyers for them, tho' they offered them at the loweſt prices (43); ſo that one would have thought it high time for a prince of that excellent character to have wreaked his fury only on the factious zealots, and to have ſpared the reſt. But in all this he was acting more like a ſcourge ſent from above, againſt a rebellious nation, than according to his own natural inclination; and it is what he rightly acknowledged, when his army congratulated him on this arduous and glorious conqueſt *.

(42) In vita ſua. (43) Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 15. * Vid. Philoſtrat. in vit. Apollon. l. vi. c. 14.

out of the city; but being there repulſed, they were forced to go and hide themſelves in the public ſinks and common ſewers, ſome one way, and ſome another. All the reſt the Romans could catch were put to the ſword, and the city was ſet on fire. This was on the eighth of September, when the city was taken and entered by Titus. He would have put an end to the maſſacre, but his men killed all, except the moſt vigorous, whom they ſhut up in the porch of the women, mentioned a little higher. Fronto, who had the care of them, reſerved the youngeſt and moſt beautiful for Titus's triumph, and ſent all that were above ſeventeen years of age into Egypt, to be employed in ſome public works there; and a great number of others were ſent into ſeveral cities of Syria and other provinces, to be expoſed on the public theatres, to exhibit fights, or be devoured by wild beaſts [m]. The number of theſe priſoners amounted to ninety-ſeven thouſand, beſides about eleven thouſand more of others, who were either ſtarved through neglect, or ſtarved themſelves through ſullenneſs and deſpair (A).

The number and diſpoſal of the priſoners.

We have already had occaſion to mention the number of ſlain, as well as of the priſoners, according to Joſephus. Suetonius and Cornelius Nepos do indeed make the former a great deal leſs; they reckon but ſix hundred thouſand of them in all; but conſidering the diſtance of time and place in which they wrote, it will be eaſily granted, that they could not be ſo well acquainted with it as Joſephus, who was a Jew and an eye-witneſs. Whether this laſt has exaggerated in compliment to Titus and the Romans, we will not pretend to ſay. A curious author has ſince taken the pains to make a freſh computation out of him of all that periſhed in the ſeveral places, throughout that kingdom and out of it, from the beginning to the concluſion of the war †; in which we believe our readers will be glad to ſee the whole amount of the ſeveral bloody articles, as it were, at one view. They are as follows:

At

[m] Ibid. c. 16, & 17. † Juſtus Lipſius de Conſtantia, lib. ii. c. 21.

(A) Joſephus was by this time in ſuch high favour with Titus, that he obtained the liberty of ſeveral of his friends and relations, and in particular of his brother Matthias, without any ranſom. That emperor had likewiſe given him leave to ſave what he thought fit out of the ruins of the city and temple, but he contented himſelf with the volume of the ſacred writings.

At Jeruſalem, by Florus's order	630	Jews killed in and out of Judæa.
By the inhabitants of Cæſarea in hatred to the Jews	20,000
At Scythopolis in Syria	30,000
By the inhabitants of Aſcalon in Paleſtine	2,500
By thoſe of Ptolemais	2,000
At Alexandria in Egypt under Tiberius Alexander, an apoſtate Jew	50,000
At Damaſcus	10,000
At the taking of Joppa	8,400
In the mountain of Cabulo	2,000
In a fight at Aſcalon	10,000
In an ambuſh	8,000
At the taking of Apheck	15,000
Upon mount Garizzim	11,600
Drowned at Joppa by a ſudden ſtorm	4,200
Slain at Tarichæa	6,500
Slain or killed themſelves at Gamala, where none were ſaved but two ſiſters	9,000
Killed in their flight from Giſchala	2,000
At the ſiege of Jotapa, where Joſephus commanded	30,000
Of the Gadarenes, beſides vaſt numbers that drowned themſelves	13,000
In the villages of Idumæa	10,000
At Geraſium	1,000
At Macheron	1,700
In the deſart of Jardes	3,000
Slew themſelves at Maſſada	960
In Cyrene by the governor Catulus, of which we ſhall ſpeak by and by	3000
Periſhed at Jeruſalem by ſword, famine, peſtilence, and during the ſiege	1100,000
According to this account the whole amouts to	1337,490

Beſides a vaſt multitude that died in the caves, woods, wilderneſſes, common-ſewers, in baniſhment, and many other ways, of whom no computation could be made; and ten thouſand that were ſlain at Jotapa, more than our author has reckoned. For Joſephus mentions expreſly forty thouſand, but he only thirty thouſand.

To these, if we add the ninety-seven thousand prisoners, doomed in all appearance to a captivity infinitely worse than death, and the eleven thousand, which, as we hinted above, perished either through the neglect of their keepers, or their own sullen despair, the amount will be above one million four hundred and forty-five thousand. What still more aggravates this destruction is, that the far greatest part of them were strangers, that is, were Jews, who, as we observed a little higher, were written to, and invited from remote parts of the world, even from beyond the river Euphrates, by their brethren at Jerusalem, to come and assist them in the defence of their religion and liberties; their country, city, and temple; instead of which they met with the most dreadfull deaths there, and shared in the common ruin. Thus did the divine providence order it, that they, who, by their strenuous opposition of the gospel in all the parts of their dispersion, had shared in the guilt of the crucifiers of its divine author, should be involved in their punishment.

TITUS, as we have seen, acknowledged more than once the hand of providence, both in his extraordinary success against them, and in the invincible obstinacy with which they, to the last, preferred their total destruction to his oft repeated proffers of mercy. Josephus hath scarce a chapter in which he doth not ascribe all these dreadful calamities, and the final ruin of his nation, city, and temple, to an over-ruling power, to the offended deity, or to the sins of the people: but no-where more pathetically than in that chapter, in which, besides the old prophecies, he sums up a number of dreadful warnings sent before-hand, not so much to reduce them to obedience, as to let them discern the almighty hand, that was now powering down the most dreadful phials of his anger against them. We have already taken notice of that extraordinary countryfellow Ananus, who had kept pronouncing woe and destruction to them, during seven whole years. It will not be amiss to close this sad catastrophe with some other signal ones, out of the same Jewish historian, which were no less remarkable than dreadful.

Strange prodigies.

OF this class was that strange comet, which hung over Jerusalem one whole year, in the shape of a sword: the extraordinary light that was seen round the altar at the ninth hour of the night, upon the celebrating of the paschal feast, and which was looked upon by the ignorant as a good omen, but by the wiser sort as a forerunner of a dreadful war: a cow delivered of a lamb, as she was led to the altar to be sacrificed: the eastern gate of the temple made of solid brass,

and

and ſo heavy, that it required twenty pair of ſtout hands to open and ſhut it and was flung open in the middle of the night, though faſtened with ſtrong bolts and bars: the air before ſun ſet filled with chariots and armed men, which paſſed all over the country, and for the truth of which Joſephus appeals to ſeveral living witneſſes, who beheld the dreadful ſight; and laſtly the voice, which, after a kind of rumbling noiſe, was diſtinctly heard by the prieſts, who were going to officiate on the feaſt of pentecoſt, and uttered theſe words articulately, Let us depart; let us depart *. In ſpight of all which, the Jews, as we have ſeen, continued as hardened as ever, and liſtened only to thoſe lying prophets, who flattered them with the hopes of a ſudden and miraculous deliverer. But to return to the ſiege.

Simon and John taken.

WHILST the ſoldiers were ſtill buſy in burning the remains of the city, and viſiting all the ſinks, jakes, and common ſewers, where they found and killed numbers of other poor creatures who had hid themſelves, Simon and John, the two grand rebels, were found and brought to Titus, who ordered them to be reſerved for his triumph. John, being pinched with hunger, came out firſt, and having begged his life, obtained it, but was condemned to perpetual impriſonment. Simon, whoſe retreat was better ſtored, held out till towards the end of October, when neceſſity forced him out. He appeared on the ſudden on the ruins of the temple, in a white robe and a purple cloak. The Romans were at firſt ſurpriſed at him; but underſtanding ſoon after who he was, Terentius Rufus, who was left commander, ſeized on him, and ſent him to Cæſarea, whither Titus was got by this time, and from whence he was conveyed with his bloody collegues to Rome, to adorn the conqueror's triumph [n].

The city razed to the ground.

As ſoon as the Romans had ended their deſtructive work of burning and maſſacring, Titus ſet them on to demoliſh the city, with all its noble ſtructures, fortifications, palaces, towers, walls, and other ornaments and fortifications, down to the level of the ground, according to Chriſt's expreſs prediction. He left nothing ſtanding but a piece of the weſtern wall, and the three towers of Hippicos, Phaſael, and Mariamne, the former to ſerve as a rampart to his tenth legion, which he left there, and the three latter to give future ages ſome idea of the ſtrength of the whole city, and of the ſkill and valour of its conqueror. His orders were ſo punctually executed, that, except thoſe few buildings above-mentioned, there there was not so much as any remains left, that could serve as an index, that that ground had been once inhabited (B). Insomuch, that when he came to pass through it, in his way from Cæsarea to Alexandria, in order to embarque for Rome, he could not refrain himself from shedding plenty of tears at the sight of so dreadful a devastation, and cursing the wretches who had forced him to be the author of it °.

* Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 12. [n] Ibid. & ſeq.

Titus's triumph.

It is not our business to follow that emperor to his capital, or to describe the magnificence of his triumph, the greatest which that city ever saw: that will be best done in the ensuing Roman history. All that is proper to be said on that head here is, that John and Simon, at the head of seven hundred of the handsomest Jewish captives, were made to adorn the triumphal chair; after which Simon, having been dragged through the streets, with a rope about his neck, and severely scourged, was put to death with some other Jewish leaders, and John was sent into perpetual imprisonment [P] (C).

Titus

° cap. 18, & seq. [P] cap. 24.

(B) The Jewish tradition adds, that Titus caused the plow to be driven over it; which ceremony, according to the Roman law, condemned the ground to perpetual desolation. But that, as well as Josephus's account, seems exaggerated, since there is great reason to believe, there were still many considerable ruins to be seen even in the emperor Adrian's time, as we may have occasion to shew in the Roman history.

(C) Titus's triumph was further adorned with a great number of trophies brought from Judæa; among the principal of which were those which had been taken out of the sanctuary, such as the golden table of shew-bread, which weighed several talents; the seven-branch candlestic, a rich and curious piece of art; the roll or volume of the law, covered with a costly gold cloth, which was carried the last of the three, as the most venerable of all the trophies. The two former Titus caused to be placed in the temple of Peace, which his father had built; the latter, together with several curious and costly veils of the temple and other rich furniture, he conveyed into his own palace (45).

There are still some coins extant of that emperor, stamped with a trophy and triumphant chariot, and of his father, with the image of a woman sitting sorrowful under a palm tree, with the inscription of Judæa Capta; with some others coined in the twenty-first year of king Agrippa, with these words in Greek, "Vespasian emperor, and Cæsar. Judæa was taken in the twenty-first of Agrippa."

To

(45) Bell. Jud. l. vii, c. 24.

TITUS had left three caſtles ſtill untaken, namely thoſe of Herodion and Maſſada on this, and that of Macheron on the other, ſide of Jordan. The firſt of them was ſoon after taken by capitulation by Lucilius Baſſus, who had been appointed lieutenant of Judæa. He went preſently after at the head of a good number of troops to beſiege that of Macheron, which was a very ſtrong place, and likely to have held out a long time. But a lucky accident, which the reader may ſee in the margin (D), obliged the beſieged to ſurrender, upon condition that they ſhould have liberty to retire whither they pleaſed; which being readily granted to them, they went and joined ſome of their revolted brethren, who had ſheltered themſelves in the foreſt of Jardes. Hither Baſſus came, and attacked them, and, after a deſperate combat on both ſides, totally defeated them, with Judas their chief, who had ſaved himſelf out of Jeruſalem, through one of the aqueducts of that city [9]. Simon and John's fate.

DEATH

[9] Cap. 25.

To theſe medals we may add ſome fragments in baſs-relief, repreſenting Veſpaſian and his ſon Titus's triumph, and on which is ſtill to be diſtinguiſhed the ſeven branch candleſtic, with other ſacred utenſils; ſome have pretended alſo to diſcover the ark in it; but we have already ſeen, that there was no ſuch thing in the moſt holy place; and it is moſt likely to be only the table of the ſhew-bread, which was not altogether unlike it; but the misfortune is, that time has ſo defaced this noble monument, that it is not eaſy to diſcover any thing in it with any certainty, except the candleſtic above-mentioned.

(D) There was in that caſtle a young nobleman highly eſteemed for his valour, who, after having given the beſiegers a ſtout repulſe in a ſally, unfortunately ſtrayed out of the gates to ſpeak to the people on the wall by way of bravado. An Egyptian then in the Roman army, came ſwiftly behind him unperceived, took him up in his arms, and carried him off.

When Baſſus had got the noble youth in his power, he cauſed him to be ſtripped naked and ſeverely ſcourged, in the view of the beſieged, who filled immediately the air with their cries. Baſſus perceiving them ſo moved at the ſight, cauſed a croſs to be erected, and gave them to underſtand, that he would crucify him, unleſs they prevented it by a timely ſurrender. The ſtratagem had the deſired effect; and the Jews, not being proof againſt ſo doleful a ſpectacle, choſe to capitulate, and ſoon after ſurrendered the place, on the conditions above mentioned (46).

(46) Cap. 25. ad fin.

DEATH having prevented Baſſus from putting an end to the war, Flavius Silva, his ſucceſſor, aſſembled all his forces to attack Maſſada, now the only remaining fortreſs in the rebels hands. The place was prodigiouſly ſtrong both by art and nature, well ſtored with all proviſions, and defended with a good number of ſicarii and aſſaſſins; at the head of whom was one Eleazar, the grandſon of Judas the Gaulonite, often mentioned in this and a former ſection. Silva having in vain tried his engines and battering rams againſt it, bethought himſelf of ſurrounding it with a high and ſtrong wall, and then ordered fire to be ſet to the gates. The wind favouring him, puſhed the flames ſo fiercely againſt the Jews, that Eleazar, in a kind of deſpair, perſuaded them firſt to kill all their wives and children, and next to chuſe ten men by lot who ſhould kill all the reſt; and laſtly, one out of the ſurviving ten to diſpatch them and himſelf, which was accordingly executed out of hand; only this laſt man was ordered to ſet fire to the place before he finiſhed this bloody tragedy. On the next morning the Romans, who were preparing to ſcale the place, were ſtrangely ſurprized to ſee and hear nothing move; upon which they made ſuch an hideous outcry, that two women, who had concealed themſelves from the maſſacre in ſome aqueduct, came out, and told them the tragical end of the beſieged, which put an end to that dreadful war [r]. Veſpaſian ordered the Jewiſh lands to be ſold to his own uſe (E), and all the Jews within the Roman empire to pay the uſual tribute of half a ſhekel, or two drachms, to his treaſury, which they were before obliged to pay to that of the ſanctuary [s].

THE temple and holy city thus deſtroyed and levelled with the ground, and the whole nation either miſerably buried under its ruins, or diſperſed into other countries, might, one would think, have opened the eyes of the poor remains of that once favoured people, and cruſhed at once all hopes and expectation of any other deliverer, but him whom they had rejected and crucified. Many of them did indeed do ſo, but the far greater part remained in their infatuated ſtate, and, according to Chriſt's own prediction, have been diſperſed ever ſince over all the world, to atteſt his truth and their own obdurate

[r] Cap 28. [s] Ibid. c. 26. in fin.

(E) He only reſerved the town of Emmaus, which he beſtowed on eight hundred of his beſt veterans, to plant a new colony there, and from that time that place took the name of Nicopolis (47).

(47) Cap. 26.

obdurate blindness, till the happy time comes when the veil shall be taken off their eyes. When that will be, is one of those secrets which God has been pleased to leave as yet unrevealed; and which it would be vain and presumptuous to search too curiously after. Eusebius adds to their sad catastrophe, that, after the destruction of Jerusalem, Vespasian caused all the remaining sprouts of the house of Judah to be cut off [t], to deprive them at once of all hopes of a deliverer or future Messiah. Notwithstanding which, the zealots made several attempts to regain their power, first in Egypt, where it cost some their heads, and caused their temple at Alexandria, mentioned in a former section †, to be quite shut up [u] (F); next in Cyrene of Libya, where one of them, named Jonathan, set up for a prophet, and persuaded about two thousand of his brethren there to follow him into the desart, where he promised to shew them wonders, and where Catullus, the then governor, caused them to be pursued and defeated [w] (G).

From

[t] Eccles. hist. l. iii c. 12. † See pag. 172, & (T). [u] Bell. ubi supra, c. 30. ad fin. [w] Ibid. c. 31. pass.

(F) These wretches, which were undoubtedly the relics of the Gaulonitish faction, since even their children suffered the severest torments, rather than acknowledge Cæsar for their lord (48), met at first with a kind reception from their brethren of Alexandria. But they quickly became obnoxious to them by sowing their leaven of sedition. To prevent the ill effects of which, they were delivered up to the Romans, and six hundred of them put to death.

Vespasian being apprised of it, and fearing lest their Alexandrian temple should afford them a fresh pretence of assembling themselves, and raising some new sedition in Egypt, sent orders to Lupus his governor there to demolish it. But he contented himself with shutting it up. Paulinus, who succeeded him soon after, stripped it of all its ornaments and rich furniture, and caused the gates of it to be quite shut up, to prevent any further worship being offered up in it (49).

(G) Jonathan was taken presently after, and brought to Catullus, before whom he accused many of the richest Jews of having instigated him to this imposture, and whom that greedy governor caused to be put to death to the number of three thousand, and confiscated all their wealth.

He afterwards obliged that wretch to prefer the same indictment against those that were at Rome, among whom was Jose-

sephus

(48) Ibid. cap. 29. (49) Cap. 30. ad fin.

FROM that time the Jewiſh nation has been diſperſed through, deſpiſed and hated by, all the world, hath gone from one age to another through a ſeries of the greateſt miſeries and perſecutions. We have innumerabe inſtances of crowned heads, and even commonwealths, who have ſpared neither the ſevereſt edicts, nor the cruelleſt butcheries againſt them. In a word, Pagans and Mahometans, as well as Chriſtians, tho' ſo oppoſite in other things, have yet, as it were, joined their efforts in vain, to exterminate that unhappy people, whom the divine providence hath nevertheleſs upheld under all thoſe diſadvantages by a kind of miraculous power, and no doubt for a more glorious purpoſe; inſomuch, that, according to a late learned hiſtorian, there are ſtill above three millions of them diſperſed through almoſt every nation and kingdom in the world, and ſtill impatiently ſighing after that glorious time, when God ſhall reſtore them to their priſtine ſtate. But this and ſome other particulars relating to their diſperſions, writings, and the like, will be fully ſeen in the appendix.

AFTER the reduction of Jeruſalem and Judæa, Agrippa and his ſiſter retired to Rome, probably with Titus, who was exceſſive fond of both, but eſpecially of Berenice. We have ſeen through the courſe of this laſt war how ſerviceable the brother had been to the general, accompanying him in perſon, and aſſiſting him with men and amunition, for which we are told Titus got his kingdom enlarged by the emperor, and procured him prætorian honours. But his extraordinary friendſhip to that prince flowed chiefly from his ſpecial fondneſs for his ſiſter, who now lived with him in his palace, and ruled every thing as if ſhe had been his real wife. We have hinted ſome former reports publicly ſpread concerning her inceſtuous phus the hiſtorian, whom he accuſed to have furniſhed him with arms and money. Veſpaſian made ſuch a ſtrict enquiry into the matter, that he eaſily found out the cheat, cauſed Jonathan to be cruelly whipped, and then burnt alive, and acquitted the perſons accuſed.

Catullus, though deep in the guilt, was yet pardoned by that emperor; but providence did not ſuffer him to go unpuniſhed; for he was ſoon after ſeized with a panic phrenſy, which made him fancy himſelf ſurrounded with the dreadful ſpectres of thoſe whom he had unjuſtly put to death. He was at length ſeized with an inward intolerable heat, which conſumed his very entrails, and he died in that miſerable condition unpitied (50).

(50) Cap. 31.

inceſtuous intrigues with her brother, and for which ſhe had given but too good a foundation. Titus could hardly be ignorant of it; but her beauty had ſo captivated him, that he overlooked every thing elſe; inſomuch, that he had promiſed her marriage, and would in all probability have kept it, had he not found that the Romans were wholly averſe to it, partly on account of her being a Jeweſs, and partly on that of her royal deſcent. To pave himſelf therefore the way to the empire, he was forced to diſcard her, invitus invitam [x], as Suetonius expreſſes it. What became of her afterwards, is not worth enquiring. As for Agrippa, he was the laſt of the Herodian race that bore the royal title, and is ſuppoſed to have died at Rome about the ſeventieth year of his age, and the ninetieth of Jeſus Chriſt [y]. Joſephus has this remarkable ſaying on the Herodian line, that they all failed within a hundred years [z], though they were at firſt ſo numerous, as we have ſeen them in the genealogy of Herod the Great.

This was the end of the Herodian family, and of the Jewiſh nation and polity, and is ſo much the more remarkable, conſidering, that the ſuccinct account we have of it is written by a Jew of ſuch extraordinary character, and that the deſtruction of the city and people, eſpecially of their temple, is found upon the whole ſo exactly conformable to the prophecies of Chriſt, denounced againſt them ſo long before. One might have expected, that this ſhould have opened their eyes, to acknowledge theſe as well as the many others we have mentioned in the courſe of this and the laſt ſection, which prove him the Meſſiah, ſince they had ſeen their ſacrifices, ceremonial law, their temple, their royal ſtock of Judah, &c. which they till then thought were to laſt for ever, buried, as it were, under the ruin of their metropolis. Inſtead of which, their chief aim and ſtudy has been to find ſalvos againſt theſe pregnant proofs againſt them; to depart from the expoſitions of their antients, give a new ſenſe to the prophets, and to invent new ſcepters for their royal tribe in ſome unknown parts of the world, in a word, to oppoſe every thing that we urge againſt them, as we ſhall ſhew in the appendix.

In the mean time, it will not be amiſs to take notice, that the Jews are no leſs at variance with Joſephus, than the chriſtians chriſtians have admired him. St. Jerom, among other praiſes he gives him, calls him the Livy of the Jews [a]. Photius and others have been equally laviſh of their incenſe; and Euſebius adds to the reſt, that he had a ſtatue reared to him in conſideration of his writings [b]. We ſhall not repeat what we have often obſerved of his partiality to his nation and ſacerdotal order, both in this chapter and a former volume. But his countrymen had trumped up another Joſephus, known by the name of Bengorion, whoſe hiſtory is compiled out of the Rufinian verſion of the true Joſephus; for he doth not ſeem to have ſeen the original, and has ſtuffed it with the moſt abſurd falſhoods and contradictions to him; and yet the Jews give him the largeſt encomiums. In particular Rabby Than, who has publiſhed his hiſtory, is not aſhamed to affirm, that all he wrote was juſt and true, without the leaſt falſehood; that his writings come nearer to thoſe of the prophets, than thoſe of any other Jewiſh author; that the hand of God was upon him, whilſt he compiled his work, with ſome other commendations, which amount almoſt to blaſphemy [c]. That fabulous author is ſo well known to the learned, that we ſhall ſpend no time in expoſing him. The readers may ſee enough of them in that mutilated edition which Munſter has given us of it; though he has concealed a great number of them. But thoſe that have ſeen the full editions that have come out ſince, will find them ſo full of them, that he will readily own, nothing but the greateſt degree of infatuation and perverſeneſs could induce the Jews to prefer him to the true one, who, ſetting aſide his partiality above mentioned, hath all the marks of a judicious and exact hiſtorian.

[x] Vid. Sueton. in vit. Tit. & Xiphil. ex Dione, Juſtus Tiberius apud Phot. bibl. cod. 33. [y] Tillemont, Ruin des Juifs, Art. 83, & not. 41. [z] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7.

[a] De vir. illuſt. c. 13. [b] Hiſt. eccleſ. l. iii. c. 13. [c] Præf. in Joſſip. Bengorio, edit. Conſtantinop. 1490.

The End of the Tenth Volume.

A N

AN INDEX TO THE TENTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A

A B-beth-din among the Jews, his office. 90.

Abſalom the ſon of Hyrcan, 208. His choice of a private life, 211. Death at Jeruſalem, 239, n.

Aceldama, Hakeldamah, where ſituate, 504.

Achme's forgery diſcovered, 389 & n.

Acra, the fortreſs of, built to command the temple, 113. Deſcribed, 137 & n. Signification of the word, ibid. Beſieged by Judas Maccabeus, 150. Fortified by Bacchides, 166. Immured by Jonathan, 179. Surrendered to him, 185. Demoliſhed, ibid. The time when, 186 & n.

Adiba, by whom fortified, 179.

Ænon, where ſituate, 431, n.

Agabus foretels a general famine, 563.

Agrippa's ſplendid reception in Jeruſalem, 313.—The ſon of Ariſtobulus, 323 n.—His ſon Agrippa born, 423. Advanced by Caligula, 552. The reſt ſee under Herod Agrippa.

Ahaſhuerns, vid. Artaxerxes, 24, & ſeq.

Albinus made prætor of Judæa, 571. His character, ibid.

Alcimus promoted to the high-prieſthood, 152. Brings a war on Judæa, ibid. Perfidious to the Aſſideans, 153. Dreadful end, 166.

Aleppo taken by Hyrcan, 198.

Alexander the Great's friendſhip to the Jews, 64, & ſeq. Revenge on the Samaritans, 67. — Balas courts the Jews, 169. His letter to Jonathan, ibid. & n. Signal favours to him, 171 & 174.—Zebina aſſiſted by Jews, 202.

— The ſon of Hyrcan's firſt education, 204, n. Why ſurnamed Janneus, ibid. Impriſoned by Ariſtobulus, 208. Mounts the throne, 211. Fratricide, ibid. Character, ibid. Ill ſucceſs againſt Ptolemais, 212. Defeated by Lathyrus, ibid. By Theodotus, 213. Bloody revenge on the Gazeans, 214. Pelted at the altar, 214, 215 & n. Cruel revenge, 215. On the revolted Jews, 216. Defeated by the Syrians, 217. Cruelty to the rebel Jews, 218. Wars and conqueſts, 219, 220 & n. Death, 220. Laſt advice to his queen, ibid. — The ſon of Ariſtobulus eſcapes out of Pompey's hands, 241. Waſtes Judæa, 243. Defeated by the Romans, 224. Beſieged by them, ibid. Releaſed, ibid. Defeated by Gabinius, 246.

By Caſſius, 248. Beheaded by Scipio at Pompey's deſire, 249.—The ſon of Herod by Mariamne, 304. Marries Glaphyra, 312. Accuſed by his father, 314. Pleads his own cauſe before Auguſtus, ibid. Makes a deſperate confeſſion, 317, 318. Condemned to death, 321. Executed, 322.—A pretended ſon of Mariamne, raiſes a Jewiſh party, 407. Diſcovered by Auguſtus, ibid.

— Tiberius an apoſtate Jew made governor of Judæa, 564.

Alexandria, vid. Salome, 211.

— Queen of the Jews ſtratagem to gain over the Phariſees, 221 & ſeq. Embaſſy to Tigranes, 225. Supplanted by Ariſtobulus, ibid. & ſeq. Her death and character, 226. Falſely confounded with Salome, 227 n.

— Widow of Ariſtobulus, married to Ptolemy Menneus, 249.—Daughter of Hyrcan, cabals againſt Herod, 283. Reſentment for her ſon's death, 286. Plots againſt Herod, ibid. Impriſoned, 238. Confined at Maſſada, 294, 295. Baſe behaviour to her unfortunate daughter, 298. Put to death, 299.

Alexandria filled with Jews, 67.

Alexandrian Jews highly courted, 78. By Cleopatra, 212. Fifty thouſand of them maſſacred by the Romans, 575.

Alexandrion, the fortreſs of deſcribed, 235 n.

Alexas, Salome's huſband, releaſes the Jewiſh chiefs, 393. His ſpeech to the Jewiſh army, 394.

Alpharag in the 12th Century, writes in defence of the Sadducees. 359.

Amatha, the noble palace of, burnt, 403 n.

Amathus taken by Janneus, 213. Deſtroyed by him, 215. Made one of the five courts of judicature, 244.

Ammonius, a writer againſt the Sadducees, 358.

Ananael, an obſcure prieſt, made pontiff, 283. Depoſed, 284.

Ananias, an eminent Jew of Alexandria, 212. His advice to Cleopatra, ibid. —The ſon of Nebedeus, made high-prieſt, 564. Murdered by the zealots, 576.

Ananus, a proud Saducee, made high-prieſt, 571. Puts St. James to death, ibid. & n. His fatal complaiſance to the Sicarii, ibid. Made governor of Jeruſalem, 578. Heads the peaceable party, 586. Oppoſes the Zealots, ibid. Betrayed by John de Giſchala, ibid. Put to death, 587.

Andrew called by Chriſt, 423. Made an apoſtle, 444, n.

Andronicus corrupted by Menelaus, 107. Aſſaſſinates his brother, ibid. His puniſhment, 108

Anna, the prophetess's teſtimony of the child jeſus, 351.

Annas depoſed from the high-prieſt-hood, 413. Sends Chriſt to Caiaphas, 500. Five of his ſons ſucceeds him in his dignity, 571 n.

Anthedon taken by Alexander Janneus, 213.

Antigonus ſeizes on Judæa, 78. A cruel tyrant, 79.

— Socho made préſident of the ſanhedrim, 81. His doctrine, ibid. Death, 90.—the ſon of Hyrcan, ſent againſt Samaria, 202. Put to death, 208.—the ſon of Ariſtobulus, ſent priſoner to Rome, 241. Petition to Cæſar rejected, 251. Invades Judæa, 262. Defeated by Herod, 263. Makes a ſecond invaſion, 265. Beſieged in the temple, 266. Inthroned, 269. Cruelty to Hyrcan and Phaſael, ibid. Outwitted by Ventidius, 271. Driven from Maſſada, 272. His charge againſt the Roman ſenate, 273. Defeated by Herod, 276. Beſieged at Jeruſalem, 277. Taken priſoner, 278. Put to death by Marc Antony at the ſollicitation of Herod, 279 & n. 280 n.

Antiochus Theos's friendſhip to the Jews, 90. Invades Galilee, 94. Defeated by Philopater, and driven out, ibid. Takes Judæa by the aſſiſtance of the Jews from the Egyptians, 97 & ſeq. Friendſhip to the Jews, ibid.

— Epiphanes, his character, 104. Cruelty to the Jewiſh deputies, 108. Againſt Jeruſalem, 110. Defiles and ſtrips the temple. ibid. 111 & n. His bloody perſecution of all the Jews, ibid. & ſeq. Foretold by Daniel, 116 n. Comes to Jeruſalem, 118. His death reſpits that nation, 138.

— ſon of Alexander, dethrones Demetrius, 176. Allies with the Jews, ibid. & ſeq. Grants to the high-prieſt, 183. Perfidy to him, 188. Encourages Ptolemy's treachery againſt the Jews, 193. Invades Judæa, ibid. Beſieges Jeruſalem, 194. Makes peace with Hyrcan, 195. Reception into that metropolis, 197. Death, 198.

— Gryphus's reſentment againſt Hyrcan, 202. Prevented from invading Judæa, ibid.

— Cyzicenus invades Judæa, 203.

— the valley of, ſeized by Alexander Jannæus, 219.

Antipas the ſon of Herod by Martace, 323 n.

———— by Cleopatra, ibid. n. Made tetrarch of Galilee, 393. Supplants his brother Archelaus, 368. The reſt ſee under Herod Antipas, 406 & ſeq.

Antipater, the father of Herod, his deſcent, 224 n. Character, 229. Cabals with the Phariſees, 230. Carries Hyrcan into Arabia, ibid. &c. Pleads the cauſe of Hyrcan Hyrcan before Pompey, 234. Ingratiates himſelf to the Romans, 242. His policy, ibid. Services to Gabinius in Egypt, 246. Aſſiſts Cæſar there, 250. His gallant behaviour there, ibid. Amply rewarded, 251. His ſpeech, 253. Over-awes the Jews, ibid. His progeny, 254 n. Sends his money to Caſſius, 259. Is poiſoned by Malichus, ibid. & ſeq.

— the ſon of Herod in high favour with him, 314 & n. Cabals againſt his two brothers, ibid. Plots againſt his father, 322. Cabals againſt his other brothers, 381. Decoyed back to Jeruſalem, 382. Tried for high treaſon, 387. Condemned, 388. Put to death, 392 & ſeq

— the ſon of Salome's bitter ſpeech againſt Archelaus, 398.

Antipatris built by Herod, 315.

Antiphilus's treaſon diſcovered, 389.

Antonia, the fort of, taken by the zealots, 576. By the Romans, 605.

Antony Marc, ſent againſt Alexander, 243. Partiality to Herod, 263. Edict in favour of the Jews, 264 & n. Procures the Jewiſh crown to Herod, 270. Baſe partiality for him, 287. Defeated by Auguſtus, 292.

— governor of Aſcalon, defeats the Jews, 579.

Apocryphal goſpels trumped up by hereticks, 346 n.

Apollodotus, the brave governor of Gaza, 213. Murdered by his brother, ibid.

Apollonius ſent to maſſacre the Jews, 112. His treachery, ib. Defeated and killed, 128.

— governor of Paleſtine, revolts to Demetrius, 173. Defeated by Jonathan, 174.

Apoſtles, the twelve choſen by Chriſt, 444 & n. Their character, 445. Inſtructions and ſucceſs, 458 & ſeq. Forſake their maſter, 500. Their ſlowneſs to believe his reſurrection, 521. Receive their commiſſion from him, 526. Aſſemble at Jeruſalem after his acceſſion, 531 & ſeq. & 533 n. Receive the Holy Ghoſt, 533. & ſeq. The miraculous effects of it proved, 524 n. Their zeal, miracles, doctrine, &c. 538 & ſeq. & 540 n Arabians defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 145. Nomades, who, ibid. n. Invaded by Alexander Janneus, 216. Defeated by Herod, 291, 292 & n.

Arbela, the banditti of, deſtroyed by Herod, 274, Inſtance of their obſtinacy, 275 n.

Archelaus's addreſs to pacify Herod, 318, & n.

— the ſon of Herod by Martace, 323, n. Succeeds his father, 393, His ſpeech to the Jews, 395. Inſulted by the mutineers, 396. Goes to Rome, 397. Oppoſed by his brother, ibid. & ſeq. By a Jewiſh embaſſy, 405. Obtains but part of his kingdom' 406. His tyranny, 408, Baniſhment, 409.

Archiſynagogoi, their office, 57, n.

Aretas king of Arabia defeats the Jews, 219 Invades Judea in favour of Hyrcan, 231. Defeats Ariſtobulus, ibid. d. Defeated by Ariſtobulus, 233, Wars with Herod Antipas, 432, 433.

Arimathea, where ſituate, 517. n.

Ariſteas's ſtory of the Septuagint verſion conſidered, 83. & n. & 84, n.

Ariſtobulus the ſon of Hyrcan's ſucceſs againſt Cyzicenus, 303, Succeeds his father, 208. His parricide, ibid. & ſeq. Fratricide, 210, & n. Dreadful end, 211. Why ſurnamed Philellen, 208. & 211. n.

—the ſon of Alexander Jannæus, 229. Joins hands with the Sadducees, 223. Sent into Syria, 225. Makes ſure of the Jewiſh crown, 226. Depoſes his brother, 228. Defeated by Aretas, 231. Beſieged in the temple, ibid. Applies to Pompey, 232. Pleads his own cauſe before him, 234. Parts from him in a huff, 235. Impriſoned by him, 236. Carried priſoner to Rome, 241. Eſcapes to Judea, 245. Defeated and taken priſoner, ibid. Releaſed by Julius Cæſar, 249. Poiſoned by Pompey, ibid.

— grandſon of Hyrcan, his title to the Jewiſh crown, 270 n. Made high-prieſt by Herod, 284 & n. Murdered in a bath, 286.

— the ſon of Herod, married to Berenice, 312 Accuſed by Salome, 313. Condemned and put to death, 321, 322.

— the ſon of Agrippa, deprived of his ſucceſſion, 564.

Artaxerxes, one of the magi, obſtructs the rebuilding of the temple, 20. His various names, ibid. n.

— the ſon of Xerxes, the Abaſtuerus of ſcripture, 24. Marries Eſther, ibid. & ſeq. His decree in favour of the Jews, 25, 26 & n.

Aſcalon given to Salome, 406.

Aſcalonites ſeverely puniſhed by Joſeph 3.

Aſcetic chriſtians, when firſt inſtituted, 370.

Aſhmon, the ſuppoſed centre of Galilee, 402 n.

Aſhmoneans, Aſmoneans, the beginning of their reign, 61 & ſeq. The end of it, 279. Duration, ibid. n.

Aſſideans, ſee Haſſideans, 122 n.

Atargatis, how worſhipped, 147. The temple of, burnt, ibid.

Atheneas ſent to perſecute the Jews, 115. Dedicates the temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, ibid.

Athenians, honours to Hyrcan, 242 & n.

Athenion ſent into Judea, 91. His friendſhip to Joſeph, 92.

— Cleopatra's general treachery to Herod, 291.

Athenobius ſent into Judea, 188.

Attrog, a fruit worn by the Jews on the feaſts of tabernacles, deſcribed, 214 n.

Auguſtus's friendſhip to Herod, 271. Victory at Actium, 292. Accepts Herod's friendſhip, 294. His grand reception in Judea, 295. Preſents to Herod, 296. Makes him his procurator in Syria, 305. Receives him at Rome with all marks of friendſhip, 312. Highly diſpleaſed with him, 320. Decree for taxing the empire, 340 & n. Appealed to by Archelaus, 398. Partition of the Jewiſh kingdom, 406.

Auranitis given to Herod, 304 & n.

Azotus taken by Judas Maccabeus, 150. Burnt by Jonathan, 174. Given to Salome, 406.

B

BAanah one of the heads of the returning Jews, 9.

Babas, the ſons of, put to death, 299 & n.

Babyloniſh captivity, the time of, computed, 6, 7 & n.

Bacchides defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 131. Sent to invade Judea, 153. Retires into Syria, 154. Returns with an army, 161. Defeats the Jews and kills Judas their general, 162. Cruelty to them, ibid. Succeſs againſt them, 166. Returns to Antiochus, ibid. & n. Sent to ſurpriſe Jonathan, 167. Beſieges him, ibid. Defeated by him, ibid. Makes peace with him, 168.

Bagoſes impoſes a fine on the Jews, 62. The ſum diſcuſſed, ibid. n.

Baithus, an Epicurean Jew, 90.

Balaam, the place of his birth, 344 n.

Balm, the plant of, deſcribed, 289 n.

Banditti of Paleſtine, deſtroyed by Herod, 254 & 274. Their invincible obſtinacy, 275 n. Kill Herod's general, ibid.

Baris, by whom built, 207. Deſcribed, ibid. & n.

Bartholemew called to be an apoſtle, 423, & 444 n.

Barzapharnes's treachery to Phaſael, 267.

Baſſus Lucil. completes the reduction of Judea, 619 & ſeq.

Batanea given to Herod, 304 n.

Batelnim among the Jews, what, 58 n.

Bath-col of the Jews, what, 488 n.

Batillus diſcovers Antipater's plot, 382.

Bean, the children of, who, 138 & n. Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, ibid.

Berenice, the daughter of Salome, married to Ariſtobulus, 312. Her off-ſpring, 323 n.

— daughter of Herod Agrippa, born, 423. Married to the king of Chalcis, 562. Her incontinency, 567 n. Piety towards the perſecuted Jews, 576. Diſcarded by Titus, 623.

Bethabara, Beth-habara, whence ſo called, 422 & n.

Bethany, where ſituate, 477,

Bethel fortified by the Syrians, 166.

Bethesda, the pool of, deſcribed, 440 & n.

Bethlehem, the place of Chriſt's birth, 340.

— the children of, maſſacred, 383.

— the prophecy of, explained, 384 n. & ſeq. n.

Bethoron, where ſituate, 128 n. Fortified by Bacchides, 166.

Bethpage, where ſituate, 484.

Bethzura, deſcribed, 132 & n. The battle of, diſcuſſed, ibid. n. & ſeq. n. Fortified by Judas Maccabeus, 137. Where ſituate, ibid n. Taken and fortified by Bacchides, 166. Rataken by Simon Maccabeus, 177.

Beza's notion of the Herodians, confuted, 361.

Bigvai, one one of the heads of the Jewiſh return, 9.

Bilhan, one of the ſame claſs, 9.

Boanerges, whence ſo called, 444 n. Their furious zeal rebuked, 473.

Boſſora taken by Judas Maccabeus, 140.

Bread from heaven offends the Jews, 460.

C

CAbbis, Joſeph, made high-prieſt, 570.

Cæſar, Jul. releaſes Ariſtobulus, 249. Aſſiſted by the Egyptian Jews, 250 & ſeq. Gratitude to them, 251, 257. Murdered in the ſenate, 258.

— Sextus, friendſhip to Herod, 254. Murdered by Baſſus, 258

Cæſarea, by whom built, 301 n. Deſcribed, 302 n. Finiſhed, 315.

— another built by Philip, 414.

Cæſarean Jews, 20,000 of them maſſacred, 575.

Caiaphas made high-prieſt, 413 n. Prophetic ſentence againſt Chriſt, 483. Condemns him to death, 501.

Caius made umpire of Archelaus's title, 398. Contempt of the Jewiſh religion, 409.

— Caligula's perſecution of the Jews, 552, 553. Friendſhip to Agrippa, ibid.

Calippian cycle, what, 156 n.

Caliſthenes burnt, 131, 132.

Cavalry, vid. Golgotha, 508.

Cambyſes privately obſtructs the building of the temple, 19.

Cana, the marriage and miracle of, 423, 424 & n.

Caper-

Capernaum, much frequented by Chriſt, 424 & ſeq. Where ſituate, 438 n. Its fate, ibid.

Caponius, governor of Judæa, 410.

Cariates, vid. Kariates, 372 & n.

Carnion, where ſituate, 146. Taken and burnt, 147.

Caſiphia, where ſituate, 26 & n.

Caſpis taken by Jadas Maccabeus, 146.

Caſſius's ſucceſs againſt Alexande, 248, 249 & n. Seizes on Syria, 258. Sells little principalities by auction, 263. Defeated by Marc Antony, ibid.

Catullus's treachery to the Jews, puniſhed, 621 n.

Celer, a tribune, put to death, 565.

Cendebus ſent to invade Judæa, 189. Defeated, ibid.

Centurion in Judæa's extraordinary humility, 447.

Cerealis's expedition againſt the Samaritans, 583. Againſt Idumæa, 594.

Ceſtius Gallus governor of Syria numbers the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, 574. Marches againſt the zealots, 577. Defeated, 578. Diſgraced and dies, 579.

Chalcidius's account of the ſtar at Chriſt's birth, 348 n.

Chaldee character, when and by whom introduced into Judæa, 31 n. & ſeq. n.

— paraphraſe, when and why firſt brought into uſe, 59.

Caphenatha, part of Jeruſalem, ſo called, 179.

Characa, where ſituate, 146 & n. Taken by the Jews, ibid.

Chel, of the temple what, 99 n.

Chelkias, a famed Jew of Alexandria, 212. Prevails on Cleopatra to aſſiſt the Jews againſt Ptolemy, ibid.

Chereas defeated and killed by the Jews, 139.

Choſe an Idumean deity, who, and whence ſo named, 299 n.

Chriſtians, primitive, their admirable lives, 538 & ſeq. Perſecuted in Judæa, 543. Leave Jeruſalem before the ſiege, 578 & 579 n.

Ciſenna, a raſh commander in Syria, 246.

Cleopatra oppoſes her ſon Lathyrus in Judæa, 212. Friendſhip to Janneus, 211. To the Jews, 212 & ſeq. — courtſhip to Herod, 269. Intrigues againſt him, 284 & ſeq. Comes into Judæa, 289. Her character, ibid. & ſeq. Helliſh plot againſt Herod, 290. Her death adviſed to Antony by Herod, 292.

— one of Herod's wives, 323 n. Helps to ſupplant Archelaus, 398

Cleophas's entertainment with Chriſt, 521 & ſeq.

Cornelius, a centurion, converted to chriſtianity, 549.

Coſroes, a great fovourer of the Karaites, 378 n.

Coſtobares, put to death by Herod, 299.

Craſſus ſucceeds Gabinius in Judæa, 246. Plunders the temple, 248.

Criminals executed without the gates of Jeruſalem, 509 n. How buried, 518. A terrible ſight exhibited by them at Berytus, 559 n.

Cumanus Ventid. ſent governor of Judæa, 564. Refuſes Juſtice to the Jews, and is ſent to Rome by Quadratus governor of Syria, 565. Baniſhed, ibid.

Cycle, a new one, introduced in Judæa, 155, 156 n.

Cypris, wife of Antipater, her progeny, 254 n.

Cypron built by Herod, 315.

Cyprus, the golden mines of, given to Herod, 315 n.

— the caſtle of, taken by the zealots, 577.

Cyrenean Jews, whence, 69 d. Relieved by Auguſtus, 315.

Cyrenius ſent to tax the Jews, 409.

Cyrus's decree in favour of the Jews, 7, & ſeq. Confirmed by Darius, 21.

D

DAgon's temple burnt by Jonathan, 174.

Dalmanutha, where ſituate, 465 & n.

Damaſcen, Nicolas's addreſs to clear Herod to Auguſtus, 320 & n. Pleads againſt Antipater, 388. In favour of Archelaus, 399, 406.

Daniel's character, prophecies, 18, 19 n. Shewn to Alexander the Great, 64. A ſignal one explained, 116. His weeks, how computed, 326 n. & ſeq. n.

Darkneſs at Chriſt's crucifixion miraculous, 513 n.

Dathema, where ſituate, 140. Relieved by Judas Maccabeus, ibid.

David's tomb, the ſtory of its being rifled diſcuſſed, 196 n.

David, in what ſenſe Chriſt is his ſon, 494 & n.

Deacons, the firſt ſeven choſen in the chriſtian church, 541.

Decapolis, whence ſo called, 464 & n.

Dedication of the temple of Judas Maccabeus, how performed, 135. The feaſt of, inſtituted by him, ibid. & 136 & n.

Demetrius Phalereus promotes the ſeptuagint verſion, 83 n. & ſeq. n.

— king of Syria makes war againſt the Jews, 152 & ſeq. Forbid to go on by the Romans, 160. Renews hoſtilities, 167.

Courts

Courts the Jews, ibid. His letter to Jonathan, ibid. Second offers to them ſuſpected, 171. His general having made peace is ordered to renew the war, 156. Defeat by Alexander Balas, and death, ibid. & ſeq.

—— Nicanor, a friend to the Jews, 175 & n. Perfidy to them, 176. Dethroned by Antiochus, ibid. & ſeq.

—— Eucherus invades Judæa, 217.

—— governor of Gamala, taken priſoner, 219.

Demus, the temple of, what, 243 n.

Devils, whether they poſſeſſed men, 436, 437 n.

Diogenes, a Sadducee, put to death, 222.

Dion taken by Alexander Janneus, 219.

Dioſcorinthus, the month of explained, 143 n.

Diſciples LXX. appointed by Chriſt, 473, & n. Their joyful return, 477.

Dolabella eaſes the Aſiatic Jews from wars, 258.

Doris, Antipator's mother, conſpires againſt Herod, 324. Baniſhed, 325.

Doſitheus, a brave Jewiſh general's ſucceſs againſt the Syrians, 146 & ſeq. In Idumea, 148. Loſes his arm in a battle, ibid.— the betrayer of Hyrcan, 293 n.

Drachm of gold, its value, 13 n.

Druſilla, daughter of Herod Agrippa, 562. Married to Azizus king of Emeſſa, 567. To Felix, ibid.

Dryma, the canto of, where, 266 & n.

E

EAgle, golden, ſet up by Herod, pulled down, 390.

Eagles, Roman, a ſanctuary, 287, 288 n.

Earthquake, a violent one in Judæa, 291. Another at Chriſt's crucifixion, 515 & ſeq.

Ecdipon, where ſituate, 267 n.

Eleazar made high-prieſt, 81. Sends the ſeventy interpreters to Ptolemy, 84 n.

— a venerable Jew martyred, 118.

— a ſurly Phariſee's affront to Hyrcan, 205 & n.

— a fooliſh prieſt, betrays the temple treaſury, 248.

— the ſon of Annas made high-prieſt, 413. Carried off by the ſicarii, 571. Murdered by the zealots, 576.

— head of the zealots, beats the Romans, 576. Made governor of Idumea, 578.

— a worthy prieſt, raiſes a party againſt the zealots, 594, 595. Surpriſed by John de Giſchala, 598. His deſperate end at Maſſada, 620.

Eli eli lama, &c. in what ſenſe repeated by Chriſt on the croſs, 413 & n. & ſeq. In what language, ibid.

Eliaſhib, an unworthy Jewiſh prieſt, 54. His death, 60.

Elioneus made high-prieſt, 560.

Eizabeth conceives in her old age, 328, & ſeq.

Elpis, Herod's laſt wife, 323 n.

Emmaus, whence ſo called, 403 n & 404. Where ſituate, 414 n. Fortified by the Syrians, 116. Whence called Nicopolis, 620 n.

Ephron taken by Judas Maccabeus, 147.

Eſſa taken by Alexander Janneus, 219.

Eſſenians, who, favoured by Herod, 282 n. Oppoſe his oath of fidelity, 306. Famous ſect among the Jews, 363. Why not mentioned by the evangeliſts, ibid. Etymon of their name, ibid. n. Their riſe, ibid. & ſeq. Auſtere life, ibid. & ſeq. Their faith, peculiar tenets, &c. 366 & ſeq. Degeneracy and end, 370, 371.

Eſdras, the apocryphal book of, 47 n.

Eſther married to Ahaſuerus, 24 & ſeq. Her hiſtory, ibid. Obtains a commiſſion to build the temple at Jeruſalem, 25.

Etnarchy, what, 406.

Ezra ſent into Judæa, 25, 26. His genealogy, ibid. n. Commiſſion in favour of the Jews, 27. Reformation of church and ſtate, ibid. & n. Of the canon, 28 & ſeq. Whether the inventor of Hebrew points, 31 n. Inſertions added by him to the text, 33 & n. Reſtores the divine worſhip, 34. Character and writings, 39 & ſeq. Lecture of the law to the people, 51 & ſeq. Whether founder of the Kariates, 372 n.

F

FAbius mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 238.

Fadus Cuſpius ſent governor of Judæa, 362 & ſeq. Suppreſſes an inſurrection, 564.

Fauſtus Cornel. mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 238.

Felix driven out of Jeruſalem, 262 Made prætor of Judæa, 565. His ſad character, 566, 567 n. Murders the good old high-prieſt, 567. Marries Druſilla, ibid. Trembles at St Paul's preaching, 568.

Feſtus Portius ſent governor of Judæa, 568. Severity againſt the turbulent Jews, 569. Partiality to the Jewiſh prieſts, ibid. & ſeq. Hears St. Paul's defence and acquits him, ibid. Dies, 571.

Fire ſacred, when and how diſcovered, 52 n.

Flaccus's cruelty to the Alexandrian Jews, 553. Baniſhed and put to death, 554.

Florus Geſſius, governor of Judæa's ſad character, 572. Rapines and cruelties complained of, 574. Horrid butcheries, 575 Brutiſhneſs to Berenice, 576.

Furius mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 238.

G

GAbala, by whom built, 301 n.
Gabeſtus aſſiſts Ariſtobulus, 226.
Gabinius's treachery againſt Ariſtobulus, 222. Made governor of Syria, 243. Succeſs in Egypt, 246. Againſt Alexander, ibid. Why recalled 247 n.
Gabriel, the angel ſent to Zacharias, 325 & ſeq. To the virgin Mary, 331.
Gadara taken by Janneus, 213. Made one of the five Jewiſh courts, 244. Diſmantled from Judæa, 580. Taken by the Romans, 593.
Galileans maſſacred by Pilate, 462.
Galilee invaded by Antiochus, 94. By Timotheus, 140. Reduced by Herod, 274. Revolts to Antigonus, 276. Its converſion foretold, 436. Subdued by the Romans, 583 & ſeq.
Gamala taken by the Romans, 583 & ſeq.
Gamaliel's advice to the ſanhedrin, 540 & ſeq. Who he was, ibid. n.
Games inſtituted by Herod, 300.
Garizzim, the temple of, when and by whom built, 66 n. An aſſylum for renegado Jews, 67. Deſtroyed by Hyrcan, 198 & ſeq.
Gaulana taken by Alexander Janneus, 219.
Gaulonites, the ſect of, 362. Inſurrection, 410 & ſeq. The reſt vid. ſub Zealots, & ſeq.
Gaza beſieged beſieged by Alexander Janneus, 213. Betrayed to him, ibid. Deſtroyed, 214. Diſmembered from Judæa, 406.
Gazara taken by Judas Maccabeus, 139. Where ſituate, ibid. n. Taken by Simon, 184, 185 & n.
Gedor fortified by Cendebeus, 189.
Gellius's ill ſucceſs in Arabia, 302 & ſeq.
Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt, 331 & n. St. Matthew's and St. Luke's reconciled, ibid. n.
Generation, the meaning of that word, 486 n.
Genezareth, lake, why called the ſea of Tiberias, 414.
Gentiles, when their converſation firſt began, 549 & ſeq.
Georgias ſent againſt the Jews, 129. Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 130. In Idumea, 138. By Doſitheus, 149.
Gergaſenes, where ſituate 454 & n.
Gethſemane, whence ſo called, 499 & n.
Ghoſt, Holy, the ſin againſt, what, 450 n. & ſeq. Why unpardonable, 451 n.
— miraculous deſcent on the apoſtles, 533 & ſeq. The truth of the fact proved, 534 n. & ſeq. n.
Gibeon, where ſituate, 577 & n.
Gilead, the Jews of, diſtreſſed by the Syrians, 140. Relieved by Judas Maccabeus, 147. Subdued by Alexander Janneus, 216.
Gileadites removed into Judæa, 147.
Giſchala, the city of, taken by the Romans, 584.
— John de, outwits Veſpaſian and flies to Juruſalem, ibid. Treachery to Ananus, 586 & 587 n. Deperate defence againſt the oppoſite parties, 595 & n. Againſt Simon, 599. Plunders the temple, 606. Horrid hypocriſy, 607. Taken priſoner, 617. Puniſhment, 618 & n.
Glaphyra, princeſs of Cappadocia, married to Alexander, 312. Sent back after her huſband's death, 322. Illegally married to Archelaus, 408.
Golgotha, deſcribed, 509 n.
Gradual pſalms, why ſo called, 35 & n.
Gratus defeats the ſeditious Jews, 403.
— Valerius, made governor of Judæa, 413. Depoſeth the high-prieſt, ibid.
Greeks that came to ſee Chriſt, who, 588 & n.

H

HAgerim Malcuth, what is meant by, 199 n.
Haggai the prophet, reproves the Jews, 20. One of Ezra's aſſiſtants, 29 n.
Hallal, among the Jews, a ſet of euchariſtical pſalms, 498 n.
Hanani and Hanania made governors of Jeruſalem, 50.
Hardouin's pedigree of Herod confuted, 224 n. And his notion of the Herodians, 361.
Hare, biſhop, an examination of his metrical edition of the Hebrew pſalms, 36 & ſeq. Confuted in many particulars, idid. & ſeq. & n. Merit of his book, ibid.
Haſſideans, or Aſdanim repair to Mattathias, 121. Their ſect, ibid. n. Murdered by Bacchides, 153. Whether the ſame with the Eſſenians, 364.
Hebrew character exchanged for the Chaldee, 31.
Hebron taken and razed by Judas Maccabeus, 142.
Hecateus the hiſtorian, inſtructed by a Jewiſh prieſt, 78 n. Wrote the hiſtory of the Jews from Abraham to his own time, ibid.
Helepolis, a warlike engine, why ſo called, 629 n.
Heliodorus ſent by Seleucus king of Syria, to ſeize the temple treaſure, 101, 103. His miraculous puniſhment, 103.

Herod, when born, 224 n. His pedigree, ibid. Made governor of Galilee, 254. Succeſs againſt the banditti, ibid. & ſeq. Summoned by the ſanhedrin, 255. Inſolence to that court, ibid. & ſeq. Puts to death his cowardly judges, 256. Made governor of Cœle-Syria, 259. Politic revenge on Malichus, 360. Quells the Malichean faction, 262 & ſeq. Contracted to Mariamne, ibid. Defeats Antigonus, 263. Favoured by Marc Antony, ibid. & ſeq. Made tetrarch by him, 265. Eſcapes Pacorus's trap, 267. Goes into Arabia, 268 & ſeq. Ill ſucceſs there, ibid. & ſeq. More ſucceſsful at Rome, 269. Created king of Judæa, 270. Relieves his family at Maſſada, 272. Amneſty to the Antigonians, 273. Engines to deſtroy the banditi, 274. Aſſiſts Marc Antony at Samoſata, 276. Defeats Antigonus, 277. Marries Mariamne, ibid. Takes Jeruſalem, 278. Complains of Soſius's cruelty, ibid. Begins his reign with cruel exactions, 280. Decoys Hyrcan into Judæa, 282 & ſeq. Plagued with domeſtic jars, 285. Murders Ariſtobulus, 286. Abſolved by Antony, 287. Bloody orders concerning Mariamne, ibid. Noble reception of Cleopatra, 289, 290. Betrayed by her, 290. Defeats the Arabians, 292. Treachery to Hyrcan, 293 & n. Bold ſpeech to Auguſtus, 294. Grand reception of him in Judæa, 295 Puts Mariamne to death, 297. His remorſe turned into cruel madneſs, 298. Prophane buildings, games, &c. diſpleaſe the Jews, 300. Rebuilds Samaria, 301. Generoſity during the famine, 302. Palace deſcribed, ibid. Sends his ſons to Auguſtus, 303. Accuſed by Zenodorus, is acquitted, 304 & ſeq. Rebuilds the temple of Jeruſalem, 306 & ſeq. Makes ſevere laws againſt robbers, 311. Goes to fetch his two ſons home, 312. Their marriage, ibid. Accuſes them before Cæſar, 314. Plunders David's tomb, 316. Horrid butcheries, 317 & ſeq. Accuſed before Auguſtus, 319. Gets his two ſons condemned, 321. His wives progeny, &c. 322 & n. Falls out with Pheroras, 323 & ſeq. Diſcovers Antipater's conſpiracy, 324. Fears at the arrival of the eaſtern magi, 348. His diſtracted ſtate at the birth of Chriſt, 380 & ſeq. Over-reaches Antipater, 382. Maſſacres the children of Bethlehem, 383. Arreſts Antipater, 387. Pleads againſt him, ibid. Finds new proofs of his treaſon, ibid. & ſeq. His ſickneſs and teſtament, 390. Affronted by the Jews, 391. His ſpeech to them at Jericho, ibid. Dreadful diſeaſe, 392 n. Bloody orders againſt the Jews, ibid. His death and character, 393 & n. Pompous burial, 394. His will canvaſſed by the ſenate, 403.

— Antipas's ſhare of the Jewiſh kingdom, 406. Cities built by him, 414. Veneration for the baptiſt, 432. Impriſons him at Macheron, ibid. & ſeq. Beheads him, ibid. Contempt of Chriſt, 506. Unſucceſsful wars with Aretas, 545. Comes to Jeruſalem, 547. And diſobliges Vitellius, ibid. & ſeq. Affronts Agrippa, 552. Accuſed and baniſhed, 554 & n.

— Agrippa's advancement by Caligula, 552. Various fortunes before it, ibid. & ſeq. Affronted at Alexandria, 553 & n. Supplants Antipas, 554. Intercedes for the Jews, 555 & ſeq. His letter to Caligula, 556 n. Advancement under Claudius, 558. Attachment to the Jewiſh religion, 559. His character, ibid. & n. High credit, 560. Viſited by five kings, ibid. Perſecutes the church, and beheads St. James, ibid. His dreadful end, 561 & 562 n. Indignities offered to his memory, ibid. & n.

— the ſon of Agrippa, deprived of his kingdom, 562. Succeeds his father, 564. Intereſt at the Roman court, 565. Hears Paul's defence before Feſtus, 570. Affronts the Jews at Jeruſalem, ibid. Becomes odious to them, 572. Driven out of the city, 575. His palace burnt by the zealots, 576. Joins forces with Ceſtius, 578. With Titus, 579. Accompanies him to Rome, 593. Careſſed by him, 622. His death, 623. Laſt king of the Herodian race, ibid.

— the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and grandſon of Herod the Great, 323 n.

Herodian line, its ſhort duration, 623.

Herodians, a real ſect in Chriſt's time, 359. Their particular tenets, ibid. & ſeq. Confuted by Chriſt, 492.

Herodias, grand-daughter to Herod the Great, 323. Inceſtuous marriage with Antipas, 432. Reſentment againſt the baptiſt, ibid. & ſeq.

— wife of Antipas's untimely ambition, 554. Goes with him into baniſhment, ibid.

Herodion, by whom built, 303. Deſcribed, ibid. n.

Hezechias, chief of the Paleſtine robbers, put to death, 254.

Hillel, the famed Jewiſh doctor, whether the Pollio of Joſephus, 282 n. When he flouriſhed, 352.

Hippon diſmembered from Judæa, 406.

Hiram, one of the four prieſtly claſſes, 11.

Hozannah, what is meant by, 484 n.

Hyrcan, the ſon of Joſeph, a worthy youth, 93. Strange profuſeneſs in Egypt, 100 & 101 n. Perſecuted by his brethren, 101 n. Kills himſelf, ibid. n.

— the

— the ſon of Simon, why ſurnamed Hyrcan, 190 n. His reception at Jeruſalem, 193, Succeeds his father in the high-prieſthood. &c. ibid. Beſieged by Antiochus, 194. Deſires a truce of ſeven days ibid. Makes peace with him, 195. Said to have rifled David's tomb, 196. Shakes off the Syrian yoke 198. Takes Aleppo, ibid. Invades Syria, ibid. Samaria, ibid. Idumea, 199. Renews his alliance with the Romans, ibid. & 200 n. Sends a new embaſſy to Rome, ibid. Beſieges Samaria 203. His great character, ibid. Prophetic ſpirit, 204 & n. Falls out with the Phariſees, 205 & n. His death, 206 & n, & ſeq. n.

— the ſon of Alexander Janneus, made high-prieſt. 221. Forſaken by his ſubjects, 227. Depoſed, 228. The time when, ibid. n. His cauſe eſpouſed by Antipater 230, Pleads his cauſe before Pompey, 234. Reſtored to the high-prieſthood, 239. Highly honoured by the Athenians, 242. Reinſtated by Gabinius. 244. Confirmed by Cæſar, 251. Allies with him, 252. Fatal partiality to Herod, 255. Cowardice, 262. Carried to Barzapharnes, 267. Diſqualified by the loſs of his ears, 269 & n. Carried priſoner into Parthia, ibid. Highly reſpected there, 283. Decoyed back by Herod, ibid. Beheaded by him, 293.

I

JAcob's prophecy of the ſceptre, departing from Judah, explained, 57, 549, 550 & n.

Jaddua's fidelity to Darius 63. Highly revered by Alexander the Great, 64. Obtains for the Jews a free exerciſe of their religion, 65. His death, 68.

Jambrians, who, 164 & n. Puniſhed by Jonathan, ibid.

James the Greater, ſon of Zebedee, made an apoſtle. 444 n. With his brother ſirnamed Boanerges ibid. Beheaded by Agrippa, 560 & n.

— the Leſs, made an apoſtle, 444 n. Why called the Lord's brother, ibid. Why made biſhop of Jeruſalem, 547 & n.

— the ſon of Judas Galileus, crucified, 564.

Jamnia, where ſituate, 141 & n. Burnt by Judas Maccabeus, ibid. Given to Salome, 406.

Janneus, vid. Alexander, 212 & ſeq.

Janus's temple ſhut at the birth of Chriſt, 343 & n.

Japhians put to the ſword, 580.

Jaſon undermines his brother Onias, 104. Bribes Antiochus for liberty to erect a gymnaſium at Jeruſalem, ibid. Supplanted by his brother Menelaus 106. Raiſes a new rebellion 109. His tragical end, 110 & n.

Jazar taken by Judas Maccabeus, 139.

Idumea, new, deſcribed, 37 & n. Conquered by Hyrcan, 199.

Idumeans forced to be circumciſed, 199 & n. Invited into Jeruſalem 587. Return home, 589. Betrayed to Simon, 591.

Jedaiah, one of the four ſacerdotal claſſes, 11.

Jericho taken by Bacchides, 166. Made one of the five Courts of the province, 244.

— the palace of, burnt, 402. Rebuilt by Archelaus, 408.

Jeruſalem rebuilt, and repeopled, 50, 51. Taken by Ptolemy, 68 & n. By Antiochus, 110. Burnt and razed by Apollonius, 112. Rebuilt by Judas Maccabeus, 134. Fortified, 179. Diſmantled by Antiochus, 196. Beſieged by Pompey, 236. Taken 238. How oft on the ſame day, 239 n. Made one of the five courts of judicature, 244. Rebuilt by Antipater, 252, &c. 257. Beſieged by Herod, 277. Taken, 278. Its deſtruction foretold by Chriſt, 435, & ſeq. & n. Inlarged by Agrippa, 560. The number of its inhabitants taken by Ceſtius, 574. Forſaken by crouds of Jews, 578. Torn into three factions, 594. Beſieged by Titus, 598. Its firſt wall entered 600. Second taken, ibid. Labours under peſtilence and famine, 601. Circumwalled, 602 & n. Famiſhed, 603 & n. Taken and deſtroyed, 605, & ſeq. 611, &c.

— high city, taken by the Romans, 613. The number of Jewiſh priſoners made in it, 614. Prodigies foregoing its total ruin, 616. Razed 617.

Jeſua, the Jewiſh high-prieſt's return from Babylon, 9. Genealogy. ibid. n. Death, 24.

— or Jeſus, killed by his brother, 62.

Jeſus the ſon of Sirach, when he flouriſhed, 113, n. An account of his writings, ibid. & 197 n.

— Chriſt, the redeemer of the world, his nativity foretold, 331, & ſeq. & n. Born at Bethlehem, 339. Birth proclaimed by angels, 341. Circumciſed, 342. The year of his birth computed, ibid. n. Manifeſted to the eaſtern magi, 343 & ſeq. Preſented at the temple 350, 351. Whether of the Eſſenian ſect, 369. Conveyed into Egypt, 383, & ſeq. Whence called a Nazarite, 385. The propheſy of it explained, ibid. n. At twelves years of age goes to the feſtival at Jeruſalem, 411. Stays three days there, ibid. Aſks and anſwers queſtions of the doctors, ibid. Firſt entrance into the miniſtry, 420. Baptiſm, 422. Firſt miracle, at Cana, 424. Anſwer to his mother vindicated, 423, 424, n. Drives the traders out of the temple, ibid. n. Other miracles, 425. ſublime diſcourſe with Nicodemus, 427, & ſeq. & n. Goes into Galilee, 434. Cures the nobleman's ſon, 435. A dæmoniac, 436. & ſeq. Calls Simon Peter, 438. Cures a paralytic on the ſabbath, 439. Calls Mathew, ibid. & ſeq. Silences the offended Jews, 442 & n. Chuſes his twelve apoſtles, 444 & n. His ſermon on the mount, 406. Heals the centurion's ſervant, 447. Raiſes the widow's ſon, ibid. His yoke, why light, 448 & n. Abſolves the ſinful woman, 449. Condemns infidelity, 450. & n. Why he ſpoke in parables, 453. Stills the winds and ſea, 454. Heals two fierce demoniacs. ibid. Raiſes the ruler's daughter, 455, & ſeq. Why he concealed his miracles, 456. n. Sends his apoſtles to preach, 457. Feeds five thouſand with five loaves, 459. Walks on the ſea, ibid. Forſaken by many of his hearers, 460. Reproves the Phariſees, 463. Heals the Syro-Phœnician's daughter. 464. Goes to Tyre, and Sidon, &c. 463. Feeds four thouſand with ſeven loaves, 464: Cures a blind man, 466. Jews opinion of him, ibid. Foretels his own death, ibid & 469. Is transfigured upon the mount, 467. Heals a demoniac, 469. Pays the tribute, 470. Checks his apoſtles ambition, ibid. Enjoins humility, forgiveneſs, &c. 471. Reproved by his kinsfolk, 472. Appoints ſeventy diſciples, 473. Teaches in the temple, 474. Acquits the adultereſs, 476. Reproved for curing on the ſabbath, 478, & ſeq. Raiſes Lazarus, 481. Some circumſtances of the miracle examined, 482, n. Triumphant entry into Jeruſalem, 484. Foretels its ruin with tears, 485 & n. Curſe of the fig-tree vindicated, 490. Silences the Jewiſh ſects, 491, 492. Waſhes his diſciples feet, 495. Deſcribes the day of judgment, 496. Celebrates the laſt ſupper, 497, 498 & n. his agony in the garden, 499 & n. Brought bound before the ſanhedrin, 501. Tried and condemned, ibid. Denied by Peter, 502. Sent to Pilate, 504. To Herod, 505. Brought back and ſcourged, 507. Accuſed of blaſphemy and condemned to the croſs, 508. Crucified 510. The hour when, ibid. n. Abſolves the penitent thief, 512 & n. His laſt Prayer, 513. Expires, 514. Why pierced in the ſide, 517. Why buried apart, 518. His tomb, why ſealed and guarded, 518 & n. His reſurrection, 519. Appears to the eleven, 522. To the reſt, 523 & n. Commiſſion to them, 524, & ſeq. Aſcends into heaven, 528, 529 & n. Teſtimony of other authors concerning him, 530.

— the ſon of Damneus, made high-prieſt, 571, Goes over to Titus, 607.

— the ſon of Gamaliel put in his ſtead, 572. Their fatal enmity againſt each other, ibid. — oppoſes the Zealots, 586. Put to death by them, 587.

— the ſon of Ananus, a dreadful prophet againſt Jeruſalem, 573. His ſufferings and death, ibid. & 599.

Jewiſh government, how altered by Pompey, 240. By Gabinius, 244 & n. Reſtored by Cæſar, 251 & 252, n.

— camp, the battle of, 250.

Jews return from captivity, 3 & 6, & ſeq. Their number, 4. Change of condition, ibid & ſeq. Renew their feaſts, 12. Blamed for rejecting the Samaritans, 15 & n. & ſeq. Polluted by ſtrange marriages, 27, 28. Oppreſſed by their rulers, 49. Repreſſed by Nehemiah 49, 50. Degenerate, 54. Fidelity to the Perſians, 63. Favoured by Alexander the Great, 64, 65. Fatal ſuperſtition about the ſabbath, 68. Flee to Alexandria, 78. Their different ſentiments concerning the ſeptuagint verſion, 84, & ſeq. Attachment to the Egyptians, 95, 96, & n. Turn to the Syrians, 97, 98 & & n Apoſtatiſe under Jaſon, 105. Forewarned by dire prodigies, 109. Maſſacred by Antiochus, 110. By Apollonius, 112. Horridly perſecuted, 115, & ſeq. Forbid their ſacred book, 117 Butchered in many places, 144, 145. Their idolatrous ſuperſtition puniſhed, 149. In high favour in Egypt, 172. Build a ſchiſmatic temple there, ibid & n. Superſtition fatal to Jeruſalem, 238. Dreadfully butchered there, ibid. Highly favoured by Julius Cæſar, 252, 257. Complaints againſt Herod rejected, 263. Puniſhed, 265. Conſpire againſt him, 300. Frivolous anſwers to the chriſtians, 336 n. & 342 n. Cauſes of their infidelity and ruin, 351. Various ſects, 352, & ſeq. Two falſe notions concerning the Meſſiah confuted, 386, 387, n. Mutiny againſt Archelaus, 395. Puniſhed, ibid. Take up arms againſt Sabinus, 396. Two thouſand of them crucified, 404. Send an embaſſy to Rome, 405. Revolt under Judas Galileus, 410. Why expelled Rome, 415. Petition Pilate againſt his ſtandards, ibid. And ſhields 416. Their infatuated ſtate at the appearing of Chriſt, 418. The cauſe of their rejection and ruin, ibid. & ſeq. & n Their incredulity accounted for, 425, n. Offended at Chriſt's ſpiritual doctrine, 460. Had the power of life and death death till after his time, 502 & n. 549, & 550, n. Perſecuted at Alexandria, 553. Raiſe new troubles, 564. Deluded by falſe prophets, 566. Break out into open rebellion, 575. Maſſacred every where, ibid. Prepare for an obſtinate defence, 578. Divided into factions, 585 & n. Cruelly butchered, 602 & ſeq. Famiſhed, 603 & n. & 605 n. Set fire to the galleries of the temple, 609, ſeq. Maſſacred by the Romans, 611 Strict faſt for Jeruſalem, 612. Sum total of their ſlain in the laſt war, 615.

— Spaniſh their apoſtacy, 73, n.

— writers wretched chronologers, 98 n

Immer, one of the four ſacerdotal claſſes, 11.

Joazar made high-prieſt, 391. Depoſed by Archelaus, 408. By Cyrenius, 410 n.

Johanan, Jewiſh high-prieſt, kills his brother, 62. His death, 63.

John the Maccabee, killed by the Jambrians, 164.

— the ſon of Simon, made general, 186. Defeats the Syrians, 190. Why ſirnamed Hyrcan, ibid. n. & 198. Cætera vid. ſub Hyrcan, ibid. & ſeq.

— the baptiſt's birth foretold, 328. Fulfilled, 338 & n. Brought up among the Eſſenians, 369. His life, preaching, &c, 420, 421, & n. Baptizes Chriſt, 422. Reproves Herod's inceſt, 432. Impriſoned and beheaded for it, ibid & ſeq. Joſephus's character of him, 434.

— the beloved diſciple, takes the virgin mother to his home, 512. Runs with Peter to the ſepulchre, 520. Not to die till the coming of Chriſt, 525.

Joiachim, high-prieſt of the Jews, 24.

Jonah's whale deſcribed, 452, n.

Jonathan the Maccabee ſucceeds his brother Judas, 163. Revenges on the Jambrian's his brother's death, 164. Defeated at Teccoa, 165. Defeats a conſpiracy, 167. Beats and makes peace with Bacchides, ibid. 168. Judges the Jews, ibid. Made high-prieſt, 169 & 170, n. Sides with Alexander, 171. His reception at Ptolemais, ibid. Defeats Apollonius, 174. Beſieges Acra, 175. In high favour with Nicator, ibid. Joins with Antiochus, 176. Falls into an ambuſh and beats the Demetrians, 177. Betrayed by Tryphon, 180. Murdered ibid. & 182. n. His ſepulchre deſcribed, ibid. n.

— the ſon of Abſalom, takes Joppa, 184.

— a zealous Sadducee, ſets Hyrcan againſt the Phariſees, 205 n. & 206, n.

— the ſon of Ananus, made high-prieſt, 554. Refuſes a ſecond pontificate, 559. Ill requited by Felix, 567.

— a Jewiſh impoſtor's puniſhment, 621, n.

Joppa deſtroyed by Judas Maccabeus, 144. Taken by Simon, 179, Deſcribed, ibid. Taken by the Romans, 583.

Joſeph's policy to ſave the Jewiſh ſtate, 92. Succeſs in Egypt, ibid. Farms the provinces of Cæleſyria Phœnicia, &c. ibid. Progeny, 93.

— the Maccabee, left governor of Jeruſalem, 140. Defeated by Georgias, 141.

— the third ſon of Antipater, 254, n. Left in care of Herod's family, 268. Beſieged in Maſſada, 271, Defeated and killed, 276.

— Herod's uncle diſcloſes his orders to Mariamne, 287. Put to death, 288.

— the huſband of the virgin mary, his genealogy, 331 & n. Death, 412, n.

— of Arimathea, buries the body of Chriſt, 517.

— the ſon of Canni, made high-prieſt. 563.

Joſephus, the Jewiſh hiſtorian, cenſured for differing from the book of Maccabees, 190, n. & ſeq. n. Another miſtake corrected, 201, n. His teſtimony concerning Chriſt, diſcuſſed, 530, n. Releaſes ſome Jewiſh prieſts at Rome, 569, n. Made governor of galilee, 578. His brave defence of Jotapa, 580. Surrender, ibid. & n. Speech to Veſpaſian, 581. Promoted by him, 594 & n. Sent with offers of peace to the Jews, 599. Speech to the beſieged, 601. Wounded by them, 606. Suſpected by the Romans, ibid. n. Beloved by Titus, ibid.

— the ſon of Gorion, made governor of Jeruſalem, 578.

— Ben Gorion, a fabulous author, trumped up by the Jews againſt the former, 624.

Jotapa taken by the Romans, 580 & n. Numbers of Jews there ſlain, 615.

Ireneus pleads Antipater's cauſe before the Roman ſenate, 397.

Iſaiah's prophecies concerning the Meſſiah, explained, 334 & ſeq. & n.

Iſhmael I. made high-prieſt, 513.

— II. ſucceeds Ananias, 569. Depoſed for his zeal, 570. Detained as an hoſtage at Rome, 571.

Iſraelites blended with the Jews, 4, 10 & n.

Itabyr, mount deſcribed, 583 & n.

Iturea given to Herod, 304 & n.

Itureans, why ſo called, 209, n. Forced to circumciſe, ibid.

Judas Maccabeus ſucceeds his father, 125 & ſeq. Defeats the Syrians, 127, 130. Speech to his troops, 129. Defeat Lyſias, 132, n.

132, n. Restores the divine worship, 134, 135. Defeats the Idumeans, 138. Timotheus, 139. Success in Gilead, 140 & seq. In Idumea 141 & seq. Make peace with Syria, 143. Defeats the Arabians, 145. Timotheus, 146. Take several cities, 147. Returns victorius, 148 & n. Offers sacrifices for the dead, 149 & n. Forces Antiochus to a peace, 151. Defeats Alcimus, 154. Escapes Nicanor's treachery, 157. Defeats and kills him, 159. Allies with Rome, 160. Why styled high-priest by the Romans, 161, n. Defeated and killed, 162.

— or Jude, chuse an apostle, 344, n.

— Galileus, head of the Gaulonitish faction, 362. Raises an insurrection, 410.

— a Jewish doctor, raises a sedition against Herod, 390. Burnt alive, 391.

— the son of Hezechias, raises a new sedition, 401. Supposed the Theudas of St. Luke, 402 & n.

— Iscariot one of the twelve apostles, 444. n. Whence so called, 445, n. Why chosen into the college, 461, n. His covetousness reproved, 483. His resentment at it, 484. Sells his master, 495, n. Betrays him, 499. His remorse 503. Kind of death, 504, n.

Judea, the forlorn state of, after the return from Babylon, 4 & seq. Made a province of Syria, 62. Under the government of the high-priests, ibid. & seq. Alternately oppressed by Syria and Egypt, 68, 79. Polluted and deserted, 117, & seq. Restored by Judas Maccabeus, 127 & seq. Invaded by Lysias, 138. By Bacchides, 153. Freed by Jonathan, 179. Subdued by Pompey 238 & seq. Deeply taxed by Cassius, 259. Visited with pestilence and famine, 301. Laid waste by several factions 401 & seq. Made a province of the Roman empire, 562. Infested with sicarii, 566. Filled with slaughter, &c. 574 & seq.

Judgment, the day of, described by Christ, 496.

Julias, by whom built, 414.

Jupiter's statue set up in the temple of Jerusalem, 115. In that of the Samaritans, ibid.

Justin martyr's account of the septuagint version, 85, n.

K

Karaites, whence so called, 371 & n. Their founder, sect, &c. 372, n. When they separated from the traditionalists, 374 & n. Their principles, 377. Why omitted by Josephus, 376, n. Hated by the other Jews, 379 & 380, n. Their character, ibid. & seq.

Khacam, among the Jews, and Khazan their office, 58, n.

L

Lamb, the daily sacrifice of, ceased, 609.

Lambs, the computation taken from them, uncertain, 574, n.

Lasthenes inthrones young Nicator, 176, n.

Laurences's surprising constancy paralelled from unquestionable testimony, 526 n.

Lazarus entertains Christ at supper, 477. Raised from the dead, 482 & n.

Lebbeus, vid. James the less, 444, n.

Levi, the evangelist, why sirnamed Matthew, 439, n. Vindicated against Porphyry, &c. ibid. n. Made an apostle, 444, n.

Levites allowed to wear white garments, 572.

Libanius pagan orator of antioch, his account of the surprising constancy of some christian martyrs, 526, n. His character, writings, &c. ibid. & seq.

Lights, the feast of, among the Jews, whence so called, 36, n.

Longinus Cassius sent governor, of Judea, 563.

Lucullus invades Pontus, &c. 225.

Lysias sent against the Jews, 129. Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 132 & n. Invades Judea, 138. Defeated at Bethsura, 142. Sues for peace, ibid. Puts the apostate high-priest to death, 151.

Lysimachus left governor of Jerusalem, 107, Extortions on the people, 108. Massacred, ibid.

— the brother of Apollodorus, murders him, 213, 214.

M

Maccabees, why so called, 125. Their wars, ibid. & seq.

— books of 96, n. & 126, n.

Macheras insulted by Antigonus, 275.

Macheron taken by the zealots, 577. By the Romans, 619 & n.

Madeba taken by Hyrcan, 198.

Magdala, where situate, 465.

Magdalen Mary's attention to christ's preaching, 477. Falsely confounded with one of another character, ibid n. Her profusion of ointment unjustly blamed, 483. Presence at the crucifixion, 512. Brings tidings of Chtist's resurrection, 520.

Magi come from the east, 343 & n. Their presents to christ, 349, n.

Malabarcha among the Jews, his office, 171 n.

Malachy one of Ezra's assistants, 29 n. Whether the same with him, 30 n. His character, prophecies, &c. 57 n.

Malchus king of Arabia's ingratitude to Herod, 268.

Malichus conspires against Antipater, 259. Who he was, ibid. n. Poisons him, 260. Outwitted and assassinated by Herod, 261 & n.

Manasseh, an apostate, 59.

Manlius, T. interposes in favour of the Jews, 143.

Maressa, where situate, 202 n.

Mariamne, Hyrcan's grand-daughter, contracted to Herod, 262. Her character, 272. Marriage, 277 & n. Alienated from him by his barbarity and bloody orders, 287. Accused shews her innocence, 288. Sent to Massada, 295. Accused of treason, 296. Her heroic behaviour at her death, 297.

— the daughter of Simon, married to Herod, 303. Accused of treason, 325.

— daughter of Herod Agrippa, 562. Her incontinency, 568 n.

Marion, prince of Tyre, joins with Antigonus, 262. 263 & n.

Mark, the evangelist, whether the founder of the Therapeutes, 370.

— a christian bishop's noble martyrdom related by Libanius, 526 n.

Marsyas, a christian martyr's constancy from heathen testimony, 529 n.

Martace, one of Herod's wives, and mother of Archelaus and Antipas, 323 n. Goes to Rome, with her son, 397.

Martha's worldly care condemned, 477, 478.

Martyrdom of the first christians, an instance of the divine wisdom, 524 n.

Marulus made governor of Judea, 552.

Mary the mother of Christ saluted by the angel, 331, 337. Her lineage from David shewn, 331 & n. Visit to Elizabeth, 337. Return to Nazareth, 338. Delivered at Bethlehem, 340. Maintained by her son, 412 n. Attends him at his crucifixion, 512. Taken home by St. John, ibid.

— Magdalene, vid. sub Magdalene, 477 & seq.

Massada besieged by Antigonus, 272. Taken by the zealots, 576. By the Romans, 619. The desperate end of the Jews there, 620.

Massorah of the Jews, an account of, 3 n.

Mattathias's noble zeal for his religion, 119 & seq. His wise decree for self-defence on the sabbath, 121 Restores the divine worship, 122. His dying advice to his son, 123 & 124 n.

— a Jewish high-priest deposed, 391.

Matthew called by Christ, 439. His readiness justified, ibid. n.

Matthias a Jewish high-priest, defiled on expiation eve, 325 n.

— a Jewish doctor, raises a new tumult, 390. Burnt alive, 391.

— a disciple of Christ, chosen apostle, 533 & n.

— a Jew, made high-priest, 559. — lets Simon into the city, 592. Put to death, 606.

Memmius Q. friendship to the Jews, 143.

Menahem, an Essenian, foretels Herod's rise, 281 n. Who he was, ibid.

— head of the zealots, massacred by them, 576.

Menelaus buys the high-priesthood over his brother's head, 106. Causes a general apostasy, ibid. Robs the temple, 107. Causes Onias to be murdered, ibid. His hellish policy, ibid. & 129. Promotes a peace with Syria, 144. Put to a cruel death, 151.

Michmash, where situate, 178 n.

Mina of silver, its value, 13 n.

— of gold, 247 n.

Miriam, a Jewish lady eats her own child at the siege of Jerusalem, 603.

Mispar, one of the heads of the Jewish return, 9.

Mithridates rescued by Antipater, 250 & 251 n.

Mizpa, a place of devotion to the Jews, 130 n.

Moabites laid under tribute by Alexander Janneus, 216.

Mordecai, one of the heads of the Jewish return, 9. Who, ibid. n.

— Esther's uncle, his genealogy, 24. His station at the Persian court, 25.

Morinus's opinion of the Karaites, 375 n.

Mosolam, a noted Jewish mark's-man, the story of, 78 n.

Myrratum Vinum esteemed by the Romans 510 n.

N

NAim, where situate, 447 n. Widow's son raised from the dead, ibid.

Nathanael called by Christ, 423.

Nazarenes offended at Christ's preaching, 436.

Nazarite, Christ, why so called, 385. That prophecy of him explained, ibid. n. The true sense of that word 387 n.

Nehemiah, why his account differs from Ezra's, 5. Succeeds him, 38. His character, 48. Repairs the city and temple, 49. Returns into Persia, 50 & n. & 54. His generosity at Jerusalem, 53, 54. Reforms the Jewish abuses, 55 & seq. His death, 60.

Nethinims who return from Babylon, poſterity of the Gibeonites, 10 n.

Nicanor's fatal expedition againſt the Jews, 129 & ſeq. & 132. Sent a ſecond time, 154. Makes peace with Judas Maccabeus, 155. His treachery to him, 157. Cruelty to the Jews, ibid. & ſeq. Blaſphemous ſpeech, 159. Defeat and death, ibid.

— Titus's general, wounded before Jeruſalem, 599.

Nicodemus, Ariſtobulus's embaſſador to Pompey, 203.

— a Jewiſh ruler, comes to Chriſt by night, 427. The ſubſtance of Chriſt's doctrine to him, 428 n. Pleads for him againſt the Phariſees, 475. Embalms his body, 518.

Nicolas, the deacon, whether author of the Nicolatian ſect, 541, 542 n.

Niger, a Jewiſh captain, defeated before Aſcalon, 579. Narrow eſcape, ibid.

O

OAth of fidelity exacted from the Jews by Herod, 306. Oppoſed by the Eſſenians and Phariſees, ibid.

Oaths, how forbid by the Eſſenians 367 & n.

Obedas king of Arabia, invaded by Alexander Jannæus, 216. Protects the plunderers of Judea, 319 n. Poiſoned by Syllæus, 320 n.

Ochus's expedition againſt the Jews, 63. Carries off a great number of captives, ibid. Death, ibid.

Octavianus, vid. Auguſtus, 270.

Onias high prieſt of the Jews, 68.

—— II. a ſordid pontiff, endangers the Jewiſh ſtate, 92 & ſeq.

— III. his character, 99. Fatal rupture with Simon, 100 & n. Retires to Antioch, 103. Murdered there, 107. When ibid. n.

— IV. Deprived of his ſucceſſion, 152. Retires into Egypt, ibid. In high favour there, 172. Builds a Jewiſh temple, ibid. & n.

— a devout Jew murdered, 232.

Onion, the Jews of, very ſerviceable to J. Cæſar, 250, & ſeq.

Owl pearches twice over king Agrippa's head, 562 n.

P

PAcorus joins with Antigonus againſt Herod, 265. Defeated, 266. Treachery to Phaſael, ib. & 267.

Paleas, by whom called Cæſarea, 414.

Pallas, one of Herod's wives, her iſſue, 323 n

Pappus kills Herod's brother, 276, Defeated and killed, ibid.

Parables, why ſo frequently uſed by Chriſt, 453.

Paros, the Jews of, redreſſed by Cæſar, 257, & 258 n.

Paſhur, one of the four prieſtly claſſes, 11.

Paul perſecutes the church, 543. Pleads his cauſe before Felix, 568. Left in bonds by him, ibid. Pleads before Feſtus, 570. Appeals to Rome, ibid. Defence before king Agrippa, ibid.

Pella taken by Alexander Janneus, 219. Demoliſhed, ibid.

Peluſium taken by Cæſar, 250.

Peter the apoſtle called, and ſirnamed Cephas, 423, 438 & 444 n. Walks on the ſea, 460. Noble confeſſion, 461, 466. Why blamed for his modeſt non-compliance, 495 n. For his zeal, 500. Denies his maſter, 502. Haſtens to his ſepulchre, 520. His commiſſion and martyrdom, 524. Firſt ſermon makes 3000 converts, 534. Firſt miracle 5000 more, 538. His ſpeech to the ſanhedrin, 539. Second defence, ibid. Miraculous deliverance from Herod, 561. Prophecy againſt the Jews, 581, 582 & n.

Pethor, where ſituate, 344 n.

Petronius ordered by Caligula to perſecute the Jews, 555. His favour to them, ibid.

Phedra, one of Herod's wives, her iſſue, 323 n.

Phannias, an obſcure prieſt, made pontiff by the zealots, 586 n.

Phariſees, their riſe, 204, & 352. Enmity to Hyrcan, 205 & n. Cauſe a revolt againſt Alexander Janneus, 216. Inſolent anſwer to him, 217. Impudent behaviour to his queen, 222. Cruelty to the Sadducees, ibid. & ſeq. Requited by Ariſtobulus, 227 & ſeq. Their peculiar doctrines, 352 & ſeq. Cauſe of their Infidelity, 354. Reproved by the baptiſt, 423. By Chriſt much more, 463. Two falſe notions of theirs confuted, 476 & ſeq. & n. Put to ſilence, 491. The reſt vid. ſub Jews.

Phaſael, Herod's brother, 253. Made governor of Jeruſalem, 260. Made tetrarch by Marc Antony, 265. Betrayed by Pacorus, 267. Kills himſelf, 269.

— the ſon of Herod, by Pallas, 323 n.

Phaſaelis, the fortreſs of, built by Herod, 375. Bequeathed to Salome, 406.

Pheroras, Herod's fourth brother, 254 n. Flies into Idumea, 267, 268. Made tetrarch, 305 & n. Accuſed by Alexander, Herod's ſon, 318. Joins with Antipater againſt Herod, 322 & ſeq. Leaves the court, 324. Refuſes to come to his ſick brother, ibid. His death diſcovers the whole plot, ibid. & ſeq.

Philarchus, a bitter enemy of the Jews, killed, 131.

Philip,

Philip, a cruel governor of Judea, 111. Murders a thouſand Jews on the ſabbath, 117. Deſtroys the ſacred books, ibid.

— the ſon of Herod, by Mariamne, 322 n. —By Cleopatra, 323 n. Made tetrarch, 393. His ſhare of the Jewiſh kingdom, 406. His death and character, 541.

— the apoſtle, called by Chriſt, 423 & 444 n.

— preaches at Samaria, 543.

Philippion put to death by his father Mennæus, 249.

Philiſtines invaded by Judas Maccabeus, 142.

Philo's account of the ſeptuagint verſion, 85 & 86 n. — of the Eſſenians, 363. Why different from Joſephus's, 366 n.

Phlegon's eclipſe quoted by the fathers 513 n.

Pilate, Pontius, made governor of Judea, 413. His character, ibid. & n. Exaſperates the Jews, 414 & ſeq. Reproved by Tiberius, 417. Attempts on the treaſury of the temple, ibid. & ſeq. Tries and condemns Chriſt, 506. His ſeverity to the Samaritans, 544. Depoſition and baniſhment, ibid. His acts, the validity of, diſcuſſed, ibid. n. & ſeq. n.

Pitolaus, a chief of the Roman faction in Judea, 243. Goes over to Ariſtobulus 245. Put to death, 248.

Placidus's ſucceſs in Judea, 593.

Pliny's account of the Eſſenians, 364.

Points, Hebrew, how and when introduced, 34 n.

Polemon, king of Pontus, marries Berenice and embraces Judaiſm, 597 n.

Pollio's policy to gain Herod's favour, 281 n.

Pompey invited by Ariſtobulus, 232. Hears the pleas of the contending brothers, 233. Partiality for Hyrcan, 335. & ſeq. Beſieges Jeruſalem, 236. Takes it, 238. Enters into the moſt holy place, 240. Returns to Rome, 241 & ſeq.

Pontius Pilate, vid. ſub. Pilate, 413.

Poppea's friendſhip to the Jews, 569 n. & 570 Joſephus's flattering character of that princeſs, ibid. n.

Porphyry's notion of Daniel's prophecies confuted, 18 n.

Potter's field, the buying of, price, &c. foretold, 504.

Prieſthood, high, becomes venal, 106 & 413.

Prieſtly veſtments, where kept, 208.

Prieſts, high, become prefects of Judea, 62. Fall into a civil war with the lower claſs, 569 & n.

Prieſts, Jewiſh, who returned from Babylon, 11. — admirable conſtancy amidſt the ſlaughter in the temple, 239. Oppreſſed by the depoſed pontiffs, 568 & 569. Sent to Rome, 569 n.

Pſalm xxii. in what Senſe repeated by Chriſt on the croſs, 513 & n. Its true lection vindicated, ibid.

Pſalms, how collected by Ezra, 34 & ſeq. Their metre, elegancy, &c. proved againſt biſhop Hare, 35, 36 & ſeq.

Ptolemy Soter ſubdues the Jews, 68. His kindneſs to them, 69 & 78.

— Philadelphus, a great friend to the Jews, 82. Procures a Greek verſion of the ſacred books, ibid. & ſeq. & n.

—— Euergetes comes into Judea, 90. Friendſhip to Joſeph, 92.

— Philopater's character, 94. Attempts to prophane the temple, 95. His puniſhment, ibid.

— Philometor's friendſhip to the Jewiſh high-prieſt, 174, 175.

— Lathyrus invades Judea, 212.

— Macron ſent againſt Judas Maccabeus, 129. Turned out by Lyſias, 138.

— the treacherous ſon-in-law of Simon, 191. His perfidy and parricide, ibid. & ſeq. Ill ſucceſs againſt Hyrcan, 193 & n.

— Menneus's kindneſs to Ariſtobulus's family, 249.

Pyrrhonians, whether the Eſſenians were of their ſect, 365.

Pythagorean doctrines held by the Eſſenians, 367.

Q

QUadratus, governor of Syria, 565. Severity to the Jews, ibid. n.

R

RAgaba beſieged by Alexander Janneus, 220.

Raphia taken by Alexander Janneus, 213.

Raphon, where ſituate, 146.

Razis's great zeal for his religion, 158. His deſperate death, ibid.

Reaſon, how far bound to yield to revelation, 432 n.

Reelaiah, one of the returning Jewiſh heads, 9.

Regeneration preached to Nicodemus, 428 & n.

Rehum, one of the heads of the returning Jews, 9.

Repta, the receptacle of the Jewiſh banditti, 319 n.

Reſurrection, the ſtate of, deſcribed, 492 & ſeq.

Roman ſenate's partiality to Herod, 270. Cætera vid. ſub Romans.

Romans, their firſt alliance with the Jews, 160 & ſeq. Style Hyrcan king, 200 n.

Roxana, Herod's daughter by Phædra, 323 n.

Rufus Anius ſent governor of Judea, by Auguſtus, 413. Recalled by Tiberius, ibid.

Ruzy, a fabulous chief of the Samaritans, 73.

S

SAbinus intendant of Syria, goes to ſeize Herod's treaſure, 397. Beſieged by the ſeditious Jews, 400. Sets fire to the temple, ibid. Sneaks out of Judea, 404.

Sacrifice daily, when ceaſed, 608 & n.

Saddoc, his doctrine, 81.

Sadducees, their riſe, 81. Why favoured by Alexander Janneus, 206. Perſecuted by the Phariſees, 222. Their peculiar tenets, 356. By whom founded, ibid. & ſeq. Cauſes of their infidelity, ibid. Their character, 357. Fall, 358. Confuted by Chriſt, 492, 493 & n.

Salome, queen of the Jews, ſets Alexander Janneus on the throne, 211.

— ſiſter of Herod, her character, 254 n. Hatred to Mariamne, 288. Helliſh plots againſt her, 296. Saves her huſband, 299. Divorces him, ibid. & n. Cabal againſt Herod's ſons by Mariamne, 313, 317 & n. Accuſed by Alexander, 318. Raiſes new accuſations, 320. Releaſes the Jewiſh chiefs, 393. Betrays Archelaus, 397. Her death, and laſt will, 412.

— the daughter of Herod, by Elphis, 323 n.

— the fatal dancer, begs the baptiſt's head, 434

Salonicus's birth celebrated by Virgil, 273 n.

Samaria cloſely beſieged, 203. Demoliſhed, ibid. Rebuilt by Gabinius, 244. By Herod, 301 & n. The reſt vid. ſub Sebaſte, ibid. n.

Samaritans, who, 14 n. Fall out with the Jews, 15. Obſtruct the building of the temple, 18. Pay tribute to it, 23. Petition Alexander, 65. Baniſhed Samaria, 67. Build Shechem, 69. Religion, 70 & n. & ſeq. Corrupt the pentateuch, 74 & n. Lay claim to the ſeptuagint verſion, 88. Ravage Judea, 94. Impious policy, 115. Invaded by Judas Maccabeus, 142. Subdued by Hyrcan, 198 & n. & 202. Pollute the Jewiſh temple, 411. Converted to chriſtianity, 543. Deceived by an impoſtor, 544. Fall out with the Jews, 565. Caſt at Rome, ibid. Defeated by Cerealis 583.

— pentateuch, an account of, 74 & n.

Sameas's noble ſpeech againſt Herod, 225 ibid. & Shammai.

Samega taken by Hyrcan 198.

Sanballat governor of Symaria, 49. Why called a Horonite, ibid. n. His ſpight againſt the Jews, ibid. & ſeq. Encourages their renegadoes, 59. Called by Joſephus a Cuthean ibid. n. Whether two of that name, ibid.

Sanhedrin's various conſultations againſt Chriſt, 479, 483, 497. Unjuſt ſentence againſt him, 501. Why they ſent him to Pilate, 502 n. Horrid hypocriſy, 503. Inveteracy, 505, & ſeq. Revile him on the croſs, 511. Obduracy, 516, 517. Suppreſs his reſurrection, 521. And the propagation of the goſpel, 539.

Saramael, ſome conjectures concerning that place. 83 n.

Saturnus votes that the ſons of Herod be puniſhed, 321.

Saul's converſion, vid. Paul, 542.

Scaurus gained by Ariſtobulus, 233. His letter to Aretas, ibid. Made governor of Syria, 241.

Sceptre, when wholly departed from Judah, 549.

Scythians, their friendſhip to the Jews, 148.

Scythopolis betrayed to Hyrcan, 203.

Scythopolitans barbarous ingratitude to the Jews, 576, 577 & n.

Sebaſte, Samaria, why ſo called, 244 & 301 n.

Sects among the Jews, an account of them, 352 & ſeq.

Sejanus whence his hatred to the Jews, 415 & n.

Seleucia taken by Alexander Janneus, 219.

Seleucus's pretenſions to Judea, 79. Mild government over it, ibid.

— the ſon of Antiochus's friendſhip to the Jews, 100.

Sephoris in Galilee, made one of the five courts, 244. Where ſituate, 401 & n. Taken and deſtroyed, 404. Rebuilt and fortified by Antipas, 414.

Septuagint verſion, an account of, 82, 83 & ſeq. & n.

Seraiah, one of the heads of the returning Jews, 9.

Seron defeated and killed, 128.

Shammai, a famous Jewiſh doctor, 256 n. Oppoſes Herod's oath of infideilty, 306.

Shechem made the metropolis of the Samaritan's, 67. Beautified, 69. Taken by Hyrcan, 198. Where ſituate, 435 n.

Sheliah, Zibbor, his office among the Jews, 57 n.

Shepherds, true and falſe, deſcribed, 480.

Sheterboſnai, governor of Samaria, 21.

Shez-bazzar, whether the ſame with Zerubbabel, 8 & n.

Shuſhan one of the temple gates, why ſo called, 22.

Sicarii in Judea, their cruelties, 566 & n. Inſolence, 571. Join with the zealots, 576 & ſeq. — a new ſet of them, 590.

Silo's falſhood to Antigonus, 272. To Herod, 273.

Simeon's teſtimony of the child Jeſus, 350. Conjectures concerning him, ibid. n.

— a ſeditious Jew, burns and waſtes Judea, 402. Beheaded, 403.

Simon the juſt, high-prieſt of the Jews, his character, works, &c. 80 & n.

— II. ſucceeds Onias II. 94. His excellent character, ibid. Death 99.

— the Maccabees ſucceſs in Galilee, 141. Made general by Antiochus, 176. Takes Bethzura, 177. Joppa, and puts Judea in a ſtate of defence, 179. Succeeds his brother, 180. Outwitted by Tryphon, 181. Buries his brother at Modin, 182. Renews his alliances, ibid. &c. Letter to Demetrius, ibid. & ſeq. Fortifies Judæa, and takes Joppa and Gaza, 184. Takes the title of prince, &c. 183 & n. Ungratefully treated by Antiochus, 188. His character, 186 & n. Alliances with Rome, 188. His coin deſcribed, 187 n. Anſwer to Antiochus, 189. Riches, ibid. & ſeq. Treacherouſly murdered, 191.

— a Benjaminite, falls out with good old Onias, 100 & ſeq. & n. Betrays the ſacred treaſure to the Syrians, 101.

— father in-law to Herod, made high-prieſt, 303. Depoſed 325.

— Peter the apoſtle, vid. ſub Peter, 423 & ſeq.

— the Canaanite, why ſo called, 444 n.

— a proud Phariſee, offended at Chriſt's charity, 449.

— the leper, entertains Chriſt at ſupper, 494 & n.

— a Cyrenean, helps to bear the croſs after him, 508.

— Magus converted to chriſtianity, 543. Gives a new name to an old ſin, ibid.

— Cantharas, made high-prieſt, 559.

— a ſurly lawyer mollified by Agrippa, 559 n.

— the ſon of Judas Galileus, crucified, 564.

— a Jew of Scythopolis, his deſperate end, 577 n.

— head of the new ſicarii, raiſes an army againſt the zealots, 590. Invades Idumea, 591. Marches againſt Jeruſalem, 592. Beſieges John in the temple, 593. Holds the city againſt him and the Romans, 599. Bloody ingratitude to Matthias, 606. Deſires a parley with Titus, 612. Taken priſoner, 617. His puniſhment ibid.

Sohemus betrays Herod's cruel order to Mariamne, 295. Put to death, 296, 297.

Solomena and her ſeven ſons martyred, 118, 119 & n.

Soſius left governor of Syria, 276. Aſſiſts Herod, 277. Contempt of Antigonus 277, 278.

Standards, Roman, why abhored by the Jews, 415. Introduced into Jeruſalem by Pilate, ibid.

Star, miraculous appears to the eaſtern Magi, 347 & ſeq. Deſcribed, ibid. n.

Stater, what, 470 n.

Stephen the protomartyr, his character, 541. Death 542.

Straton's tower, by whom built, 301 n. vid. Cæſarea.

— a gallery in the royal palace ſo called, 210 n.

Sun miraculouſly darkned at the crucifixion, 513 n.

Swine, the herd of, drowned, 454 & 455, & n.

Syllæus's hatred to Herod, the cauſe of, 319 n. Accuſation of him to Cæſar, ibid. Put to death, 320 n.

Synagogue, grand, the rabbies account of, confuted, 28 n.

Synagogues, when firſt brought into uſe, 57 n.

Syrians defeated by the Maccabees, 127 & ſeq.

Syrophœnician woman, her ſingular faith, 463, 464 & n. Country ibid. n.

T

TAcitus's character of Felix, 566 n.

Tannaim, among the Jews, their office, 8.

Tarichea taken by the Romans, 583 & n.

Tatnai goes to Jeruſalem, 21. Befriends the Jews, ibid. & ſeq.

Tekoah, the fight of, 165 & n.

Temple of Jeruſalem begun to be rebuilt, 8, & ſeq. Its dimenſions, ibid. Diſparity from the old one, 13 n. & ſeq Diſcontinued, 20. Reſumed, 21. Dedicated 22. By Nehemiah, 50. The ceremony of ibid. n. Prophaned by Sanhallat, 54. By Antiochus, tiochus, 111. Its worſhip ſuppreſt, 113. Polluted with Jupiter's ſtatue, 115 & 116 n. Purified by Judas Maccabeus, 134. Walls demoliſhed by Alcimus, 166 & n. Its moſt ſacred place entered by Pompey, 240. Rebuilt by Herod, 306 & ſeq. Whether to be reckoned a new temple, 307 n. How long it was a building, 308 & n. Its deſcription, ibid. & ſeq. & n. Dedication 319. Polluted by the Samaritans, 411. Forced by the zealots, 586. Defended by John de Ghiſchala, 600. Its gates fired, 609 & ſeq. The ſanctuary burnt, 611. Plundered, ibid. & ſeq.

— at Samaria, vid. Garrizzim, 65 & n.

— in Egypt deſcribed, 172 n. Shut up and plundered, 621 & n.

Thaddeus, vid. James the leſs, 444 n.

Theodore's treachery to Ptolemy, 94.

Theodotus ſtript of his vaſt treaſure 219

Theophilus made high-prieſt, 547.

Therapeutes, their ſect, life, &c. 365. Prophetic ſpirit, 367. Auſterity, 368. Worſhip, 369. Whether Jews or Chriſtians, 370.

Theudas, a Jewiſh impoſtor beheaded, 563, 564 & n.

Thief the penitent, why abſolved, 512 & n.

Thieves, crucified with Chriſt, who, 510 & 511 n.

Thimnatha fortified by Bacchides, 166.

Thomas Didymus, one of the twelve apoſtles, 444 n.

His incredulity reproved, 523.

Tiberias by whom built, 514. Taken by the Romans, 583 & n.

— the ſea of, whence ſo called, 414.

Tiberius Cæſar, the twelfth year of, how computed, 413.

Tigranes invades Syria, 225.

Timotheus defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 131. A ſecond time, and killed, 139.

— invades Gilead, and defeated, 140. A ſecond time 145 & ſeq. Taken priſoner, 147.

Tirſhatha, what, 8 n.

—— the ſon of Veſpaſian joins his Father in Judea, 580. Puts off his journey to Rome, 593. Rejoins his father at Cæſarea, ibid. Left commander in Judea, 594. Gratitude to Joſephus, ibid. n. Marches againſt Jeruſalem, 596. Order of his army, ibid. n. Lays ſiege to the place, 598. Engages the enemy, ibid. n. His frequent offers of peace rejected, 599. Swears the deſtruction of the city, 604. Endeavours to ſave the temple, 611. Enters the ſanctuary, ibid. Carries off the ſacred utenſils, ibid. & ſeq. Shews mercy to many Jews, 612 n. & ſeq. Enters the city, 513. Triumph and trophies, 618 & n. Cuts off the reliques of the houſe of Judah, 622. His fondneſs for Berenice, ibid.

Tob, the Jews of, maſſacred, 140. The territories of, invaded by the Maccabees, 146.

Tobiah, an Ammonite, prophanes the Jewiſh temple, 54. Expelled out of it, 55.

Trachonitis, where ſituate, 338 n. Given to Herod, 304 n. Infeſted with banditti, 319, 338. Deſtroyed by Zamaris, 339. Bequeathed by Herod to Philip, 393.

Trajan ſent againſt Japhia, 582. Takes it and puts all the men to the ſword, ibid. & ſeq.

Trophies miſtaken for idols by the zealous Jews, 300.

Tryphon's treachery to Jonathan, 180 & ſeq. The Syrians revolt from him on account of his tyranny, 187.

Tubieni, Jews, whence ſo called, 146.

Tyrians aſſiſt the Jews, 19. Why ſpared by Herod, 263.

Tyro accuſed to Herod by Salome, 321.

V

VArus Quintil. appointed to judge Antipater, 387. Declares his ſentence only to Herod, 388. Informs the emperor againſt Archelaus, 398. Quells the ſeditious Jews, 400. Enters Judea, 404. His reception at Jeruſalem, ibid.

Veil of the temple rent at the death of Chriſt, 516.

Ventigius extorts money from Antigonus, 271.

Veſpaſian ſent into Judea, 579. Enters Galilee, 580. Reception of Joſephus, 581. Treatment to the city Tiberias, 583 n. His ſtay at Cæſarea very politic, 589. Choſen emperor, 594 & n. Sets Joſephus at liberty, ibid. Goes to Rome, ibid.

Vine, a rich golden one ſent a preſent to Pompey, 233.

Vinegar, why given to Chriſt, 510 n.

Virgil, remarks on his eclogue on Saloninus, 272, 173 n.

Virgilianæ ſortes, how imitated by the Jews, 489 n.

Vitellius's arrival in Judea, 543. Kindneſs to the Jews, ibid. Depoſes Pilate, 544. Comes with Herod to Jeruſalem, 547.

Volumnius condemns Herod's two brave ſons to death, 321.

Uſher, archbiſhop, procures ſeveral copies of the Samaritan pentateuch, 77 n.

W

Water, the festival of, among the Jews, 474.

Whales, a particular kind in the Mediterranean, 453 n.

Wine mingled, why given to malefactors, 510 n.

Wisemen from the east, vid. Magi, 343.

Wonderful, one of the peculiar characters of the Messiah, 336, 341, 343.

Wood carried to the temple once a year, 474.

X

Xerxes's favour to the Jews, 23. Death, 24.

Xylophoria, the feast of, at Jerusalem, 470.

Z

Zachariah's vision in the temple, 326 & seq. Noble canticle at the birth of his son, 338.

—— the son of Barachias, murdered by the zealots, 588. Some conjectures concerning him, ibid. n.

Zamaris, sent by Herod against the banditti, 339.

Zebedee, the sons of, become apostles, 444 n.

Zechariah's prophecies to the Jews, 22. Assists Ezra in his reformation, 29 & n. His character and prophecies, 55 n. Those particularly which concern Christ's sufferings, 500 n. And destruction of the Jewish nation, 607 n.

—— the son of Baruch, vid. sub Zechariah, 588.

Zealots, the spawn of the Gaulonitish faction, 411. Join with the sicarii, 576. Beat the Romans, 578. Put all to fire and sword, 578. Their cursed character, 586. Seize the temple, 586. Set up a high-priest of their own, ibid. n. Horrid butcheries committed by them, ibid. & seq. Dreadful crimes, 392 n. Josephus's character of them, 601. Their desperate defence, 605.

Their suit to Titus rejected, 612. Seized with infatuation, 613. Raise new troubles in Egypt, 621.

Zelotes Simon, whence so called, 444 n.

Zenodorus, why stript of his toparchies, 304 & n.

Zerubbabel, head of the returning Jews, 9. His genealogy, 8.

The End of the Tenth Volume.

Directions to the Bookbinder for placing the CUTS.

MAP of Palestine, Page 3
View of Jerusalem, the Temple, &c. 309

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological,
And other TABLES.

VOL. XI.

Ἱσορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ ἁλανόει, ἐν ἀυταῖς γὰρ ξυρήσεις ἀκόπως ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐ. πως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G, and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, J. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookſellers.

MDCCXLV.

1937

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XII.

The Hiſtory of the Parthians, from Arſaces, to the recovery of the kingdom by the Perſians.

Parthia deſcribed.

PARTHIA, properly ſo called, was bounded on the eaſt by Aria; on the ſouth by Carmania Deſerta; on the weſt by Media; and on the north by Hyrcania. Ptolemy divides it into five diſtricts or provinces, viz. Caminſine or Camiſene, Parthyene, Choroane, Atticene, and Tabiene. The antient geographers enumerate a great many cities in Parthia; but thoſe of moſt note were, Calliope, Iſſatis, Europum, known alſo by the names of Ragæ, Europos, and Arſace, Apamea, Heraclea, Crenonia, Charax, Artacana, Aſpa, Marriche, Rhagæa, and Hecatompylos. The latter was the metropolis of Parthia, and the place where the firſt kings of that country reſided; for after they had made themſelves maſters of Aſſyria, they abandoned Hecatompylos, paſſing the winter at Cteſiphon, and the ſummer at Ecbatan, or in Hyrcania. The city of Cteſiphon ſtood on the Tigris, a little below Seleucia, and on the oppoſite bank, in the province of Chalonitis, which was the moſt ſoutherly of all Aſſyria. This city was founded, according to Ammianus Marcellinus [a], by one Vardanes, and embelliſhed and fortified by Pacorus. Who Vardanes was, we know not; but Valeſius takes Pacorus here ſpoke of to have been the ſon of Orodes, whom Ventidius defeated. Polybius [b], Tacitus [c], Herodotus [d], and Strabo [e] ſpeak of Cteſiphon as the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire; whereas Hecatompylos was only the metropolis of Parthia properly ſo called, but nevertheleſs a place of great note, and about nine miles in compaſs. It had a hundred gates, whence it borrowed the name of Hecatompylos, as Polybius informs us [f]. Moſt of our modern travellers are of opinion, that it ſtood on the very ſpot where the preſent city of Iſpahan ſtands. Parthia is at preſent known by the name of Arach or Erach, and may be called the royal province of Perſia, ſince the king always reſides in it. The chief cities it contains at preſent are, Caſbin or Caſwin, built on the ruins of the antient Arſace; Sawa or Sava, Kom, Hamadan, Kaſhan, and Iſpahan, which Holſtenius [g] takes to be the antient Aſpa, contradicting therein moſt of our modern geographers and travellers. The air of Parthia was antiently, and is ſtill, very clear and healthy; but the ſoil barren, and not yielding wherewithal to maintain the inhabitants, who were once very numerous, and therefore obliged to tranſplant themſelves into other countries. Upon the death of Alexander the Great, it was almoſt entirely neglected, and left as an appendant to Media, none of that prince's commanders caring for the government of ſo poor and barren a province. But we ſhall ſee this ſmall and obſcure province make a great figure in hiſtory, eclipſe all the kingdoms of the eaſt, and become formidable to the Romans themſelves, while they were at the height of their glory. But we muſt not here confound Parthia, or, as others call it, Parthyæa and Parthyene, with what the antients underſtand by the Parthian empire. The former was comprized within the narrow bounds which we have deſcribed above; whereas the latter was of a vaſt extent, being bounded on the eaſt by Indus; on the weſt weſt by the Tigris; on the ſouth by the Red-ſea; and on the north by mount Caucaſus [h]; ſo that it comprehended Arachoſia, Parthia, Aſſyria, Perſis, and Media. Theſe wide-ſpreading dominions, were, according to Pliny [i], divided by the Parthian monarchs into eighteen kingdoms, which they diſtinguiſhed by the name of the upper and lower kingdoms. The former were eleven, extending from the confines of Armenia and the Caſpian ſea to the borders of Scythia. The other ſeven comprehended the remaining provinces ſubject to the crown of Parthia, and were known by the name of the lower kingdoms.

[a] Ammian. Marcell. l. xxiii. c. 20. [b] Polyb. l. v. c. 45. [c] Tacit. l. vi. c. 42. [d] Herod. l. iii. c. 9. [e] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 512. [f] Polyb. l. x. c. 25. [g] Holſten. in Orth.

Inhabitants.

SOME writers are of opinion, that this country was firſt peopled by the Phetri or Pathri, often mentioned in ſcripture [k], and will have the Parthians to be deſcended from Phetruſim the ſon of Mizraim. This may perhaps be true with relation to the firſt inhabitants of Parthia; but thoſe Parthians, who are ſo famous in hiſtory, were, without all doubt, originally Scythians, as we are told by all the antients who ſpeak of them. 'Tis true, there is a great diſagreement among authors as to the particular nation or tribe to which they belonged, ſome taking them to be originally Daæ; others to be Getæ, Maſſagetæ, or European Scythians. Strabo tells us, that Arſaces, the founder of this kingdom, was by birth a Scythian, and king of the Daæ or Dahæ. Curtius ſays, that the Scythians, known by the name of Parthians, came out of Europe [l]. Jornandes will have them to be originally Goths or Getæ; for theſe, according to him, are one and the ſame people [m]. They were, according to Juſtin, driven out of their own country, and, finding no other place to ſettle in, obliged to take up with this barren and inhoſpitable region. They called themſelves, on their firſt ſettling here, Parthians, that is, in the old Scythian language, exiles; and hence came the name of Parthia.

Manners, cuſtoms, &c. of the Parthians.

THE Parthians were a courageous and warlike people, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory, and not undeſervedly eſteemed the beſt horſemen and archers in the world. They were accuſtomed from their infancy, ſays Dionyſius [n], to the warlike and manly exerciſes of managing a horſe and handling a bow; and in both excelled all other nations. They had an art or method peculiar to themſelves, of diſcharging their arrows with incredible addreſs, dexterity and order, while they were retiring full ſpeed, which gained them many victories, and rendered their retreat far more formidable to the enemy than their onſet (A). To their great ſkill in archery alluded the conſul Craſſus, when being told by an aſtrologer, that his expedition againſt the Parthians would prove unſucceſsful, by reaſon of the ominous aſpect of the conſtellation Scorpio, the Roman returned anſwer, That he feared not Scorpio, but Sagittarius. To theſe exerciſes of horſemanſhip and archery the air and nature greatly contributed; for the dry air, as Dion obſerves, ſeaſoned their bows; and their large plains afforded them ſufficient room for the training up of their horſes. From the age of twenty to fifty, they were all without exception, obliged to ſerve in war, to attend the muſters, learn the military exerciſes, and be ready, at a very ſhort warning to take the field [o]. Perſons of any rank or diſtinction among them never appeared in public a-foot, but always on horſeback and armed with ſcymetars [p]; which cuſtom ſeemed ſtrange to the Romans, who uſed to lay down their arms when they quitted the ſagum or military

[h] Vide Oros. l. i. c. 2. [i] Plin. l. vi. c. 25. [k] Iſai. c. xi. Jerem. c. xliv. Ezech. c. xxix. [l] Curt. l. vii. [m] Jornand. de reb. Goth. [n] Dionyſ. in poem. de ſitu orb.

[o] Strabo. l. xv. [p] Juſtin. l. xii.

(A) This art, peculiar to the Parthians, of diſcharging their arrows with great dexterity, while they were retiring full ſpeed, is much ſpoke of by the Latin writers, eſpecially the poets.

Fidentemque fuga Parthum, verſiſque ſagittis (1).
Et verſis animoſum equis
Parthum dicere (2).
Ut celer averſis utei : Parthus equis (3).
Quid tibi nunc mitti ſolitæ poſt terga ſagittæ,
Quid loca, quid rapidi profuit uſus equi (4)?
Nil opus eſt equis,
Nil armis, & inertibus
Telis, quæ procul ingerit
[illegible]us, cum ſimulat fugas (5).
[illegible]at & verſas equitis ſagittas,
Terga fallacis metuenda Parthi (6).
Rupis Achæmeniæ ſcopulis, ubi verſa ſequentum
Pectoribus figit ſpicula pugna fugax (7), &c.

(1) Virgil. georg. l. iii. (2) Horat. l. i. carm. od. 19. (3) Ovid. l. iii. de arte. (4) Idem faſt. v. (5) Senec. in Thyeſt. (6) Idem in Oedip. (7) Boet. l. v.

tary habit [q]. In war they did not uſe trumpets like other nations, but large hollow veſſels of braſs, covered with ſkins, ſuch as our kettle-drums, which, being beat with hammers, yielded a very warlike ſound [r] (B). They are ſaid to have been very ſpare in their diet [s], their country not affording any ſuperfluities; but at the ſame time to have been great lovers of wine, and much addicted to all manner of lewdneſs, not reſpecting even their ſiſters or mothers, whom they were allowed to marry, and as many wives beſides as they pleaſed, nothing being deemed more honourable among them than to have a numerous iſſue [t]. They entirely neglected agriculture, navigation, trade, and all other callings, being wholly taken up in learning the arts of war which alone were of any repute among them [u].

THEIR religion was much the ſame with that of the Perſians; they worſhipped the ſun under the name of Mithras [w]; believed, that thoſe who fell in battle enjoyed a perpetual and uninterrupted happineſs, a tenet well ſuited to the genius of a warlike nation; and in moſt other points Religion.

[q] Ovid. Triſt. l. v. [r] Plut. in Craſſo. [s] Juſtin. l. xii. c. 3 & 9. [t] Idem, l. xvi. Agath. l. ii. Philo. de ſpecial. legib. p. 778. Tertul. in Apologet. [u] Dionyſ. ubi ſupra. [w] Strabo. l. xv. Suid. Heſych. Dionyſ. Areopagit. epiſt. 7. ad Polycarp. Cyril. catech. 7.

(B) Lucretius tells us, that the Parthians carried lions about with them in war, which, in the beginning of the engagement, they uſed to let looſe againſt the enemy.

Et validos Parthi præ ſe miſere leones
Cum ductoribus armatis, ſæviſque magiſtris,
Qui moderarier his poſſent, vincliſque tenere:
Nequicquam; quoniam permixta cæde calentes
Turbabant ſævi nullo diſcrimine turmas,
Terrificas capitum quatientes undique criſtas (8). infan

But herein the poet deſerves no more credit, than ſome too credulous hiſtorians mentioned by Lucian, who, miſtaking the dragons which the Parthians carried in their colours for real dragons, wrote, that the king of Parthia was always attended in war with a great number of dragons, which made a dreadful havock among the enemies troops (9).

(8) Lucret. l. v. (9) Lucian. in lib. de conſcrip. hiſtor.

of religion entirely agreed with the Persians, of whose religion we have spoke at length in the history of Persia. They were most religious observers of their word, thinking it highly dishonourable not to perform their engagements, or to deceive those who had trusted them on their parole [x], whereof we shall give a glaring instance in the reign of Artabanus.

Government. As to their government, it was, as is well known, monarchical, and absolute in the highest degree, no tyrants having ever required a more servile and blind submission from those who had the misfortune to live under them. They treated their subjects, says Herodotus [y], as the meanest of slaves and scarce as men, while they put themselves on a level with the immortal gods. Their usual title was, "The king of kings, the great monarch, the brother of "the sun and moon, &c." These haughty titles they not only assumed in all the laws and edicts they enacted, but in their letters to other princes. Thus Vologeses II. in writing to the emperor Vespasian, used the following superscription: Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasian. The emperor could not help smiling when he read it; and, to shew how little he valued such pompous and high sounding titles, he answered him in his own strain thus: Flavius Vespasian to Arsaces king of kings, giving the Parthian the titles he had assumed, but despising them himself. The same haughty stile Phrahates IV. used in writing to Augustus; and Phrahates III. sent embassadors to Pompey, on purpose to expostulate with him for omitting in his letter to him the title of king of kings, and giving him only that of king. Their whole conduct was answerable to the sublime and lofty titles they assumed; for, not satisfied with the respect paid to other crowned heads, they obliged all those whom they vouchsafed to see, to kiss the threshold on their first entering the royal palace, to prostrate themselves before them with their faces on the ground, and acknowledge their majesty with some offering, as if they appeared, to use the expression of Dion, before the great Jupiter [z] (C).

We

[x] Joseph. Antiq. l. xviii. c. ult. [y] Herod. l. iv. c. 3. [z] Dion. l. iv. Justin. l. xvi. Strabo, l. xv.

(C) To this Martial alludes in the following epigram:

Frustra

We can give no particular account of the ſtate of Parthia before Arſaces I. the works of Apollodorus, Artemiſius, Creperius, Calpurnianus, Quadratus, Rhianus, and Seleucus Emiſenus, who wrote of the Parthian affairs and are quoted by Strabo [a], Athenæus [b], Lucian [c], Stephanus, and Suidas, not having reached our times. All we know of them is, that they were firſt ſubject to the Medes, afterwards to the Perſians, and laſtly to Alexander the Great, upon whoſe death Parthia fell to the ſhare of Seleucus Nicator, whoſe ſucceſſors held it till the reign of Antiochus Theus, when Arſaces, ſhaking off the Macedonian yoke, ſet up for himſelf and founded a new kingdom, which, in proceſs of time, became by far the moſt powerful in the eaſt, and was held by his ſucceſſors for the ſpace of four hundred and ſeventy-five years; at the end of which the empire was transferred anew from the Parthians to the Perſians, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Kings of Parthia. Arſaces I. Year of the flood 2699. Before Chriſt 300.

Arsaces I. the founder of the Parthian monarchy, was, according to ſome writers, of the race of the Achemenidæ; according to others, by birth a Parthian. Strabo ſays, that he was king of the Dahæ before the revolt of Parthia; and Georgius Syncellus, that he was a nobleman of Bactria. We have related elſewhere [d] on what provocation he ſolicited the Parthians to revolt from Antiochus Theus, and what ſucceſs attended him in his wars with Seleucus Callinicus, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus Theus [e], whom he not only defeated, but took priſoner, and from that time aſſumed the title of king, having [a] Idem, l. ii. & xv. [b] Athen. l. xv. c. 12. [c] Lucian. de conſcrib. hiſtor. [d] Vol. viii. within 33 pages of the end. [e] Ibid. within 23 pages of the end.

Fruſtra blanditiæ venitis ad me, &c.
Ad Parthos procul ite pileatos,
Et turpes, humileſque, ſuppliceſque,
Pictorum ſola baſiate regum (10).

And Virgil:

Præterea regem non ſic Ægyptus, & ingens
Lydia, nec populi Parthorum, aut Medus Hydaſpes Obſervant, &c. (11).

(10) Mart. l. x. epig. 71. (11) Virgil. georg. l. iv.

ving founded, and by that victory firmly eſtabliſhed, an empire in the eaſt, which in proceſs of time counter-balanced the over-grown power of the Romans in the weſt. He reduced Hyrcania and ſome other neighbouring provinces, and was at laſt killed in a battle againſt Ariarathes IV. king of Cappadocia [f]. From him all thoſe, who reigned of the ſame race, took the name of Arſaces, as the kings of Egypt did that of Ptolemy, and the Roman emperors that of Cæſar.

Arſaces II. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Arſaces, who entering Media, made himſelf maſter of that country, while Antiochus the Great was engaged in a war with Ptolemy Euergetes king of Egypt. But Antiochus was no ſooner diſengaged from that war, than he marched with all his forces againſt Arſaces, drove him quite out of Media, and, entering Parthia, obliged him to retire into Hyrcania, whence he ſoon after returned with an army of an hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe. With theſe he put a ſtop to Antiochus's further progreſs; ſo that the Syrian, finding he could not overpower ſo valiant an enemy, began to give ear to the overtures which were made him for putting an end to ſo troubleſome a war; and a treaty being ſet on foot, it was agreed, that Arſaces ſhould hold Parthia and Hyrcania, on condition of his aſſiſting Antiochus to recover the other provinces which had revolted [g], as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Syria [h].

Priapatius. Priapatius, the ſon of Arſaces II. ſucceeded his father; but all we know of him is, that he reigned fifteen years, and left three ſons behind him, viz. Phrahates, Mithridates, and Artabanus. The crown he bequeathed to Phrahates. Phrahates his eldeſt ſon, who overcame the Mardi, one of the moſt warlike nations of the eaſt, and never conquered before the reign of Alexander, who, with much ado, reduced them, as well as the other nations inhabiting Media [i]. Phrahates left a numerous iſſue; but having more at heart the welfare of his kingdom than the advantage of his children, he left the crown to his brother Mithridates, on account of his extraordinary merit; for he had given many inſtances of an uncommon wiſdom, probity, and courage. He reduced the countries of the Bactrians, Perſians, Medes, and Elymæans, and over-ran in a manner all the eaſt, extending Mithridates I.

[f] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 5, &c. [g] Idem ibid. [h] Vide Vol. ix. p. 2. [i] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 5.

tending his dominions into India, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conqueſts. Demetrius Nicator, who then reigned in Syria, endeavoured to recover the provinces of the eaſt, which Mithridates had taken; but his army was entirely cut off, and himſelf taken priſoner, as we have elſewhere related at length [k]. After this victory, Mithridates got poſſeſſion of all Babylonia and Meſopotamia; ſo that he was now maſter of all the provinces lying between the Euphrates on the weſt, and the Ganges on the eaſt [l]. He entertained his royal captive with great humanity, allowed him a maintenance ſuitable to his rank, and, ſending him into Hyrcania to reſide there, gave him Rhodagune, one of his ſiſters, in marriage [m]. However, he kept him ſtill in captivity, tho' with as much freedom as was conſiſtent with the ſtate of a captive; and at his death, which happened in the thirty-ſeventh year of his reign, left him in this condition to his ſon Phrahates, who ſucceeded him in the kingdom [n]. The reign of Mithridates is looked upon by authors as the epoch of the Parthian grandeur; for under him that empire was by far the moſt powerful and moſt extenſive in the eaſt, all the countries that lie between the Euphrates and mount Caucaſus receiving law from him, and moſt of the princes of Aſia being either ſubdued by him, or obliged to enter into an alliance with him on his own terms. He was a prince of great courage and reſolution, and at the ſame time had a ſweetneſs of temper, which rendered him amiable to all who approached him. As he conquered many nations, he is ſaid to have carefully examined their various conſtitutions, and, out of the whole collection, to have formed a body of excellent laws for the regulation of the empire; ſo that he was both a great warrior and wiſe law-giver [o].

PHRAHATES II. had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the throne, when Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, marched againſt him at the head of a numerous army, under pretence of delivering his brother Demetrius, who was ſtill kept in captivity. Phrahates marched out againſt him, but was overcome in three ſucceſſive battles, ſtripped of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and all the other countries which his Phrahates II.

[k] Vide Vol. ix. p. 131, 132. [l] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 6. Oros. l. v. c. 4. [m] Juſtin. ibid. & l. xxxviii. c. 9. [n] Idem, l. xxxviii. c. 9. & l. xlii. c. 1. [o] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 361.

his father had reduced, and confined within the narrow limits of the firſt Parthian kingdom. However, he had the good luck at laſt to retrieve his affairs, and cut off Antiochus with his whole army, in the manner we have related at length in the hiſtory of Syria [p]. Phrahates, flushed with this victory, reſolved to invade Syria; but while he was making the neceſſary preparations for this enterprize, he found himſelf engaged in a war at home with the Scythians his neighbours. He had called them to his aſſiſtance againſt Antiochus; but that prince being overcome, and his army entirely defeated before their arrival, he refuſed to pay them the ſum which had been promiſed them. Hereupon the Scythians, falling upon the country which they were come to defend, committed every-where moſt dreadful ravages [q]. Phrahates, having thus drawn upon himſelf a war with the Scythians, in order to ſtrengthen his army againſt ſo brave and powerful an enemy, took into his ſervice all the Greek mercenaries, who, having followed Antiochus king of Syria in his Parthian expedition, had been taken priſoners in the late overthrow of that prince. As theſe Greeks had been treated by the Parthians with great haughtineſs and cruelty during their captivity, they no ſooner got arms into their hands, but they reſolved to be revenged on them; and accordingly, in the firſt engagement, they went all in a body over to the Scythians, and, in conjunction with them, falling upon the Parthians, cut their army to pieces, killed their king, and laid waſte their country [r]. After this, both the Greeks and Scythians returned to their own countries; and on their departure, Artabanus, the third ſon of Priapatius and uncle to the deceaſed king, took poſſeſſion of the crown, which he held a very ſhort time, being killed a few days after in battle by the Thogarians, another nation of the Scythian race [s].

Artabanus I.

Pacorus I.

ARTABANUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Pacorus I. who, hearing of the great exploits of the Romans, ſent embaſſadors to Sylla, who was then in Cappadocia, to deſire the friendſhip and alliance of ſo powerful a people. The Parthians, tho' the moſt warlike and wealthy nation in Aſia, were at that time ſcarce known at Rome. Sylla therefore was overjoyed to hear, that their king had reſolved to ſend embaſſadors to him, and looked upon it as one of the moſt fortu-

[p] Vol. ix. p. 141.
[q] Juſtin. l. xlii. c. 1.
[r] Idem ibid.
[s] Idem ibid.

fortunate occurrences of his life, that he should be the first Roman, to whom so great and gallant a nation should apply for an alliance with the people of Rome. He was then only prætor, and had been sent by the senate to restore Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, to the throne, whence he had been driven by Tigranes king of Armenia. However, to dazzle the eyes of the embassadors with an air of grandeur, he took great state upon him in the audience he gave them; for in the place where he received them he ordered three seats to be put; one in the middle for himself, that on the right hand for king Ariobarzanes, and the other on the left for Oromazes, the chief of the embassy. This compliance of the Parthian embassador cost him his life, Pacorus having caused him to be beheaded on his return, for debasing the majesty of the Parthian monarchy, by giving place to a Roman prætor [t]. However, Pacorus afterwards sent embassadors to Lucullus, to renew the alliance he had concluded with Sylla. He was succeeded by his son Phrahates III. who taking under his protection Tigranes, the son of Tigranes the Great, king of Armenia, gave him his daughter in marriage, and invading Armenia laid siege to Artaxata, with a design to drive the father from the throne, and place the son on it in his room. But, on the approach of Pompey, he thought fit to withdraw, and, by a solemn embassy, to renew the alliance which his father had concluded first with Sylla, and aftewards with Lucullus [u]. He was, not long after, murdered by his own children, Mithridates and Orodes, in the twelfth year of his reign. Upon his death, Orodes, who was the elder brother, took possession of the throne; but was soon driven out by Mithridates, who making himself odious to the Parthians by his cruelties, was, in his turn, obliged to abandon the kingdom, and shelter himself with Gabinius governor of Syria. On his flight Orodes was replaced on the throne, by means of the Surenas, who next to the king, held the first place of honour and power in the kingdom, and had always adhered to the interest of Orodes. Gabinius was easily prevailed upon to undertake the restoring of Mithridates; for as his heart was entirely bent upon gain, he wanted only a pretence to invade Parthia, knowing that it was at that time a wealthy nation. Accordingly he set out on his march, taking Mithridates

Phrahates III.

Orodes.

Mithridates II.

[t] Plut. in Syll. Vell. patercul. l. ii. c. 24.

[u] Dion, l. xxxvi. p. 22. Liv. epit. l. 100.

thridates along with him for his guide; but after he had passed the Euphrates, being accosted by Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt, who offered him ten thousand talents, on condition he restored him to his kingdom, this corrupt governor, dropping his former enterprize, repassed the Euphrates, and marched directly into Egypt, leaving Mithridates to shift for himself. The Parthian, seeing himself thus abandoned by Gabinius, raised what troops he could, and returning into Babylonia, seized Seleucia, where he was closely besieged by Orodes, and in a short time reduced to such streights, that he was obliged to surrender at discretion. Orodes no sooner got him into his power, but, considering him as an enemy, and not as a brother, he caused him to be put to death, and was himself an eye-witness of that cruel execution [w]. We must not confound, as Justin has done, this Mithridates with Mithridates II. of whom we have spoke above, it being plain from Plutarch, Dion, Florus, Xiphilinus, and from the very prologue of the forty-second book of Trogus Pompeius, whom Justin has epitomized, that Mithridates II. and Mithridates the brother of Orodes, were two different princes. The former, by his many conquests and noble exploits, acquired the surname of Great; whereas the latter did nothing worth mentioning.

Mithridates put to death by his brother Orodes.

Orodes, by the death of his brother, became sole master of the whole Parthian empire; but did not long enjoy it in peace, a violent storm breaking out at a time, and from a quarter he least expected it. M. Licinius Crassus had been lately created consul at Rome the second time with Pompey; and, in the partition of the provinces, had obtained, in virtue of a law made by C. Trebonius tribune of the people, Syria, with the neighbouring provinces. To Pompey the two Spains were assigned, with all the provinces of Africa. By the Trebonian law they were both impowered to hold their provinces for the space of five years, to raise what forces they should think proper, and to make peace or war with whom they pleased, according to their own judgment, without having recourse to the senate or people of Rome, as all other governors had ever before been obliged to do [x]. Crassus was, according cording to Plutarch [r], a man of known valour and great experience in war, and had, on many occaſions, given ſignal proofs of both in the armies of Sylla, under whom he had learnt the military art. He was likewiſe an eloquent orator, well verſed in hiſtory, acquainted with Ariſtotle's philoſophy, and deemed one of the beſt antiquaries of his time. His obliging behaviour, his wonderful addreſs and affability, prejudiced people at firſt in his favour, and gained upon their affections; but his inſatiable avarice made all his good qualities in a manner overlooked; for though he was born of a rich family and heir to a great eſtate, yet he let no means of encreaſing his revenues eſcape him, and often uſed ſuch as were wholly unworthy of his birth and rank, being of opinion, as he himſelf declared, that no citizen was to be accounted a rich man, till he was able to maintain an army at his own expence. As he had therefore uſed all his intereſt to obtain the province of Syria, ſo he was overjoyed when it was conferred upon him for ſuch a term of years, and with ſo unbounded a power and authority, being reſolved to carry the war into Parthia, in hopes of enriching himſelf with the ſpoils of that nation, which was deemed very rich, as never having been ſubdued by any foreign enemy. He was ſo tranſported with joy at the thoughts of the immenſe treaſures, which he took for granted, he was to bring with him from Parthia, that he could not forbear talking of his intended expedition in a manner unworthy of his age and character, even with perſons whom he ſcarce knew. He did not confine his view to Syria alone, or Parthia, but flattered himſelf with atchieving ſuch things, as ſhould eclipſe the great exploits of Lucullus, Pompey, and Sylla himſelf, whoſe names had ſpread terror over all the nations of the eaſt. He fancied himſelf already on the banks of the Indus and the Ganges, and over-ran in his thoughts Bactria, India, and the moſt remote provinces of Aſia, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conqueſts. Intoxicated with theſe hopes, he began, towards the end of his conſulſhip, to make his levies, and form the legions, which were to attend him into Syria. But ſome of the tribunes of the people, diſapproving his deſign of making war upon the Parthians, who had entered into an alliance with Rome, and religiouſly obſerved their engagements, did all that lay in their power to reverſe the

[w] Dion, l. xxxix. Appian. in Parthic. p. 134, 140, 141, & in Syriac. p. 120. Justin. l. xlii. c. 4. [x] Liv. l. cv. Plut. in Crasso, Pomp. & Cat. Min. Appian. bell. civil. l. ii. p. 437, 438. Dio, l. xxxix.

M. Licinius Craſſus reſolves to make war on the Parthians.

[r] Plut. in Craſſo.

the plebiſcitum or decree of the people, paſſed at the inſtigation of Trebonius, who was now out of office.

Is oppoſed in vain by Capito, tribune of the people.

Ateius Capito one of the tribunes, having ſtirred up the people, by repreſenting to them how baſe and ſhameful a thing it was to diſturb the tranquillity of a peaceable nation, who had done the Romans no injury, would have arreſted Craſſus, tho' conſul, if eight other tribunes had not oppoſed the violence of their collegue, and reſcued Craſſus out of the hands of the officer who had ſeized him. When the conſul, after performing, as uſual, his vows in the capitol, was ready to ſet out for his province, Ateius aſſembled the people, prepared to obſtruct his departure; which Craſſus being alarmed at, deſired Pompey to accompany him to the gates of the city; which he did accordingly, keeping in awe by his preſence, as he was greatly revered by the people, thoſe who had moſt zealouſly oppoſed the conſul's expedition. Ateius, ſeeing he could not prevent the departure of Craſſus, haſtened to the gate of the city through which he was to paſs; and there having ordered a fire to be kindled, as ſoon as Craſſus appeared, he threw ſome perfumes into it, and, invoking the infernal gods, uttered a thouſand imprecations againſt Craſſus, which made all thoſe, who heard them, tremble with horror [z]. Tho' Craſſus took no notice of theſe curſes, yet the ſuperſtitious Romans aſcribed to them all the misfortunes and calamities which befel him, and thoſe who attended him in this fatal expedition (D); whereas they were owing, as we ſhall ſee anon, to a quite different cauſe.

CRASSUS

[z] Dio & Plut. ibid. Flor. l. iii. c. 11. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 46. Appian. bell. civil. p. 438

(D) Florus tells us, that Craſſus, on his ſetting out from Rome, was curſed by Metellus tribune of the people (12); and Velleius Paterculus (13), Appian (14), and Dion (15), that he was curſed by all the tribunes, but eſpecially by Ateius, who ſignalized himſelf on that occaſion.

——————Craſſumque in bella ſecutæ Sæva tribunitiæ moverunt prælia diræ.

ſays Lucian (16). Craſſus, the night before he ſet out for his province, ſupped with Cicero, in the gardens of his ſon-in-law Craſ-

(12) Flor. l. iii. c. 11. (13) Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 46.
(14) Appian. de bell. civil. l. ii. p. 438. (15) Dio, l. xlix.
(16) Lucian. l. iii.

CRASSUS having, with the aſſiſtance of Pompey, got ſafe out of Rome, purſued his march to Brunduſium; where he immediately embarqued his men on board ſeveral tranſports, and, notwithſtanding the wind blew then very high, ſet ſail for Aſia, and, with much ado, reached the ports of Galatia, having loſt many ſhips in his paſſage. Soon after his landing he had an interview with Dejotarus king of Galatia, who, tho' ſtricken in years, was at that time employed in building a new city. Craſſus, thinking this an unſeaſonable undertaking, ſaid pleaſantly, You begin, O king, full late to build a city at the twelfth hour of the day. The twelfth hour was, with the Romans, the laſt of the day. As Craſſus was upwards of ſixty, and looked older than he was, Dejotarus replied, "And you, O general, are not too early in your expe- "dition againſt the Parthians [a]."

Sets out from Rome, Year of the flood 2944. Before Chriſt 55.

FROM Galatia Craſſus purſued his march into Syria, the province allotted to him; and being there informed, that immenſe treaſures were lodged in the temple of Jeruſalem, which Pompey had not ventured to touch, he marched thither with part of his army, in order to ſeize them. Eleazar, one of the prieſts and at that time keeper of the ſacred treaſure, had under his charge, beſides many other things of an ineſtimable value, a rafter of maſſy gold, weighing three thouſand Hebrew pounds, or ſeven hundred and fifty common pounds. This, for the better ſecuring of it, he had incloſed into a beam made hollow for that purpoſe, and placed the beam over the entrance from the holy place into the holy of holies, hanging from it the veil which parted thoſe two places. Eleazar, who was appriſed of the motive of Craſſus's march to Jeruſalem, to ſave the other ornaments of the temple and the riches which were depoſited there by private perſons Plunders the temple of Jeruſalem.

[a] Plut. ibid.

Craſſippes (17). From thence Cicero removed to Tuſculanum, and Craſſus haſtened to Brunduſium in his military habit, being reſolved, in ſpite of the tribunes, to make a war on the Parthians (18).

(17) Cic. epiſt. familiar. l. i. epiſt. 9. (18) Idem, l. iv. ad Attic. epiſt. 12. & l. ii. de divinat.

ſons, diſcovered the golden rafter to Craſſus, and ſuffered him to take it away, after having made him ſolemnly promiſe with an oath, that he would meddle with nothing elſe. But Craſſus no ſooner received it, than forgetting his oath, he ſeized on the two thouſand talents which Pompey had left there untouched; and rummaging the temple, plundered it of every thing elſe which he thought worth taking away, to the value of eight thouſand talents more; ſo that the whole booty, which he ſacriligeouſly took from thence, amounted to ten thouſand talents [b]; that is, to two millions and upwards of our money. Joſephus, who relates this, thinking it would ſcarce be credited by other nations, alledges the authority of Strabo and other writers to prove, that immenſe treaſures had been depoſited in the temple, by the Jews of Europe, Aſia, and Cyrenaica [c]; but the hiſtorical writings of Strabo, which he quotes, have not reached our times.

Begins hoſtilities with the Parthians.

CRASSUS, thinking himſelf now ſufficiently furniſhed for his intended expedition, marched to the Euphrates, and having croſſed that river on a bridge of boats, which he threw over it, entered the Parthian territories, and began hoſtilities, without any other motive than his inſatiable avarice, and an eager deſire of enriching himſelf with the plunder of a country, which was generally eſteemed very rich. The Romans had, by Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey, made peace, and entered into alliances with the nation he thus invaded, and no complaints of any infraction or injuries had ever been heard, which might give juſt reaſon for a war; ſo that the Parthians, expecting nothing leſs than ſuch an invaſion, and having made no preparations for their defence, were eaſily driven out of all Meſopotamia.

And ſeizes great part of Meſopotamia.

The city of Zenodotia, which Stephanus places near Nicephorium, was the only place that made any oppoſition. Apollonius, who was governor, or rather tyrant, as Dio calls him, of that city, ſent deputies to Craſſus, acquainting him, that he was willing to ſurrender up the place to him; but as ſoon as the detachment ſent to take poſſeſſion of it had entered the gate, he ſurrounded them, and cut them in pieces. But both he and the inhabitants paid dear for their treachery; for Craſſus having immediately inveſted the city with his whole army, and taken it by aſſault, reduced the inhabitants to ſlavery, confiſcated their goods goods, and ſold their perſons to the beſt bidder. For this conqueſt and an inconſiderable advantage gained over one Talymenus Ilaces, or Syllaces, governor of Meſopotamia, who, having engaged the Romans with a ſmall body of horſe, was overcome and wounded, Craſſus ſuffered himſelf to be ſaluted by the ſoldiery with the title of imperator, which was uſually given after ſome ſignal victory. This turned to his diſgrace, the whole army laughing at his vanity, and expecting little from a general who was thus elated with the leaſt ſucceſs [d]. The other cities made no reſiſtance; ſo that he over-ran all Meſopotamia, and might, if he had taken advantage of the conſternation the Parthians were in, have penetrated as far as Seleucia and Cteſiphon, and made himſelf maſter of Babylonia as well as Meſopotamia; but, inſtead of purſuing the career he had begun, in the beginning of the autumn he repaſſed the Euphrates, and, leaving only ſeven thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe to garriſon the places he had taken, put his army into winter-quarters in the cities of Syria. This was undoubtedly the greateſt fault Craſſus committed in his Parthian expedition, after that of his undertaking it upon moſt unjuſt motives; for his haſty retreat gave the enemy time to recover from the terror which his arms had ſpread all over the eaſt, and to raiſe an army againſt the enſuing year, which the Romans could not withſtand. On his return into Syria, he was joined by his ſon, at the head of a thouſand choſen horſe. This young Roman had ſerved under Cæſar in Gaul, in quality of his lieutenant, and had been honoured with ſeveral military crowns, which generals uſed to beſtow on ſuch as diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their valour. When Cæſar underſtood that his father had begun the war with the Parthians, he gave him leave to go into the eaſt and ſerve under him; and indeed Cæſar had all along preſſed Craſſus to break with the Parthians, to force his way into Bactria, and from thence into India, knowing, that the farther that general, of whoſe power he was jealous, penetrated into the eaſtern countries, the more able he himſelf ſhould be to put in execution his deſign of ſubverting the republic; but the unfortunate young Craſſus came into Aſia, only to be a witneſs of his father's ill conduct and to partake of his misfortunes [e].

[b] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 12. [c] Idem ibid.

[d] Dio, l. xl. Plut. ubi ſupra. [e] Plut. & Dio, ibid.

His extortions in Syria.

In Syria Craſſus ſpent his time, more like a publican than a general, being wholly taken up with examining into the revenues of that province, and improving them by the moſt ſhameful methods, in order to amaſs new treaſures. The plunder of the temple of Jeruſalem was not the only ſacrilege he was guily of; he robbed in like manner all the temples of Syria, appropriating to his own uſe their rich ornaments and furniture. The temple of the Syrian goddeſs, named Atargetis, at Hierapolis, which ſome writers call Bambyces, others Edeſſa, and the Syrians Magog, was famous all over the eaſt, on account of the immenſe treaſures laid up there, as being the collection of many years. Theſe the avaricious proconſul ſeized; and leſt any of the rich vaſes and ornaments ſhould be embezzled, he ſpent a great deal of his time in ſeeing the money counted, and the gold and ſilver veſſels weighed before him [f]. Having thus ranſacked all the temples and ſacred places within the limits of his province, which Gabinius himſelf, his predeceſſor, had ſpared, he began to load the Syrians with ſuch taxes as reduced them to beggary. He commanded all the cities of his province to furniſh him each with a certain number of men, and then diſcharged them for a ſum of money. No one could obtain juſtice without a large bribe, nor redeem themſelves from the inſolence of the ſoldiers, without advancing a large ſum to the general. In ſhort, there was not any means of amaſſing money, how unjuſt or oppreſſive ſoever, which he did not uſe, as if he had been ſent, not to govern, but to plunder the province. In the mean time, the military diſcipline was entirely neglected, the ſoldiers lived in their quarters without any order, and the whole army gave themſelves up to idleneſs, debauchery, and all manner of effeminate pleaſures. We are told, that as Craſſus was going out of the temple of Hierapolis, which he had plundered, his ſon, who walked before, ſtumbled at the threſhold, and falling pulled down his father with him. This was interpreted by the ſoothſayers as a very bad omen; but the entire neglect of military diſcipline was the ſureſt preſage of the misfortunes, which afterwards befel both his ſon and the whole army.

His interview with the Parthian ambaſſadors.

Crassus having thus ſpent the winter, early in the ſpring drew together his troops out of their ſeveral quarters, in order to purſue the war which he had begun with the

[f] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 748. Plin. l. v. c. 23. Plut. & Dion. ibid.

the Parthians. As Orodes their king was a very warlike prince, he had, during the winter, aſſembled a numerous army; but, before he entered with it upon action, he ſent embaſſadors to the Roman general, to know for what reaſon he made war upon him. The embaſſadors arrived in Syria while Craſſus was aſſembling his troops, and being introduced to him, firſt put him in mind of the alliance which the Parthians had concluded with Sylla and Pompey, and then told him, that if he was ſent againſt the Parthians by the people of Rome, they did not pretend he ſhould diſobey his orders, ſince in that caſe a war muſt enſue, which could not be terminated but by the final ruin of one of the empires; but if Craſſus, as they had been informed, had undertaken this war, contrary to the inclinations of the people of Rome, to ſatiate his private intereſt, that the king their maſter, pitying his old age, would ſuffer the Romans he had left in Meſopotamia, where they were rather beſieged than in garriſon, to retire unmoleſted. Craſſus, without alledging any pretence for his invading the Parthian dominions, anſwered this ſpeech with a rodomontade, ſaying, that they ſhould have his anſwer at Seleucia. Hereupon the chief of the embaſſadors, by name Vageſes or Vahiſes, ſmiling and ſhewing him the palm of his hand, ſaid, "You ſhall "ſooner, O Craſſus, ſee hair grow here, than be maſter "of Seleucia;" and, without adding a word more, retired and acquainted his maſter, that he muſt prepare for war [g].

Orodes finding, on the return of his embaſſadors, that the proconſul was bent on a war, immediately took the field, and dividing his troops into two bodies, marched in perſon with one to the frontiers of Armenia, to make a diverſion there, the king of that country having raiſed a conſiderable army to reinforce the Romans. The other he ſent into Meſopotamia, under the command of the brave Surena, or Surenas. This general, if we may depend on the character Plutarch gives us of him [h], had all the qualifications that form a conſummate hero. He was deſcended from one of the moſt antient and illuſtrious families of Parthia, and had derived from his anceſtors the right of putting the crown on the king's head at his coronation: To this illuſtrious birth he is ſaid to have joined an extraordinary wiſdom and diſcretion, tho' he was but thirty years of age, and to have surpassed in valour and prowess all men of his time. His valour kept the princes and nations of Asia in awe, and prevented their entering into a confederacy against the formidable power of Parthia. Orodes was indebted to him, as we have hinted above for his crown. The taking of Seleucia, when held by Mithridates, was chiefly owing to him; for he was the first who mounted the ramparts of that capital, struck terror into the enemy's troops, and made them fly before him. His stature was majestic, his air graceful, and his behaviour towards all extremely obliging. In wealth, power, and authority, he was, next to the king, the first man in the kingdom. His equipage, when he travelled, consisted of a thousand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots for the service of his wives and concubines, a thousand horsemen completely armed for his guard, and besides, a great number of light-armed troops, which with his domestics, amounted to ten thousand more. He is said to have united the luxury of an Asiatic with the intrepidity of a conqueror; for he carried with him whatever could contribute to his pleasures, and at the same time was ready to expose himself to the greatest dangers; being always at the head of his troops, he commanded in the most perillous and desperate enterprizes. Tho' his courage was such as to brave death in a breach or battle, yet he was not ashamed to paint his face and perfume his hair, after the manner of the effeminate Medes; whereas the Parthians marched against their enemy with their hair in disorder, and making as hideous a figure as they could, to strike the more terror [i].

The character of Surenas the Parthian general.

[g] Flor. l. iii. c. 11. Plut. Dio, ibid.

[h] Plut. in Craſſo.

Surenas retakes most of the cities of Mesopotamia.

But, to resume the thread of our history, Orodes having divided his army into two bodies, Surenas marched with that which was under his command into Mesopotamia, where he soon retook most of the cities which Crassus had made himself master of the year before. Hereupon several Roman soldiers, who garrisoned the other places, making their escape out of Mesopotamia fled to Crassus, and filled his camp with a terrible report of the number, power, and strength of the enemy. They told their fellow soldiers, that the Parthian troops were very numerous, brave, and well-disciplined; that it was impossible to overtake them when they fled, or escape them when [i] Plut. ibid. & Appian in Parthic.

when they pursued; that their defensive arms were proof against the Roman darts, and their offensive weapons so sharp, that no buckler was fence against them, &c. Crassus looked upon this account only as the effect of a panic and cowardly fear; but the common soldiers, and many of the chief officers, were so disheartned at it, that he quæstor Caius Cassius, the same who afterwards conspired against Cæsar, and most of the legionary tribunes, advised Crassus to suspend his march, and deliberate with more leisure on the enterprize, before he proceeded farther in it. But Crassus obstinately persisted in his former resolution, contrary to the opinion of all his officers, being confirmed therein by the arrival of Artabazes king of Armenia, who brought with him six thousand horse, which were only his guard, and promised to send to the proconsul ten thousand cuirassiers and thirty thousand foot, whenever he should stand in need of them. At the same time he advised him by no means to march his army through the plains of Mesopotamia, but to take his rout over the mountains of Armenia. The reasons with which he supported this advice were, that as Armenia was a mountainous country, the Parthian horse, in which the main strength of their army consisted, would prove there entirely useless; and besides, that if he took this rout, his army should be plentifully supplied with all necessaries: whereas, if he marched by the way of Mesopotamia, he would be perpetually harassed by the Parthian horse, and often be obliged to lead his army through sandy deserts, where he would be distressed for want of water and all other provisions. This was the best advice that could be given him, and the reasons for it were unanswerable; but Crassus, despising all that was said to him, told Artabazes, that as he had left many valiant Romans to garrison the towns, which he had made himself master of the last year in Mesopotamia, he was obliged to take that rout, lest they should be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy; but as to the auxiliaries the king of Armenia had offered him, he willingly accepted them, and desired Artabazes to send them to him with all possible expedition. Thus Crassus, hearkening to no advice but what tended to his ruin, set out on his march for Mesopotamia. Dion Cassius, a judicious historian and at the same time an experienced warrior, observes here, that the Romans under the command of Crassus were on all occasions, either ignorant of what was neceſſarily to be done, or in no condition to execute it; and adds, that one would have thought they had been blinded and perſecuted by ſome divinity, ſince they could neither make uſe of their minds nor bodies. This divinity was, no doubt, the true God, tho' unknown to Dion, who thus revenged the robbing and profaning of his holy temple at Jeruſalem.

Crassus despises the advice of the king of Armenia.

Enters Meſopotamia, contrary to the advice of all his officers.

THE proconſul, being greatly encouraged by the proſpect of the reinforcement promiſed him by the king of Armenia, began his march, and, contrary to the advice of his chief officers, advanced to the frontiers of Meſopotamia. He had under his command ſeven legions, four thouſand horſe, and a great many auxiliaries, the whole army amounting to forty thouſand men and upwards. With theſe he paſſed the Euphrates, near the city of Zeugma, in the province of Comagene (E), and again entered Meſopotamia. Plutarch, Dion Caſſius, and Julius Obſequens ſpeaks of many prodigies, by which the gods declared before-hand, that they did not approve of this expedition, and gave him warning of the ill-ſucceſs that would attend it. While the troops were paſſing the Euphrates, the ſky was all on a ſudden overcaſt, and ſo dreadful a ſtorm aroſe, that the ſoldiers were filled with fear and conſternation. The inceſſant claps of thunder, the flaſhes of lightening that followed one another, and the violent wind which blew in the ſoldiers faces, ſeemed to have been ſent by the gods, on purpoſe to put a ſtop to their march. Part of the bridge was broke down by the wind and lightening, while the army was paſſing. The horſe which Craſſus uſed to ride in battle, fell into the river, and was drowned with the groom who led him. The golden eagle, which was the chief ſtandard of the army, is ſaid to have turned about of itſelf on the ſtaff on which it was fixed.

Many

(E) Strabo and Pliny place the city of Zeugma in Comagene, a province of Syria, and tell us, that it was ſo called from a bridge built here over the Euphrates, the word Ζευγμα in the Greek tongue ſignifying a bridge. This bridge was, according to Dion Caſſius and Stephanus, the work of Alexander the Great. But it is not at all probable, that Alexander ſhould have gone ſo far as Comagene to croſs the Euphrates; and beſides, Arrian tells us, that he led his army over that river at Thapſacus, after having repaired a bridge there, which had been deſtroyed by the Perſians, in order to prevent him from entering Meſopotamia.

Many other ſtandards were, by the violence of the wind, blown into the river and loſt. While Craſſus was offering the uſual ſacrifices for the purifying of the troops, he let fall the entrails of the victim, which the prieſts had, according to cuſtom, put into his hands. From this event the ſoldiery drew bad preſages; but the general, deriding their ſuperſtition, told them, That they had no occaſion to be afraid, for his arms ſhould not ſlip out of his hands in the ſame manner [k].

THE army having thus croſſed the Euphrates and entered the enemy's country, Caſſius adviſed the proconſul to advance to ſome of the towns in which he had left garriſons, and there reſt and refreſh his troops, till he had got certain intelligence of the number, ſtrength, and power of the enemy; but, if he did not approve of this counſel, he thought the beſt thing he could do was to march along the Euphrates to Seleucia; for, by keeping cloſe to that river, he would avoid being ſurrounded by the Parthians, and at the ſame time be plentifully ſupplied, by means of his ſhips, with all neceſſary proviſions. Craſſus ſeemed to approve of this advice, and was ready to come into it, when Abgarus king of Edeſſa, of whom we have ſpoke in the end of the ninth volume, arrived at the Roman camp, and prevailed upon the proconſul to follow a quite different plan. Abgarus, as he had formerly ſerved under Pompey, was well known in the Roman army, and looked upon by the ſoldiery as a friend; but in reality was a traitor, and ſent by Surenas, with whom he kept a private correſpondence, on purpoſe to bring about the deſtruction of Craſſus; and this part he acted ſo well, that the ruin of the Roman army was chiefly owing to him. In the firſt interview he had with the Roman general, he told him, that he wanted wings and feet more than arms againſt a nation that was ready, on his approach, to withdraw with their moſt valuable effects into Scythia and Hyrcania; that they had not courage enough to look the Romans in the face; that the name of Craſſus had already ſpread a general terror among their troops, and that there wanted no more for the obtaining of a complete victory, than to march directly up to them and give them battle. He offered himſelf for a guide to lead them the ſhorteſt way to the enemy; and Craſſus, blinded with his flattering ſpeeches, gave entirely into the ſnare, and followed the traitor, who Betrayed by Abgarus king of Edeſſa.

[k] Plut. & Dion. ibid.

who had ſo ſtrongly inſinuated himſelf in his favour, that he would hearken to no-body but him. Under the conduct of this crafty and treacherous guide, they firſt entered into a vaſt green plain, divided by many rivulets; and their march proved very eaſy croſs this delicious country: but the farther they advanced, the worſe the roads grew, inſomuch, that they were obliged at laſt to climb up mountains and rocks, which brought them to a dry and ſandy plain, where they could neither find food to ſatisfy their hunger, nor water to quench their thirſt. Then Abgarus began to be ſuſpected by the tribunes and other officers, who earneſtly preſſed their general to follow him no longer, but to retreat to the mountains. At the ſame time an expreſs arrived from Artabazes, acquainting Craſſus, that Orodes had invaded his kingdom at the head of a mighty army, and that he was obliged to keep his forces at home for the defence of his own dominions. The ſame meſſenger adviſed the proconſul, in his maſter's name, to avoid by all means the barren plains, where his troops would periſh with hunger, and to take to the mountains and approach Armenia, that they might join their forces againſt the common enemy; but all was to no purpoſe, for Craſſus, inſtead of giving ear either to the wiſe counſels of his own officers, or of a king, who was a ſincere and hearty friend to the Romans, blindly and obſtinately followed the advice of the treacherous Abgarus, or rather his own ill fate; nay, he flew into a violent paſſion againſt the meſſenger ſent him by Artabazes, for the treacherous advice he had given him [1]. Caſſius could not hear this mad anſwer without the greateſt indignation; but Abgarus endeavoured to ſoften him, by promiſing to lead the army very ſoon into a delicious and fruitful country beyond the deſarts, which would make them amends for the fatigue they had undergone. As to Craſſus, he gave no other anſwer to the complaints of his troops, than that they could not expect to meet with the delights of Campania in the moſt remote parts of the world.

The painful march of the Roman army.

THUS they continued their march for ſome days croſs a deſart, the very ſight of which was ſufficient to throw them into the utmoſt deſpair; for they could not perceive, either near them, or at a diſtance, the leaſt tree, plant, or brook, not ſo much as a hill, or a ſingle blade of graſs; nothing was to be ſeen all around them, but huge heaps of burning ſand. The Romans had ſcarce got through this deſart, when word was

[1] Plut. Dion. ibid. Appian. in Parthic.

was brought them by their ſcouts, that a numerous army of Parthians was advancing full march to attack them; for Abgarus, under pretence of going out on parties, had often conferred with Surenas, and concerted meaſures with him for deſtroying the Roman army. Upon this advice, which occaſioned great confuſion in the camp, the Romans being quite exhauſted and tired out with their long and troubleſome march, Craſſus drew up his men in battalia, following at firſt the advice of Caſſius, who was for extending the infantry as wide as poſſible, that they might take up the more ground, and by that means prevent the enemy from ſurrounding them; but Abgarus aſſuring the proconſul, that the Parthian forces were not ſo numerous as was repreſented, he changed this diſpoſition, and believing only the man who betrayed him, drew up his troops in a ſquare, which faced every way, and had on each ſide twelve cohorts in front. Near each cohort he placed a troop of horſe to ſupport them, that they might charge with the greater ſecurity and boldneſs. Thus the whole army looked more like one phalanx, than troops drawn up in manipuli, with ſpaces between them, after the Roman manner. The general himſelf commanded in the centre, his ſon in the left wing, and Caſſius in the right. In this order they advanced to the banks of a ſmall river called the Baliſſus, the ſight of which was very pleaſing to the ſoldiers, who were much harraſſed with drought and exceſſive heat. Moſt of the officers were for encamping on the banks of this river, or rather rivulet, to give the troops time to refreſh themſelves after the fatigue of ſo long and painful a march, and in the mean time to procure certain intelligence of the number and diſpoſition of the Parthian army; but Craſſus, ſuffering himſelf to be hurried on by the inconſiderate ardour of his ſon and the horſe he commanded, only allowed the legions to take a meal ſtanding; and before this could be done by all, he ordered them to advance, not ſlowly and halting now and then, after the Roman manner, but as faſt as they could move, till they came in ſight of the enemy, who, contrary, to their expectation, did not appear either ſo numerous or ſo terrible as they had been repreſented. But this was a ſtratagem of Surenas, who had concealed his men in convenient places, ordering them to cover their arms, leſt their brightneſs ſhould betray them, and ſtarting up at the firſt ſignal attack the enemy on all ſides. The ſtratagem had the deſired effect; for Surenas no ſooner gave the ſignal, than the Parthians, riſing as it were

The imprudent conduct of Craſſus.

The Roman army attacked by the Parthians.

were out of the ground, with dreadful cries and a moſt frightful noiſe, advanced againſt the Romans, who were greatly ſurprized and diſmayed at that ſight, and much more ſo, when the Parthians, throwing off the covering of their arms, appeared in ſhining cuiraſſes and helmets of burniſhed ſteel, finely mounted on horſes, covered all over with armour of the ſame metal. At their head appeared young Surenas in a rich dreſs, and was the firſt who charged the enemy, endeavouring with his pike men to break through the firſt ranks of the Roman army; but finding it too cloſe and impenetrable, the cohorts ſupporting each other, he fell back and retired in a ſeeming confuſion; but the Romans were much ſurprized, when they ſaw themſelves ſuddenly ſurrounded on all ſides, and galled with continual ſhowers of arrows. Craſſus ordered his light-armed foot and archers to advance and charge the enemy; but they were ſoon repulſed, and forced to cover themſelves behind the heavy-armed foot. Then the Parthian horſe advancing near the Romans, diſcharged ſhowers of arrows upon them, every one of which did execution, the legionaries being drawn up in ſuch cloſe order, that it was impoſſible for the enemy to miſs their aim. As their arrows were of an extraordinay weight, and diſcharged with incredible force and impetuoſity, nothing was proof againſt them. The two kings advanced in good order to repulſe them, but to no effect; for the Parthians ſhot their arrows with as great dexterity when their backs were turned, as when they faced the enemy; ſo that the Romans, whether they kept their ground, or purſued their flying enemy, were equally annoyed with their fatal arrows.

The Romans galled by the arrows of the Parthians.

THE Romans, as long as they had any hopes that the Parthians, after having ſpent their arrows, would either betake themſelves to flight, or engage them hand to hand, ſtood their ground with great reſolution and intrepidity, ; but when they obſerved that there were a great many camels in their rear loaded with arrows, and that thoſe who emptied their quivers wheeled about to fill them anew, they began to loſe courage, and loudly to complain of their general for ſuffering them thus to ſtand ſtill, and ſerve only as a butt to the enemy's arrows, which, they well ſaw, would not be exhauſted till they were all killed to a man. Hereupon Craſſus ordered his ſon to advance at all adventures, and attack the enemy with thirteen hundred horſe, five hundred archers, and eight cohorts.

Young Craſſus advances againſt the enemy.

But

But the Parthians no ſooner ſaw this choice body, for it was the flower of the army, marching up againſt them, but they wheeled about, and betook themſelves, according to their cuſtom to flight. Hereupon young Craſſus crying out as loud as he could, They fly before us, puſhed on full ſpeed after them, not doubting but he ſhould gain a complete victory; but when he was a great diſtance from the main body of the Roman army he perceived his miſtake, for thoſe, who before had fled, facing about, charged him with incredible fury. Young Craſſus ordered his troops to halt, hoping that the enemy, upon ſeeing their ſmall number, would not be afraid to come to a cloſe fight; but herein he was likewiſe greatly diſappointed, for the Parthians, contenting themſelves to oppoſe his front with their heavy armed horſe, ſurrounded him on all ſides, and keeping at a diſtance, diſcharged inceſſant ſhowers of arrows upon the unfortunate Romans, thus ſurrounded and pent up. The Parthian cavalry, in wheeling about, raiſed ſo thick a duſt, that the Romans could ſcarce ſee one another, much leſs the enemy; nevertheleſs they found themſelves wounded with arrows, tho' they could not perceive whence they came. In a ſhort time the place where they ſtood was all ſtrown with dead bodies. Some of the unhappy Romans finding their entrails tore, and many overcome by the exquiſite torments they ſuffered, rolled themſelves on the ſand with the arrows in their bodies, and expired in that manner. Others endeavouring to tear out by force the bearded points of the arrows, only made their wounds the larger, and encreaſed their pain. Moſt of them died in this manner, and thoſe who outlived their companions, were no more in a condition to act; for when young Craſſus exhorted them to march up to the enemy, ſome ſhewed him their wounded bodies, others their hands nailed to their bucklers, and ſome their feet pierced through and pinned to the ground; ſo that it was equally impoſſible for them either to attack the enemy, or defend themſelves. The young commander therefore, leaving his infantry to the mercy of the enemy, advanced at the head of the cavalry againſt their heavy-armed horſe. The thouſand Gauls, whom he had brought with him from the weſt, charged the enemy with incredible boldneſs and vigour; but their lances did little execution on men armed with cuiraſſes, and horſes covered with tried armour. However, they behaved with great great reſolution; for ſome of them taking hold of the enemies ſpears and cloſing with them, threw them off their horſes on the ground, where they lay without being able to ſtir, by reaſon of the great weight of their armour; others diſmounting crept under the enemies horſes, and thruſting their ſwords into their bellies, made them throw their riders. Thus the brave Gauls fought tho' greatly harraſſed with heat and thirſt, which they were not accuſtomed to bear, till the moſt of their horſes were killed, and their commander dangerouſly wounded. They then thought it adviſeable to retire to their infantry, which they no ſooner joined, than the Parthians inveſted them anew, making a moſt dreadful havock of them with their arrows. In this deſperate condition, Craſſus ſpying a riſing ground at a ſmall diſtance, led the remains of his detachment thither, with a deſign to defend himſelf in the beſt manner he could, till ſuccours ſhould be ſent him from his father. The Parthians purſued him, and, having ſurrounded him in his new poſt, continued ſhowering arrows upon his men, till moſt of them were either killed or diſabled, without being able to make uſe of their arms, or give the enemy proofs of their valour.

Is reduced to great ſtreights.

YOUNG Craſſus had two Greeks with him, who had ſettled in the city of Carrhæ. Theſe touched with compaſſion in ſeeing ſo brave a man reduced to ſuch ſtreights, preſſed him to retire with them to the neighbouring city of Iſchnes, which had declared for the Romans; but the young Roman rejected their propoſal with indignation, telling them, that he would rather die a thouſand times, than abandon ſo many valiant men, who ſacrificed their lives for his ſake. Having returned this anſwer to his two Greek friends, he embraced and diſmiſſed them, giving them leave to retire and ſhift for themſelves in the beſt manner they could. As for himſelf, having now loſt all hopes of being relieved, and ſeeing moſt of his men and friends killed round him, he gave way to his grief, and not being able to make uſe of his arm, which was ſhot through with a large barbed arrow, he preſented his ſide to one of his attendants, and ordered him to put an end to his unhappy life. His example was followed by Cenſorinus a ſenator, by Megabacchus an experienced and brave officer, and by moſt of the nobility who ſerved under him. Five hundred common ſoldiers were taken priſoners, and the reſt cut in pieces.

His death.

THE

THE Parthians, having thus cut off or taken the whole detachment commanded by young Craſſus, marched without delay againſt his father, who, upon the firſt advice that the enemy fled before his ſon and was cloſely purſued by him, had taken heart, the more becauſe thoſe, who had remained to make head againſt him, ſeemed to abate much of their ardour, the greateſt part of them having marched with the reſt againſt his ſon. Wherefore having encouraged his troops, he retired to a ſmall hill in his rear, to wait there till his ſon returned from the purſuit. Young Craſſus had diſpatched frequent expreſſes to his father, to acquaint him with the danger he was in; but they had fallen into the enemies hands, and been by them put to the ſword. Only the laſt, who had eſcaped with great difficulty, arrived ſafe, and informed him that his ſon was loſt, if he did not ſend him an immediate and powerful reinforcement. This news threw Craſſus into the utmoſt conſternation; a thouſand affecting thoughts roſe in his mind, and diſturbed his reaſon to ſuch a degree, that he ſcarce knew what he was doing. However, the deſire he had of ſaving his ſon and ſo many brave Romans, who were under his command, made him immediately decamp and march to their aſſiſtance; but he was not gone far, before he was met by the Parthians, who, with loud ſhouts and ſongs of victory, gave, at a great diſtance, the unhappy father notice of his misfortune. They had cut off young Craſſus's head, and, having fixed it on the point of a lance, were advancing full ſpeed to fall on the father. As they drew near, Craſſus was ſtruck with that diſmal and affecting ſight but on this occaſion behaved like a hero; for tho' he was under the deepeſt concern, he had the preſence of mind to ſtifle his grief, for fear of diſcouraging the army, and to cry out to the diſmayed troops, "This misfortune is entirely mine; the loſs of one man "cannot affect the victory: let us charge, let us fight "like Romans; if you have any compaſſion for a father "who has juſt now loſt a ſon, whoſe valour you admired, "let it appear in your rage and reſentment againſt theſe "inſulting barbarians". Thus Craſſus ſtrove to reanimate his troops; but his efforts were unſucceſsful: their courage was quite ſunk, as appeared from the faint and languiſhing ſhout which they raiſed, according to cuſtom, before the action. When the ſignal was given, the Parthians keeping to their old way of fighting, diſcharged clouds clouds of arrows on the legionaries, without drawing near them, which did ſuch dreadful execution, that many of the Romans, to avoid the arrows, which occaſioned a long and painful death, threw themſelves like men in deſpair, on the enemy's heavy-armed horſe, ſeeking from their ſpears a more quick and eaſy kind of death. Thus the Parthians continued plying them inceſſantly with their arrows till night, when they left the field of battle, crying out, that they would allow the father one night to lament the death of his ſon.

The whole Parthian army falls upon Craſſus.

Deſperate conditions of the Romans.

THIS was a melancholy night for the Romans. Craſſus kept himſelf concealed from the ſoldiery, lying not in the generals tent, but in the open air, and on the bare ground, with his head wrapped up in his paludamentum or military cloke, and was, in that forlorn condition, ſays Plutarch, a great example to the vulgar of the inſtability of fortune; to the wiſe, a ſtill greater of the pernicious effects of avarice, temerity, and ambition. Octavius, one of his lieutenants, and Caſſius, approached him, and endeavoured to raiſe him up and conſole him; but ſeeing him quite ſunk under the weight of his affliction and deaf to all comfort, they ſummoned a council of war, compoſed of all the chief officers, wherein it was unanimouſly reſolved, that they ſhould decamp before break of day, and retire, without ſound of trumpet, to the neighbouring city of Carrhæ, which was held by a Roman garriſon. Agreeable to this reſolution, they began their march as ſoon as the council broke up; which produced dreadful outcries among the ſick and wounded, who, perceiving that they were to be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy, filled the camp with their complaints and lamentations; but their cries and tears tho' very affecting, did not ſtop the march of the others, which indeed was very ſlow, to give the ſtragglers time to come up. There were only three hundred light horſe, under the command of one Egnatius, who purſued their march without ſtopping. Theſe arriving at Carrhæ about midnight, Egnatius, calling to the centinels on the walls, deſired them to acquaint Coponius, governor of the place, that Craſſus had fought a great battle with the Parthians; and without ſaying a word more or letting them know who he was, continued his march with all poſſible expedition to the bridge of Zeugma, which he paſſed, and by that means ſaved his troops, but was much blamed for abandoning his general.

HOWEVER,

Crassus gets to Carrhæ.

However, the message he sent to Caponius was of great service to Crassus; for that commander, wisely conjecturing, from the manner in which the unknown person had given him that intelligence, that some misfortune had befallen Crassus, immediately ordered his garrison to stand to their arms, and marching out met Crassus, and conducted him and his army into the city; for the Parthians, tho' informed of his flight, did not offer to pursue him, observing therein the superstitious custom which obtained among them and the Persians, not to fight in the night; but, when it was day, they entered the Roman camp, and having put all the wounded, to the number of four thousand, to the sword, dispersed their cavalry all over the plain in pursuit of the fugitives. One of Crassus's lieutenants, named Vargunteius, having separated in the night from the main body of the army, with four cohorts, missed his way and was overtaken by the enemy, at whose approach he withdrew to a neighbouring hill, where he defended himself with great valour, till all his men were killed, except twenty, who made their way through the enemy sword in hand, and got safe to Carrhæ [m]; but Vargunteius himself lost his life on this occasion.

In the mean time Surenas, not knowing whether Crassus and Cassius had retired to Carrhæ, or taken a different rout, in order to be informed of the truth and take his measures accordingly, dispatched a messenger, who spoke the Roman language, to the city of Carrhæ, enjoining him to approach the walls, and acquaint Crassus himself or Cassius, that the Parthian general was inclined to enter into a treaty with them, and demanded a conference. Both the proconsul and his quæstor Cassius spoke from the walls with the messenger, and accepting the proposal with great joy, desired that the time and place for an interview might be immediately agreed upon. The messenger withdrew, promising to return quickly with an answer from Surenas; but that general no sooner understood that Crassus and Cassius were in Carrhæ, than he marched thither with his whole army, and, having invested the place, acquainted the Romans, that, if they expected any favourable terms, they must deliver up Crassus and Cassius to him in chains. Hereupon a council of the chief officers being summoned, it was thought thought expedient to retire from Carrhæ that very night, and ſeek for another aſylum. It was of the utmoſt importance, that none of the inhabitants of Carrhæ, ſhould be acquainted with their deſign till the time of its execution; but Craſſus, whoſe whole conduct evidently ſhews that he was blinded, as Dion Caſſius obſerves, by ſome divinity, imparted the whole matter in confidence to one Andromachus, chuſing him for his guide, and relying injudiciouſly on the fidelity of a man whom he ſcarce knew. Andromachus immediately acquainted Surenas with the deſign of the Romans, promiſing at the ſame time, as the Parthians did not engage in the night, to manage matters ſo, that they ſhould not get out of his reach before day-break. Purſuant to his promiſe, he led them through many windings and turnings, till he brought them into deep marſhy grounds, where the infantry were up to the knees in mire. Then Caſſius, ſuſpecting that their guide had led them into thoſe bogs with no good deſign, refuſed to follow him any longer, and returning to Carrhæ, took his rout towards Syria, which he reached with five hundred horſe. Octavius, with five thouſand men under his command, being conducted by truſty guides, gained the mountains, called, by Plutarch and Appian, Sinnaci, and there intrenched himſelf before break of day. As for Craſſus, he was ſtill entangled in the marſhes, when Surenas, at the riſing of the ſun, overtook him, and inveſted him with his cavalry. The proconſul had with him four cohorts and a ſmall body of horſe; and with theſe he gained, in ſpite of all oppoſition, the ſummit of another hill within twelve furlongs of Octavius, who, ſeeing the danger that threatened his general, flew to his aſſiſtance, firſt with a ſmall number of his men, but was ſoon followed by all the reſt, who, being aſhamed of their cowardice, quitted their poſt, tho' very ſafe, and, charging the Parthians with great fury, diſengaged Craſſus, and obliged the enemy to abandon the hill. Upon the retreat of the enemy, they formed themſelves into a hollow ſquare, and, placing Craſſus in the middle, made a kind of rampart round him with their bucklers, reſolutely proteſting, that none of the enemy's arrows ſhould touch their general's body, till they were all killed fighting in his defence. Surenas, loath to let ſo fine a prey eſcape, ſurrounded the hill, as if he deſigned to make a new attack; but finding his Parthians very backward, and not doubting but the Romans, when night came on, would purſue their march and get out of his reach, he had recourſe again to artifice, and declared before ſome priſoners, whom he Caſſius gets ſafe into Syria.

[m] Plut. & Appian. ibid. Eutrop. l. vi. Oros. l. vi. c. 13.

Craſſus, betrayed by his guide, is overtaken by the enemy.

he ſoon after ſet at liberty, that he was inclined to treat with the proconſul of a peace, and that it was better to come to a reconciliation with Rome, than to ſow the ſeeds of an eternal war, by ſhedding the blood of one of her generals. Agreeable to this declaration, Surenas, as ſoon as the priſoners were releaſed, advanced towards the hill, where the Romans were poſted, attended only by ſome of his officers, and, with his bow unbent and open arms, invited Craſſus to an interview. So ſudden a change ſeemed very ſuſpicious to the proconſul, who therefore declined the interview, till he was forced by his own ſoldiers to intruſt his life with an enemy, whoſe treachery they had all experienced; for the legionaries, flocking round him, not only abuſed him in an outrageous manner, but even menaced him, if he did not accept of the propoſals made him by the Parthian general. Seeing therefore that his troops were ready to mutiny, he began to advance, without arms or guards, towards the enemy, after having called the gods and his officers to witneſs the violence his troops offered him, and entreated all who were preſent, but eſpecially Octavius and Petronius, two of the chief commanders, for the honour of Rome their common mother, not to mention, after his death, the ſhameful behaviour of the Roman legionaries. Octavius and Petronius could not reſolve to let him go alone, but attended him down the hill, as did likewiſe ſome legionaries keeping at a diſtance. Craſſus was met at the foot of the hill by two Greeks, who, diſmounting from their horſes, ſaluted him with great reſpect, and deſired him in the Greek tongue to ſend ſome of his attendants, who might ſatisfy him, that Surenas, and thoſe who were with him, came without arms. Hereupon Craſſus ſent two brothers of the Roſcian family; but Surenas, having cauſed them to be ſeized, advanced to the foot of the hill mounted on a fine horſe, and attended by the chief officers of his army. Craſſus, who waited for the return of his two meſſengers, was ſurpriſed to ſee himſelf prevented by Surenas in perſon, when he leaſt expected it. The Parthian general, perceiving as he approached Craſſus, that he was on foot, cried out in a ſeeming ſurpriſe, "What "do I ſee? a Roman general on foot, and we on horſe-"back! Let a horſe be brought for him immediately. "You need not be ſurpriſed, replied Craſſus, we are come "only to an interview, each after the cuſtom of his coun-"try. Very well anſwered Surenas, there ſhall be hence-

Invited by Surenas to an interview

" forth a laſting peace between king Orodes and the people " of Rome; but we muſt ſign the articles of it on the " banks of the Euphrates; for you Romans do not always " remember your conventions." Craſſus would have ſent for a horſe; but a very ſtately one, with a golden bit and richly capariſoned, was brought to him by a Parthian; which Surenas preſenting to him, " Accept this horſe from " my hands, ſaid he, which I give you in the name of my " maſter king Orodes." He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when ſome of the king's officers, taking Craſſus by the middle, ſet him up upon the horſe, which they began to whip with great violence before them, in order to make him quicken his pace. Octavius offended at this inſult, took the horſe by the bridle; Petronius, and the few Romans who were preſent, ſeconded him, and flocking all around Craſſus, ſtopped his horſe. The Parthians endeavoured to repulſe them and clear the way for the proconſul; whereupon they began to juſtle and puſh one another with great tumult and diſorder. At laſt Octavius, drawing his ſword, killed one of the king's grooms; but at the ſame time another coming behind Octavius, with one blow laid him dead at his feet. Both parties fought with great reſolution, the Parthians ſtriving to carry off Craſſus, and the Romans to reſcue him out of their hands. In this ſcuffle moſt of the Romans, who came to the conference, were killed, among the reſt Craſſus himſelf; but whether by a Roman or a Parthian is uncertain. Some writers tell us, that he fell by the hand of one Promonæthros or Manarthes, a Parthian; but others, with Livy [n], Florus [o], and Sextus Rufus [p], leave it in doubt, whether he was killed by his own men, to prevent his falling alive into the ene or's hands, or by the Parthians. However that be, his head and right hand were immediately cut off in order to be ſent to Orodes in Armenia, and his mangled body left unburied, to be devoured by the wild beaſts. Upon his death, the reſt of the army either ſurrendered to the enemy, or diſperſing in the night, were purſued and put to the ſword. The Romans loſt in this campaign at leaſt thirty thouſand men; of which twenty thouſand were killed, and ten thouſand taken priſoners. The latter continued in captivity among the Parthians, and Inſulted by the Parthians.

And killed.

His whole army deſtroyed.

[n] Liv. l. cvi. [o] Flor. l. iii. c. 11. [p] Sext. Ruf. in brev.

and contracting ignominious marriages, to the ſhame of Rome, as Horace emphatically expreſſes it (F), grew old on the lands and under the ſtandards of the barbarians. The ſtandards of the vanquiſhed legions were carried to Seleucia, and there ſhewn for many years as ſights; and from this time the Romans looked upon the war with the Parthians as the moſt important of all their wars, the revenging of the death of Craſſus and the recovering of their enſigns being ever after the chief object of their application; but how they ſucceeded herein, we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. This battle is called by the Latin authors the battle of Carrhæ, becauſe it was fought at a ſmall diſtance from that city, and was, without all doubt the moſt terrible blow, after the battle of Cannæ, which the Romans ever received.

SURENAS, having thus entirely defeated the Roman army, ſet out on his march to Seleucia, ſpreading a report, that Craſſus was ſtill alive, and that he intended to ſhew him to the numerous inhabitants of that great metropolis. His deſign was to entertain them with a comical ſcene, which he projected on his march. There was among the Roman captives one Caius Paccianus, who greatly reſembled the proconſul Craſſus. This man Surenas cauſed to be dreſt after the Parthian manner, and having placed him on a ſtately horſe, made him enter Seleucia at the head of the army, with twelve lictors carrying before him their faſces and axes. The guards of this mock conſul were mounted on camels, each of them having an empty purſe hanging at his girdle. The bloody heads of ſeveral Roman ſoldiers, ſtuck on ſpears, ſerved for trophies, and revived in the minds of the citizens of Seleucia the joy, which the firſt news of the late victory had occaſioned in that city. This odd train was followed by a company of lewd women, who with ſuitable ſongs ſtigmatized

(F) The words of Horace are:

Mileſne Craſſi conjuge barbara
Turpis maritus vixit? & hoſtium
(Proh Curia inverſique mores!)
Conſenuit ſocerorum in armis
Sub rege Medo Marſus & Appulus,
Anciliorum, nominis, & togæ
Oblitus, æternæque Veſtæ, Incolumi Jove & urbe Roma (19)?

(19) Horat. carm. l. iii. od. 5.

matized the memory and character of Craſſus. When the ſhew was over, Surenas produced, in the preſence of the ſenate of Seleucia, a collection of laſcivious tales, then known by the title of the Mileſian fables, which a Parthian ſoldier had found in rifling the baggage of a young Roman, whom Plutarch calls Ruſtius. The general took occaſion from thence to inveigh againſt the debauchery of the Romans, who put ſuch infamous books into the hands of their youth, and corrupted their minds with lewd fables, inſtead of forming their bodies for the exerciſe of war [q].

WHEN the battle of Carrhæ was fought, king Orodes was, as we have hinted above, in Armenia, where he had concluded a peace with Artabazes; for the king of Armenia, on the return of the expreſſes he had ſent to Craſſus, perceiving by the falſe meaſures he had taken, that the army under his command muſt have been infallibly loſt, had entered into a treaty of friendſhip with the Parthian, and cemented it by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Pacorus the ſon of Orodes. While the two kings were ſolemnizing their new alliance with expenſive and public feaſts, Styllaces or Syllaces, a Parthian officer, whom Surenas had ſent with the news of his late victory, and the head of Craſſus as a proof of it, arrived in the capitol of Armenia. The two kings were at table, and Jaſon, a tragedian of Trallis, was ſinging ſome ſongs out of the Bacchis of Euripides, when the meſſenger was introduced, and preſented Orodes with the head of Craſſus, ſaying, "Surenas ſends you the "head of the Roman general, who has been cut in pieces "with his whole army." The tranſports of joy which Orodes felt, at this ſight and theſe words, are not to be expreſſed. The lords of both kingdoms, who attended their ſovereigns, raiſed loud and repeated ſhouts of joy; and Syllaces was ordered to give a more particular and diſtinct account of that memorable action: which when he had done, Orodes commanded melted gold to be poured into Craſſus's mouth, reproaching him thereby with avarice, which had been always his predominant paſſion [r].

The head of Craſſus ſent to Orodes.

SURENAS did not long enjoy the pleaſure of his victory; for Orodes, growing jealous of his glory and great authority among the Parthians, cauſed him to be put to death ſoon after [s], placing Pacorus, his favourite ſon, at the head of the army in his room. The young prince, agreeable to his Surenas put to death.

[q] Plut ibid. [r] Flor. l. iii. c. 11. Sext. Ruf. in brev. Dio. Caſs. l. xl. [s] Dio. Cass. ibid.

his father's directions, marched into Syria, which the Parthians expected to find without defence, after the late defeat of the Roman army; but Caſſius, the only general officer who ſurvived the defeat of Craſſus, meeting them on the frontiers, at the head of five hundred horſe, who had eſcaped with him out of Meſopotamia, and ſome Aſiatic levies, gave them ſo warm a reception, that they thought it adviſeable to retreat to their own territories, and there raiſe more forces for a ſecond invaſion. Accordingly they repaſſed the Euphrates, and, having ſpent the winter in making new preparations, early in the ſpring they croſſed the Euphrates anew, and re-entered Syria with a very numerous army, under the conduct of Orſaces, an old and experienced commander; for Pacorus the king's ſon, being then but fifteen years of age, had only the name of general. Orſaces reduced without oppoſition, ſuch places as lay in his way; and being maſter of all the country between the Euphrates and the city of Antioch, cloſely beſieged that Metropolis, Caſſius having ſhut himſelf up in it, as not having ſufficient forces to keep the field and make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy. In the mean time Cicero, to whom the province of Cilicia had been aſſigned, being informed by Antiochus king of Comagene, that Caſſius was beſieged in Antioch by the Parthians, and that the king of Armenia was ready to fall upon Cappadocia, drew together what forces he could, and with them marched to the eaſtern borders of his province lying next to Armenia, with a deſign to prevent the Armenians from invading Cappadocia, and to be at the ſame time near at hand to aſſiſt Caſſius, in caſe the Parthians ſhould purſue the ſiege of Antioch with vigour. He likewiſe ſent another body of troops to mount Amanus with the ſame view, which falling in with a great party of Parthian horſe, that had entered Cilicia through the ſtreights of that mountain, cut them off all to a man. The news of this defeat and of Cicero's approach to Antioch greatly encouraged Caſſius and his men to make a vigorous defence, and ſo diſheartened the Parthians, that, deſpairing to carry the place, they raiſed the ſiege, and marching to Antigonia, another city in that neighbourhood, attempted to reduce it; but as they were quite unacquainted with the manner of managing ſieges, their chief force conſiſting in cavalry, they were attended with no better ſucceſs there, and were ſoon obliged to retire. Caſſius, who was apprized of the rout they would take, drew them into an ambuſcade, in which great great numbers of them were cut off, with Orſaces their leader. Thoſe who had the good luck to eſcape repaſſed the Euphrates with Pacorus; but returned again with new forces towards the end of the ſummer, and wintered in Cyrrheſtica, a northern province of Syria [t].

The Parthians invade Syria.

But are driven out with great loſs by Cicero and Caſſius.

Return, and beſiege Antioch.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon was proper for action, the Parthians took the field, and marching to Antioch, beſieged that city a ſecond time, and M. Calpurnius Bibulus with all his forces in it; for the province of Syria had been allotted to him, and Caſſius, who had defended it before without any legal commiſſion, was now returned to Rome. As Bibulus was no warrior, he did not ſo much as make one ſally, but kept his troops within the walls, ſuffering the enemy to carry on their works without the leaſt moleſtation. He would not even acquaint Cicero, who was ſtill in Cilicia, with the danger he was in; nay, he was heard to ſay, that he had rather be reduced to the utmoſt extremity, than ſeem to ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance. However, his lieutenants wrote both to Cicero and to Thermus prætor of Aſia, ſoliciting them to haſten to their relief; but, before their arrival, Bibulus effected by craft what he dared not attempt by force; for having by his emiſſaries encouraged Ordonopantes, a nobleman of Parthia, who had been diſguſted by Orodes, to raiſe a rebellion in the heart of the kingdom, the army before Antioch was recalled to ſuppreſs it; by which means the ſiege of Antioch was raiſed, and all Syria delivered from the danger it was in of falling under the power of the Parthians [u].

The ſiege raiſed.

We find no further mention made of the Parthians from this time to the breaking out of the civil war between Cæſar and Pompey, when the latter ſent embaſſadors to ſolicit ſuccours from Orodes; which that prince was willing to grant on condition that Syria was delivered up to him; but Pompey refuſing to comply with his demand, he not only denied him the ſuccours he required, but, after the battle of Pharſalia, put in irons Lucius Hirtius, whom Pompey had ſent to him to implore his aſſiſtance anew, or at leaſt to obtain for him leave to ſhelter himſelf in the Parthian

[t] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 12. & de bell. Jud. l. i. c. 6. Dio. Caſs. l. xl. Plut. in Cicer. & Cic. ad familiar. l. iii. epiſt 2. & l. xv. epiſt. 1, 2, 3, 4. & l. v. ad Attic. epiſt. 18, 20

[u] Cic. ad famil. l. ii. epiſt. 17. & l. xii. epiſt. 19. & ad Attic. l. vi. epiſt. 6. l. vii. epiſt. 2. &c. Dio. Caſs. ibid.

thian dominions [w]. But, for all this, Cæsar had no sooner got the better of Pompey's party, and settled his affairs at Rome, than he began to make great preparations, with a design to invade Parthia and revenge the defeat and death of Crassus at Carrhæ; but when all things were ready for this expedition, Cæsar was killed, and the Parthians by his death delivered from a war, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to them [x]. Not long after, the eastern provinces being allotted to Marc Antony, in the famous partition of the Roman empire between him, Octavianus, and Lepidus, the cities of Syria, being grievously oppressed with the taxes Marc Antony laid on them, rose up in arms, and, having killed those who were sent to gather them invited the Parthians to their assistance, assuring them, that they were all to a man ready to join them and drive out the Romans. On this invitation the Parthians passed the Euphrates with a mighty army, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus, a Roman general of Pompey's party. He was the son of Titus Labienus, who had been Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul, and one of his chief favourites; but afterwards siding with Pompey, became one of his most inveterate enemies, and was slain fighting against him in the battle of Munda. His son, pursuing the same interest, had been sent by Brutus and Cassius, a little before the battle of Philippi, to beg succours of the Parthian king, which he was soliciting when that battle happened. The bad success which attended his friends on that occasion having discouraged him from returning, he continued in Parthia; and, having prevailed on Orodes to undertake this war, was sent with Pacorus to command under him [y]. On his entering Syria, he was met by Saxa, Antony's lieutenant, whom he overthrew in a pitched battle, obliging him to shelter himself in Cilicia. After this victory, having divided his army into two bodies, he marched with one after Saxa into Cilicia, where he killed him, over-ran all Asia Minor; and having obliged Plancus, Antony's other lieutenant in those parts, to fly to the islands, subjected all the places as far as the Hellespont and Ægean sea [z]. At the same time Pacorus, with the other part of the army, reduced all Syria and Phænice, as far as Tyre, which was the only city that held out against him, being defended by the Romans, who from

The Parthians invade Syria, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus.

Their conquests in Syria, Phœnice, and Asia Minor, &c.

[w] Dio. l. xli, xlii. [x] Plut. in Cæs. Appian. de bell. civil. l. ii. Dio, Cass. l. xlii. & xliii. [y] Dio. Cass. ibid. Eusеb. in chron. Appian. in Parthic. Plut. in Anton.
[z] Dio. Cass. ibid. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 5.

from all parts had flocked thither as to a place of refuge. Thus the Parthians made themſelves maſters of all Syria, Aſia Minor, and Phænice, except Tyre, and exerciſed their power even in Judæa, where they plundered Jeruſalem, drove Hycanus from the throne, and placed Antigonus on it in his room, in the manner we have related in the hiſtory of the Jews.

Ventidius ſent againſt them.

BUT they did not long enjoy their new conqueſts; for Antony, after his reconciliation with Octavianus, having ſent Ventidius, one of his lieutenants, againſt them, that general was attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Parthians were ſoon obliged to quit all they had taken and repaſs the Euphrates; for Ventidius managed matters with ſuch expedition, that, arriving in Aſia much ſooner than expected, he ſurprized Labienus before he was in a condition to withſtand him, having no Parthian troops with him, but only a few Roman deſerters and a ſmall body of raw and undiſciplined Aſiatics, gathered up in Syria, Phænice, and Aſia Minor; wherefore, not daring to ſtand the approach of a Roman army, he retired as faſt as Ventidius advanced, till he got to mount Taurus, where he encamped ſo advantageouſly, that he could not be forced to a battle, and then ſent to Pacorus for aſſiſtance. Pacorus ſent immediately the flower of his army to the relief of Labienus, Gains great advantages over them.

but the Parthians, deſpiſing the Romans on account of their late victories over them, engaged Ventidius before Labienus could join them, and were entirely defeated. The news of this defeat ſo diſheartened thoſe who were with Labienus, that they all abandoned him, every one ſhifting for himſelf in the beſt manner he could. Ventidius purſued them, ſlew ſome of them, and took the reſt into his ſervice. As for Labienus, he made his eſcape in a diſguiſe; but after having ſculked about for ſome time in Cilicia, from one hiding place to another, he was at

Labienus taken, and put to death

laſt diſcovered by Demetrius, governor of Cyprus, taken, and put to death [a]. After this victory, Ventidius, having made himſelf maſter of all Cilicia, marched to mount Amanus, which parted that province from Syria; and there met another army of Parthians, who, under the command of Pharnapates, one of Pacorus's lieutenants, had ſeized the paſſes leading into Syria, in order to obſtruct his further progreſs; but, Ventidius falling upon them, cut moſt of them them in pieces, killed their general, and having gained a second victory as considerable as the former, pursued his march, without any further opposition, into Syria. Hereupon Pacorus, having assembled all his forces, made what haste he could to the Euphrates, which he repassed, leaving the Romans masters of all the countries on this side of that river [b].

[a] Dio, l. xlviii. p. 380, 381. Appian. in Parthic.

ANTONY, who in the mean time was diverting himself with his new wife Octavia at Athens, being informed of the victories gained by Ventidius, made great rejoicings in that city; but hearing at the same time that Pacorus was making vast preparations for another invasion, he resolved to head his army in person, and not suffer his lieutenant to reap the whole glory of the war: wherefore early in the spring he left Athens with all his forces, and marched towards the east; but, before he got thither, Ventidius had gained a third victory over the Parthians, far more glorious than the other two. It was obtained in the following manner: Ventidius fearing left the Parthians, whose preparations were much advanced, should pass the Euphrates before he had time to draw all his troops together from their different quarters, had recourse to the following stratagem: there was a petty eastern prince in his camp, under the character of an ally, who was entirely addicted to the interest of the Parthians, with whom Ventidius well knew he kept a private correspondence, communicating to them all the intelligence he could get of the counsels and designs of the Romans. This man's treachery Ventidius resolved to improve to his own advantage; for taking the first opportunity that offered of conversing with him, and seeming to repose in him an entire confidence, he told him, that he had heard with much concern, that the Parthians did not design to pass the Euphrates at Zeugma, as usual, but to enter Syria another way, at a passage much below the former; for if they pass at Zeugma, said he, the country on this side of the Euphrates is so mountainous, that the cavalry, in which the whole force of their army consists, can do us no great hurt; but, in case they take the lower passage, the country being there all plain and level, they will have so great an advantage over us, that it will be impossible to make head against them. This conference was no sooner over, than the treacherous Chaunæus, for so he is called by Appian, conveyed a full account of it to the the Parthians, with whom it had the desired effect; for Pacorus, instead of keeping the road to Zeugma, took the other rout, and in that march lost forty days; during which time Ventidius being joined by Silo, Antony's lieutenant in Palestine, and by all the legions which were quartered on the other side of mount Taurus, found himself in a condition to give them a warm reception when they entered Syria. As they met with no opposition either in passing the river or advancing into Syria, they ascribed that inactivity to fear, and therefore, with great boldness, went directly to attack the Romans in their camp, on the top of a steep hill. This Ventidius expected, and therefore sallying out upon them at the head of his legionaries, as they were ascending the hill, easily put them in disorder, by the advantage of the ground, and pursued them with great slaughter into the plain, where they rallied and made a most vigorous resistance, the victory being doubtful, till Pacorus was killed, fighting with incredible bravery at the head of the Parthian horse. His death was followed by the flight of the whole army, every one striving to regain the bridge, in order to retire into their own country; but Ventidius with a strong detachment of horse, getting to the Euphrates before them, cut off their retreat; so that only a small number of them escaped by flight, and retired into the dominions of Antiochus king of Comagene; the rest was all put to the sword [c]. This victory which fully revenged the death of Crassus and the Romans who were killed with him, was gained on the same day of the year, on which, fourteen years before, the famous battle of Carrhæ was lost.

[b] Dio, Appian. ibid. Liv. epit. l. cxxvii. Flor. l. iv. c. 9. Plut. in Anton.

Pacorus killed, and his army entirely cut off by Ventidius.

Orodes, when he heard of the defeat of his army, and the death of his son, was so overwhelmed with grief, that, for some days, he abstained from all food, not being able to utter a single word the whole time; and when he recovered the use of his tongue, he acted and spoke in such manner, as plainly shewed, that sorrow had got the better of his reason; for nothing was heard from him but the name of Pacorus, his dear Pacorus; sometimes he talked to him as if he had been present, commended his gallant behaviour, and launched out on the happiness of a father who was blessed with such a son. At other times, remembering that he was was dead, he burſt into a flood of tears, and was ready to lay violent hands on himſelf: And indeed never was grief more juſt; for this was the moſt terrible blow the Parthian monarchy had ever received, and the loſs of the young prince was as great as that of the army, he being commended by all the antients as the moſt worthy perſon for juſtice, clemency, valour, and all other princely qualities, that the royal family of Arſaces ever produced. He ſo endeared himſelf to the Syrians, during the ſhort time he lived among them, that they never expreſſed more affection for any of their native ſovereigns, than they did for him, tho' deſcended from a family, which had brought many calamities on their country [d].

[c] Liv. l. cxxviii. Flor. iv. c. 9. Strabo, l. xvi. p. 751. Vell. Patercul ii. c. 78. Joseph. l. xiv. c. 27. A. Gell. l. xv. c. 4. Justin. l. ii. c. 4. Plut. in Anton. Frontin. stratagem. l. i. c. 1. & l. ii. c. 2. Dion, l. xlix.

HAD Ventidius purſued the advantages of this victory, he might have driven the Parthians quite out of Meſopotamia and Babylonia, and extended the boundaries of the Roman empire to the Tigris; but, as he was afraid of giving umbrage to Antony, with whoſe jealous temper he was well acquainted, he contented himſelf with reducing thoſe places in Syria and Phœnice, which had revolted from the Romans in the late war. Purſuant to this plan, he was with his whole army in Comagene, making war upon Antiochus king of that country, for ſiding with the Parthians, when Antony arriving took the command of the army upon himſelf and diſmiſſed Ventidius. His pretence for this was, that Ventidius deſerved a triumph, and ought to go to Rome to aſk it of the ſenate; but the true motive that prompted him to act in this manner was, that he envied him the great glory he had acquired, and the reputation he was in with the army; for Antony was one of thoſe, who cannot bear to be ſerved by perſons of ſuch talents as are capable of eclipſing their own; he was therefore glad to get rid of him, and never employed him afterwards, tho' he often ſtood in need of ſo able and experienced a general. Ventidius, on his return to Rome, was received there with all poſſible marks of honour, and granted a triumph, with the general applauſe of the whole city. In his triumph two very remarkable circumſtances concurred; the one, that he was the only Roman who ever triumphed over the Parthians, no one having, either before or after him, attained to that honour. The other circumſtance, no leſs remarkable, was, that he triumphed after having been led in triumph himſelf; for, in the ſocial war, being made a captive at the taking Aſculum, Antony diſmiſſes Ventidius, and takes the command of the army on himſelf.

Ventidius obtains a triumph.

[d] Juſtin. l. xlii. c. 4.

lum, the chief city of Picenum, by Strabo the father of Pompey the Great, he was, with his father and mother, who carried him in her arms, led before the triumphal chariot of that general. Afterwards his family being brought to poverty by the ruin of their city, he was obliged, when grown up, to betake himſelf to a mean and ſordid employment for his livelihood; for at firſt he was only a muleteer, and being uſed to provide mules to carry the baggage of ſuch Roman magiſtrates as were ſent to govern foreign provinces, Cæſar employed him in this capacity when he firſt went into Gaul; and having on that occaſion obſerved in him a great quickneſs of apprehenſion and activity, took him with him into his province, and put him in the way of riſing to great preferments; for he firſt gave him a ſmall command in the army, from which he raiſed himſelf, by his diſtinguiſhed merit, through all the ſtations of the camp to the higheſt poſt in the army, and became one of Cæſar's chief generals in all the wars he waged afterwards. Upon his death he ſided with Antony, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Mutina and Peruſia, and was at laſt ſent as Antony's lieutenant into the eaſt, where he gained the victories over the Parthians which we have mentioned [e].

In the mean time Orodes, being in ſome degree recovered from the diſtraction of mind, which the death of his ſon Pacorus had occaſioned, appointed Phrahates the eldeſt, but the moſt wicked, of all his children, to ſucceed him in the throne, admitting him at the ſame time to ſhare the regal power with himſelf. Phrahates no ſooner ſaw himſelf veſted with the ſovereign authority, than he cauſed all his brothers by the daughter of Antiochus Euſebes, king of Syria, to be put to death, for no other reaſon, but becauſe they were of a more noble deſcent than himſelf. As this was highly reſented by his father, he attempted to put him to death alſo, by giving him a potion of the poiſonous juice of hemlock; but that proving only a medicine againſt the dropſy, which grief had brought upon the king, the cruel and unnatural ſon cauſed him to be ſtifled in his bed, and ſoon after diſpatched all his brothers, who were thirty in number. The ſame cruelty he exerciſed over the nobility and all the reſt of the royal family, not ſparing his eldeſt ſon, leſt the diſcontented Parthians ſhould place him, as he was already of age, on the throne. Hereupon many of the chief lords of Orodes barbarouſly murdered by his ſon Phrahates.

[e] Plut. Appian. Dion Caſs. ibid, A. Gell. l. xv. c. 4. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 63. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9. Plin. l. vii. c. 43.

of Parthia, quitting their own country, took refuge in Syria, under the protection of Antony. Among these was one Monæses, a man of great distinction, who having gained the confidence of Antony, prevailed upon him to engage in a war with the Parthians his countrymen [f].

Antony undertakes a war against the Parthians. Year of the flood 2963. Before Christ 36.

As Antony had, by means of his lieutenant Publius Canidius, reduced the Armenians, Albanians, and Iberians, and carried his victorious arms as far as mount Caucasus, he was easily persuaded to embarque in a war, which he had long designed, all the Romans, who served under him, earnestly pressing him to revenge the death of Crassus and their countrymen, who had perished with him at Carrhæ. Accordingly he began to make vast preparations for so great an undertaking; and as he formed all his schemes for the carrying of it on by the advice of Monæses, in order to attach him the more to his service, he allowed him the revenues of three cities for his maintenance, imitating therein the generosity of Xerxes towards Themistocles; and moreover promised to place him on the throne of Parthia, on his conquering that country. But in the mean time Phrahates, dreading the advantage which the enemy might draw from the advice of so wise and able a counsellor, who was well acquainted with the country, sent a solemn embassy to invite him home, on such terms as the banished Parthian thought fit to accept. This greatly provoked Antony; but nevertheless he did not think it adviseable to use any violence with him, for fear of discouraging others from revolting: he therefore dismissed him with great civility, and sent embassadors with him to Phrahates to treat of a peace, hoping by that means to divert him from making the necessary preparations for a war, and to fall upon him before he was in a condition to withstand him; but herein he was greatly disappointed, for, on his arrival at the Euphrates, which he intended to pass and enter the Parthian dominions on that side, he found all the passes so well guarded on the other bank, that he thought it adviseable to march off to the left, with a design to reduce Media, and from thence invade Parthia. This plan had been suggested to him before by Artabazes king of Armenia, who, falling out with Artavasdes king of Media, had pressed Antony to take that rout, with no other view but to distress the Median his rival. Antony had rejected it when first proposed, intending to invade the Parthian dominions by the nearest cut over Invades Media.

[f] Justin. l. xlii. c. 4. Dio. Cass. l. xlix. Plut. in Cr[illegible]

over the Euphrates; but not succeeding in that, he fell in with the proposal of the Armenian, who in the end betrayed him; for, instead of conducting him the streight way from Zeugma on the Euphrates to the river Araxes, which parted Media from Armenia, and was about 500 miles distance from the place whence he first set out, he led him over rocks and mountains so far about, that the army had marched a thousand miles and upwards, before they reached the borders of Media [g], where they intended to begin the war; so that they were not only greatly fatigued, but had not sufficient time, the year being already far spent, to put in execution the design on which they were come. However, as Antony was in great haste to get back to Cleopatra, he left behind him most of the baggage of the army, and three hundred waggons loaded with battering rams and other military engines for sieges, ordering Statianus, one of his lieutenants, with a body of ten thousand men, to guard them, and bring them by slower marches after the army. With the rest of the forces he hastened forward, and marched three hundred miles more, without allowing his men any respite, till he arrived at Praaspa, or as others call it, Phraata, the capital of Media, which he immediately invested; but, as the place was well fortified, he was soon made sensible of his mistake in leaving behind him his battering rams and other military engines; for without them he could make no progress in the siege: and when the Median and Parthian forces came up with him, they did not think it worth their while to attack him, but pursued their march, with a design to prevent Statianus from joining him with the heavy carriages, without which they well knew, he could never make himself master of the city. Statianus did not expect them, and therefore, being attacked before he had time to draw up his men, was cut off, with the whole body under his command, which amounted to ten thousand men. All the baggage and military engines were taken, and among the rest a battering ram eighty foot long. Polemo, king of Pontus, was made prisoner, and with him a few Romans, to whom the Parthians gave quarter in the end of the slaughter; but all the rest were put to the sword [h].

His long and fatiguing march.

Besieges Phraata.

Statianus cut off, with ten thousand Romans.

STATIANUS, on his first discovering the enemy, had dispatched an express to Antony, who made all the haste he [g] Dio. Cass. & Plut. ibid. Strabo, l. xi. & xvi. [h] Strabo, l. xi. p. 523. Dion Cass. p. 407. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 82. Plut. in Anton.

he could to his aſſiſtance; but nevertheleſs came too late, and found, on his arrival, Statianus and all his men dead on the field of battle: but as no enemy appeared, he took courage, imagining they had fled at his approach, and returned to the ſiege, where he was daily haraſſed by the garriſon within, and by the enemy's army without. If he ſent out ſmall parties to forage, they were generally cut off by the Parthian cavalry; and if he detached large bodies, thoſe who remained were not able to ſtand the repeated ſallies of the numerous garriſon. To obviate theſe inconveniences, Antony attempted to draw the enemy to a general engagement, and twice ſucceeded therein, but without reaping from thence any advantage; for tho' he put the enemy to flight in both engagements, yet the loſs they ſuſtained was very inconſiderable, the Parthians preventing, by the ſwiftneſs of their horſes, the evil conſequences which generally attend ſuch defeats. In the laſt he thought his victory complete, and purſued it to the utmoſt; but in the end found that he had killed only eighty of the enemies men, and taken thirty priſoners during the whole action. However, he continued before Phraata till his proviſions were near ſpent, and the forage round the country quite conſumed; when he began to think of a retreat, ſeeing he had loſt all hopes of making himſelf maſter of the beſieged city; but as he was to march three hundred miles through the enemy's country, for at that diſtance Phraata lay from the borders of Armenia, before he raiſed the ſiege, he ſent embaſſadors to Phrahates to acquaint him, that the Roman people was willing to grant him a laſting peace, provided he would return the ſtandards and priſoners taken at Carrhæ. Phrahates received the embaſſadors ſitting on a golden throne, and after having bitterly inveighed againſt the avarice and unbounded ambition of the Romans, told them, that he would not by any means part with the ſtandards and captives taken at Carrhæ, but would allow Antony to retire unmoleſted, provided he withdrew immediately from before Phraata. Antony who was reduced to great ſtreights, no ſooner received this anſwer, than he raiſed the ſiege, and began his march towards Armenia, hoping that Phrahates would be as good as his word; but he was therein greatly diſappointed, for the Parthian army haraſſed him the whole way, and fell upon him eighteen times with all their forces, before he reached the Araxes, which was the boundary of the Median territories. 'Tis true, he always repulſed repulſed them, but not without great loſs on his ſide; whereas that of the Parthians, as being all horſemen, was very inconſiderable, by reaſon of their quick retreats. The Romans were very fortunate in their guide, who being a native of Mardia, a country bordering on Media and Armenia, was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, and conducted them with great fidelity. However, the army was thrice in imminent danger of being entirely cut off by ambuſcades, which they could not poſſibly have eſcaped, had they not received notice of them from the enemy's quarters. Monæſes twice forewarned Antony of them by a meſſenger ſent to him for that purpoſe, in return for the kindneſs ſhewn him during his baniſhment. The other time he had his intelligence from an old Roman ſoldier, who had continued among the Parthians ever ſince the battle of Carrhæ, and came to the Roman camp to acquaint his countrymen with the danger. This painful march laſted twenty-ſeven days, during which time they were not only inceſſantly haraſſed by the Parthian arrows, but greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, the parties that went out to forage being generally cut off, and their beaſts of burden either dead, or employed in carrying the ſick and wounded. A quart of wheat was ſold in the camp for fifty drachmas, and barley-loaves for their weight in ſilver. At laſt they were reduced to live upon ſuch roots and herbs as they found in the fields, which occaſioned many diſtempers among them. When the famine firſt began to rage in the camp, ſome to avoid it fled to the enemy, but were by the Parthians cruelly murdered in the ſight of the reſt; which put a ſtop to their deſerting, and proved very advantageous to Antony, who would have been left alone, had the enemy treated kindly ſuch as took refuge with them. Antony ſeeing his men dying every day in great numbers, was often heard to cry out, O, the ten thouſand!

Antony raiſes the ſiege of Phraata.

Haraſſed by the Parthians in his retreat.

Reduced to great ſtreights.

admiring the conduct of Xenophon, who marched a far longer way through the enemy's country, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, led his men ſafe home. At length the army began to mutiny, and falling upon thoſe who had any gold or ſilver, plundered and murdered them, rifled Antony's baggage, ſeized on his money and plate, and committed many other diſorders. Hereupon the general, quite diſheartened, retired to his tent, and calling one of his freed-men, ordered him to kill him, and after his death to cut off his head and conceal it, leſt it ſhould fall into the enemy's hands, and be inſulted as that of Craſſus had been; but the Mardian guide, coming in-

to

to his tent in the mean time, prevailed upon him to forbear uſing any violence on himſelf, by aſſuring him, that the worſt of the march was over, and that he was at a ſmall diſtance from the river Araxes, beyond which the Parthians would not purſue him. Accordingly he arrived a few days after at that river, and croſſed it, without being diſturbed in the leaſt by the enemy. The ſoldiers ſeeing themſelves at length out of the enemy's reach and in a place of ſafety, fell down on the ground, and kiſſed it, embracing one another with tears of joy [h].

ANTONY committed, without all doubt, many miſtakes in the management of this war, but none in his retreat; for all the antients do him the juſtice to own, that he conducted it with as much art and ſucceſs as it was capable of. He loſt indeed a great many men; for on his reviewing his forces after he had paſſed the Araxes, he found twenty thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe miſſing; but the greater part of theſe had periſhed by the hardſhips of the campaign, and very few by the enemy's ſwords. The greateſt error he committed in this fatal undertaking, was his obſtinately purſuing his march, after he had, with the utmoſt difficulty, got back into Armenia; for inſtead of putting the remainder of his army into winter quarters, and allowing them time to refreſh themſelves after ſo long and fatiguing a march, as he was in haſte to get back to Cleopatra, he continued his march, tho' winter was far advanced, through Armenia, which was then covered with ſnow, and, in that mountainous country, loſt eight thouſand more of his men, who periſhed by reaſon of the hard ſeaſon and exceſſive cold; ſo that according to the moſt moderate calculation, he loſt in all two-and-thirty thouſand men [i]. Florus tells us [k], that he did not bring back the third part of his army, which, at his firſt ſetting out on this deſtructive undertaking, conſiſted of an hundred thouſand men. He was not indeed overcome in battle, as Craſſus had been; but, if we compare the loſſes of both generals, we ſhall find Antony's expedition to have been the moſt unfortunate of the two; and yet, on his return into Egypt, he had the confidence to aſſume ſuch honours as were due only to conquerors.

His great loſs.

ANTONY was ſcarce returned from this expedition, when the kings of Media and Parthia, falling out about the booty

[h] Plut. Dio, Caſs. Juſtin. Flor. ibid. [i] Plut. & Dio. Caſs. ibid. [k] Flor. l. iv. c. 10.

they had taken on the defeat of Statianus, the former ſent an embaſſy to him, offering to join him with all his forces againſt the latter. Antony accepted this offer with great joy, the more becauſe he was informed at the ſame time, that the Parthians, not able to endure the tyranny and cruelty of their king, had taken up arms againſt him, and were greatly divided among themſelves. Theſe circumſtances offered him a favourable opportunity of making amends, by a new expedition, for the miſcarriages of the former. Accordingly he reſolved to lay hold of it, and leaving Egypt haſtened into Syria, there to make the neceſſary preparations for a ſecond invaſion: but Cleopatra feigning that his abſence had thrown her into a languiſhing diſtemper, and that ſhe could not live without him, he was ſo infatuated as to believe her, and, giving over all thoughts of revenging his late loſſes, to drop the enterprize and return to the embraces of his beloved queen [k]. However, he ſent ſuch a body of Romans to the aſſiſtance of Artavaſdes, king of Media, as enabled him to gain a complete victory over Phrahates king of Parthia; but the enſuing year a war breaking out between Antony and Octavianus, the former not only recalled the troops he had ſent to the aſſiſtance of Artavaſdes, but alſo retained thoſe which Artavaſdes had ſent him in their room; by which means the king of Media was entirely defeated in a ſecond battle, and taken priſoner by Phrahates, who purſuing his victory, reduced all Media and likewiſe Armenia, reſtoring to that throne Artaxias the ſon of Artabazes, who had been driven from it by Antony, as we have related in the hiſtory of Armenia.

Reſolves on a ſecond expedition againſt the Parthians; but is diverted from it by Cleopatra.

Media reduced by Phrahates.

Civil diſſenſions among the Parthians.

PHRAHATES, elated with this ſucceſs, began to oppreſs his ſubjects in a moſt cruel and tyrannical manner, whereupon the Parthian nobility, conſpiring againſt him, drove him from the throne, and placed on it in his room Tiridates, one of their own body; but the next year Phrahates returned into Parthia at the head of a numerous army, and, having overcome his rival, in a pitched battle, recovered his crown. Tiridates took refuge in Syria, where Octavianus found him after the death of Antony, and was warmly ſolicited by him to lend him his aſſiſtance againſt Phrahates. At the ſame time embaſſadors arrived from Phrahates on the ſame errand. Octavianus received them both in a very friendly manner, without intending to help either, but rather to egg them on againſt each other with fair fair promiſes, and by that means to waſte and weaken the power and ſtrength of that formidable empire. With this view he gave Tiridates leave to continue in Syria, till he ſhould be in a condition to make head againſt his rival, accepting from him a ſon of Phrahates, who had fallen into his hands. This ſon he carried with him to Rome, where he kept him as an hoſtage [l]. Not long after, Tiridates returned into Parthia and drove out Phrahates; but was ſoon driven out by him again in his turn. Phrahates was aſſiſted by the Scythians, who not only reinſtated him in his kingdom, but ſupported him in it with a mighty army. Hereupon Tiridates, with the leading men of his party, fled to Rome, to implore the aſſiſtance and protection of Auguſtus, promiſing to hold the kingdom of him, provided he was reſtored to it by his means. Phrahates hearing he had fled to Rome, diſpatched embaſſadors thither after him, to obviate his deſigns, and to demand of Auguſtus the delivery of his rebellious ſubjects and the releaſe of his ſon, whom Tiridates had put into his hands. Auguſtus received Tiridates, as well as the embaſſadors, with particular marks of eſteem; but anſwered, that he would not deliver Tiridates into the hands of Phrahates, nor lend either of them aſſiſtance againſt the other. However, to gratify both in ſomething, he gave Tiridates leave to continue at Rome, ordering him, out of the publick treaſury, a maintenance ſuitable to his rank; and ſent back Phrahates his ſon, on his promiſing to reſtore the captives and ſtandards that had been taken from Craſſus and Antony [m]. This Phrahates then promiſed to do, but could not prevail upon himſelf to perform, till the coming of Auguſtus into Syria, which happened three years after; when, dreading a foreign war, as he was greatly hated by his ſubjects on account of his cruelty, he ſent embaſſadors to him, to conclude an alliance with the people of Rome; and on this occaſion it was that he ſent back all the captives and enſigns, which the Parthians had taken in their wars with Craſſus and Antony. At the ſame time he agreed to ſuch terms of peace as Auguſtus thought fit to propoſe, and gave four of his ſons, with their wives and children, as hoſtages for the performance of them [n]. The Phrahates reſtores to Auguſtus the enſigns and priſoners taken from Craſſus and Antony.

[k] Plut. in Anton. Dion Caſs. l. xlix. p. 411.

[l] Dion Caſs. l. li. p. 456. Plut. ibid. Juſtin. l. xlii. c. 5.
[m] Juſtin. ibid. Dion Caſs. l. liii. [n] Liv. l. cxxxix. Flor. l. iv. c. ult. Strabo, l. ii. p. 288. & l. xvi. p. 748. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 91. Juſtin. l. xlii. c. ult. Dio, l. liv. p. 522. Eutrop. l. vii. Oros. l. vi. c. 21.

enſigns Auguſtus cauſed to be hung up in a temple, which he built and conſecrated to Mars twice the revenger, and appointed Circenſian ſports to be annually ſolemnized in memory of his victory at Philippi, (for before that battle he had vowed the temple to Mars) and of his recovering the Roman enſigns from the Parthians [o]. Juſtin obſerves here [p], that Auguſtus did more by the greatneſs of his name, than any other could have done by a long and expenſive war; but Tacitus [q] tells us, that Phrahates, was induced to comply with the demands of Auguſtus, not for fear of him, but becauſe he diſtruſted his own ſubjects. Strabo [r] and Joſephus [s], agreeing with Tacitus, relate the matter in the following manner: A very beautiful Italian woman, by name Thermuſa, having been formerly ſent by Auguſtus to Phrahates as a preſent, the king kept her at firſt as his concubine; but afterwards, on her bringing him a ſon, married her and declared her queen. In this ſtation ſhe gained an abſolute aſcendant over him, which ſhe made uſe of to ſecure the ſucceſſion to her ſon. With this view ſhe propoſed to Phrahates the delivering up of his other ſons, who were four in all, to the Romans; and he readily came into the propoſal, as not thinking himſelf ſafe againſt his diſcontented ſubjects, ſo long as there were any of the royal race of Arſaces of an age fit to govern. On this conſideration, when hoſtages were demanded by Auguſtus, for ſecuring the terms of their agreement, he delivered up to him his four ſons, Saraſpades, Ceroſpades, Phrahates, and Vonones, two of their wives, and four of their ſons. Theſe were all carried to Rome, where they remained many years; but Thermuſa's ſon, by name Phraatices, was bred up at home, and appointed to ſucceed his father. The Parthians were ſo ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to the family of Arſaces, that Phrahates well knew they could bear with him, notwithſtanding their hatred to him, as long as they had no other of the ſame race to ſet up in his room; and therefore, not for fear of Auguſtus, but for his own ſafety readily yielded up to him his four ſons, who, being of an age to govern, gave him no ſmall jealouſy. But what he thus projected for his ſafety, proved at laſt his ruin; for as ſoon as Phraatices was of age, Thermuſa, impatient to ſee him on the throne, poiſoned her huſband, to make room for Phraatices.

[o] Vide Ovid. faſt. l. v. & Horat. l. iv. od. ult. [p] Juſtin. l. xlii. c. 5. [q] Tacit. annal. l. ii. c. 1. [r] Strabo, l. vi. p. 288. [s] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 3.

for him the ſooner [t]. But he was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when the Parthians, diſdaining to be governed by ſo wicked a parricide, roſe up in arms, and drove him from it into baniſhment, where he periſhed ſome years after [u]. In his room they placed one Orodes, who was of the royal family of Arſaces, but generally hated on account of his cruel and ſavage temper. However, they preferred him to the ſons of Phraatices, who, by their father, were deſcended from the Italian concubine Thermuſa; but not being able to bear his unheard of cruelties, they killed him ſoon after at a banquet [w]. Upon his death they diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome, entreating Auguſtus to ſend one of the ſons of Phrahates to rule over them. The emperor readily granted them Vonones, who was received at firſt with great demonſtrations of joy; but, as he betrayed a great inclination to the Romans and affected their dreſs and manners, the Parthians grew ſoon weary of their new king, and diſdaining to obey, as they expreſſed it, a Roman ſlave, had recourſe to Artabanus king of Media, who was likewiſe of the race of Arſaces, inviting him to take poſſeſſion of the crown of Parthia. Artabanus willingly complied with their requeſt; but being met on the frontiers by Vonones, was by him defeated, tho' he had a conſiderable army with him, and obliged to fly back into Media, where he raiſed new forces, and in a ſecond engagement obtained a complete victory over Vonones, who took ſhelter in Armenia, where he was kindly received, and entertained by ſome of the chief lords of that country. But Artabanus threatening to invade Armenia, Vonones thought fit to retire from thence, after having ſolicited in vain the aſſiſtance of Tiberius, by a ſolemn embaſſy ſent to Rome for that purpoſe. From Armenia the unhappy prince withd w into Syria, and there delivered himſelf up to Creticus Silanus governor of that province, who, in regard he had been brought up at Rome, ſuffered him to live at Antioch, with the pomp and title of a king. He was afterwards removed by Germanicus from Antioch to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia, whence he made his eſcape, tho' kept under a ſtrict guard; but being ſoon after retaken, he was killed by one Remmius a Roman ſoldier [x]. Germanicus had removed him from Anti-

Orodes II.

Vonones.

Artabanus.

[t] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 749. Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 3. [u] Joſeph. ibid. [w] Idem ibid. [x] Suet. in Tiber. & Oct. c. 21. Joſeph. ibid. Tacit, annal. l. ii. c. 2 & 4.

och to Pompeiopolis at the requeſt of Artabanus, and alſo becauſe he was in high favour with Cneius Piſo, to whoſe wife Plancina he made rich preſents, having brought with him into Syria immenſe treaſures [y].

ARTABANUS, having now no competitor to contend with, began to treat his ſubjects with great cruelty, whereupon ſome Parthian lords, among whom were Sinnaces a man of great power and credit, and an eunuch named Abdus, entering into a plot againſt him, ſent privately to Rome for Phrahates, the ſon of king Phrahates, who, as we have related above, had been delivered by his father to Auguſtus as a hoſtage. The deputies repreſented, that the Parthians were ready to revolt; that they wanted only a leader; that a deſcendant of Arſaces, ſupported by Rome and ſeen on the banks of the Euphrates, would occaſion an immediate and general inſurrection. Tiberius, who had ſucceeded Auguſtus, was glad of ſo favourable an opportunity of raiſing new diſturbances in Parthia; for Artabanus, elated with the ſucceſs that had attended him in his wars with the neighbouring nations, had not only ſeized on Armenia, and appointed his eldeſt ſon Arſaces king of that country, but ſent a proud meſſage to the governor of Syria, demanding the treaſures which Vonones had left there and in Cilicia, and claimed all the countries which had been poſſeſſed by Cyrus, and ſince by Alexander. Tiberius therefore, overjoyed at the thoughts of humbling the haughty Parthian, immediately diſpatched Phrahates to recover his father's kingdom; but that prince arriving in Syria, and there diſuſing the Roman way of living, to which he had been many years accuſtomed, and reſuming the Parthian cuſtoms, was ſeized, on that ſudden change, with a violent diſtemper, which put an end to his life. At the ſame time the plot was diſcovered, and the chief promoters of it either privately put to death, for Artabanus was afraid to uſe open violence, or ſo narrowly watched, that they could not meet, without being obſerved, to conſult together about the neceſſary meaſures. However, Tiberius did not abandon the enterprize; but putting Tiridates, another prince of the royal family of Parthia, in the room of Phrahates, wrote to Mithridates Iberus, requeſting him to invade Armenia with his brother Pharaſmanes king of Iberia, and by that means to draw Artabanus out of his own kingdom.

[y] Tacit. ibid.

dom. Mithridates, purſuant to the directions of Tiberius, entered Armenia, at the head of a numerous army of Iberians, and made himſelf maſter of Artaxata, the metropolis of that kingdom. At the ſame time his brother Pharaſmanes, having recourſe to treachery, ſuborned ſome of the ſervants of Arſaces to murder him. Artabanus no ſooner heard of the invaſion of Armenia and the death of his ſon, but he diſpatched his other ſon Orodes, with a mighty army, againſt the enemy, and at the ſame time ſent to hire auxiliaries in Sarmatia and the neighbouring countries. Pharaſmanes, on the other hand, having joined the Albanian forces to his own, and receiving great ſupplies from Sarmatia, marched to the aſſiſtance of his brother, and meeting with Orodes, offered him battle; which he declining, Pharaſmanes, beſieged him in his camp, and reduced him to ſuch ſtreights, that he was obliged at laſt to put all to the iſſue of an engagement, which proved very bloody, the Parthians behaving with their uſual bravery. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end Pharaſmanes, having attacked and wounded Orodes, and report being thereon ſpread through the Parthian army that he was killed, the Parthians retired in diſorder, and left Pharaſmanes maſter of the field. This victory was attended with the conqueſt of Armenia, which Pharaſmanes over-ran without oppoſition, the Parthians flying every where before him. In the mean time, Artabanus, having raiſed another army, marched in perſon againſt the united forces of Mithridates and Pharaſmanes; but was attended with no better ſucceſs than his ſon Orodes, his army being entirely defeated, and himſelf obliged to abandon his kingdom, and take refuge among the Carmanians and Hyrcanians [z]. Artabanus driven from the throne.

UPON the retreat of Artabanus, Lucius Vitellius governor of Syria, advanced with his legions to the banks of the Euphrates; and having croſſed that river on a bridge of boats, cauſed Tiridates, whom he had brought with him, to be proclaimed king of Parthia. The new king was immediately joined by a great many Parthian lords, among whom were Ornoſpades, Sinnaces, and Abdageſes. Ornoſpades, brought with him a ſtrong body of horſe, and Abdageſes all the enſigns of royalty, which had been committed Tiridates.

to

[z] Tacit. annal. l. vi. c. 36. Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 6.

to his care. When Vitellius found the Parthians incline to receive Tiridates, thinking it enough to have countenanced them, he repaſſed the Euphrates with his legions and retired into Syria. He was no ſoner gone, than Phrahates and Hiero, two men of great power and authority among the Parthians, out of envy to Abdageſes, who governed the new king and his whole court, returned to their old allegiance, and recalled Artabanus, who was, at his firſt appearing, joined by all thoſe who hated Abdageſes. The Scythians likewiſe, the Dahæ and the Sacæ, declared in his favour, and ſent him powerful ſupplies; ſo that he was ſoon in a condition to take the field; which he did accordingly, at the head of a very numerous and well-diſciplined army. Tiridates, who had ſpent his whole time in beſieging a fortreſs, whither Artabanus, had conveyed his treaſures and concubines, did not think it adviſeable to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle; and therefore retired into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to recruit his army in the country of the Elymæans and Armenians, and then try the fortune of a battle; but in his march he was abandoned by the greateſt part of his troops, who either retired home, or fled to Artabanus; inſomuch that not thinking himſelf any longer ſafe within the Parthian dominions, he retired into Syria, leaving his competitor in quiet poſſeſſion of the crown [a]. But it was not long ere new diſturbances obliged him to quit the kingdom a ſecond time. The nobility, not being able to bear his cruelties and haughty behaviour, conſpired anew againſt him, and taking up arms, obliged him to ſhelter himſelf in the dominions of Izates king of the Adiabenians, who not only received and entertained him in a manner ſuitable to his rank, but, by his kind offices, prevailed upon the Parthian nobility to receive him again, after he had, by a ſolemn oath, promiſed to forgive all thoſe who had taken up arms againſt him. The Parthians had placed one Cinnamus on the throne in his room, who was by the ſame Izates perſuaded to reſign, of his own accord, the regal power and authority to the baniſhed prince. Artabanus, being thus reſtored to his kingdom by the mediation of Izates, in acknowledgment of the favours he had received at his hands, beſtowed on him the rich country of Niſibis, and allowed him to wear a ſtrait tiara, and to lie in a golden bed; which were privileges peculiar to the kings Artabanus reſtored.

[a] Tacit. ibid. c. 41, 42, 43, 44. Joſeph. ibid. c. 6. Dion Caſſ. l. lviii. p. 537. Suet. in Tiqer. 66.

kings of Parthia [b]. From this time he governed with great equity and moderation, and, after a reign of thirty years, died greatly lamented by all his ſubjects, leaving behind him ſeven ſons, viz. Darius, Bardanes, Gotarzes, Orodes, Vologeſes, Pacorus, and Tiridates. By his laſt will he appointed Bardanes to ſucceed him, who, forgetful of the obligations his family owed to Izates, made war upon him, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he refuſed to join him againſt the Romans. His monſtrous ingratitude, towards a prince who had ſo well deſerved of the Parthian nation, was highly reſented by the chief lords of his kingdom, who taking up arms againſt him, killed him, and raiſed his brother Gotarzes to the throne [c]. This is the account which Joſephus [d] gives, in a few words, of the acceſſion to the crown, and reigns of Bardanes and Gotarzes; but Tacitus, diſagreeing with that writer, relates the matter in a quite different manner [e]. According to him, Gotarzes and Bardanes were not the ſons, but the brothers of Artabanus, who was ſucceeded by Gotarzes, a moſt cruel prince, and therefore ſo hated by his ſubjects, that they called Bardanes to the throne. Bardanes, as he was a man of great reſolution and activity, marched in two days three thouſand furlongs, and arriving at Cteſiphon, ſurprized and drove Gotarzes from the throne. With the ſame expedition he overran the chief provinces of the Parthian empire, and was every-where received with loud acclamations. Seleucia was the only city that refuſed to ſubmit to him, which he cloſely beſieged; but while he was waſting his time before that place, Gotarzes unexpectedly arrived at the head of a numerous army of Dahans and Hyrcanians, which obliged Bardanes to raiſe the ſiege, and retire to the plains of Bactria, where he encamped with a deſign to venture a battle in the open fields. Gotarzes followed him; but while the two armies were ready to engage, Gotarzes received private intelligence of a conſpiracy formed by the chief men of the kingdom againſt himſelf, and alſo his brother, to whom he immediately imparted it. Hereupon the two competitors had an interview, in which, tho' at firſt diſtruſting each other, they were at laſt thoroughly reconciled, both of them ſwearing on the altars not to moleſt one another, but to turn their arms againſt their common Bardanes.

Gotarzes.

Gotarzes driven out by Bardanes.

[b] Joſeph. ibid. [c] Idem ibid. Zonar. l. iii. Philoſtrat. l. i. & iii. de vita Apollon. [d] Joſeph. ibid. [e] Tacit. annal. l. xi. c. 8.

Gotarzes resigns the crown to his brother Bardanes.

mon enemies; nay, Gotarzes, judging Bardanes more worthy of the crown than himself, an instance of equity and moderation seldom to be met with, resigned it to him; and, in order to remove all ground of jealousy, retired into the most remote parts of Hyrcania. Bardanes leaving Bactria, returned to the siege of Seleucia, which voluntarily submitted to him, after he had attempted in vain to reduce it by force. Being now sole master of the whole Parthian empire, he formed a design of recovering Armenia; but Vibius Marsus, or, as we read in Josephus, Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, threatening him with war, in case he made any attempts upon that kingdom, he thought it advisable to drop the enterprize [f].

In the mean time, Gotarzes, repenting his resignation, and being recalled by the nobility, who, in time of peace, were ever plotting changes in the government, raised new forces, and advanced at the head of a powerful army as far as the river Charinda, where he was met and entirely defeated by Bardanes, who elated with that victory, attacked and reduced all the countries lying between that river and the Gindes, which parts the Dahans from the Arians. There he was obliged to halt, the Parthians, tho victorious, refusing to follow him into countries so remote from their own. Having therefore erected monuments with pompous inscriptions, importing that none of the Arsacidæ before him, had exacted tributes from those nations, he returned home, loaded with the spoils of the countries he had conquered. The glory he acquired in this expedition inspired him with such pride, that he became quite insupportable to his subjects, especially to the nobility, who, thereupon conspiring against him, killed him at a hunting match when he was not attended, as usual, by his guards, as not apprehending any treachery or danger. He was according to Tacitus, a prince endued with excellent qualities, and would have been one of the greatest kings that ever reigned in Parthia, had he studied to be as much beloved by his subjects, as he was feared by his enemies [g].

Bardanes murdered.

Upon the death of Bardanes, new disputes arose among the nobility about the electing of a king to succeed him; some declaring for Gotarzes, and others for Meherdates, the grandson of Phrahates, by whom he had been delivered to the Romans as an hostage. At last the party of Gotarzes prevailed, who was no sooner placed on the throne, than he began

Gotarzes.

[f] Tacit. ibid. c. 8, & 9. Joseph. ibid. [g] Tacit. ibid.

began to use all sorts of cruelty on his subjects, especially on those who had adhered to Meherdates; whereupon they had private recourse to the emperor Claudius, soliciting him to send them Meherdates, since they could no longer bear with Gotarzes, whose cruelties had rendered him odious to all his subjects. Claudius readily complied with their request, and having exhorted Meherdates to govern with equity and moderation, blessings, said he, unknown to Barbarians, and hence the more likely to please them, he dismissed him, together with the embassadors, and at the same time wrote to Caius Cassius, governor of Syria, enjoining him to attend the young prince to the banks of the Euphrates. As soon as Meherdates arrived in Syria, Cassius, agreeable to his instructions, drew together his legions, and marched with him to Zeugma, where the river was then fordable. There he encamped, and being joined by Abgarus king of Edessa and such of the Parthian chiefs as privately favoured Meherdates, he exhorted, in their presence, the new king to press on the execution of his design without delay, lest the Parthians should in the mean time change their mind, as it had often happened, and cooling in their affections to him, retire home, or join his competitor. This advice, the best that could be given to him, was frustrated by the treachery of Abgarus, who had, in appearance, espoused the interest of Meherdates, but was in reality entirely attached to Gotarzes; and therefore detained the young king many days at Edessa, tho' Carrhanes, a leading man among the Parthians, and a sincere friend to Meherdates, pressed him by frequent messages, to advance with all possible expedition, and assured him, that if he only shewed himself, he would be joined by great multitudes; but Meherdates neglecting the advice of his friends, followed that only of the treacherous Abgarus, who prevailed upon him to march a great way about, and, instead of entering Mesopotamia, tho' he was on the borders of that country, to pass through Armenia, which, as winter was already begun, was in great part covered with snow. As they came down into the champain country, wearied with the deep snow and steep mountains, Carrhanes joined them with his forces. Thence they crossed the Tigris, passed thro' the country of the Adiabenians, and advancing to the city of Ninos, the antient seat of the kings of Assyria, made themselves masters of that place, as they did likewise of the strong castle of Arbela, so famous in history on account of the signal victory gained there by Alexander over Darius. In the mean time Gotarzes, Meherdates set up against him by the Parthian nobility, and supported by the emperor Claudius.

Meherdates betrayed by Abgarus king of Edessa.

tarzes, having offered ſacrifices on mount Sambulos to the gods of the place, eſpecially to Hercules, came and encamped in the plain, with the river Carma between him and the enemy. Meherdates endeavoured by daily inſults and haughty meſſages, to draw him to a battle; but he declined it, ſoliciting in the mean time, by his emiſſaries, the friends of Meherdates to abandon and betray him: and herein he was attended with all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed for; for firſt Izates king of the Adiabenians, and afterwards Abgarus king of the Edeſſans, went over to him, with all the forces under their command. Meherdates ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken by his allies, and muſtering thoſe who remained, reſolved, as his only recourſe, to commit the iſſue to chance, and riſque a battle, which Gotarzes no longer avoided, his army being now as much ſtrengthened as his enemy's was weakened. Both parties engaged with the utmoſt fury, and the victory continued doubtful, till Carrhanes, having put to flight one of the enemy's wings and purſuing it too far, was ſurrounded by a body of reſerve, which prevented him from returning to the aſſiſtance of Meherdates; who thereupon, being entirely defeated, and ſo hemmed in that he could not make his eſcape, ſurrendered himſelf to one Parrhaces, a dependent of his father's, by whom he was immediately loaded with fetters, and delivered up to the conqueror. Gotarzes looking upon him not as one of the race of Arſaces, but as a Roman and foreigner, ordered his ears to be cut off, in contempt of the Romans, but granted him his life to ſhew his clemency [h].

His army defeated and himſelf taken priſoner.

Not long after Gotarzes died, and was ſucceeded by Vonones, at that time governor of Media, whoſe reign was ſhort and inglorious; for he did nothing which writers have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. Upon the death of Vonones, the crown of Parthia devolved upon Vologeſes, the ſon of Gotarzes according to Joſephus, of Vonones according to Tacitus. In the very beginning of his reign he invaded Armenia with a powerful army, and having, without oppoſition, made himſelf maſter of Artaxata and Tigranocerta, the two chief cities of that kingdom, he obliged Rhadamiſtus the Iberian, who had uſurped the crown, to ſave himſelf in Iberia. Upon his retreat, Vologeſes declared his brother Tiridates king of Armenia, having before appointed his other brother, by name Pacorus, king of Media;

Vonones.

Vologeſes.

[h] Idem ibid. & l. xii. c. 14.

dia; for Tiridates and Pacorus had yielded the crown of Parthia to him, tho' born of a Greek concubine; whence they thought it incumbent upon him to procure a crown for thoſe, who had ſo generouſly parted with one for his ſake. But while he was in Armenia, a plague breaking out in his army, occaſioned chiefly by want of proviſions, he was forced to relinquiſh his conqueſts and retire into his own dominions. Hereupon Domitius Corbulo entering Armenia, drove out Tiridates, with the few Parthian forces that had continued with him, and placed on that throne Tigranes the Cappadocian, as we have related in the hiſtory of Armenia. This affront Vologeſes could not brook, and therefore having, publickly and with great ſolemnity, crowned Tiridates king of Armenia, he diſpatched Monæſes, one of his generals, with a ſtrong body of choſen horſe and Adiabenian auxiliaries, enjoining him to drive out Tigranes, and recover Armenia, which had been long held by, and therefore belonged to, the princes of the family of Arſaces. As for himſelf, he dropped his expedition againſt the Hyrcanians, who had lately revolted; and, having drawn together a mighty army, began to make the neceſſary preparations for a deſcent on the Roman provinces. Corbulo, whom Nero had charged with the defence of Armenia, was no ſooner acquainted with the meaſures taken by Vologeſes, than he ſent two legions to the aſſiſtance of Tigranes, under the command of Verulanus Severus and Vettius Bolanus, with private injunctions to act rather with caution than eagerneſs and diſpatch; for he was more deſirous, as Tacitus obſerves, of keeping a war on foot, than bringing it to a ſpeedy concluſion; beſides he had wrote to Nero, that another general was neceſſary to defend Armenia, ſince Syria was threatened with a terrible ſtorm from Vologeſes. In the mean time, he poſted the remaining legions along the banks of the Euphrates, and having raiſed new forces in the province, placed guards at all the paſſes, and erected forts over the ſeveral fountains to prevent the enemy from having any water in that dry and ſandy country.

His wars with the Romans.

WHILE Corbulo was thus buſied in ſecuring Syria, Monæſes advanced by long marches towards Armenia, hoping to ſurprize Tigranes: but with all his expedition, he found that prince well guarded againſt him; for he had furniſhed the ſtrong city of Tigranocerta with all manner of proviſions and warlike ſtores, and retired into it with all his forces. Monæſes, after having attempted in vain to reduce

it

it, withdrew, and began to lay waſte the country. Here upon Corbulo, who was unwilling to engage in a war with the Parthians, leſt he ſhould loſe the reputation he had hitherto gained, ſent embaſſadors to Vologeſes, to expoſtulate with him for falling upon a Roman province, for beſieging a king who was a friend and ally of the Roman people, and for ravaging a country which Rome had taken under her protection. At the ſame time he gave him to underſtand, that if he did not forthwith abandon the ſiege of Tigranocerta, he would look upon it as an infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the Parthians and Romans, and in his turn invade the Parthian territories. Vologeſes, as he did not care to provoke Corbulo, who had acquired great fame by his military exploits, anſwered with great moderation, that he would ſend embaſſadors to Rome, to beg of Nero the kingdom of Armenia, and to renew the alliance made by his anceſtors with the people of Rome. Agreeable to this anſwer he immediately diſpatched meſſengers to Monæſes, ordering him to raiſe the ſiege of Tigranocerta; and retired himſelf with all his forces into the heart of his dominions, to wait there for the return of the embaſſadors he had ſent to Rome. The emperor Nero received them in a very obliging manner, but refuſed to renew his antient alliance with the Parthians, unleſs they renounced all pretenſions to the crown of Armenia. This anſwer incenſed Vologeſes, that he immediately drew again all his forces together, with a deſign to invade Syria; but finding the banks of the Euphrates ſtrongly guarded by Corbulo, he turned all his efforts againſt Armenia; where he gained thoſe advantages over Ceſennius Petus, which we have related at length in the hiſtory of that kingdom. However he conſented at laſt, dreading the conſequence of a war with the Romans, that his brother Tiridates ſhould go in perſon to Rome and there receive the crown of Armenia as a gift from Nero; which he did accordingly. By this means the antient alliance between the two empires was renewed, and the affairs of the eaſt ſettled in peace [i]. From this time no further mention is made of Vologeſes, till the beginning of the reign of Veſpaſian, to whom he ſent embaſſadors, offering to aſſiſt him with forty thouſand Parthian horſe [k]. Veſpaſian, as he was already ſettled on the throne, did not accept of the ſuccour offered him; but renewing all the antient treaties with the Parthians

[i] Tacit ibid. [k] Tacit. hiſt. l. vi.

Parthians, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, loaded with preſents, and maintained, during the reign of Vologeſes, a good underſtanding with the Parthian nation. Vologeſes, being now diſengaged from all foreign and domeſtic wars; applied himſelf to the building of a city, which, from his own name he called Vologeſocerta, or the city of Vologeſes; but was prevented by death from completing the work he had begun.

Artabanus III.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Artabanus III. who, falling out with Veſpaſian, eſpouſed the cauſe of the counterfeit Nero, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of Rome. However, the emperor did not think it adviſeable to reſent the affront, for fear of kindling a new war in the eaſt, the kingdom of Parthia being at that time in a very flouriſhing condition, and the Roman provinces greatly weakened by a late irruption of the Alani, a barbarous people of Scythia, inhabiting the countries bordering on the river Tanais and the lake Meotis. Artabanus had formed a deſign of invading Armenia; but died before he could put it in execution [l]. Upon his death, his ſon Pacorus II. was raiſed to the throne; but all we know of him is, that he entered into an alliance with Decebalus king of the Daci, and maintained, during the whole time of his reign, which is ſaid to have been very long, a ſtrict friendſhip with the Romans [m]. He was ſucceeded by his brother Coſdroes, who invading Armenia, drove out Exadares, who had been appointed king of that country by the emperor Trajan, and in his room placed his eldeſt ſon Parthamaſiris on the throne. As this was an open infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two empires, Trajan haſtened into the eaſt, with a deſign to humble the Parthians, who, relying on their victories formerly gained over the Romans, were daily raiſing new diſturbances in Syria and Armenia, and making incurſions into the Roman provinces bordering on their dominions. His arrival in Armenia was ſo ſudden and unexpected, that he reduced the whole country, almoſt without oppoſition, and took Parthamaſiris himſelf priſoner. Animated with theſe ſucceſſes, he entered Meſopotamia; and having there beſieged and taken the ſtrong city of Niſibis, after many ſkirmiſhes and encounters, he made himſelf maſter

Pacorus II.

Coſdroes.

[l] Xiphilin, in Othone.

[m] Suidas, voce Ωλινην. Plin. epiſt. l. x.

ter of that opulent country, never before ſubject to Rome. From Meſopotamia, which he reduced to a Roman province, he returned, in the beginning of the winter, into Syria, whence he acquainted the ſenate with the ſucceſs that had attended his arms againſt the Parthians, and was by them honoured with the ſirnames of Armenicus and Parthicus [n].

EARLY in the ſpring, he took the field again; but was warmly oppoſed by Coſdroes, whom he found encamped on the banks of the Euphrates, with a deſign to diſpute his paſſage; which he did with ſuch vigour, that the emperor, after having ſeveral times attempted to ford that river, and been always repulſed with great ſlaughter, was obliged to cauſe boats to be built on the neighbouring mountains, which he privately conveyed from thence on carriages to the water-ſide; and having in the night-time formed a bridge with them, he paſſed his army the next day, but not without great loſs and danger, the Parthians haraſſing his men the whole time with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows, which did great execution. Having gained the oppoſite bank, he advanced boldly into Aſſyria, the Parthians flying every where before him, and made himſelf maſter of Arbela. Thence he purſued his march, ſubduing with incredible rapidity, countries, where the Roman ſtandards had never been diſplayed before. Babylonia, or the province of Babylon, voluntarily ſubmitted to him. The city itſelf was, after a vigorous reſiſtance, taken by ſtorm; by which means he became maſter of all Chaldea and Aſſyria, the two richeſt provinces of the Parthian empire. From Babylon he marched to Cteſiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian monarchy, which he beſieged and at laſt reduced. But as to the particulars of theſe great conqueſts, we are quite in the dark, this expedition, however glorious to the Roman name, being rather hinted at, than deſcribed, by the writers of thoſe times. While Trajan was thus making war in the heart of the enemy's country, Coſdroes, having recruited his army, marched into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to recover that country, and cut off all communication between the Roman army and Syria. On his arrival in that province, the inhabitants flocked to him from all parts, and moſt of the cities, driving out the garriſons left by Trajan, opened their gates to him. Hereupon the emperor [n] Sext. Ruf. in breviar. Theodos. Min. Spartian. in Trajan.

peror detached Lucius and Maximus, two of his chief commanders, into Meſopotamia, to keep ſuch cities in awe as had not revolted, and to open a communication with Syria. Maximus was met by Coſdroes, and having ventured a battle, his army was entirely defeated and himſelf killed. But Lucius, being joined by Euricius and Clarius, two other commanders ſent by Trajan with freſh ſupplies, gained conſiderable advantages over the enemy, and retook the cities of Niſibis and Seleucia, which had revolted. And now Trajan, ſeeing himſelf poſſeſſed of all the beſt and moſt fruitful provinces of the Parthian empire, but at the ſame time being well appriſed that he could not, without a vaſt expence, maintain his conqueſts, nor keep in awe ſo fierce and warlike a people at ſuch a diſtance from Italy, reſolved to ſet over them a king of his own chooſing, who ſhould hold the crown of him and his ſucceſſors, and acknowledge them as his lords and ſovereigns. With this view he repaired to Cteſiphon, and having there aſſembled the chief men of the nation, he crowned one of the royal family, by name Parthanaſpates, king of Parthia, obliging all who were preſent to pay him their allegiance. He choſe Parthanaſpates, becauſe that prince had joined him at his firſt entering the Parthian dominions, conducted him with great fidelity, and ſhewn on all occaſions an extraordinary attachment to the Romans. Thus the Parthians were at laſt ſubdued, and their kingdom made tributary to Rome. But they did not long continue in this ſtate of ſubjection; for they no ſooner heard of Trajan's death, which happened ſoon after, than, taking up arms, they drove Parthanaſpates from the throne and recalling Coſdroes, who had retired into the country of the Hyrcanians, openly revolted from Rome. Adrian, who was then commander in chief of all the forces in the eaſt, and ſoon after acknowledged emperor by the army, did not care, tho' he was at that time in Syria with a very numerous army, to engage in a new war with the Parthians; but contented himſelf with preſerving the antient limits of the empire, without any ambitious proſpects of farther conqueſts: therefore, in the beginning of his reign, he abandoned thoſe provinces beyond the Euphrates, which Trajan had conquered, withdrew the Roman garriſons from Meſopotamia, and, for the greater ſafety of other places, made the Euphrates the boundary of, and barrier in, thoſe parts, poſting his legions along the banks of that river. Some writers are of opinion, that he did this out of a ſecret envy to his uncle Trajan's glory and reputation; but others commend it as a very politic and prudent action, the maintaining of those distant conquests being attended with many inconveniencies, and no advantages, to the empire. Before he left Antioch to return to Rome, in order to keep the Parthians quiet, he dismissed their prisoners without ransom, and among the rest, the daughter of Cosdroes, who had been taken by Trajan. Cosdroes, in return for these favours, never offered to disturb the Romans in the possession of the provinces bordering on his dominions; but shewed himself always ready to assist them, as his best friends and allies [o].

Vologeses II. COSDROES died after a long reign, and was succeeded by his eldest son Vologeses; in whose reign the Alani breaking into Media, then subject to the Parthians, committed there great devastations; but were prevailed upon, with rich presents sent them by Vologeses, to abandon that kingdom and return home. Upon their retreat, Vologeses, having no enemy to contend with at home, fell unexpectedly upon Armenia, surprized the legions there, and having cut them in pieces all to a man, entered Syria, defeated with great slaughter Attilius Cornelianus, governor of that province, and advanced, without opposition, to the neighbourhood of Antioch, putting every-where the Romans, and those who favoured them, to the sword. Hereupon the emperor Verus, by the advice of his collegue Antoninus, sirnamed the Philosopher, leaving Rome, hastened into Syria, and, having driven the Parthians out of that province, ordered Statius Priscus to invade Armenia, and Cassius, with Martius Verus, to enter the Parthian territories, and carry the war into the enemy's country. Priscus made himself master of Artaxata, and in one campaign drove the Parthians, tho' not without great loss on his side, quite out of Armenia. Cassius, on the other hand, having in several encounters defeated Vologeses, tho' he had an army of four hundred thousand men under his command, reduced, in four years time, all those provinces which had formerly submitted to Trajan, took Seleucia, burnt and plundered the famous cities of Babylon and Ctesiphon, with the stately palaces of the Parthian monarchs, and struck terror into the most remote provinces of that great empire. On his return, he lost above half the number of his forces by sickness and famine; mine; ſo that, after all, the Romans, as Spartianus obſerves, had no great reaſon to brag of their victories and conqueſts. However, Antoninus Verus, who had never ſtirred, during the whole time of the war, from Antioch and Daphne, took upon him the lofty titles of Parthicus and Armenicus, as if he had juſtly acquired them in the midſt of his pleaſures and debaucheries [p]. We are told, that ſome of Caſſius's ſoldiers, in pillaging the temple of Apollo at Babylon, found under ground a ſmall golden coffer, which, upon their opening it, caſt forth ſuch peſtilential vapours, as infected all thoſe who were preſent, and by their means the reſt of the army. As Verus, on his return to Italy, took Caſſius's forces along with him, he carried the plague into all the provinces thro' which he paſſed, and ſpread the infection through Italy, whence it was communicated to the moſt remote parts of the empire, and every-where attended with great mortality. After the revolt and death of Caſſius, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in the hiſtory of the Roman emperors, Antoninus the Philoſopher repaired into Syria, to ſettle the affairs of that province, and was, on his arrival, met by embaſſadors from Vologeſes, who, having recovered moſt of the provinces ſubdued by Caſſius, and being unwilling either to part with them, or engage in a new war, ſollicited the emperor to confirm him in the poſſeſſion of them, promiſing to hold them of him, and to acknowledge the ſovereignty of Rome. To theſe terms Antoninus readily agreed, and a peace was accordingly concluded between the two empires, which Vologeſes did not long enjoy, being ſoon after carried off by a diſtemper, and not murdered by his own ſubjects, as we read in Conſtantinus Manaſſes, who calls him Belegeſes.

[o] Theodos. Min. in frag. Spartian. Xiphilin. ibid. Paul. Diacon. hist. miscell.

Upon his death Vologeſes III. the ſon of his brother Sa- Vologeſes truces and grandſon of Coſdroes, was raiſed to the throne. III.
He ſided with Niger againſt the emperor Severus, who thereupon, having ſettled matters at home, marched with his forces againſt him, and advancing to the city of Ctesiphon, whither he had retired, laid cloſe ſiege to that metropolis. Vologeſes made a moſt gallant defence; but the city, after a long ſiege and much bloodſhed on both ſides, was at length taken by aſſault. The king's treaſures, with his wives and children, fell into the emperor's hands; but Vologeſes himſelf had the good luck to make his eſcape, which was a great diſappointment to Severus, who imm diately diſpatched an expreſs to acquaint the ſenate w the ſucceſs that had attended him in his expedition, agai the only nation that was then formidable to Rome. ſent likewiſe a particular deſcription of the countries, citi rivers, and mountains he had paſſed, and of the battles had fought, all drawn and painted upon tables; for wh the ſirnames of Parthicus, Arabicus, and Adiabenicus w decreed him. But he had no ſooner croſſed the Euphra than Vologeſes recovered all the provinces, except Meſo tamia, which he had reduced. Theſe expeditions were ry chargeable to the Romans, and coſt them much blo without their reaping any advantages from them; for they had not ſufficient forces to keep in awe the prov ces they had ſubdued, the inhabitants, greatly attache the family of Arſaces, never failed to return to their tient obedience, as ſoon as the Roman armies were w drawn. Vologeſes was ſoon after engaged in a war, more troubleſome and deſtructive, with his brother A banus, who, encouraged by ſome of the diſcontented bles, attempted to rob him of the crown, and place it his own head. Vologeſes gained ſeveral victories over brother and rebellious ſubjects; but died before he c reſtore the empire to its former tranquility.

[p] Euſeb. in chron. Zonar. l. iv. Oros. hiſt. miſcel. Theodos. l. ibid.

Artabanus IV.

ARTABANUS, who had a numerous army at his de on, did not meet with any oppoſition in ſeizing the th vacant by the death of his brother, tho' Tiridates had a ter title to it, as being his elder brother. He had ſc ſettled the affairs of his kingdom, when the emperor C calla, deſirous to ſignalize himſelf, as ſeveral of his pr ceſſors had done, by ſome memorable exploit againſt Parthians, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to him, deſiring his da ter in marriage. Artabanus, overjoyed at this propoſal, wh he thought, would be attended with a laſting peace betw the two empires, received the embaſſadors with all po marks of honour, and readily complied with their req Soon after Caracalla ſent a ſecond embaſſy, to acquain king, that he was coming to ſolemnize the nuptials: wh upon Artabanus went to meet him, attended with the f er of the nobility, and his beſt troops, all unarmed an moſt pompous habits; but this peaceable train no ſoone proached the Roman army, than the ſoldiers, on a ſi given them, falling upon the king's retinue, made a terrible ſlaughter of the unarmed multitude, Artabanus Treachery of the emperer Caracalla.

ſelf eſcaping with great difficulty. The treacherous Caracalla, having gained by this exploit great booty, and, as he thought, no leſs glory, wrote a long and boaſting letter to the ſenate, aſſuming the title of Parthicus, for this piece of treachery, as he had before that of Germanicus, for murdering in like manner ſome of the German nobility. Artabanus, reſolving to make the Romans pay dear for their inhuman and barbarous treachery, raiſed the moſt numerous army that had ever been on foot in Parthia, croſſed the Euphrates, and entered Syria, putting all to fire and ſword; but Caracalla being murdered before this invaſion, Macrinus, who had ſucceeded him, met the Parthians at the head of a mighty army, compoſed of many legions, and all the auxiliaries of the ſtates of Aſia. The two armies no ſooner came in ſight of each other, but they engaged with the utmoſt fury. The battle continued two days, both Romans and Parthians fighting ſo obſtinately, that night only parted them, without any apparent advantage on either ſide, tho' both retired, when night had put an end to the conteſt, crying, Victory, victory. The field of battle was covered all over with dead bodies, there being already above forty thouſand killed, including both Romans and Parthians; nevertheleſs Artabanus was heard to ſay, that the battle was only begun, and that he would continue it, till either the Parthians or Romans were all to a man cut in pieces. But Macrinus, being well appriſed, that the king came highly enraged againſt Caracalla in particular, and dreading the conſequences which would attend the deſtruction of his army, ſent a herald to Artabanus, acquainting him with the death of Caracalla, and propoſing an alliance between the two empires. The king, underſtanding that his great enemy was dead, readily embraced the propoſals of peace and amity, upon condition, that all the priſoners, who had been taken by the treachery of Caracalla, ſhould be immediately reſtored, and a large ſum of money paid him to defray the expences of the war. Theſe articles being performed without delay or heſitation, Artabanus returned into Parthia, and Macrinus to Antioch [q].

Artabanus invades Syria.

An obſtinate engagement between the Parthians and Romans

As Artabanus loſt on this occaſion the flower of his army, Artaxerxes, a Perſian of a mean deſcent, but of great courage and experience in war, revolting from the Parthi-

The Perſians revolt.

[q] Theodos. Min. ubi ſupra, Zonar. l. iv. Sozomen. hiſtor. tripart. l. iii. c. 1.

ans, prevailed upon his countrymen to join him, and attempt the recovery of the sovereign power, which, he said, they had been unjustly deprived of, first by the Macedonians, and afterwards by the Parthians, formerly their vassals. Artabanus, upon the news of this revolt, marched with the whole strength of his kingdom to suppress it; but being met by Artaxerxes, at the head of a no less powerful army, a bloody battle ensued, which is said to have lasted three days. At length the Parthians, tho' they behaved with the utmost bravery, and fought like men in despair, were forced to yield to the Persians, who were commanded by a more experienced leader. Most of their troops were cut off in the flight, and the king himself taken prisoner, and soon after put to death by Artaxerxes's orders. The Parthians, having lost in this fatal engagement both their king and their army, were forced to submit to the conqueror, and become vassals to a nation, which had been subject to them for the space of four hundred and seventy-five years. Thus was this gallant and warlike nation subdued at last, and the empire once more transferred to the Persians; whose kings reigns, till they were in their turn reduced by the Arabs, will be the subject of the following section. However, the royal family of Arsaces did not end in Artabanus, but continued to reign in Armenia, till the time of the emperor Justinian, holding that kingdom of the Persian monarchs, to whom the Arsacidæ of Armenia were tributaries. Among these we find the following princes mentioned in history, Arsaces, Teridates, Artavasdes, Teridates II. Arsaces II. Paras, Tigranes, and Arsaces III. all descended from Arsaces, brother to Artabanus IV. the last king of Parthia. But of Armenia, and the princes who reigned there, after that country became subject to the Persians, we shall have occasion to speak in the next section.

Defeat the Parthians, kill their king, and put an end to the Parthian empire.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

SECT. I.

The hiſtory of the Perſians, from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being ſubdued by the Arabs.

According to the Greek and Latin Authors.

THE reader hath before ſeen, after what manner, and how long, the Perſians were ſubject to the Parthian princes. We are here to ſpeak of their atchievements after they had again rendered themſelves independent; and not only ſo, but lords alſo of many ſpacious provinces, and the firſt nation in the eaſt. As we have no regular hiſtory of Perſia by any Greek or Latin writer, what we offer to the reader in this ſection, is collected, as carefully as might be, from ſuch as have occaſionally mentioned the Perſian affairs. Theſe paſſages we have digeſted in their natural order; and, if there be any omiſſions, they will be ſupplied in the next article, wherein we ſhall treat of the ſame period from the Oriental hiſtorians (A).

A

(A) There is no branch of the Univerſal Hiſtory which more clearly evinces the general uſefulneſs of this work, or the peculiar ſymmetry of its parts, than this before us. All the general hiſtories, that have been publiſhed in our own, or in other modern languages, are ſtrangely deficient in this article. We have either a looſe, unſatisfactory account of the paſſing of the empire of the eaſt from the Parthians to the Perſians, and from them to the Arabians; or we have ſuch a chronological table of their kings, as that inſerted in our text, with a few remarks thereon from Scaliger's chronicon, or ſome other collection; and ſo we are hurried to another ſubject. It muſt be owned, that there are ſome particular relations which promiſe fairer, and perform more, than is either expected or done by the compilers of general

A TABLE of the Perſian kings.

	Years.	Months.
Artaxares	14	10
Sapores	31
Ormiſdates	1	10 days.
Varanes	3
Varanes II.	17
Varanes III.	00	4
Narſes	7	9
Miſdates	-	-
Sapores II.	70
Artaxerxes	4
Sapores III.	5
Varanes IV. or Cermanſaa	11
Iſdigertes	21
Varanes V.	20
Varanes VI.	17	4
Perozes	20
Valens	4
Cavades	11
Zambades	8
Cavades	30
Coſroes	48
Hormiſdas	8
Coſroes II.	39
Sirões	1
Acheſyr	00	2
Sarbaras	00	6
Bornarim	00	7
Hormiſdas	10

Artaxares Year of Chriſt, 230.

ARTAXARES, or, as he is ſometimes called, Artaxerxes, the reſtorer of the Perſian kingdom, was not only a private ral hiſtories; but then we can very truly affirm, that even theſe fall very far ſhort of the following account. The learned (1) Bizarus, whoſe hiſtory of the Perſian affairs is deſervedly eſteemed the beſt extant, takes all he hath relating to this period from a very few Latin and Greek authors; ſo that, for very want private perſon, but of ſpurious birth, as we are informed by Agathias (B). His mother was married to one Pabecus or want of materials, he is forced to draw in the Roman affairs, and other matters ſtill more foreign; nay, he once digreſſeth ſo far as to mention William the Conqueror, and compliment Queen Elizabeth (2). One might ſay much more as to other compendiums of Perſian hiſtory (3); but we deſire not to prejudice the works of others, or to give any more than a fair account of our own.

(1) Rerum Perſicarum hiſtoria, initia gentis, mores, inſtituta, reſque geſtas ad hæc uſque tempora complectens: auctore Petro Bizaro Sentinate, fol. Francofurti, A. D. 1601.

We have divided the hiſtory of this period into two parts. The firſt is compoſed of ſuch materials as the Latin and Greek writers furniſh, particularly that noble collection which goes under the name of the Byzantine hiſtorians, whence we have taken ten times as much as hath appeared in any modern language, and, by aſſembling a multitude of divided paſſages, have preſented the public with ſomething that looks like a connected hiſtory. Whereas Bizarus found himſelf ſo deſtitute of matter, that, in his hiſtory of the Perſian affairs, he makes the reigns of the Roman emperors his rule, and refers the ſeries of Perſian monarchs to a table. The ſecond part is truly taken from Oriental writers; but more eſpecially from Mirkhond, and what is related therein is ſo neceſſary a ſupplement to what the firſt part contained, that, without it, there would not only have remained a viſible imperfection, but, in many places, it would have been unintelligible; becauſe the Greek writers, out of a perverſe humour, wilfully miſrepreſent the manners, cuſtoms, and literature of the Oriental nations. The compariſon therefore of theſe diſtinct hiſtories will illuſtrate each of them, and enable the intelligent reader perfectly to comprehend both; whereby this wide chaſm will be in ſome meaſure filled up, and this period of Perſian hiſtory no longer remain, as it hitherto hath done, under an impenetrable obſcurity.

(B) As we have taken the foregoing table chiefly from Agathias, and as we have generally preferred his authority, wherever he ſpeaks deciſively, it is neceſſary we ſhould ſay ſomething of the merit of this author. He was a native of Marina, and addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of the law; and as thoſe who dedicated their time to the acquirement of that ſcience, ſtudied moſtly in colleges, he came from thence to be called Scholaſticus (4), which the learned Voſſius will have to ſignify the ſame as advocatus (5). He was a poet and an hiſtorian; but it is in his laſt capacity only that we have to do with him. He was, it ſeems, ſo or Pabec, who was either a tanner or a ſhoemaker, but withal a perſon well ſkilled in judiciary aſtrology. It happened, that one Saſanus, or Saſan, a military officer, travelling through the country of the Caduſians, took up his lodging in the houſe of this Pabec, tho' it was a very mean one. Pabec, by his art, perceiving, that a perſon begotten by this ſtranger, would become the head of a moſt potent family, and alſo arrive at regal honours, he began to fret within himſelf, becauſe he had neither ſiſter, daughter, nor couſin in the houſe. At length, his ambition getting the better of his ſenſe of ſhame, he cauſed his wife to go to bed to Saſan, who begat on her Artaxares. When afterwards Artaxares came to be king, Pabec and Saſan each claimed him for a ſon; whereupon the ſtory became public, and it was agreed, that he ſhould be ſtyled the ſon of Pabec of the ſeed of Saſan [a]. Artaxares from his youth addicted himſelf to a military life, and having attained to great ſkill and no leſs reputation in the wars, he projected the delivery of his countrymen from the Parthian yoke. In purſuance of this deſign, he wrought them to a general revolt; and having in three battles routed, and in the laſt ſlain the Parthian monarch, he aſſumed the double diadem and the pompous title of king of kings. He was, as all authors agree, a man of great abilities and undaunted ſpirit, or, in other words, a perſon of great courage and unbounded ambition [b].

(2) Hiſt. rer. Perſic. l. v. p. 137. (3) Bartholm. Keckermannus, de monarch. Perſar. Tom. II Oper. ejuſd. author. in fol. Genev. 1614. Reinec. comment. de reb. Perſic. ap. hiſt. Jul. Schicard. catal. reg. Perſar. (4) Agath. Scholaſt. præfat. ad hiſt. (5) De hiſtor. Græc. l. ii. p. 270.

He

[a] Agath. Scholaſt. hiſt: de reb. geſt. Juſtinian. imperat. edid. Pariſ. l. ii. p. 65. l. iv. p. 134. [b] Herodian. hiſt. l. vi. Æl. Lamprid. in vit. Aurel. Alexand. Sever. Oros. hiſt. l. vii. c. 11. Nicephor. hiſt eccleſ. l. i. 6. Gregor. Abul-Phar. hiſt. dynaſt. dyn. 7. p. 186.

ſo pleaſed with Procopius's memoirs of the Perſic wars, that he reſolved to continue them, which he did in the hiſtory we yet have, divided into five books. In the fourth of theſe he takes occaſion to mention one Sergius, who was ſo well ſkilled in the Perſian tongue, as to be on that account in great favour with Coſroes the firſt. This man making ſeveral journies into Perſia, and having many opportunities of converſing with the learned of that nation, procured, by their favour, the peruſal of the royal annals from whence he made many extracts, which, at his earneſt deſire, he communicated to Agathias. Theſe were, in that hiſtorian's opinion, of ſo great weight, that he preferred them to the memoirs of Procopius, differing from him to follow them

He was no sooner seated on the throne, than he formed a design of restoring the Persian empire to its antient glory; and having caused the necessary preparations to be set on foot, he gave notice to the Roman governors of the provinces bordering on his dominions, that he conceived himself to have a just and unquestionable title, as the successor of Cyrus, to all the Lesser Asia, which he commanded them immediately to quit, as well as the provinces on the frontiers of the antient Parthian kingdom, which was already his. Alexander Severus was at this time the possessor of the Roman empire, a very youth, under the tutelage of his mother, and one who had hitherto dwelt always at Rome; he was therefore unwilling to engage in a war, especially if it might be avoided; and for that reason sent letters to Artaxares, importing, that he would do wisely to keep within bounds, and not, out of vain hopes of conquest, to enterprize new wars, which might not be attended with the same success as formerly; that, in the present case, he ought to consider he was not to deal with barbarians, or a nation used to war, but with the Romans, whose emperors, Augustus, Trajan, and Severus, had often vanquished the Parthians. The Persian king had little regard to these letters, on the contrary, he began to raise a great army and to attack the fortified posts of the Romans, on the river Euphrates, making such a progress in the reduction of the adjacent provinces, that the emperor Alexander, how unwilling soever he might be, was constrained to raise an army, and to march towards Mesopotamia, in order to give a check to the Persian power [c].

Asserts his right to all the provinces of the antient Persian empire.

Artaxares was employed in the siege of Nisibis or Antiochia, when he received the news of Alexander's marching towards him; upon which he thought proper to raise his siege, Sends an insolent message to the emperor Alexander.

[c] Herodian. & Æl. Lamprid. ubi supra.

them; which shews, that he was thoroughly convinced of their authority. From these extracts he drew up a short, but very perspicuous and exact, account of all the Persian monarchs from Artaxares, who recovered the kingdom from the Parthians, to Cosroes, with whom himself was cotemporary (6). It is from this short account that we have taken the dates, and such other material circumstances, as, we thought, could not be had with the same probability of exactness from other historians, who wrote from later and less authentic memoris.

(6) Agath. Schol. hist. l. iv. p. 140, 141.

ſiege, that he might recruit and refreſh his army. He ſe however, deputies or embaſſadors, if we may be allowed call four hundred perſons by that title, whom he ſelected their extraordinary ſtature and great ſtrength; and hav furniſhed them with rich habits and fine horſes he g them commiſſion, when they ſhould be introduced to emperor's preſence, to ſpeak thus: "The great king Arta
"res commands the Romans and their prince to depart
"of all Syria and Aſia Minor, and to reſtore to the Perſi
"all the countries on this ſide of the Ægean and Pontic ſe
"as of right deſcending to them from their anceſtors [d]."

His meſſengers rigorouſly treated.

THESE heralds or embaſſadors performed their commiſſi very exactly; which ſo highly irritated Alexander, w was otherwiſe a prince of the gentleſt diſpoſition, that ordered all their equipage to be taken from them, and ſe them into Phrygia, where he aſſigned them farms, wh they might cultivate for their ſubſiſtence. This done, advanced into Meſopotamia, which he recovered in a gr meaſure without fighting. Hiſtorians differ ſo much in t accounts they give us of the ſubſequent parts of this w that it is almoſt impoſſible to reconcile them. We ſha however, relate what appears to us moſt probable, and g our readers our reaſons in a note.

Gives battle to, and is beaten by, the Romans.

ARTAXARES advanced with his forces into Meſopotam as ſoon as he thought himſelf ſtrong enough to give the nemy battle. His army conſiſted of a hundred and twen thouſand horſe, ten thouſand heavy armed ſoldiers, eig teen hundred chariots with ſcythes, and ſeven hundred el phants. Alexander, however, did not decline fightin An engagement enſued in which the Romans were victo ous, and Artaxares was compelled to retire into the heart his dominions, where, with great aſſiduity, he appli himſelf to the recruiting and reſtoring of his army. On t other hand, the Roman emperor divided his forces in three bodies, the firſt, marching through Armenia, h orders to penetrate into Media; the ſecond marched ov the marſhes, to enter the Parthian dominions on the oth ſide; the third, which was the greateſt, and which t emperor comanded in perſon, was to have fallen into t heart of Artaxares's dominions; and if this ſcheme h been thoroughly executed, in all probability, the Perſi pow

[d] Zonar. hiſt. ad. A. C. 230. [e] Herodian & A Lamprid. ubi ſupra.

power would not only have been weakened, but even brought to the very verge of destruction[f].

Restores his affairs by firmness and vigilance.

The body of troops which passed through Armenia, underwent great difficulties, and with very much fatigue arrived at last in Media. Artaxares quickly marched against them with a formidable army; but was not able to do much, for the country being uneven, the Roman foot had the better of his cavalry. While he was considering how these evils might be surmounted, he received advice of the other body of Romans breaking into his territories, which, in some measure, frustrated all his designs; however, having left guards sufficient to secure the passes, he marched with his forces against the new invaders. These troops finding no enemy to oppose them, plundered all the country, and proud of their spoils, would no longer be restrained under discipline; nay, at last they became so scandalously licentious, that they slew their commander in chief, Flavius, for endeavouring to restrain them, and for being more careful of their safety than they were themselves. In this situation the Persian king fell upon them, and rather destroyed than defeated them. The Roman emperor in the mean time, being under feminine counsels, failed to perform the share he had taken to himself in this enterprize; which was the ruin of his army, the remains of which having joined the corps under his command, he returned first to Antioch and then to Rome, where he triumphed, and was styled Parthicus and Persicus, with very little reason (C). Artaxares made the best use of his absence

[f] Zonar. ubi supra. Herodian. l. vii.

(C) Nothing can be more opposite than the account given by Herodian and Ælius Lampridius of the Persian war. We will give a concise account of what is said by each of them, and leave it to the intelligent reader to decide as he pleases. Herodian affirms, that, in the fourteenth year of Alexander Severus, letters came from the presidents of Syria and Mesopotamia, purporting, that Artaxerxes king of Persia had made an inroad into Mesopotamia, and threatened to invade Syria, claiming all the continent opposite to Europe, from the Ægean sea to the Pontis, as the antient patrimony of the Persians. Upon this, after writing letters to no purpose to persuade the Persian to be quiet, the emperor Alexander marched into the east, where he divided his army, as we have related in our text, and by failing to perform what himself had undertaken, brought them all into a miserable situation; for which the army was so grievously offended ſence, recovering what he had loſt, reſtoring the gl of the Perſian name; and having reigned with much putation, died with honour and in peace, after enjoy the kingdom twelve years, or, as others ſay, fifteen ye abating two months [g].

Sapores. Year of Chriſt, 242.

He was ſucceeded in the throne by his ſon Sapores, Sapor, a prince equally famous for ſtrength of body abilities of mind, fierce and intractable in his nature, vetous of glory, haughty, inſolent, and cruel. He offended with the emperor, that they openly ſaid, he had foully betrayed them. Upon this he led them back to Anti where he refreſhed the remains of them, diſtributed amo them large ſums of money; and perceiving, that the Rom who were ſlain in Perſia, by ſelling their lives dear, had exce ingly weakened the enemy, he had thoughts of invading t territories again, when he had advice of the German rebelli which compelled him to return into Italy (7). On the ot hand, we are expreſly told by the writer of the life of Alexan Severus, addreſſed to Conſtantine the Great, that the Per were entirely defeated, and a great number made priſon He likewiſe informs us, that he tranſcribed from the journa the ſenate, a ſpeech of the emperor's after his return, wh hath abundance of extraordinary particulars. Amongſt oth the emperor aſſures the ſenate, that Artaxerxes was not imp perly ſtyled the great king; that he brought ſeven hundred phants into the field, of which three hundred were taken two hundred killed; that the Romans had cut to pieces an a of one hundred and twenty thouſand horſe, had ſold a multit of Perſian priſoners, and that he had defeated the Perſians in plains where Craſſus had been overcome by the Parthians. affirmed the ſame thing in groſs to the people of Rome, and thereupon complimented with the title of Conqueror of Parthians and Perſians (8). This author mentions Herodi account, and alſo ſome other accounts leſs favourable to emperor Alexander than his; but he thinks the authorities c by himſelf ſufficient to weigh down all they ſay. Howe Herodian, we know, wrote only of ſuch things as happe within his own life time, and made it a rule with him to m every thing give way to truth. As for the author of this addreſſed to Conſtantine, ſome will have him to be Ælius L pridius, and again others attribute it to Spartianus (9); whoever writ it, it hath much the air of a panegyric, or at of an apology.

[g] Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 134.

(7) Herodian. hiſt. l. vi. c. 6——16. (8) Æl. Lamp in vit. Alex. Seve. (9) G. J. Voſſ. de hiſt. Latin. l. ii. p.

no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than he began to meditate a new war with the Romans, to which he was encouraged by a traitor, who dwelt in his court. The name of this man was Cyriades, the ſon of another Cyriades, an eminent commander in the Roman army. This profligate ſon of whom we are ſpeaking, began his exploits with robbing his own father. He was naturally a voluptuous man; and therefore, as ſoon as he had poſſeſſed himſelf of this treaſure, he withdrew into Perſia, where he lived in that ſplendor and luxury, for which he had ſacrificed his honour. In conjunction with Odomaſtes, a Perſian general, he waſted the adjoining provinces, and having at laſt prevailed on the king himſelf to take the field, Cyriades, with the deſerters, who, for the ſake of plunder, followed him, attacked the cities of Antioch and Cæſarea Philippi, both of which they were ſo lucky as to make themſelves maſters of; whereupon Cyriades took firſt the title of Cæſar, and then called himſelf emperor, acquiring by degrees, dominions, revenues, and forces, not altogether unworthy of that title [h].

His dominions invaded by the Romans.

THE young emperor Gordian, when he had ſettled the affairs of the empire in the weſt, reſolved to reſcue the eaſt alſo from the tyranny of pſeudo-emperors, as well as from the terror of the Perſian arms. With this view he marched into Syria, at the head of a great army; and as long as his father-in-law, whom ſome writers call Myſitheus, others Timeſocles, lived, every thing went well. The Perſian found himſelf conſtrained to withdraw into his own dominions, whither the emperor followed him, taking Charra or Haran in Meſopotamia; but while he was preparing to puſh his conqueſts ſtill farther, he was murdered by the treachery of Philip, whom he had made captain of his guards, on the death of his father-in-law [i].

Makes an advantageous peace.

THIS Philip, having poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſovereign authority, made peace with Sapor, and abandoned Meſopotamia and Armenia to him again. Part of theſe provinces, on the news of the ſenate's diſapproving his conduct, he recovered again, without ſhewing any regard to his his treaty; and, leaving a a sufficient number of troops t secure the frontiers, marched back into Italy. As soo as the Roman army was withdrawn, Sapor and Cyriad renewed their incursions; and the latter, growing stronge than ever, began, in all respects, to be treated as an em peror. Indeed the Roman affairs were in such miserabl confusion, that many, who would otherwise have oppose Cyriades, were now glad to be sheltered under his pro tection. At length, however, things began to take new turn. Valerian, tho' he was seventy years old whe he was advanced to the empire, yet spared no pains t reduce all the numerous provinces thereof to a proper de gree of obedience. While he was thus employed, first i the west, and then in the north, Sapor, with a numerou army, broke into the Roman territories, burnt and pil laged the country; and at length advancing as far as Ede sa, besieged it in form, one Demosthenes, who command ed therein, making a gallant resistance [k].

[h] Trebell. Pol. in hiſt. trigint. tyran. [i] Herodian. hiſt. l. vii. Jul. Capitolin. de vita Gordian. tert. Zoſim. hiſt. A. C. 243. Zonar. hiſt. A. C. 244.

Takes the emperor Valerian prisoner.

VALERIAN no sooner received advice of this, than h posted with the troops about his person to its relief. H approach gave new spirits to the distressed inhabitants o the Roman provinces, and disposed them to take all th necessary steps for compelling the Persians to retire int their own dominions. The soldiers of Cyriades mutinie against him, put him to death, and declared for Valerian Sapor, however, confiding in the strength of his army continued still before Edessa, in the neighbourhood where of an action happened, in which Valerian was taken pri soner, whether by his own temerity, or the treachery o one of his commanders, cannot be well determined. Th gave a mortal wound to the Roman affairs in the eas where Sapor gained continual advantages, and used his fo tune with an insolence not to be endured. This at leng drove the people to despair; so that, first under the com mand of Callistus, afterwards under that of Odenatu prince of Palmyrene, they took arms, and not only pro tected themselves from any further insults, but also, und the command of the last-mentioned general, defeated th Persian, and took part of his baggage, with all his co cubines, which determined him to retire into his own d minio minions. In his march he is ſaid to have made uſe of the bodies of his unfortunate priſoners to fill up the hollow roads, and to facilitate the paſſage of his carriages over ſuch rivers as lay in his way. On his return into Perſia, he was ſollicited by the kings of the Caduſians, Armenians, Bactrians, and other nations, to ſet the emperor Valerian at liberty; but to no purpoſe. On the contrary, he uſed him the worſe, treated him daily with indignities, ſet his foot upon his neck when he mounted his horſe, and, as ſome writers ſay, after ſeveral years confinement, cauſed him to be flayed alive [1] (D).

[k] Jul. Capitolin. in vita Gordian. Trebell. Pol. hist. trig tyran. Zonar. histor. A. C. 253. Zosim. hist. A. C. 252.

Treats him inhumanly, and is ever after unfortunate.

FROM this time forwards the affairs of Sapor wore but an indifferent aſpect. Odenatus, fluſhed with victory, at the head of a gallant army, and cloathed with the character of preſident over the Roman provinces in the eaſt, bridled the Perſians, and made them frequent viſits in their own territories. Twice this general advanced as far as the city of Cteſiphon, ſeated on the banks of the Tigris, all the countries between Palmyra and that river being under his obedience. On his death his wife, the celebrated Zenobia, continued to oppoſe the Perſians, and with ſucceſs, till ſhe was conquered and made priſoner by the emperor Aurelian, who vindicated the honour of the Romans on this ſide, and took ample vengeance for the ill treatment of Valerian. Much ſpoil, many priſoners, and one of the king's chariots, Aurelian carried with him

[1] Trebell. Pol. in vita Valerian. Agath. Schol. l. iv. p. 133. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. vii. p. 128.

(D) There is nothing more confuſed, nothing for which it is more difficult to account, than the manner by which Valerian fell into the hands of Sapor, and his treatment afterwards. Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the life of this emperor, expreſſes himſelf doubtfully as to the conduct of Marcianus, whether it was treacherous, or unfortunate only; but, as to the emperor himſelf, he is poſitive, that, after he was made priſoner, Sapor made uſe of him as a footſtool when he mounted his horſe. The ſame writer hath preſerved three letters; one from king Belſotus; another from Balenus king of the Caduſii; and a third from Artabazes king of Armenia, to the Perſian monarch, in favour of Valerian, who, he ſays, died in his captivity at a very advanced age (10). Zonaras affirms, that however Valerian was taken

(10) In vita Valeriani.

him into Italy, and with them graced his triumph a Rome [k]. Sapores, however continued to enlarge his do minions at the expence of his barbarous neighbours, an having reigned, with great variety of fortune, thirty-on years, died, and left the kingdom to his ſon. An eaſter writer informs us, that Aurelian made peace with Sapore and gave him his daughter in marriage, in whoſe train wer two Greek phyſicians, who firſt brought the writings Hippocrates into the eaſt [l]. In the reign of this monarch flouriſhed, according to the ſame writer, the famous here tic Manes, whoſe opinions ſo long diſturbed the church m

HOR

[k] Trebell. Pol. in vit. Gallien. Odenat. Zenob. & Saturni
[l] Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. 7. p. 138. [m] Agath. Schol. iv. p. 134. Flav. Vopiſc. in vit. Aurelian. Gregor. Abul-Pha dynaſt. p. vii. 130.

taken, whether fighting in his own defence, or voluntarily yield ing himſelf up, he was afterwards treated with the utmoſt indig nity. He likewiſe ſays, that he was carried into the heart Perſia, and was ſo unhappy as to be an eye-witneſs of the ma ſacring of the Romans, in order to fill up the hollow ways wi their carcaſſes; and this, ſays he, was the end of Valerian (11 Zoſimus relates things more paticular. He informs us, th Valerian, finding his army much weakened by ſickneſs, an diſtruſting the fidelity of moſt of his officers, endeavoured firſt negociate, and then to buy, a peace from Sapor; who refuſe to treat with any, but the emperor, he imprudently went confer with him, attended only by his ordinary guards, and was ſurprized, put into chains, and carried away priſoner in the inland parts of Perſia, where he died of extreme old ag (12). Agathias aſſerts, that Valerian was not only treated wi the utmoſt ignominy after he was made priſoner by Sapor, b that at length he ordered him to be flay'd alive; which was a cordingly performed (13). Cedrenus ſays, that Valerian, wi twenty thouſand men, were made priſoners by Sapor at the ba tle of Cæſarea; and that his ſkin being pulled over his ears, died in miſerable torture (14). To cite more authors would tedious, as well as to no purpoſe; for we do not pretend to aſce tain any fact, but to ſhew, that the death of Valerian is ve uncertain; and this we have already ſufficiently done

(E) The eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians are not agreed at what ti Manes flouriſhed. However, as Cedrenus (15), who wrote compe

(11) Hiſt. A. C. 259. (12) Hiſt. A. C. 259, 260. (1 Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 133. (14) Hiſt. comp. p. 4 (15) Idem, p. 259.

HORMISDAS ſucceeded Sapores, of whom we have little to ſay. It was during his reign that the Palmyrenians were fooliſh enough to take arms again, in order to free themſelves from the Romans, or rather, as other parts of the Roman empire had done, to aſſert a right of making emperors. They caſt their eyes on one Antiochus, whom they arrayed in purple and ſaluted emperor; but Aurelian did not leave them long at liberty to carry on this ſcheme. He returned with his victorious army, reduced Palmyra, and dyed the cloaths of his ſoldiers, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, in the blood of its inhabitants. As for Antiochus, he took no notice of him at all. And for Hormiſdas, Hormiſdas. Year of Chriſt, 273.

compend of hiſtories from good memoirs, places him under the reign of Sapor, we may as well ſpeak of him here as any-where elſe. Concerning him and his doctrines we are told in general, that one Terebinthus, an arch heretic, having fled out of Paleſtine into Perſia, and being there received into the houſe of a widow, took the name of Buda, pretended to have been born of a virgin, to have been brought up in the mountains, and to have received a command to teach men a new religion, or at leaſt new notions in religion. He being either killed by the people, or by an evil ſpirit that he converſed with in this woman's houſe, left behind him in her hands four treatiſes, containing the ſum of his doctrines. This woman having bought a ſlave called Cabricus, when a boy of ſeven years old, cauſed him to be carefully educated, and, when ſhe died, left him all ſhe had. By this means the writings of Terebinthus or Buda coming into his hands, he read, conſidered them, and reſolved to paſs for ſomebody as well as his maſter. The firſt thing he did, was to change his name from Cabricus to Manes; then he began to propagate his opinions, which were taken principally from the writings of Zoroaſter and the Gnoſtics. Part of the ſcriptures he rejected, part he retained, but magnified his own writings above all. He aſſerted two principles, the one good, and the other evil. He ſpoke reſpectfully of Jeſus Chriſt, yet denied that he ſuffered and roſe again, affirming, that the Jews crucified a phantom. He gave himſelf at ſometimes out for the Meſſiah; at others, for the comforter. He choſe twelve apoſtles and ſeventy-two diſciples, who diſcharged their offices faithfully, ſpreading his notions far and wide, ſome of them penetrating into China (16). As for Manes himſelf, he was according to the manner of thoſe times, a perſon of conſiderable learning; for he drew a map of the world, and wrote a treatiſe of its uſe. He likewiſe miſdas, he had not interfered, and therefore Aurelian not trouble his country; he had the good fortune con quently to die in peace, after having ſat on the thron year and ten days [n].

(16) Epiphan. hær. 6. Auguſt. 46. Theodoret. lid. hær. fab. 10. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. vii p. 130.

Varanes I. Year of Chriſt 274. VARANES the firſt ſucceeded him. Of him we kn very little more than that he reigned three years, duri which ſpace we find not that he enterprized any thing gainſt the Romans, or they againſt him. In truth, empire was at this time in a very indifferent condition; f after the death of Aurelian, the Roman forces in Syria a Meſopotamia were very unquiet. At length Saturninus himſelf up for emperor, but with no great good luck; y as he was a man of probity and an excellent commander, kept the Perſians within their limits; ſo that the prince, whom we are ſpeaking, never had any opportunity of ex ting himſelf [o].

Varanes II. Year of Chriſt 277. VARANES the ſecond aſcended the throne on death of the former king of the ſame name. He had firſt ſome thoughts of invading the Roman provinces; b he quickly found, that the ſtate of things was changed; fo on the firſt motion of his troops, the emperor Probus a vanced in perſon into the eaſt. Upon this Varanes deſiſt fro likewiſe compoſed a large book of enigmatical figures, whic he pretended, contained a ſeries of revelations to the end of t world (17). In the end, he is ſaid to have loſt himſelf in th whirlpool which ſwallows up moſt impoſtors, the affectation working of miracles. He would needs undertake to cure t king of Perſia's ſon, who laboured under a mortal diſeaſe; b he failed in his attempt, the young prince died, and he w impriſoned. He made his eſcape afterwards, and for ſome ti wandered about, and was concealed by his diſciples. At leng he was apprehended by the king of Perſia's officers, and, ſome ſay, was crucified by the order of Sapor, tho', as oth affirm, he was flayed alive (18). However, his opinions did periſh with him; for his ſect flouriſhed afterwards in Perſia, a was encouraged by ſome of its kings.

[n] Agath. Schol. hiſt. l. iv. p. 134. Flav. Vopiſc. in vita Au lian. Zoſim. hiſt. A. C. 274. [o] Agath. Scholaſt. ubi ſup Flav. Vopiſc. in vita Saturnin. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. p. 134.

(17) Herbelot. Artic. Ertenk. Giagrafiah. (18) Cedr compend. p. 260. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi ſupra.

rom his enterprize, and, hearing of the emperor's great ucceſs, ordered Narſes, who commanded for him in Armenia, to ſend deputies to compliment Probus, to make im preſents, and to treat of peace. The emperor received hem very haughtily, refuſed the preſents they brought him, nd wrote an anſwer to the letter of Narſes to this purpoſe: That all he had was his; that he wondered how he could end him ſuch trifles: wherefore, to him, who might perhaps eſteem them, he had ſent them back, as well knowng how to have all that he poſſeſſed, when the Romans hould deſire it. However, he granted them peace at this ime, and terrified them ſo much with his power, that the Perſians were afraid to make their uſual excurſions for ſome ime [P]. At length Varanes took heart, and began to think of recovering ſome of the provinces which his anceſtors had oſt; but, before he was able to do any thing, he found imſelf diſturbed by domeſtic ſeditions; and, before theſe were calmed, Probus, aſſembling a great army, began his narch towards the eaſt. Varanes conceived himſelf delivered rom this misfortune, when he heard that the army, in a ſediion, had killed the emperor; but he was miſtaken; for Carus his ſucceſſor, after ſubduing ſeveral barbarous nations, ſhortly after entered Meſopotamia, and carrying all before im advanced beyond Cteſiphon, as if he intended an abolute conqueſt of that province. The fears of the Perians were, however, ſoon over; for the emperor Carus lied in the firſt march he afterwards made, either by an llneſs under which he had long laboured, or by his tent's eing ſet on fire by lightening. What was ſtill more happy or the Perſians was a notion, the Romans took from thence, hat fate had aſſigned Cteſiphon for the bounds of their emire, which they were never to paſs but to their hurt (F).

[P] Flav. Vopiſc. in vita Prob. Eutrop. hiſt. Rom. l. ix. M. A. Caſſiodor. chron. xxxi.

(F) There is nothing ſo valuable in an hiſtorian as truth, and et there is nothing more frequently wanting. We generally eſteem thoſe authors moſt, who lived neareſt the times of which hey wrote; and yet we are as often deceived by them as by any thers. A deſire of praiſing immoderately thoſe of whom they rite, too often influences hiſtorians to repreſent things otherwiſe han they apprehended them. Vopiſcus, in his life of the emeror Carus, affects a great deal of candour and impartiality, ſpecially in reſpect to the death of that emperor, which had been

Soon after Numerianus, the son of Carus, was also slain and the Roman army, under the command of Diocleſian returned into Italy. Varanes gained hereby some reſpite which he employed in ſtrengthening his frontiers; but when on the news of the diſturbances which had happened in the Roman empire, he began to think of invading its provinces Diocleſian ſuddenly returned into Armenia, with a great body of forces, and thereby ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Perſians, that they were afraid to undertake any thing. A little after died Varanes, after an unfortunate reign of ſeventeen years, leaving the kingdom to his ſon [q].

Varanes III. Year of Chriſt 294.

VARANES the third reigned no more than four months. He is dignified by hiſtorians with the title of Seganſaa. Agathias hath given us the reaſon of this appellation. He tells us, that it was the cuſtom of the Perſian monarchs to incorporate the nations they ſubdued into the body of their ſubjects, not by removing them hither or thither, but by allowing them to live, as formerly, under their own laws themſelves adding to their titles that which the antient princes of the country bore. Varanes the ſecond having, a little [q] Flav. Vopiſc. in vit. Prob. & Car. Zonar. hiſt. A. C. 28[illegible] Sext. Aurel. Victor. in Car. Agath. Scholaſt. p. 134. Grego[illegible] Abul- Phar. dynaſt. 7. p. 131.

been generally ſuppoſed ominious to the empire. He expir[illegible] in his camp before Cteſiphon blaſted, as the report went, by lightening; whence it was inferred, that the Romans ſhould never penetrate farther than this city. It was built by the Parthians on the eaſt bank of the Tigris, and was a very populous place; and beſides, the country beyond it was quite unknown to the Romans, as well as very improper for their manner of making war which probably gave birth to this opinion. However, Vopiſcus was reſolved to deſtroy it, in order to which he produces a letter from Calphurnius, ſecretary to Carus, wherein he gives a very ambiguous account of that emperor's death. He ſays it happened after the greateſt clap of thunder which was heard during the ſtorm; that his ſervants, for grief, ſet fire to his tent which occaſioned the report that he was burnt by lightening; whereas, according to the beſt account this writer could get, he died of his ſickneſs. Vopiſcus then mentions the notion that Cteſiphon was fatal to the Roman empire, and that the death of Carus was thought a judgment for attempting to paſs farther. But, ſays he, let cowardice make uſe of ſuch arts to cover it the brave will ever deſpiſe them. The moſt excellent Cæſar Maximian will never believe this; but, on the contrary, will attempt e before his death, overcome this nation, his took the tie of Seganſaa or Seganſhâh, which, Agathias expreſly tells s, ſignified king of the Segani or Segeſtani [r].

NARSES ſucceeded next, a prince of high ſpirit, who Narſes. eſigned, no leſs than Artaxares, the founder of the Year of ew Perſian monarchy, had done, the reduction of Chriſt 294.
ll the Perſian provinces, held at this time either by the arbarous nations, or conquered by the Romans. It is cerain, that never did a fairer opportunity offer for the excution of this vaſt deſign, than at the entrance of this rince's reign. The Roman empire was in ſuch diſtractin, that tho' there were two emperors, yet they found the veight to heavy for them, and therefore created two Cæſars o ſhare the burden of government. War was kindled in very corner of the empire, when Narſes, with a great ar-ny, broke into Meſopotamia, and in a ſhort time recovered noſt of the places which had been heretofore in the hands of his anceſtors. But it was not long before Diocleſian ſent Galerius, one of the Cæſars, with a numerous army to An-ioch, to check the progreſs of the Perſian. Narſes did not decline an engagement; but his ſucceſs was not equal to his courage, either in this, or in a ſecond battle. Galeri-us being conqueror in both, paſſed the river Tigris, and advanced into the very heart of the king of Perſia's dominions. Narſes, tho' he retired continually, yet kept a ſtrict eye upon the enemy, beſeeching his own troops not to look upon his conduct as timorous, but to be aſſured, that he would take an opportunity of vindicaing their honour, and revenging the loſs he had ſuſtained

[r] Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 135.

ttempt and finiſh the conqueſt of the Perſians, and penerate beyond them (18). Would it not have been better, if, in-tead of this flouriſh, he had told us, that, immediately after he death of Carus, his army, under the command of his ſon Numerianus, was attacked and beaten by the Perſians, and thereby forced to retire into the Roman provinces again (19)? Yet he ſays nothing of this, either here, or in the life of Numerianus (20), whom ſome writers affirm to have been taken and put to death by the Perſians after their victory (21).

(18) In vita Car. (19) Zonar. hiſt. A. C. 283. (20)
Flav. Vopiſc. in vita Numerian. (21) Gregor. Abul-Phar. lynaſt. 7. p. 132.

tained. He was as good as his word; for Galerius, el ted with success, abating of his usual care and circumspec on, Narses took advantage thereof, and falling upon the Ro man army while they were upon their march, gave them total a defeat, that scarce any remains of them could be a terwards drawn together. Galerius himself with much a escaped, and making haste to the army of Diocletian, pr pared to give the emperor the best account he could of h misfortune. Diocletian used him but very indifferentl shewed a high dislike of his conduct, and in a manner r fused to trust him with another army. At length, howeve the zealous importunities of Galerius prevailed, and, levi being made with all possible expedition, he was sent wi fresh forces against Narses. The Persian king had, in th interval, made the best use of his victory, retrieving n only the cities and country which he had lost, but al bringing into the field a numerous army, composed especia ly of chosen horse, to maintain the conquests he had mad in case the Romans should once more dispute them [s].

Constrained to submit to the Romans.

Galerius acted now as Narses had before; he adde prudence to fortitude, and depended no less on his own con duct, than on the courage of his forces. He went with few of his friends to view the Persian army, and having hap pily performed this exploit, he returned to his own, whic he disposed in such a manner, as to attack the Persians at un awares, whereby he gained a complete victory. Narses him self was wounded, and forced to fly with a small remnant o his army into the mountains. His baggage, treasure, paper all fell into the hands of Galerius, as did likewise his sister his queen, his concubines, and children. In vain he ende voured to repair his misfortune; the spirits of his subject were effectually damped by this blow, insomuch, that h found it impossible to collect another army capable of takin
the field against the victorious Romans, who were shortl after joined by Diocletian and his army, who, at the time of the engagement lay encamped at Antioch, in order t have sustained Galerius, in case any thing amiss had befalle him. Overcome therefore with the reflection of his misfor tunes, Narses, to rid himself of these troublesome neighbour consented to give up five of his provinces; on which condi tion peace was granted him and his queen restored; but a
for

[s] Zonar. hist. A. C. 297. Eutrop. hist. Rom. l. ix Agath. Scholast. ubi supra.

for their ſiſters, his concubines, and the other perſons of quality, who were taken in the battle, they were carried to Rome, and there led in triumph. The grief of this broke the heart of Narſes, when he had enjoyed the regal dignity about ſeven years [t].

He was ſucceeded by Miſdates, otherwiſe called Hormiſdas the ſecond, who wore the diadem ſeven years and five months, but without doing any thing remarkable. As he was long in a declining condition, and had no iſſue, the nobility of Perſia were under the utmoſt concern for the conſequences of his diſeaſe, without a ſucceſſor declared. At length it appeared, that the queen was with child; upon which a council of the magi was ſummoned, and they were required to inform the nobles whether the queen was with child of a ſon or a daughter. The magi anſwered, Of a ſon. Hereupon the diadem was placed upon the queen's great belly, and all the nobility ſwore allegiance on the faith of the foregoing prediction to the ſon ſhe ſhould bear. The king dying in the interim, the public peace was preſerved by this expedient; and at the end of nine months the queen was delivered of a ſon, who was a king before he was born [u]. This was Miſdates or Hormiſdas, Year of Chriſt 301.

Sapores, or Sapor the ſecond, who governed the dominions of his anceſtors long and happily. The account we have given in the laſt reign is ſtrongly controverted, and it muſt be allowed, that there are more teſtimonies alledged againſt it than can be urged in its ſupport. Yet we have given it the preference, for a reaſon which will appear at the bottom of the page, and which we are perſuaded, will induce the readers to be of the ſame mind (G). This prince if Sapor II. Year of Chriſt 308.

[t] M. A. Caſſiodor. chron. xxxiii. Cedren. hiſt. compend. p. 268. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. vii. p. 132. Zonar. Eutrop. Agath. ubi ſupra. [u] Agath. Scholaſt. lib. iv. p. 134.

(G) There are ſeveral paſſages in the writings of Ammianus Marcellinus (22), Zoſimus (23), Socrates (24), and other writers, which ſeem to intimate, that Sapor was not a poſthumous child, but born in his father's life-time, and educated by his direction. They alſo ſpeak of one Hormiſdas, who fled to the emperor Conſtantine, as if he had been brother to this prince. Now, if theſe facts were true, it would follow, that what is above related muſt

(22) Hiſt. lib. xvii, xviii., xix. (23) Hiſt. lib. ii. (24) Hiſt. eccleſ. lib. ii..

if we may credit an eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian, was educa under the care of an eunuch named Uztazades, who ſecretly a chriſtian. Whoever had the care of his educati certain it is, that he became a very great prince, if we may ſtow that character on one who was no very good man.
was a zealous aſſerter of the dignity of the Perſian dia and purſued ſteadily that deſign which Artaxares had firſt muſt be falſe. But if it be conſidered firſt, that the rela found in theſe authors are ſo worded, as that they may be to ſuit with either fact: that, ſecondly, there is nothing preſly ſaid of the manner in which Sapor came to the cro and that, thirdly, theſe writers appear to be frequently very differently inſtructed as to the hiſtory of Perſia, and ſcarce at acquainted with its religion: we muſt confeſs, that no gr ſtreſs can be laid on what they deliver, much leſs on what is ferred from their accounts. On the other hand, what Agath relates, he had from the Perſian records, and the Perſian reco are the beſt evidence for Perſian affairs (25). But beſides, th is another reaſon which ſo ſtrongly corroborates what Agath tells us, that one can ſcarce entertain any doubt of the truth the fact mentioned by Agathias. Sapor ſucceeded in the Per throne about the ſame time that Conſtantine became emper and he reigned ſeventy years. In the fifteenth year of his rei Hormiſdas retired into the Roman dominions. Now if Horm das had been the brother of Sapor, and had been a man be the death of his father, we muſt conceive that Sapor was w in a few years as old as he, otherwiſe he could not have b his rival. But this would ſtretch the life of Sapor to an inc dible extent, and would alſo involve us in new difficulties.

is therefore better to acknowledge Agathias's account, wh concurs exactly with the moſt remarkable events recorded by ther hiſtorians. As to the ſtory of Hormiſdas, it runs th
He is ſaid to have been a prince of the blood-royal of Per and that coming in when his father celebrated his birth feaſt, he obſerved that the nobility did not riſe to ſalute h Upon which he threatened, that if ever he came to the crow he would treat them as Marſyas the Phrygian was treated. M of the Perſian lords knew not what to make of this; but one them told the reſt the ſtory of Marſyas, who, for contendi with Apollo, was by him flayed alive. This irritated them much againſt the prince Hormiſdas, that they not only exclud him from the ſucceſſion, but cauſed him alſo to be cloſely i priſoned; whence, however, he eſcaped by the contrivance his wife; and flying to the emperor Conſtantine, met with favo

(25) De reb. geſt. Juſtian. lib. iv. p. 134.

foot, viz. of uniting all the territories of the antient rſian kings under his obedience. But he did not purſue s deſign, as ſome of his predeceſſors had done, openly, d at the head of armies: if he had, in all probability he ould not have been more fortunate than they; for the rſian militia were by no means able to combat the regu- forces of the Romans. This prudent monarch took ite different meaſures; he encouraged the barbarous peo- dwelling on the frontiers of the Roman provinces to vage and harraſs them; this he did more openly, when affairs of the Romans were in confuſion, and with eater ſecrecy, when they were better eſtabliſhed. He tended his own dominions towards the eaſt, and towards e north; he encreaſed his revenues, by encouraging in- ſtry and trade among his ſubjects; he diſciplined his rces, and above all things affected a mighty eſteem and neration for the civil and religious conſtitution of his untry [x].

THIS laſt mentioned diſpoſition induced him to perſecute e chriſtians, who were repreſented to him, by the magi, d the Jews ſettled in his dominions, as men of deteſta- e principles, bad ſubjects to their governors, and avowed emies of religion, that is, of its fundamental articles. Perſecutes the chriſtians in his dominions.

It

[x] Ammian. Marcel. lib. xvii. Euſeb. in vit. Conſtant. Sozomen. t. eccleſ. lib. ii.

vourable reception, which he very well deſerved, by the di- ence and fidelity which he manifeſted on all occaſions in the vice of the Romans (26). There is certainly a ſtrong air of ble in the firſt part of this narration; for that a Perſian prince ould be acquainted with the ſtory of Apollo and Marſyas, muſt pear ſtrange, if not incredible. Again, that ſo raſh and cruel prince ſhould, in getting out of priſon, leave all his ill qualities hind him, and come a perfect wit and hero (for ſo theſe writers int him afterwards) to the court of Conſtantine (27); this ely is very wonderful alſo; and therefore ſtripping off theſe rvellous appendages, if we credit the bare matter of fact, that ormiſdas, a prince of the blood royal of Perſia, fled to the mans, and behaved well in their ſervice; it will anſwer all ſonable purpoſes, and the current of our hiſtory receive no erruption.

(26) Zoſim. hiſt. lib. ii. A. C. 324. (27) Zonar. hiſt. C. 340.

It is ſaid, that he put Simeon biſhop of Cteſiphon, and ny other eccleſiaſtics, to death, and that he even cut the head of the eunuch before mentioned, notwithſtan he had been his governor, and his father's old and fa ful ſervant. One great crime objected to the chriſt was, their regard for Conſtantine, then emperor of Ro His power was too great for Sapores to think as yet of tacking him openly; he therefore ſent a ſolemn embaſſ Conſtantinople to compliment that prince, and to re that peace which had for ſo many years ſubſiſted betw the two empires, directing his miniſters privately to quire into the ſtrength of the Romans, and to buy quantity of arms, of which his ſubjects ſtood in g need. The emperor, though well informed of the de of Sapores, received his miniſters very graciouſly, gra their requeſts, and at their return charged them with a ter for the king of Perſia their maſter. Of this letter th are two copies extant, the one more full and correct the other. The intent of the epiſtle was to perſuade Sap to treat the chriſtians with greater lenity. The argum made uſe of therein are juſt and natural, delivered in guage becoming the writer, and him to whom it was dreſſed (H). In all probability, it had its effects; for

(H) Sozomen hath given us a long account of the cruel pe cution raiſed againſt the Perſian chriſtians by Sapor; but this writer intimates, that the whole was not only excited, managed alſo, by the magi. Thoſe who are deſirous of ente farther into this matter, may find in the works of this hiſto a very copious account, not only of the general perſecut but of the principal martyrs, their quality, and behaviour Euſebius, in his life of Conſtantine, affords us a conciſe of the perſecution; but then he gives us the letter of the em ror at large; whereas Sozomen gives us only an extract o In this letter the emperor firſt gives a ſhort account of his fa then of his ſucceſs and grandeur, which he attributes wholly God's bleſſing thereon; he afterwards expatiates on the od folly of idolatry; but without inſinuating any thing of his picion that Sapor was an idolater. He then very patheti repreſents the miſeries which had conſtantly attended unjuſt cruel princes, eſpecially perſecutors, of whom he particular Valerian, whom he aſſerts to have been happy in all his dertakings, until he perſecuted the chriſtians. Laſtly, he wa ly recommends the chriſtians in his dominions to the favou Sapor, and beſeeches him for his ſake to look upon them as good and faithful ſubjects (29).

(28) Hiſt. eccleſ. lib. ii. c. 9, 10, 11, 12. (29) In Conſtant.

informed by an impartial author, that Sapores treated chriſtians afterwards with leſs ſeverity. Indeed, he had ver troubled them at all, if he had not been inſtigated ſome malicious prieſts of his own religion, and the in-cretions perhaps of ſome chriſtian prieſts.

HOWEVER, he abandoned not the ſcheme he had for-ed of raiſing himſelf and his ſucceſſors to the ſupreme do-nion over the eaſt. When he thought he had brought ngs to bear, he generouſly acquainted Conſtantine with intention, tranſmitting to him by his embaſſadors a let-, or rather a manifeſto, wherein he expreſly ſet forth his im to all the dominions antiently belonging to the Per-n emperors, affirming, that the river Strymon was the le-boundary of his empire. Conſtantine returned him an wer, full of dignity and reſolution; and though he was w grown in years, made great preparations for war, embled a numerous army, and reſolved to command it in ſon. When the ſeaſon of the year approached, he joined forces, and immediately began his march for the eaſtern vinces; but providence prevented his deſign from taking ect, by removing him out of this life, ſo that together h his empire, he left the management of this Perſian war his ſucceſſors [y]. Sapor did not fail to make uſe of the antages afforded him by the diſorders which happened in empire on the death of Conſtantine. He inſtantly en-d the Roman provinces, and reannexed to his own do-nions what his anceſtors had loſt. It is a very difficult g to give an account of this war from the Greek and in hiſtorians, notwithſtanding the writings of many who d in thoſe days have come down to our hands; by rea-of their evident partiality, ſome commending the empe-Conſtans, as a very martial prince, others upbraiding with puſillanimity, both endeavouring rather to ſuit ory to their own opinions, than to the truth. By ma-g proper allowances, however, for the viſible biaſſes of e writers, the truth ſeems to have been, that in pitched les, and in the defending of towns, the Romans were erior to the Perſians; but that in ſwift marches, horſe-bats, and ſurprizes, the Perſians had the advantage.

Reſolves on a war with the Romans.

HENCE it came to paſs, that altho' Sapor reconquered e tracts of country, and was ſucceſsful in many engage-nts; yet could he not prevail againſt Niſibis, the ſtron-geſt

Which proves tedious and bloody.

[y] Zonar. hiſt A. C. 337. Zoſim. hiſt. lib. ii. A. C. 338. Eu-. lib. x. Amm. Marcel. Euſeb. Sozom. ubi ſupra.

geſt fortreſs the Romans had in thoſe parts, though h ten beſieged it, and exerted his utmoſt force, in order t liver his ſubjects from a thorn that continually pricked t but he was conſtantly defeated, and conſtrained after loſſes to riſe from before it. As to the circumſpectio the emperor Conſtans, when in the field, it might very bably be owing to the ſituation of thoſe countries, w were the ſeat of war. In a plain country, ſuch as Meſ tamia, the emperor was forced to act with great circ ſpection, becauſe the enemy had all advantages, their ca ry having room to extend themſelves, to retire, and to c back to the charge, which in a mountainous ſituation could not have done. We need not wonder therefore, the Romans were backward in fighting, and more ſol tous about fortifying their camps than ſeeking the ene
In the battle of Singara, which was fought in the ni Sapor had at firſt the advantage by reaſon of the ſurp the Romans were under; but when they had recovered th ſelves a little, they repulſed the enemy ſo briſkly, tha the end Sapor was forced to retire, after having loſt his in the battle, and received a dangerous wound himſ
Both parties were in the end tired out with the war;
Roman emperor therefore leaving the care of the eaſtern p vinces to Gallus, whom he had lately created Cæſar, re ned into the weſtern provinces of his empire, while Sa who perceived that little was now to be got from the mans, turned his arms upon his eaſtern neighbours, left the care of his frontiers towards the Romans to his m experienced generals. In his expeditions againſt the Ba rians, he was more fortunate than againſt the Rom
Some he ſubdued by force, others readily yielded him o dience; with his moſt powerful and inveterate enemies made a ſolid and laſting peace. In the midſt of this ſucc he received advice that overtures had been made to his nerals in the weſt for the concluſion of a peace. To ſ therefore his readineſs in this point, he diſpatched one N ſes, a nobleman of great credit in his court, to carry letters to Conſtans, with the terms on which he was c tent to enter on a treaty. The miniſter proceeded to mium, in order to have an interview with Conſtans; t he preſented him with the letters of the Perſian king, w ten in the uſual ſtrain of the Perſian monarchs, i. e.
lofty ſwelling ſtyle. The purport was, that notwithſtan Sapor knew himſelf to have a juſt claim to all the coun between Persia and the river Strymon, yet he was content for the sake of peace to be satisfied with Mesopotamia and Armenia; which once yielded up, he would willingly become the friend of the Romans. Narses, perceiving how ill his master's letter was taken, endeavoured all that in him lay to pacify the Romans, and to obtain from the emperor an account of his demands, with which Constans readily complied. He named on his side embassadors, who were to go to Sapor, and who were charged with letters, importing that, while himself was possessed of but a part of the Roman empire, he had notwithstanding maintained its antient boundary in the east; and that now being master of the whole, it was not reasonable to expect that he should yield to such conditions as had been proposed. The Roman embassadors found the king of Persia at Ctesiphon, where they had many conferences with him and his ministers, though to very little purpose, for the Persian would remit nothing; however, time was gained, in which Constans came first to Constantinople, and then prepared to set out for the east [y].

Antoninus deserts and Sapor renews the war.

About this time one Antoninus, an officer of great credit in the Roman army, being persecuted by some of the emperors favourites, fled to Sapor, by whom he was received with open arms, treated with the utmost kindness, and immediately admitted into the highest confidence. In the mean time, the emperor had been prevailed upon to remove Ursinicus, who was general of the horse in the east, and to give his command to Sabinian, a very old man, who thought himself very cautious, but was by others esteemed timid, and most unfit for supreme command. Antoninus quickly gave the Persian notice of the incapacity of the Roman general, who thereupon determined, with the numerous army under his command, immediately to enter the Roman provinces, and to advance as fast as possible without imbarrassing himself with sieges, or attempting to divide his forces, in order to garrison towns. Accordingly, he passed the Tigris, and marched with all imaginable diligence towards the Euphrates, intending, if possible, to penetrate into Syria, hoping to pillage that fruitful country, which had enjoyed so many years peace [z]. But Ursicinus, who was returned [y] Zonar. hist. A. C. 350. Zosim. hist. lib. ii. A. C. 352. Ammian. Marcel. lib. xviii. Eutrop. lib. x. [z] Ammian. Marcel. lib. xviii. c. 5.

returned again into the eaſt with the title of general of foot, prevented him by throwing up works on the ſide the river, and poſting himſelf with his troops behind the Sapor then, by the advice of Antoninus, turned to the le and before it was expected, inveſted the city of Ami
In the neighbourhood of this place he took ſeveral ſtro caſtles, and in one of them a conſiderable number of chri an virgins, who had dedicated themſelves to the ſervice God. The Perſian treated them not only with humani but with the utmoſt politeneſs, being deſirous to ſhew t proſperity ſoftened his diſpoſition, inſtead of rendering h arrogant. Amida made a long defence, and the ſiege the of is ſaid to have coſt Sapor thirty thouſand men. It w at laſt, however, taken by ſtorm, after a ſiege of ſeven three days. The principal officers of the garriſon he hange the men he ſent into ſlavery, after which he put an end the campaign on this ſide; he entered, however, afterwa Meſopotamia, where he took the town of Singara, and r ned it; he then attacked Bezabda, and after a ſiege ſome days, took it, and fortified it; then he advanced Virta, which he likewiſe inveſted; but after a ſiege of ſo continuance, was obliged to retire. The emperor Conſta in the mean time paſſed the Euphrates, and came to Amid over the ruins of which he is ſaid to have wept; he th advanced, in hopes of regaining the places taken by Sapo and proceeded to beſiege Bezabda, but to no purpoſe; the rainy ſeaſon, and a ſcarcity of proviſion, obliged hi to raiſe his ſiege, and return into Syria, where he contin all the winter [a] (I).

SAP

[a] Ammian. Marcel. lib. xx. Eutrop. lib. x. Zona
A. C. 355. Zoſim. hiſt. lib. iii. Sozomen. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. iv.

(I) It would have been very eaſy to have rendered this part our hiſtory more particular and more entertaining than it is, there had not been two very cogent arguments offered by the v nature of the work to keep us here much within bounds.
firſt, as all the accounts we have come from Latin and Greek thors, they eſpecially regard the conduct of the eaſtern empe their miniſters and generals, and conſequently belong rather to Conſtantinopolitan than Perſian hiſtory. Secondly, they agree little among themſelves, and yet are all of them ſo partial to th own countrymen, that ſhould we relate exactly what thoſe wri are pleaſed to ſay of the Perſians, we ſhould rather deceive th infor

SAPOR, in the beginning of the next ſpring, drew together a great army, and made a ſhew of entering the Roman provinces immediately, which compelled the emperor Conſtans to prepare alſo to take the field. As he had by this time not only a very great body of forces, but thoſe too the very beſt in the empire, his great excellence lying in an exact knowledge of military diſcipline, in all probability the war would have been both bloody and laſting, if it had not been prevented by the military prudence of the Perſian; to whom when an account was brought of the Roman preparations, he inſtantly determined to put ſtrong garriſons into his frontiers, and then to withdraw the remainder of his forces; which he accordingly did. The Roman emperor perceiving, that, without a peace, the war was at an end, did the like on his ſide; and having given directions for fortifyinform our readers, as too many hiſtorians do. There was a neceſſity of making theſe obſervations, that the nature of this part of our hiſtory might be well underſtood. We have herein ſtuck cloſe to facts, without ſcrupulouſly reporting circumſtances, becauſe the latter have frequently appeared to us improbable, or at leaſt violently exaggerated. Ammianus Marcellinus is the author on whom we have principally depended in the hiſtory of this reign. He was a man of quality, a ſoldier, and one who actually ſerved in this very war, of which he writes. Beſides all this, he was a native of Antioch, and therefore perfectly well acquainted with the ſeat of the war. However, as he was a Pagan, he leſſens all the chriſtian emperors, that his hero Julian may appear with the greater luſtre; and as he was a Roman, he exaggerates the barbarity and want of diſcipline among the Perſian troops, who yet held the Romans at bay, and made very long ſieges, which tumultuary armies never do (30). Zoſimus is by far more outrageous than Marcellinus. He was ſo bigotted a heathen, that he will not allow Conſtantine the Great to have done the leaſt thing worthy of that title. He cenſures him for withdrawing the garriſons from the frontiers of the empire, and inſinuates, that by this means the Perſians ravaged the Roman provinces with impunity (31). The chriſtian writers, on the other hand, magnify all the actions of Conſtantine (32). In ſuch a ſituation we could do no more than aſſemble the matters of fact relating to Perſia, and deliver them in a plain ſtyle, and in their natural order; for had we entered into the comparing of authors and weighing authorities, we ſhould have exceeded all bounds, and, after all, perhaps waſted our time to no great purpoſe.

His prudence ſaves his forces.

(30) Hiſt. rer. geſt. ſub. imp. Conſtant. Julian. Jovian. &c. (31) Hiſt. l. ii. prop. fin. (32) Euſeb. in vit. Conſtant. Zonar. hiſt. Rom. Sozomen. hiſt. eccleſ. &c.

ing the places which were moſt in danger, he reſolved march away immediately againſt Julian, who had taken title of Auguſtus, and had given juſt grounds to ſuſpect aimed at the empire [b].

His dominions invaded by the emperor Julian.

In this march the emperor fell ſick and died; whereby J lian was raiſed to be abſolute lord of the Roman empire, whole forces of which he intended to make uſe of in order deſtroy the Perſians; that is, to break their force ſo effect ally, as that it ſhould be impoſſible for them ever to troul more the Roman provinces. Full of this great project, did every thing which might conciliate the minds of the ſoldie raiſe his own reputation, or by any means contribute to fa litate his enterprize; in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that t army diſcovered an unuſual alacrity, and readily followed hi into the dominions of Sopores, who contented himſelf wi acting on the defenſive, having no hopes at all of defeati the Romans in a pitched battle under ſo martial a prince. this expedition Hormiſdas the Perſian commanded the le wing of the Roman army, and by his advice it was that t emperor regulated moſt of his deſigns. As long as he this, ſucceſs attended his arms; ſome ſtrong places he took force, others yielded through fear; but moſt were given up him by treachery. At length he beſieged Cteſiphon, whi had been the bulwark of the Parthian empire, but witho ſucceſs; for it was well fortified, and had a numerous garriſo Here it was that the Romans began to diſcover how puiſſa an enemy they had to deal with [c].

Whom he deſtroys, by drawing him too far into his country.

The Perſians ſkirmiſhed with him every day; the cou try on all ſides was burnt and deſtroyed, inſomuch, that ſeemed impracticable to hope any further advantages on t ſide. Julian therefore reſolved to repaſs the Tigris, which he had a fleet of tranſports laden with proviſions. Perſian of quality deſerting to him, aſſured him, that method he took would be equally prejudicial to his fame to his affairs; that hitherto he might be juſtly ſtyled the co queror of the Perſians, and that he might ſtill better defe this title, if he would follow his advice; which was, quit the ſide of the river, to burn his fleet, and to ma through a broad open road, into which he promiſed to co duct him, where, after three or four days march, he wo find an end put to all the difficulties, which he either actually ſtruggled with, or even apprehended. Horſmiſdas, when the emperor conſulted him upon this project, told him plainly, That it was impracticable, and that he would be undone if he purſued it. Julian, however, was inflexible; he ordered his ſoldiers to furniſh themſelves with twenty days proviſions, and having ſo done he commanded the fleet to be ſet on fire, maugre all the ſolicitations of his friends, who, while it was yet in a flame, convinced him that he was betrayed; whereupon he ordered the Perſian nobleman and his attendants to be put to the torture. This was executed upon the ſervants; but as for their lord, he was fled. It ſerved only to encreaſe the emperor's diſquiet; for the men readily acknowledged, that they came on purpoſe to miſlead him. Orders were then given to ſave as many of the veſſels as was poſſible, which however, were but a few; and then, as if he had perfectly loſt his ſenſes, Julian threw himſelf and his army into that road, which had been pointed out to him by his enemies. For three or four days they met with little or no interruption; but afterwards Sapor, with the whole force of Perſia, coaſted them in their march, and, at the beginning of the night, continually ſet upon their rear guard. The weather proving intenſely hot, water ſcarce, and proviſions failing, Julian ſaw plainly that his obſtinacy had brought him into difficulties almoſt unſurmountable. He ſtill continued to bear up againſt them with great conſtancy, and the ſoldiers, encouraged by his example, repulſed the Perſians with great ſlaughter, as often as they attacked them. At length, on the twenty fifth of June in the evening, a mighty cloud of duſt aroſe, occaſioned by the advance of the greater part of the Perſian horſe. On this occaſion the Perſian noblemen gave full teſtimony of their valour, making ſuch an impreſſion on the left wing of the Roman army, as obliged the emperor to repair thither in perſon; whither he was no ſooner come, than he received in his body an arrow, whether from the enemy, or from one of his own ſoldiers, could never be known, of which wound he died the next night. This threw his army into a terrible conſternation, notwithſtanding they had been victorious in the fight the day before, ſlain many thouſand Perſians, and amongſt them fifty perſons of quality [d].

[b] Ammian. Marcel. l. xxi. Eutrop. ubi ſupra. Zoſim. ubi ſup Sozomen. hiſt. eccl. l. v. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 113. [c] trop. l. x. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxiii. Zonar. A. C. 363. Soc hiſt. eccleſ. l. iii. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 307. Zoſim. l. iii.

[d] Ammian. Marcel. xxiv. xxv. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 308. Zonar. ubi ſupra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. vii. p. 140. Zoſim. l. iii. A. C. 363.

Makes an advantageous peace with the Romans.

SAPOR, as ſoon as he was informed of the emperor's dea made proclamation that he would give a great reward to man by whoſe hand he fell; which, however, was ne claimed. At the ſame time, to ſhew his deſire of pea he ſent deputies to Jovian, who had ſucceeded Julian. four days a peace was concluded, whereby the five provin in diſpute were for ever yielded to the Perſians, toget with the ſtrong fortreſs of Niſibis, which had been ſo l the bulwark of the empire. As ſoon as the treaty concluded, Sapor furniſhed the Romans, for their mon with proviſions, and alſo gave and received hoſtages for due performance of the treaty; which was exactly exec ed, tho' with much reluctancy, by the Romans; yet the mighty army led by Julian into Perſia, ſcarce a te part returned, and even theſe perhaps had never return but by the favour of this peace, which they ſo much cried [e] (K).

DURI

[e] Ammian. Marcel. ubi ſupra. Socrat. hiſt. eccleſ. l. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 308. Eutrop. l. x. Agath. Scholaſt. 136.

(K) The various accounts which are given by different auth of the death of the emperor Julian, belong to the Conſtanti politan hiſtory; and therefore we have but juſt touched upon ſubject here. Ammianus Marcellinus and Zoſimus (22) afford higheſt commendations to their hero Julian, on account of penetrating farther into the Perſian territories than any of his deceſſors. The laſt-mentioned of theſe authors carries his eul ſo far, as to pretend, that Julian conquered the greateſt par the Perſian empire; than which nothing can be falſer, or m ridiculous. Almoſt all the Greek hiſtorians agree in blam Jovian for the peace he made; and on this account they degr him far below his predeceſſor. It may not be amiſs to take opportunity of ſetting in a true light a point, which hath ſo nerally, and ſo long, been miſunderſtood. Julian was, with queſtion, a very gallant man and an excellent ſoldier; but he as certainly no general, ſince there is ſcarce a maxim in the of war, againſt which he did not expreſly act in this Perſian pedition. All the Roman generals, who had ſuffered themſe to be dazled with the reputation of conquering the Perſians, periſhed in their fooliſh attempts; for, from Craſſus to Ca no Roman had ever penetrated the Perſian dominions, but to own diſhonour; and therefore there could be nothing more t

(22) Zoſim. hiſt. Rom. l. iii. Ammian. Marcel. l. x Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 136.

DURING the reſt which ſo advantageous a treaty afforded to the Perſians, their monarch neglected no opportunity of ſettling effectually the bounds of his empire towards Tartary and India. This took him up ſome time, and ſerved alſo to exerciſe his ſoldiers; but after the death of Jovian the Roman emperor, when the affairs of that people were again diſordered, Sapor did not fail to make a new irruption, in breach, as the Latin writers ſay, of the peace ſubſiſting between the two empires. The iſſue of this war is no leſs obſcure than its commencement. All we know of it is, that, at the beginning, Sapor had great advantages in Armenia, having ſlain Arſaces, who then reigned in that country, where he alſo reduced a large territory under his obedience; but, on the arrival of Arinthius, he was conſtrained to abandon a great part of his conqueſts. However, being intent on aggrandizing the Perſian dominions on this ſide, he ſtill remained in arms, and transferred the imperial ſeat to Cteſiphon, the old capital of the Parthian empire, that he might be always at hand to improve ſuch trary to reaſon, than Julian's puſhing forwards as he did. Again, he acted without any certain view; he marched he knew not where; he fought he knew not what; he took for guides he knew not whom; he burnt a fleet, when of all things it was moſt neceſſary to him; he ſacrificed his ſoldiers, in making them paſs rivers almoſt unpaſſable in themſelves, and in the ſight of an enemy perfectly acquainted with the country. In one word, there were five large provinces in diſpute: Julian, if he had taken cool and proper meaſures, might have diſpoſed things ſo as to have ſecured them for ever to the Romans; but, inſtead of doing this, he did the ſingle thing he ſhould not have done; he quitted the antient Roman method of making war, to take up that of the Perſians; and by engaging Sapor in his own way, and in his own country, ſacrificed a numerous and victorious army. But if Julian was not, Sapor certainly was, a general; he managed the war as it ought to have been managed; he retired that he might conquer; and when he had conquered, he thought of nothing but making an advantageous peace. In this he ſhewed himſelf a wiſe king, a great captain, and an able ſtateſman. The eloquence of the Greek writers will everlaſtingly do juſtice to the military virtues of Julian, and the chriſtian piety of his ſucceſſor. As we are now writing the Perſian hiſtory, we thought it but juſtice to vindicate the character of a Perſian monarch, by a ſhort recapitulation of acts, which is all that is intended by this note.

Turns his arms againſt other enemies.

opportunities as might offer (L). It does not, however, appear, that, after this time, he gained any great victory; and all we know farther is, that in the beginning of the reign of Gratian, this reſtleſs and ambitious monarch end

(L) Ammianus Marcellinus hath given a pretty large account of this Armenian war, wherein he charges the king of Perſia with breach of faith to the Romans, and with exceſſive cruelty and treachery towards the Armenians. He ſays, that he took advantage of that confuſion which overſpread the Roman affairs after the death of the emperor Jovian, to fall upon the Armenians, firſt by ſlight incurſions, quickly after more openly and with greater force; that in the progreſs of the war, he, on ſome pretence or other, prevailed on Arſaces king of Armenia to admit of a perſonal conference with him, at which he ſeized him, and inſtantly cauſed his eyes to be put out, and himſelf to be cruelly beaten with ſilver rods; and a ſhort time afterwards ordered him to be crucified, laying then ſiege to the capital of Armenia, where the queen, the king's ſons, and treaſures were; that the Armenians, in this diſtreſs, had recourſe to the emperor Valentinian, who ſent to their aſſiſtance Arinthius, with an army which obliged Sapor to retire, tho' he exclaimed againſt it as a breach of the peace (34). It is eaſy enough to ſee that this account is perplexed, and altogether favourable to the Romans; but it is not eaſy to unravel it, or, at this diſtance of time, to point out all the miſrepreſentations contained therein. We know, however, that they are not wanting, and that the true ground of the war was this: Julian, when he made his irruption into Perſia, compelled Arſaces king of Armenia to attend him with all the forces he could raiſe, tho' he would not accept the aſſiſtance of other princes. This he did, becauſe Arſaces was a chriſtian, as he had a mind to leave him and his ſubjects. When Sapor came to treat with Jovian, he excluded the Armenians, intending to revenge himſelf upon them for the aſſiſtance they had given Julian; ſo that the war was not altogether without pretence, and more than the complaint of the Romans aſſiſting them, ſince they could not do this according to the letter of their treaty with the Perſians. Some time after, when Valentinian ſuſpected Para who ſucceeded his father Arſaces, he, by fraud, got him into his hands, and, after very ill uſage, cauſed him to be cruelly put to death; which fact was highly reſented by Sapor. Henceforward the peace was ill-obſerved on both ſides; and, on the whole, it is moſt evident, that Sapor did not employ either fraud or force more unjuſtly than the Romans, with whom he had to deal, tho' the authors of that nation are not always ready to acknowledge as much.

(34) Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii. Socrat. l. iii.

ed his days, after having reigned ſeventy years, or, as ome ſay, ſeventy-two, with great variety of fortune [f].

To Sapor ſucceeded Artaxerxes; but who he was is a queſtion. Some writers are poſitive that he was the ſon of his predeceſſor; others are no leſs poſitive that he was his brother. Thoſe who will have him to be ſon of Sapor, give us this account of the matter: They ſay, that Sapor had four ſons, Hormiſdas, Adarnaſſes, and Narſes, by great princeſſes; and this Artaxerxes by a lady of exquiſite beauty, but of no diſtinguiſhed family. Hormiſdas, by going over to the Romans, forfeited his right to the crown, and ſo Adarnaſſes came to be conſidered as his heir; but this prince threw away his title to the kingdom, by diſplaying his own unworthineſs to poſſeſs it; for the inhabitants of Meſopotamia having preſented to king Sapor a tent of camels ſkins, curiouſly painted, and enriched with gold, the king gave it to his ſon, and afterwards aſking him how he liked it; "The thing, replied he, is well enough; but, when I "come to be king, I will have a tent of the ſkins of men." His actions correſponded ſo exactly with this barbarous expreſſion, that it was judged proper to ſet him aſide. Narſes had the misfortune to offend the king, who therefore diſinherited him, whereby the crown came to this Artaxerxes, who leaſt thought of it; a moſt romantic and incredible tale! But the other opinion, that Artaxerxes was not the ſon, but the brother, of Sapor, is not at all the more probable as making the foregoing ſtory inconſiſtent and unintelligible; we ought therefore to ſuppoſe he was his kinſman only. However, our European hiſtorians tell us nothing more concerning this prince, than that he maintained the peace with the Romans, and governed his dominions, quietly four years [g]. (M).

Artaxerxes. Year of Chriſt 380.

To

[f] Agath. Scholaſt. ubi ſupra. Cedren. ibid. p. 312. Zoſim. l. iv. Paul. Diacon. l. xi. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii.

[g] Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 137. Zonar. A. C. 340. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. vii. p. 143.

(M) In this note we are to render a reaſon for our departing in the text from all authorities, in making the ſucceſſor of Sapor neither his brother nor his ſon, but his kinſman only; and this we ſhall do as briefly as is conſiſtent with the reader's ſatisfaction. For firſt, we will ſhew, that he could not be the brother of Sapor; ſecondly, we will ſhew, that he could not be his ſon; and, thirdly Sapor III. Year of Chriſt 385.

To him ſucceeded his ſon Sapor, the third of that nar who reigned five years; but what he did in that ſpa we find not in any Greek author, probably becauſe, adh ing to the peace made with his grandfather, he troub not the Roman empire, then governed by Theodoſius Great [h].

Varanes IV. Year of Chriſt 390.

VARANES, or, as the Greeks write it, Vararanes, fourth of that name, ſucceeded his father Sapor. He is known by the ſirname of Cerma Saa, of which we h little or no account as to its meaning. Elſewhere, hov ver, this difficulty will be cleared up, and the title ſhe to be Kerman Shâh, which province of Kerman was his reign added to the Perſian empire. He alſo maintai the peace with the Romans, being otherwiſe employe and therefore the Greek hiſtorians ſay very little of hi any more than of his predeceſſors, tho' he reigned elev years [i].

Iſdigertes. Year of Chriſt 401.

ISDIGERTES ſucceeded Varanes, a monarch deſerve renowned for his many great virtues. He was cotempor with Arcadius emperor of the eaſt, with whom he liv

[h] Agath. Scholaſt. ubi ſupra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi ſup
[i] Agath. Scholaſt. ubi ſupra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. dynaſt. p. 146.

ly, we will reconcile our conjecture to hiſtory. If this Art erxes had been the brother of Sapor, he muſt have been older, younger; if older, why was he not king before him? or h came ſo cunning and ſo caul a prince, as the Romans make Sa to be, to ſpare an elder brother during a reign of ſeventy yea Younger he could not be, ſince Sapor himſelf was a poſthum ſon (25). If he had been the ſon of Sapor, then, the hiſtor ſays, he had three elder brothers, of whom Hormiſdas eſcap to the Romans, in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of Sap and he was the ſecond ſon; how then could this be, eſpecia if, as the Greek hiſtorians ſay, Hormiſdas was married? It mains, that we account for the expreſſion of Agathias who preſly affirms Artaxerxes to have been the brother of Sap for we have ſet the credit of Agathias too high to be unhin by a ſlight criticiſm. We ſay then, that Agathias, writing a the Perſian records, retained the word brother, which the P ſians, as other oriental nations do, uſed only in a large ſenſe; therefore this does not contradict, but confirm, our conj ture, that Artaxerxes was the near kinſman of Sapor, and not only in terms of peace, but of friendſhip; inſomuch, that at his death the emperor Arcadius declared him protector of his ſon Theodoſius the ſecond, and of the Roman empire. Of this when Iſdigertes was informed, he ſent Antiochus, one of his eunuchs, a perſon of great wiſdom and experience, to take care of his pupil's education, and by him declared to the ſenate of Conſtantinople, that he would turn the whole force of the Perſian monarchy, upon whomſoever ſhould attempt to diſturb the young prince's adminiſtration, whereby the empire was preſerved, during a minority, in perfect quiet. As the young Theodoſius grew up, the ties of friendſhip became ſtronger between the two empires, and embaſſies were more frequent than in former times (N). Amongſt other miniſters whom Theodoſius more. The reaſon of our introducing this notion in our text was, the deſire we had to make the hiſtory clear, plain, and conſiſtent, which this account does. As to the ſtory of the tent, we find it in Zonaras (36), as we found the ſtory of Marſyas in Zoſimus (37); and we take them both for fictions. Truth is always uniform, and therefore, as far as theſe ſtories are conſiſtent with each other, and with common ſenſe, we acknowledge them to be true; but, where they differ from theſe we crave leave to differ from them. In all probability the fact was, that the family of Hormiſdas ſettled at Conſtantinople, and that Artaxerxes was the next of the blood royal reſident in Perſia, and in a capacity of ſucceeding to the crown; for, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, the Perſians were not ſcrupulous in ſetting aſide young children.

(35) Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv.

(N) This fact is doubted of by Agathias, and he aſſures us, was not doubted of by him only, but by many of the learned in his time; the reaſon of which, he ſays, was the ſilence of cotemporary authors, and the ſtory's being traced no higher than the writings of Procopius (38). We have, however, made no doubt of inſerting this as a fact in our text, and we hope to give the reader ſatisfaction for ſo doing in this note. As to Procopius, if he was alone, he would be an inconteſtable witneſs; for he did not live at any great diſtance, neither was he one who reported things upon truſt. We find this in the introduction to his hiſtory, and he ſays expreſly, that Arcadius's will was ſent to Iſdigertes, and that the nomination of this prince to the tutelage of young Theodoſius preſerved the empire in peace (39). All

(36) A. C. 340. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 136. (37) Lib. ii. iii. (38) Agath. (39) Procop. de bell. Perſic. l. i. c. 2. p. 8.

Theodosius made use of, Marathas, a Mesopotamian bi shop, was one, a person equally remarkable for the inno cence of his life, and for the winning pleasantry of his co versation. His stay in Persia quite altered the state of th christian church in that country; for whereas before the were looked upon not only as heretics, but as very b subjects, on account of their inclination to the Roma emperors, who were of their own religion, Marathas fully informed him of the true doctrines of the christi faith, that he began to entertain just ideas of the innocen and loyalty of its professors. This alarmed the Persia priests, and they instantly began to form schemes f the destruction of so wise and good a man. He had, seem

All the Greek writers own, that, in the space of twenty o years, which this Persian king reigned, he never attempted a thing against the Romans; but, on the contrary, lived w Theodosius in the strictest amity all his days, which seems be a strong presumption in favour of this account. Zonaras, his history, relates this fact without the least sign of diffiden or suspicion (40). Cedrenus doth the same with this addition circumstance, that the emperor Arcadius bequeathed the Pers king a great sum of money for his trouble (41). As to A tiochus, all authors agree, that he was the first governor Theodosius, and that, for a time, the emperor was swayed his counsels (42). The reason Agathias doubted the fact, see to be his zeal for the Roman glory, which, he thought, w tarnished by the choice Arcadius made of a barbarian for tutor of his son. Procopius informs us, that it was the hi reputation of Isdigertes for wisdom and probity, which induc Arcadius to make choice of him; and for this he commen him (43). Yet Agathias himself yields a higher complim to Isdigertes than Procopius; for if, without being his tut that monarch abstained from any attempts upon his dominio merely because Theodosius was a child, he was one of the m generous princes that ever lived, and deserved the confide of all the princes his cotemporaries. The truth seems to that Procopius, as a man of business, a courtier, and a soldi was free from prejudice; whereas Agathias, who was a dow right scholar, and lived in an age when it was fashionable hate the Persians, could not let a story so much to their hono pass, without intimating a doubt about it (44).

(40) A. C. 423. (41) Hist. comp. p. 335. (
Sozomen. hist. eccles. l. ix. Evagr. hist. eccl. l. i. Cedren.
supra. (43) Procop. ubi supra. (44) Agath. Schol ubi supra.

ſeems, by his prayers, cured the king of a fixed and inveterate head-ach, which induced that monarch to reverence him greatly, and for his ſake his religion, without forſaking, however, his own. To drive the biſhop from court, and to revive in the king's mind his antient diſlike to the chriſtians, the Perſian magi contrived a very whimſical expedient, which yet had well nigh effected their purpoſe, ridiculous as it was. They let down a man into a pit behind the ſacred fire in the king's oratory, and having covered the perſon placed therein with carpets, they directed him, when the king came to worſhip, to ſpeak the following words in a ſhrill voice; "Impious and ungrateful prince, I will chaſe thee from thy throne, if thou baniſh not that chriſtian, whom thou believeſt to be acceptable to God." Iſdigertes was mightily ſurprized when he firſt heard this; but more ſo, when he heard it conſtantly repeated as often as he went to his devotions. At length he determined to ſend back Marathas, but with the utmoſt civility, as well in reſpect to his maſter as to himſelf; but when he came to break it to the biſhop, that prelate penetrated the contrivance, and adviſed the king, when he next heard the voice, to order certain perſons to dig in the place whence it came. Iſdigertes did ſo; the man was diſcovered, the fraud detected, and the magi decimated. The king moreover granted hereupon free leave to the chriſtians to build churches throughout his dominions, where-ever they thought fit, and freed them in all reſpects from the penal laws enacted againſt them by his predeceſſors [k].

Chriſtianity highly favoured by him.

MARATHAS returned after this to Conſtantinople, and was employed a ſecond time in an embaſſy to Perſia. The magi, hearing of his coming, had recourſe to new frauds; but the king eaſily ſaw through theſe without aaſſiſtance. They were therefore ſo far from preventing his giving a favourable reception to the biſhop, that they engaged him to treat this prelate with ſtill greater marks of favour than he had given him before. Marathas had not been long in Perſia, before a new opportunity offered for raiſing his credit with the king. The prince of Perſia was thought to be poſſeſſed. This pious prelate, aſſiſted by Abdas, whom he had conſecrated biſhop in Perſia, joined their prayers to God for the prince's recovery; which ſoon after happened, to the joy of the whole court, and to the honour of of the chriſtian religion. Iſdigertes governed in the wh twenty-one years, and, during that ſpace, lived in perf peace and friendſhip with the Romans, as alſo with chriſtians in his own dominions, whom he treated not o with lenity, but indulgence [l].

[k] Socrat. hiſt. eccleſ. l. vii. c. 8.

Varanes V. Year of Chriſt 421.

VARANES, or Vararanes, the fifth, ſucceeded his fat Iſdigertes, and ſeems, notwithſtanding what the Greek w ters affirm, to have had, in his own diſpoſition, a gr tenderneſs for the chriſtians. He had not, however, be long upon the throne, before he found himſelf provoked ſuch a degree, as conſtrained him to lay aſide all ind gence, and openly to perſecute them. Thus it came to pa Abdas the Perſian prelate, in a high and unwarrantable of zeal, burnt a fire temple to the ground. The ki ſent for him, and having a great reſpect for his perſon, r proved him gently, and adviſed him to rebuild it; whi he abſolutely refuſed to do. The chriſtian writers univ ſally condemn the raſhneſs of the firſt act, and the prelat conſtancy in the ſecond. However, the magi reſented t matter ſo warmly, and, by their clamour, ſo incenſed t people, that the king was obliged to proceed to extremit to order all the chriſtian churches to be demoliſhed, and put the biſhop Abdas to death. After this, a furious p ſecution began, on the old ſuppoſition, that ſuch as dif in religion from their prince cannot be loyal to his gover ment. As for perſons of quality, they were deprived their places, had their eſtates confiſcated, but were ind ged in life and liberty, in hopes of their coming over. Ho miſdas, a man deſcended of the antient race of Achæm nes, after being ſtripped of his fortune, was reduced keep camels for his bread. Another nobleman had his w taken from him, and given to his ſlave; but theſe metho wrought no converſions. The meaner ſort of people we ſtill in a worſe way; they were delivered over to the me cy of the prieſts, and conſequently were ſubjected to inexpreſſible variety of deaths and torments [m].

War breaks out with the Romans.

THESE things quickly occaſioned differences to ariſe b tween the Perſian and Roman monarchs, eſpecially as r ſons of ſtate concurred with theſe religious jars. Theod fu

[l] Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. p. 137. Paul. Diacon. l. x Gregor. Abul-Phar dynaſt. vii. p. 146. [m] Theodor hiſt. eccleſ. l. v. c. 39. Socrat. hiſt. eccleſ. l. vii. c. 20. Evagr i. c. 19.

ſius, in the days of Iſdigertes, had lent a certain number of miners, who were to be employed in working anew ſome ſilver and gold mines, which had been long neglected in Perſia. Theſe miners Varanes had refuſed to ſend home; and therefore, as well on this account, as becauſe multitudes of chriſtians fled out of Perſia into the dominions of Theodoſius, both parties began to prepare for war. The king of Perſia made choice of one Narſes for his general, and ſent him to his frontiers, where he expected to have found a numerous army: but he was miſtaken; the troops were not come to the place of rendezvous; and, before they could be aſſembled, the Roman general Ardaburius, marching through Armenia, fell into Azazene, a Perſian province, and began to waſte it with fire and ſword. Narſes no ſooner received this news, than he inſtantly marched to give him battle with the forces he had about him. The conſequence was, that the Perſian was worſted; but, being an able captain, made a good retreat. He ſaw, that it was now impoſſible to prevent the deſtruction of Azazene by force; and therefore, returning back to the place of rendezvous, whither by this time the Perſian troops were come, he, at the head of a very numerous army, made an irruption into Meſopotamia, a Roman province, which obliged the Roman general quickly to return, and as quickly to block up Niſibis, the principal fortreſs which the Perſians had on that ſide. Narſes finding himſelf diſappointed, for he conceived, that the Romans would immediately have given him battle a ſecond time, reſolved, if it was poſſible, to provoke them to fight. With this view he ſent a meſſage to Ardaburius, telling him, That if he would appoint a day, he would be ready to meet him in the field. But Ardaburius wiſely anſwered, That the Romans fought when they pleaſed themſelves, and not when their enemies thought it for their advantage. Varanes, in the mean time had ſollicited the Saracens to break with the Romans; and they very readily complied, their captain Alamundarus being naturally an enemy to the Romans. This man, having raiſed a prodigious army, promiſed the Perſian king to perform wonders, at leaſt to reduce Antioch and Syria under his power; neither meant he to perform leſs than he promiſed, for, paſſing the Euphrates, he broke, like a torrent, into the Roman province; but beginning to plunder without mercy, the people recovered their ſpirits, and, joining the Roman army, fell upon Alamundarus in his march, and cut to pieces a hundred thouſand

thouſand men, which forced the remainder of the Sa cens to fly with ſhame into their own country. W this news reached the ear of the Perſian monarch, w this further circumſtance, that Niſibis was ſo cloſely p ſed, that it could not long hold out, he determined put all things to the riſque, and to march to the r of that city, with the whole force of Perſia. This reſ tion once taken, Varanes inſtantly put it in execution, recting all his troops in the frontier provinces to rendezv at a certain time, and marched immediately with an arm had collected from the nine provinces of Perſia, together w his elephants, that his preſence might influence all the ne ſary preparations. His deſign ſucceeded perfectly well; by that time he entered Meſopotamia, all his generals w arrived; ſo that he advanced towards Niſibis with a prodig army. The Romans, hearing of his approach, the numbe elephants he brought with him, and his mighty ſtrength in valry, were ſeized with a ſudden pannic, and, without ſta for his coming, raiſed the ſiege, and fled. This was hi pleaſing to Varanes, who, thinking now the worſt was o retired to his capital, and left his generals to manage the w Herein he acted incautiouſly and unhappily; for the Rom recovering their ſpirits, defeated the Perſians in a pitched b tle, repulſed the Saracens a ſecond time, and, under the co mand of Ardaburius, beat the Perſian forces, with the ſlau ter not only of a great number of men, but of ſeven nerals. However, Varanes continued the war, and ing himſelf a prince of great firmneſs and much mili ſkill, he found means to make even victories diſadvantage to the Romans; for, by keeping a court on the front repairing his armies by conſtant ſupplies, and preſerving magazines in good order, he kept the enemy ſtill on the de ſive; and as they found it difficult to recruit, all actions were bloody, were favourable to the Perſians, tho' they w beaten. The emperor Theodoſius, perfectly ſenſible of ſituation of things, ſent Helion, a perſon of great diſtinct with a large body of troops, to reinforce his army, di ting him to enter into a negotiation with Varanes, and conclude a peace, if poſſible. Helion purſuing his inſtru tions, and finding the Roman army intrenched, ſent Ma min, the collegue of Ardaburius, to offer Varanes peace, certain conditions. Varanes ordered Maximin to be cond ted to the tent of one of his principal officers, and, in mean time, held a council of war, wherein it was reſol immedia

immediately to attack the Romans in their camp; and, in caſe they were repulſed, to accept the terms offered by Maximin. There was in the Perſian army a corps of troops, diſtinguiſhed by the title of immortal, becauſe their number was continually kept to ten thouſand men, by draughts out of other corps. This body of troops took upon themſelves this dangerous piece of ſervice, which, however, they reckoned would prove the leſs ſo, if they could take the Romans unprovided. In order to this they divided themſelves, and while five thouſand attacked the intrenchments, the other five thouſand formed behind a hill, waiting there for an opportunity to attack the Romans in flank. But their enterprize miſcarried; for Procopius, a Roman general, obſerving the troops that were formed behind the hill, marched round with a great body of forces, and getting between them and thoſe who attacked the Roman camp, charged them on all ſides with incredible fury; ſo that the victory was quickly determined on the ſide of the Romans, with a prodigious ſlaughter of the Perſian ſoldiery. Varanes then condeſcended to hear Maximin; and when that officer had explained to him his maſter's demands, he told him, That, for his ſake, he would be content to make peace on thoſe terms, and put an end to the ſeverities exerciſed upon the chriſtians. An accident, however, happened, which carried this matter much farther, and contributed more than the peace between the two empires to the re-eſtabliſhment of chriſtianity in Perſia. It was this. When the province of Azazene was ravaged by the Romans in the beginning of the war, ſeven thouſand Perſians were brought priſoners to the city of Amida, where they fell into extreme want. Acaſes, biſhop of that place, having aſſembled his clergy, repreſented to them in the moſt pathetic terms the miſery of theſe unhappy priſoners. He then obſerved, that as the Almighty preferred mercy to ſacrifice, ſo he would certainly be better pleaſed with the relief of theſe his creatures, than with being ſerved in gold and ſilver veſſels in the churches. The clergy entertained this motion not only with readineſs but with applauſe, ſold all the conſecrated veſſels, and having maintained the Perſians during the war, ſent the whole ſeven thouſand home, at the concluſion of the peace, with money in their pockets. Varanes was ſo much aſtoniſhed at this, that he ſent to invite the biſhop to his capital, where he received him with the utmoſt reverence, and did the chriſtians tians many favours at his requeſt. After this, Varanes enjoyed peace as long as he lived; and, having reigned twenty years, died, beloved and honoured by his ſubjects [n].

Varanes VI. Year of Chriſt 442.

To Varanes the fifth ſucceeded Varanes the ſixth, or, as he is called by ſome authors, Iſdigertes. It is not probable that he ever broke the peace made by his father with the Romans; inaſmuch as we meet with nothing concerning him in any of the Greek hiſtorians, further than that he was contemporary with Theodoſius the ſecond, and his ſucceſſor Marcianus, and that he reigned ſeventeen years and four months [o].

Peroſes. Year of Chriſt 458.

PEROSES ſucceeded his father Varanes or Iſdigertes. He was a prince of a reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit, and could not bear that the Hunns, who at this time, began to be terrible as well to his ſubjects as to thoſe of the Conſtantinopolitan emperors, ſhould encroach, as they daily did, upon his dominions. Thoſe he had to do with were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Euthalites, or white Hunns, and were much more civilized than the reſt, as living in cities, and under a certain form of government; which the reſt of their nation did not. To rid himſelf of thoſe neighbours, Peroſes marched at the head of a great army, after having carefully ſettled the affairs of his empire, and done all that in him lay to ſecure its peace in his abſence. Gonza was the capital of the nation he attacked, and lay directly north of Perſia. Peroſes marched ſtrait thither, hoping to put an end to the war by a general action. But the Euthalites, or Nephalites, as ſome authors call them, were wiſer. They knew that a waſted country was not loſt; and therefore, retiring continually, they drew Peroſes and his army ſo far into their territories, as to cut off their retreat, and, at the ſame time, to hinder them from receiving proviſions. The diſtreſs of the Perſians was ſo great, and the ſoldiers were ſo enfeebled and diſpirited, that they were conſtrained to accept any conditions that were offered them. The king of the Euthalites, being informed of their condition, ſent to acquaint Peroſes, that if he had a mind to deliver himſelf and his army, he might do it upon theſe terms, viz. ſwearing never to invade the Euthalites, and coming to do homage to him as his lord. To the firſt of theſe Peroſes readily yielded; but the laſt ſeemed intolerable. At laſt the magi, who were about his perſon, propoſed to him an expedient, which removed all difficulties. This expedi-

er

[n] Socrat. hiſt. eccleſ. l. vii. c. 17—21. Zonar. hiſt. Rom. A. C. 435. Agath. hiſt. l. iv. p. 137. [o] Agath. ubi ſupra.

ent was, that he ſhould go pay his compliments to the king of the Euthalites at ſun-riſing, when his proſtrating himſelf would be underſtood by that king as an act of ſubmiſſion; but by himſelf would be conceived to be no more than an act of reverence to the ſun. This expedient was approved and carried inſtantly into execution. The king of the Euthalites was ſatisfied, and Peroſes, with the remainder of his army, returned back into Perſia. As ſoon as he had a little ſettled his affairs, and had leiſure to look about him, the Perſian monarch, unmindful of his oath, provided for a ſecond expedition againſt the Hunns. He took, however, more prudent meaſures than before; that is, he not only raiſed a very numerous army, but he likewiſe took care to be well furniſhed with proviſions. He alſo ſettled his domeſtic concerns in the beſt manner poſſible; and leaving the prince his ſon regent of the kingdom, he began his march a ſecond time towards the northern frontiers of his empire. The Euthalites ſuppoſing, as they very well might, that Peroſes would expect to penetrate, as he did before, into the heart of their country, carried off their effects, but concealed their forces behind certain mountains, from whence iſſuing ſuddenly on all ſides of the Perſian army, they totally routed it, and, at their leiſure, killed or made priſoners almoſt all the ſoldiers of whom it was compoſed, amongſt whom Peroſes himſelf periſhed, when he had worn the Perſian diadem twenty years [p] (O).

WHEN the Perſians had received advice of the diſaſtrous death of their king, they made choice of his brother Obalas, Valens. Year of Chriſt 482.

[p] Procop. de bell. Perſic. l. i. c. 24. p. 10. Agath. hiſt. l. iv. p. 138. Cedren. hiſt. comp p. 355.

(O) The ſtory of Peroſes is related at large by Procopius, in the beginning of his memoirs of the Perſian war. He informs us, that, in his firſt expedition, the Perſian monarch carried with him a certain Roman embaſſador, whoſe name was Euſebius, a discreet perſon, and one equally beloved by the king and by his nobility. Him therefore, when the Perſian generals had diſcovered the miſerable ſituation they were in, they made choice of to break the matter to Peroſes, that, before it was too late, ſome method might be taken, to extricate them out of their misfortunes. Euſebius, having artfully drawn the king into a diſcourſe of the preſence of mind neceſſary in great diſtreſſes, and being deſired to ſpeak his mind freely of the ſtate they were now in, he told Peroſes this ſtory: A lion once ſaw a kid tied or, as he is uſually called by the Greek writers, Valens, not caring to truſt ſo young a perſon as Cavades then was, with the reigns of government, tho' his father had left him regent. This Valens proved an excellent prince, tender, compaſſionate, juſt, affable, and deſirous of aſſuaging, as far as he might, the miſery of his country, almoſt wholly ſubjected by the Euthalites, to whom, for two years, he paid tribute, and with whom, for two others, he held war. At length, worn out with cares, he died, after a ſhort and troubleſome reign of four years, the leſs regretted by his ſubjects, on account of his being a man peaceably diſpoſed, and therefore very unfit to reſtore the antient luſtre of the kingdom [p] (P).

at

Cavades. Year of Chriſt, 486.

CAVADES, or, as he is frequently called, Cabades, aſcended the throne on the demiſe of his uncle. He was a prince at a diſtance, and preſſed by hunger, leaped at it with all his force; but, falling ſhort of his prey, he dropped into a pit, which had been prepared for him, and out of which all his force could not deliver him. Peroſes eaſily comprehended the drift of this fable, and, by the advice of his magi, acted as the reader hath been told above. In his ſecond expedition, Peroſes wanted ſuch an adviſer, otherwiſe he had not fallen as he did. The enemy, it ſeems, having timely notice of his intention, ſpent many months in digging a vaſt ditch in the midſt of a plain, and in removing all the earth which was thrown out of it. In the middle they left a narrow neck of land, and having covered this mighty ditch with hurdles, they ſtrewed theſe with mould, and covered them with graſs plots. This done, they drew all their forces, on the approach of Peroſes, into a line of battle before the ditch, and, as the Perſian troops advanced, they drew off in cloſe order croſs the neck of land. The Perſian cavalry following them with great fury, puſhed each other into the ditch, and ſo became a ſacrifice to this incenſed people. Peroſes is ſaid to have had no leſs than thirty ſons grown up to man's eſtate, who all periſhed with him here. Cavades being left at home, on account of his youth, and that the kingdom might be preſerved to the immediate offspring of Peroſes (45).

[p] Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 356. Agath. hiſt. l. iv. p. 138.

(P) There cannot be any thing more perplexed than the accounts given us by the Greek writers of theſe white Hunns, who prince of a high ſpirit; one who loved war, and underſtood it; ready to undertake any thing for the extending of his dominion, and jealous to the laſt degree of his authority, and the glory of the Perſian name. At firſt theſe qualities were extremely uſeful to his ſubjects; for, in all probability, had they not been governed by ſo warlike and enterprizng a prince, they had never recovered their independency, but had ſunk under the weight of thoſe continual invaſions, made upon them by the Euthalites, whom no tribute could content, no treaties reſtrain. Againſt theſe enemies Cavades ſet himſelf with great reſolution; and, making uſe of the ſame policy which they had done towards his father, drew them, by ſmall bodies, in hopes of plunder, far into his country, and, in their return, cut them off. When, by this means, they were cured of their practice of invading, he turned his arms upon them; but warily, ſuſtaining one body of troops by another, that by a third; wintering ſometimes in their country, till at laſt he quite broke their ſpirits, and obliged them to own him for their ſovereign, whom they thought to have had for their ſubject. This war finiſhed, Cavades, from being terrible to his enemies, became no leſs ſo to his ſubjects. His enterprizing, reſtleſs for a time, ſo terribly diſtreſſed the Perſians. Procopius, who ſpeaks more at large of them than any other writer, calls them Ephthalites, and ſays, they inhabited a country to the north of Perſia. Their chief city, according to him, was Gorgo, on the very frontiers of Perſia (46). Agathias calls theſe people Nephthalites. They are generally agreed to have been the ſame people, who, in other antient authors, are called Indoſcythæ (47). All this will give the reader but very little, if any, light at all. From the Oriental hiſtorians we learn, that their true name was Haiathalites, and that they poſſeſſed a large tract of country between the Indies and Perſia, till they began to make encroachments on the country laſt-mentioned, after they had made choice of Balkh for their metropolis (48). This is plain and intelligible to every man that is acquainted with the Oriental geography; and we ſhall make the whole hiſtory of this war much more uniform and perſpicuous, when we come to ſpeak of it from the memoirs of the Eaſtern writers. At preſent this is ſufficient to demonſtrate the great utility of theſe compariſons, deſpiſed only by ſuch as either cannot, or are unwilling to, be at the pains neceſſary to ſuch an undertaking.

(45) Procop. de bell. Perſic. l. i. c. 3. p. 9. Agath. Scholast. l. iv. p. 137. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 355, 356.

(46) De bell. Perſic. l. i. c. 3. (47) Agath. Scholaſt. l. iv. (48) Mirkhond. ſect. 31.

genius, incapable of brooking any reſtraints, put him upon altering the conſtitution of his kingdom, and depriving all the nobility of thoſe privileges and prerogatives, which they had enjoyed under his predeceſſors. He likewiſe became intolerably proud, would ſcarce allow any of them to enter his preſence, or adviſe him in his affairs; but acted with ſuch an arbitrary fierceneſs, as would have given a very bad colour to his proceedings, had they been really juſt in themſelves. At length he puſhed his extravagancy ſo far, as to publiſh an edict, whereby all the women in the empire were declared common to all the men therein. This the Perſian nobility thought too much to be endured, and therefore they inſtantly aſſembled, ſeized on the perſon of the king, depoſed him, and caſt him into priſon, ſuppoſing that leſs than this could not ſecure themſelves in ſafety, or the kingdom in peace. This happened after he had reigned eleven years, and appears to have been as total a revolution as ever happened in any kingdom, there being ſcarce any who adhered to the depoſed prince; and thoſe that did were conſtrained to be ſilent, for his ſake, as well as for their own. [r].

Zambades. Year of Chriſt, 497.

ZAMBADES, whom ſome call Blaſes, others Lamaſes, and who is by ſome ſaid to have been the ſon, by others the brother, of Peroſes, conſequently the uncle or brother of Cavades, was elected king in his ſtead. The firſt thing the new king did was, to aſſemble a general council of the nobility, in which he deſired they would conſider and determine what ſhould be done with Cavades. The people had before declared, that they conſidered the perſon of their prince as ſacred; however, the council were very much divided, eſpecially when Guſanaſtades, who was poſſeſſed of the higheſt office in the kingdom, drew a little knife out of his pocket, with which he was wont to pare his nails; and when he had made them take notice of the ſmallneſs of its blade, This, ſaid he, properly applied now, will do what twenty thouſand men will not be able to do, if you let this opportunity ſlip. At laſt it was unanimouſly determined, that the king ſhould, for his unworthy adminiſtration of the government, ſuffer perpetual impriſonment, and be for ever forgotten by his people, whoſe allegiance from thenceforwards was to be transferred to Zambades. This prince prince had indeed all the properties neceſſary to give luſtre to a crown juſtly attained. He was equally wiſe and indulgent, deſirous of reſtoring order, and of making the people happy; and applied himſelf with great induſtry to remedy thoſe evils, which had taken birth from his predeceſſor's conduct and example. But while he was thus employed, a new ſtorm aroſe, which, after throwing the whole kingdom into violent convulſions, at length produced a ſecond revolution. Thus it happened [s].

[r] Agath. hiſt. lib. iv. p. 139. Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 5. p. 16. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 356. Theophylact. hiſt. p. 99.

The depoſed king eſcapes.

THE keeper of the caſtle, in which Cavades was impriſoned, became enamoured of his queen, who alone remained attached to him in all his misfortunes, and who failed not to bring him neceſſaries with her own hands, though ſhe was not permitted to ſee him. With much ado, however, ſhe procured leave to write to him, and having acquainted him with the ſituation of things, Cavades by letter directed her to ſooth the paſſion of his goaler, in order to get admittance to him. This the lady did ſo effectually, that ſhe had acceſs to her huſband when ſhe pleaſed, and thereby an opportunity of acquainting him that he had ſtill one friend left, who was ready to undertake any thing for his ſervice. The name of this man was Seſoſes, a perſon of quality, who had a great number of dependents, among whom he collected a troop fit to attend the king where-ever he ſhould think fit, when he ſhould be once ſafely out of the caſtle. The care of this the queen took upon herſelf; for ſtaying, as ſhe often did, late in the evening, ſhe dreſſed the king in her cloaths, wherein he went out, and having put on his, remained in his ſtead. As ſhe pretended to be ſick, and not to leave her bed for ſome days, the cheat was not diſcovered, ſo that Cavades had time enough given him to ſave himſelf, which he did in the company of Seſoſes and his friends, who conducted him quite through Perſia into the territories of the Euthalites, whoſe king received him with great honour, and readily granted him his protection. As for the queen, there is nothing ſaid of her fate with certainty; however, hiſtorians intimate, that more of reſentment than of pity was ſhewn in the treatment towards her. As for Cavades, the king of the Euthalites entertained him ſplendidly, treated him as his good friend and ally, and gave him his daughter in marriage. After this the Perſian king began to hold correſpondence with ſome of the nobility, and finding or believing he found in his people a propenſity to receive him once more as their ſovereign, he perſuaded his father-in-law to furniſh him with an army; and this favour being readily accorded to him, he no ſooner ſaw the troops in a readineſs, than he put himſelf at their head, and marched directly into Perſia [t].

[s] Agath. Procop. Cedren. Theoph. ubi. ſupra.

Cavades reſtored. Year of Chriſt, 501.

CAVADES entered firſt into the province, of which Guſanaſtades, who had threatened his life, was governor, where he inſtantly cauſed proclamation to be made, that this man, as a rebel, ſtood deprived of his charge, and that himſelf would inſtantly confer it on him, who ſhould firſt pay his duty to him on a day aſſigned. His friends repreſented to the king, that this was innovating the eſtabliſhed laws which fixed the governments of provinces in certain houſes. Cavades, however, affected to remain firm; but at the day conferred the office of governor upon Adergunabades, a young nobleman next of kin to the deprived governor, who, as it was concerted, paid his compliments to him firſt. After this he proceeded to the capital of Perſia, and repoſſeſſed himſelf of the throne, almoſt as eaſily as he had been ejected. His conduct upon this extraordinary change in his affairs was ſuitable to the fierceneſs of his temper. Zambades he deprived of ſight and impriſoned, after he had for four years worn the royal title. Guſanaſtades he put to death; and that his reſtoration might be adorned with one act of generoſity amidſt ſo much ſeverity, he erected a new office for his friend Seſoſes, whom he made lieutenant general of his kingdom [u].

Invades the Roman provinces.

IT was not long before the king of the Euthalites preſſed his ſon-in-law to repay the great ſums of money he had lent him. Cavades found he had it not in his power to comply with his demand, and therefore deſired Anaſtaſius, then emperor of the eaſt, to accommodate him with the ſum he wanted, offering to pay intereſt for it, which was refuſed. Cavades readily conceiving that there was now no way to avoid breaking with his father-in-law, but by making war upon the Romans, choſe this as the leſſer evil of the two, and, having a conſiderable body of forces about him, made a ſudden irruption into Armenia, preventing, by the quickneſs of his march, the very report of his expedi-

[t] Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 6. Agath. Cedren. ubi ſupra.
[u] Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 6. p. 19. Agath. Hiſt. lib. iv. p. 139. Cedren. H. C. p. 336. Theophylact. lib. iv. p. 10 expedition. By this method he answered his purpose; for the inhabitants having no time to withdraw their effects, he raised excessive contributions; after which he besieged Amida, the principal fortress in those parts, in form. As the province had for many years enjoyed a profound peace, the city was wholly unprovided either of garrison or of magazines; however, the citizens refused to open their gates, and prepared to make an obstinate defence. Cavades, who delighted in war, and who understood it perfectly well, practised all the methods then in use for reducing fortified places, but in vain; at length, however, when he and his principal commanders were almost in despair, a tower was surprized by the supine negligence of certain monks, on the eightieth day from the commencement of the siege. At first Cavades suffered his soldiers to put the inhabitants to the sword. A citizen thereupon told him, it was unworthy of a hero to put those to death who were unable to resist, "Why then, said the king, did you pre-"tend to treat me as an enemy? Because, said the citi-"zen, it was the will of God to deliver Amida, not to "your will, but to your valour." Cavades, charmed with this compliment, ordered the citizens to be spared. Some time afterwards he restored to them their privileges, directed the walls and public buildings to be repaired, and leaving therein Glones, a Persian nobleman, with a garrison of a thousand men, he treated it afterwards rather as a benefactor than a conqueror [x].

Defeats several Roman generals.

As soon as the news of this invasion reached Rome, the emperor took the necessary precautions for assembling an army, which was accordingly done; and orders were given them to march to the frontiers with all imaginable expedition. The Greek writers tell us, that there never were better forces sent against the Persians, than this army was composed of, or generals of greater reputation. Cavades on his side took the field early, and being informed that the Roman officers differed among themselves, and had divided their forces into several independent corps, he resolved to attack them as speedily as he could. He first fell upon Ariobindus, who, on the approach of the Persians, shamefully abandoned his camp, and fled to an adjacent city. Eight hundred Euthalites, who were the forlorn hope of Cavades's army army, in their next march fell in with a conſiderable body of Roman troops, commanded by Hypatius, and were by them entirely cut to pieces on the ſide of a river, the ſtream of which they died with their blood. It was not long before the Perſian monarch arrived on its banks, where gueſſing by the colour of the water what had happened, he immediately conceived, that he ſhould find the Romans ſecure and unprovided. Whereupon, inſtead of making a halt, he puſhed on with his cavalry; and, as he conjectured, finding the Romans eating, drinking, and waſhing themſelves in the river, he ſeverely revenged the death of his friends, by putting almoſt this whole body of Romans to death without any reſiſtance [y].

[x] Procop. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 7. p. 20. Cedren. H. C. p. 169.

Makes an advantageous peace,

